divisions, on which about 40 per cent of the poor rate was now levied, were made for the special purpose not only of the election of Guardians, but of being the ordinary area of rating. The English parishes, on the contrary, handed down from ages long gone by, were areas with every kind of anomaly and variety, and were very much smaller in average extent than the electoral divisions in Ireland, which were, on an average, something like 6,000 acres. Moreover, the complaints against the old parochial rating system of England were not made in Ireland to the same extent against the electoral division rating. The great reason which induced Parliament to adopt Union rating in England was the feeling excited by the removal of the poor from what were called close parishes. The old English Poor Law specially favoured the practice of removal, because under the system of averages, by which the cost of maintaining the irremovable poor was placed on the Common Fund, to which each parish contributed on the average of its poor law expenditure for three years, it was clear that if the landowners could remove the poor altogether from a parish, that parish ceased to become chargeable with any poor rate at all. No such practice existed in Ireland, and no proof whatever had been shown that the removal of paupers for the sake of relieving the electoral divisions ever prevailed there to any great extent. The hon. Member for Limerick, who had introduced the subject with so much ability, wished to equalize, as far as possible, the charge for the poor in Ireland. But if they were to have Union rating in that country to-morrow, it would not equalize that charge, and the differences of rating would be far greater in various parts of Ireland than in England. He could quote instances of Unions in the four Provinces which would prove it. For instance, under the system of Union rating, one Union in Ulster would have to pay 2s. 2½d., another in the same Province only 6d. In Munster, while one Union would pay 2s. 11½d., another would pay 9d. In Connaught, one Union would pay 2s. 9d., another 7½d.; and in Leinster, one Union would pay 2s. 3d., another 7d. He mentioned that to show that the object of the hon. Member could not be attained by Union rating, but only by a national rate, which would be the overthrow of the present system of Poor Law, and would never receive the sanction of the House. The Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick was for the adoption of Union rating in Ireland precisely in the same way as in England. But by all who had considered the question, it would be admitted that a small area was almost essential for the proper administration of out-door relief. The adoption of the area of English Unions for out-door relief was, in his opinion, a mistake, and it would be a still greater mistake to adopt the larger area of Irish Unions for the same purpose. In Ireland out-door relief had increased of late years to an extent that bade fair to take away one of the great advantages that had hitherto been attributed to the Irish Poor Law system. On the whole, he thought the House would be agreed that the charge for out-door relief should not be levied upon the basis of a Union charge, and the question to be decided, therefore, was, whether the charge now placed on electoral divisions in order to defray the expense of maintaining and clothing paupers in the workhouses was so to remain, with unequal incidence, or whether it would be better to make it a Union charge. At one time it struck him that the best mode of dealing with the question would be to place all in-door relief upon the Unions and retain out-door relief upon the electoral divisions. But when he came to consider the details of this solution he found this important objection to it, in addition to others that had been urged—namely, that in order to relieve a small number of heavily-rated electoral divisions it would make an important change in the area of rating through the whole country. He had, therefore, to abandon that proposal. So the question rested at the end of last Session. Since then he had been in communication on the subject with hon. Members on both sides of the House, and with noble Lords sitting in the other House, who were greatly interested in the management of Poor Law matters in Ireland. He thought, after all, the question would be met by placing the charge for the deaf and dumb paupers, on the Union rate, and relieving certain electoral divisions of part of the heavy charge for the maintenance of in-door paupers by rate in aid might be so arranged that it would secure economy, even in the cases mentioned by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing). He proposed, where the charge on any electoral division for the maintenance and clothing of electoral division in-door paupers exceeded the average rate of charge on the Union for that purpose by more than 50 per cent, that the excess above that 50 per cent should be levied as a Union rate; provided that no electoral division would be so relieved, on which this charge did not exceed 1s. in the pound. The details were difficult to explain; but he would bring in a Bill in which his proposals would be embodied. He thought in this way they might secure what was wanted—namely, relief in a comparatively small number of electoral divisions without interfering with the Poor Law system throughout the country. The provisions of the rate-in-aid would apply to 91 Unions out of 163. In that Bill there would be a provision in regard to the valuation of electoral divisions. It was no doubt the fact that in some of the electoral divisions the apparently high poundage rate now levied was due to a very low valuation. The provision to which he referred would enable the Guardians of any Union where a rate-in-aid was levied to have their Union re-valued in order that the poundage of all the electoral divisions might as far as possible be put on a fair basis. These would be the main provisions of the Bill, which he hoped shortly to lay before the House, and he trusted they would be regarded as a fair attempt to meet the question and to give relief where it was wanted, as well as to secure administrative economy.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was fair and reasonable.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, after the statement of the right hon. Baronet, he begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS BILL.

Notice being taken of the language contained in the Petition from Newark Street, Leicester, in favour of the an Institutions

MR. CALLAN moved—

“That the Order that the Petition do lie upon the Table, be read, and discharged, on account of the unbecoming language used therein.”

The hon. Gentleman said, it was true that considerable liberty was given with reference to the language of Petitions; but when an hon. Member presented a Petition containing charges of an awful nature he ought within a reasonable time—certainly within a month—to found some Motion on that Petition. Six weeks had now elapsed since the presentation of this Petition; but the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had not founded any Motion upon it. The Petition, among other things, stated that in many of the convents the inmates were put to death and that the nuns became the victims of horrors that far surpassed anything that entered into the minds of the public generally. Upon the ground, therefore, that the language of the Petition was unbecoming, he moved that the Order of the Day that the Petition from Newark lie upon the Table be read and discharged.

MR. WHALLEY trusted the House would pause before accepting this Motion, because it involved a question in respect to the right of petitioning which was entirely novel. He had carefully read this Petition, and although he should have recommended the petitioners to withdraw many of the expressions in the Petition, yet the statements contained in it were strictly and historically true, and could be proved verbatim et literatim by evidence such as hon. Members were in the habit of acting upon.

MR. ANDERSON thought it could not be denied that the expressions used in that Petition were very improper, but, on the other hand, they were bound in every possible way to protect the right of Petition; and as that particular Petition had, he believed, been received and printed by the Committee on Petitions, it would be a virtual censure on them to reject it without first hearing their explanation of the matter.

MR. O'CONOR said, it had been before explained by the Chairman of the Committee on Petitions that that Petition, or one similar to it, had been printed by pure inadvertence, owing to the very great number of Petitions which came in on the same day.

MR. ORMSBY GORE confirmed this statement, and said that what had occurring in that case would cause the Committee to observe great caution in future.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that all must feel that the right of petitioning was a very sacred one, and one with which they ought to be careful how they interfered. It, however, must be borne in mind that there were necessary Rules to maintain the proper position of the House, and one of them was that Petitions should be couched in temperate and respectful language. Ordinarily speaking, the House trusted to the judgment of the Committee of Petitions to reject any Petition containing language of a character which ought not to be laid on the Table. But they could understand how, under the circumstances just mentioned by two Members of that Committee, those particular Petitions had escaped notice and been inadvertently received. On the whole, he thought the House had better adopt the Motion for the discharge of the Petition.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Order that the Petition do lie upon the Table be read, and discharged, on account of the unbecoming language used therein.—(Mr. Callan.)

BOULOGNE SUR MER PETITION.

Your Committee, having taken Evidence and having searched for precedents, do not advise the reception of the Petition by the House.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LICENSING BOARDS) BILL.

(Mr. Joseph Cowen, Sir Henry Havelock, Mr. Burt, Mr. Norwood.)

[BILL 6.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. COWEN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was simple, soon stated, and easily understood. It proposed to vest the power of granting, withholding, and transferring licences for the sale of intoxicating drinks, now enjoyed by the magistrates in a board elected by and composed of ratepayers. The constituency would be all persons who were rated, or liable to be rated, for the relief of the poor. The qualification for members would be rateability and residence, and the jurisdiction of the board would be co-extensive with the Poor Law Unions. The elections would be triennial, the voting by ballot, and each ratepayer would give one vote for each candidate. The cost of the elections and the working of the board would be defrayed out of the local rates. The number of members of the board would vary according to populations—never being less than five, nor more than 21. Against the decision of the board there would be no appeal to magistrates in quarter sessions or other authorities. All the licensing powers that the magistrates now possessed would be handed over to the boards without curtailment, and without addition; but there would be no interference with the ordinary licensing laws. The regulations that now existed with respect to the opening and closing of public-houses and the police restrictions, would be the same under the Bill as they were at present. There were many other details in the Bill, regulating elections for and the working of the boards, but in none of these details was there any principle involved. They were merely matters of convenience and arrangement, and if the Bill should be so fortunate as to be read a second time, these could be altered in Committee as the House thought fit. The vital principle of the Bill was the transference of the power of granting licences from a class to the people—from an irresponsible to a representative body. The reasons for the Bill were two-fold. First, he asked for it as an act of justice to the ratepayers; and, second, as a means of mitigating the evils of intemperance. Men of all parties, classes, and creeds were agreed that drunkenness was the curse of our age and country. No sane man would attempt to apologize for or excuse, much less defend, the vice. The subject had been written about so extensively, and spoken of so often, that it was almost impossible to give expression to a new thought upon it, or to clothe an old thought in fresh language. Medical men, Judges, police authorities—all persons, indeed, interested in the administration of criminal justice—Poor Law Guardians, and the number of excellent men and women who were daily concerning themselves with the social betterance of the people, were all agreed that most of the pauperism, much of the crime, and a great portion of the insanity in the country were due to the excessive use of intoxicating drinks. It had been estimated that two-thirds of the pauperism, three-fourths of the crime, and half the insanity were thus occasioned. He gave these figures not as facts, but as calculations. They did not possess sufficient data to form an absolute conclusion on the subject, but the opinion that had been expressed was worthy of consideration. The indirect evils of intemperance were scarcely less than the direct miseries it inflicted. There was not a household in the land that had not felt its blighting and baneful influence. The wisest and the ablest and the best amongst them had suffered either by themselves, or through their connections, from its demoralizing and degrading contaminations. He believed he spoke the unanimous sentiments of the House when he said they were all anxious to discover some remedy that would, if not remove, at least moderate the injuries sustained by the nation from intoxication. Drunkards did not suffer themselves only for their vices—they entailed suffering and expenditure on others. Poor houses, lunatic asylums, and gaols, had to be erected, upheld, and the inmates maintained, by the sober and thrifty section of the community. It was difficult to calculate the exact amount thrown on the rates by this selfish and self-destroying custom. It was customary of late years to include in the poor rate almost every new local rate that was imposed, but, making all necessary deductions, he calculated that the sober and thrifty ratepayers paid no less a sum than £20,000,000 a-year for the direct and indirect consequences of drunkenness. This amount might be considered excessive by some, but he believed the Poor Law and prison returns would sustain it. On these two points—that intemperance was an evil, and a consequent expense to the ratepayers—he believed he would carry the united support of hon. Members. His third point might not receive such general approval. He maintained that the excessive and unnecessary multiplication of public-houses was productive of drunkenness. He knew this view was not universally held, as he had that morning received a letter from a gentleman, written with great ability, and in which figures were very adroitly manipulated, showing, or attempting to show, that the more public-houses they had the less drunkenness they had. He did not think the view of his correspondent would be acceptable to the House. Committees of the House of Commons had sat at various times—in 1834, in 1853, and at more recent dates—examining into the cause of intemperance and the best means for its cure. The all but unanimous opinion of the witnesses called before those Committees was to the effect that an excessive traffic in drink was productive of drunkenness. The Church of Scotland, some years ago, alarmed at the spread of intemperance, appointed a Committee of their body to make a like investigation. Their report was equally decisive as to the injurious influence of the public-house. The Lower House of Convocation of the Church of England also appointed, quite recently, a committee, under the presidency of Archdeacon Sandford, to inquire into the question. An immense mass of valuable and trustworthy evidence was collected from all parts of the country, and from all classes of men. Again, the all but unanimous opinion of the persons referred to was, that you could always tell the amount of drunkenness in a place by knowing the number of public-houses. As far as evidence could justify an opinion, therefore, the evidence at their disposal showed that with extended traffic they had extended drunkenness. Now, his (Mr. Cowen's) argument was this—That inasmuch as public-houses caused drunkenness, as drunkenness caused crime, pauperism, and insanity, and as these in their turn threw a heavy tax on the ratepayers, the ratepayers ought to possess the power of regulating and controlling the licensing authority. He did not think that by abolishing all public-houses you would necessarily abolish all drunkenness. A man could drink in his own house, even to excess. No one had ever proposed that the law should interfere with the exercise of this individual right. Intemperance arising in this way was beyond the reach of legislation. All that had ever been proposed was to deal with the open and public drinking. In asking that the power of licensing should be vested in the people, he was simply asking for the extension of a principle that was acted upon in all other local institutions. The men who paid the educational rate voted for members of school boards, the men who paid the sanitary and municipal taxes voted for the members of local boards and town councils. All he was now contending for was that the men who paid the drunkards' rate should control the social mechanism that manufactured drunkards. The licensing authorities now were the magistrates. He objected to them possessing that power for two reasons. First, because they were drawn from a class not fully acquainted with the social requirements of the people, and second, because they were irresponsible. He had no wish to speak with unnecessary harshness of the unpaid magistracy, but he was simply stating what was the fact, when he said that men were put on the Commission of the Peace not because they were qualified for discharging the duties of the office. Before a man was made a Justice, it was not necessary for him to have any judicial training or legal knowledge. If he had a certain social standing in his town or county, if his personal character was moderately reputable, and if he had been a more or less active partizan of either of the two political parties of the State, he could have no difficulty in being raised to the local bench. He knew that the political aspect of the magisterial creations was disputed, but he felt satisfied that facts warranted the statement he had made. They had a phrase in America to the effect that "to the victors belong the spoils," and when a change of Government took place in the United States, every officer, from the President of the Republic to the most obscure postmaster, was changed. They did these things better in this country than that, for whatever changes of Government we had, the permanent officials of the Administration were not altered. But whenever either of our political Parties changed sides in that House, there suddenly arose from all parts of the country a mysterious demand for an increase in the borough magistracy. It was both amusing and instructive to note that requirements for additional magistrates always sprung up just after an alteration of the Government had been effected. When the Conservatives came into office in 1866, in less than three months after their accession to power the magistracy in the county of Lancashire was increased one-fourth. He did not know whether this accession to the unpaid justices had anything to do with the subsequent Conservative reaction that took place in that county. He did know, however, that some inconvenience had been experienced by the list of J. P's. and D. L's. being swollen so rapidly, and so largely. He had heard of some local publisher who had been accustomed to print annually an almanack or county directory, in which were recited the names of the local magnates. The sheets for this publication were prepared in advance, and a little space was left for adding the names of the magistrates. It was found, however, that the number had been run up so largely, that the poor publisher, or publishers, was compelled to issue a supplement, so as to include all the new dignitaries that had been created. When the present Administration came into office a number of magistrates were again made. There were upwards of 3,000 borough magistrates in England and Wales. About one-half that number had been created within the last 10 years, and 300 of them were made in 1874, within seven or eight months after the present Government got office. The late Sir Arthur Helps, shortly before his death, said that he could not recollect during all his varied and extended official career that he ever knew a case of political jobbery. The late Clerk to the Council was not only an able, but an amiable, and unsuspecting man, and he (Mr. Cowen) feared that his opinion as to the absolute purity of either or both Parties in the State would not be confirmed by anyone who had been engaged in the rough and tumble political life of the last quarter of a century. He did not charge the Tories exclusively with using their power for Party purposes. The other side were also to blame. The only Party that was clear was the unfortunate Radical party to which he belonged. The only difference between the Parties was that the Liberals had been in office almost continuously for a number of years, and their appointments had been spread over a length of time, whilst the Tories had usually been made in lumps. He did not wish to be as hard on the "Great Unpaid" as his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) sometimes was. He believed the magistrates administered substantial justice in a rough and ready way. Whatever might be the political proclivities of the men before they were put on the Commission of the Peace, when in office he believed they fairly and conscientiously strove to do their duty on all general questions that came before them. He would not, however, like to trust to the impartiality of a county bench of magistrates when a game case was submitted to their consideration. Nor would he like to place much reliance on the fairness of either a borough or county bench when they were called upon to adjudicate on any question that referred to trades unions or to labour organizations. Indeed, the Government themselves, and Parliament also, had taken that view of the magisterial character, for in the Labour Laws Bill of last Session the powers of the justices were restricted by special enactment. The same objection that there was to the impartiality of magistrates in game law and trade cases applied to their dealing with licences. A licence was granted upon the theory that the public required it. The requirement of the people was a very elastic term that could be stretched either way without any great charge of partiality being sustained. He did not accuse the magistrates generally of granting licences improperly, but he did say that without proper consideration, and very often for purposes of obliging a friend, or serving a political partizan, they allowed the interests of the people to suffer. It was true that their authority in this respect had been much curtailed by the continuous criticism that had of recent years been passed upon their proceedings. Still, however, they were amenable to the political and personal influences he had mentioned. It was a settled point of the jurisprudence of this country that judicial authority should be dissevered from the exercise of patronage. In their Judges was vested the appointment of their own assistants and clerks, but beyond that they had no power to dispense offices of trust or value. The patronage of the nation was vested in the responsible Government. The Government had to account for the exercise of their power to Parliament, and Parliament in its turn to the country. In this way a wholesome restraint was put upon the exercise of this privilege. Although this was the general principle, they departed from it in the power they gave the justices. A licence was a piece of property. It was worth £200, £300, £400, or £500, according to circumstances. The law as it now stood enabled the men who had received their appointments as magistrates for political services to give this valuable property to their supporters and adherents without being liable to either criticism or control. They might exercise that power fairly and they might do it corruptly. He proposed to withdraw that authority from them, so as to prevent the suspicion of corruption in persons administering a department of the criminal law. But the magistrates could not only enhance the value of one man's property, but they could also, by conferring a licence, decrease the value of his neighbour's. He recollected a case which occurred quite recently, illustrative of this point. A piece of property had to be sold for purposes of a trust. It was put up for auction, and a certain sum was bid for it, but not being sufficient, the property was bought in. In three or four months afterwards it was again put up, and the price obtained was less by £800 than what had been previously offered. The cause of this difference was easily explained. In the meantime the magistrates had granted a licence for a spirit bar in the immediate neighbourhood. By adding this licence they more than quadrupled the rental of the publican, while they sent the value of his neighbour's house down by the amount he had named. It might be said that the same influence could be used by, and the same objection urged against, the exercise of this authority by

Licensing Boards that was urged against its exercise by the magistrates. He (Mr. Cowen) at once acknowledged that this was the case. The members of the Licensing Board would neither be perfect nor infallible. They would be amenable to some of the influences the magistracy were controlled by. But there was this very marked difference between the two. The magistrates were practically an irresponsible body. They were nominally accountable to the Secretary of State, and could be dismissed by the Lord Chancellor for any serious breach of law or duty; but they knew that, in practice, this power was very seldom exercised. The fact was, as a general rule, that a man once a magistrate was always a magistrate. The nature of their appointment being thus, the magistrates might be said to be in office for life, and irresponsible. The members of the Licensing Board, on the other hand, would be directly responsible to the people. If they failed to discharge their duty honestly, when they came for re-election they would be dismissed. The cardinal difference between the two bodies was that the magistrates were irresponsible, and the Board would be a responsible body. In that distinction there was much involved. The magistrates, too, were disqualified for the impartial discharge of the functions of granting licences, because they were drawn from a special section of society. They were all members of one class. The theory on which licences were granted was that they were necessary for the accommodation of the public. The magistrates were members of that section of the community that did not use these houses, and did not want them. They lived for the most part in the country, and in suburbs of towns, and they always took care that they kept licensed houses as far away from the precincts of their dwellings as possible. Public-houses were set down in the most densely-populated parts, and surely the men who lived in these districts would be better acquainted with their wants and requirements than the persons who resided such a distance from them. If some of their magistrates were called upon to reside next door to a gin palace, and to have their sons and daughters brought daily and hourly in contact with the scenes of disorder and demoralization that too frequently surrounded such places, they would probably be more chary in their dispensation of licences, and less given to extol the benefits arising from public-houses. On these grounds, therefore, he objected to the magistrates as the licensing authority. The reasons with which he sustained his position might be unsound; but he had been unable to detect their unsoundness. It was always customary for a man who felt warmly on any subject to speak disparagingly of his opponent's arguments, and possibly to exaggerate the force of his own. He believed the case that he had made out was complete, and his accusations unanswerable. The magistrates had had the power of granting licences in this country for 300 years, and how had they exercised it? What had been the result of their administration? They judged a tree by its fruits, and did not expect figs of thorns or grapes of thistles. What had been the fruits of this magisterial licensing? He learnt by one of Mr. Hoyle's admirable and able contributions to the literature of temperance some facts respecting the growth of our drinking customs. During the last 14 years the population of England had increased 18 per cent. During the same period assaults had increased 48 per cent, breaches of the peace 128 per cent, misdemeanours 37 per cent, prostitution 36 per cent, and drunkenness 110 per cent. Along with this increase of intemperance and crime, they had had an enormous increase in the number of places for the sale of intoxicating drinks. In 1829, in this country, 50,422 places were open for the sale of drink. At that time the population was under 14,000,000 in England and Wales. In 1869, they had 135,720 places open for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and the population was under 23,000,000. He thought whatever else they might say about the magisterial licensing system, they could with justice affirm that during its exercise, even with the modern restraints that had been put upon it, there had been an enormous development of the traffic in strong drink, and along with it a large addition to the crime of the nation. In asking for the transference of the licensing from the magistrates to the local authorities, he was simply asking for the restoration of an old constitutional privilege. For some hundreds of years the power of granting and controlling licences in this country was vested in the local authorities. It was only in the reign of Edward VI., the Tudor King, that the magistrates were entrusted with the powers they now possessed. This principle of local option had been adopted with benefit in different parts of America. He was not in this referring to the operation of the Maine Law, but merely to the exercise of licensing powers by the municipal and parochial authorities. In Canada, and in some of the Australian colonies, the same authority had been granted. In Sweden, too, a very interesting licensing experiment had lately been tried. The details of that scheme had been made known in a very able pamphlet written by Mr. Balfour, of Liverpool, which was well worthy the consideration and attention of hon. Gentlemen. The principle of that scheme was to vest the licensing authority in the municipal councils in boroughs and parochial authorities in the rural districts. In this country, too, the same principles had been assented to. That the House had more than 40 years ago debated, and adopted the identical principle that he was now contending for, hon. Members might not be aware, but it was the fact, that the House of Commons, by a large majority, agreed to the transference of the power of licensing from the magistrates to the town councils. In 1835, Lord Melbourne's Administration introduced into Parliament the Municipal Corporation Reform Bill. In that Bill the change that had been mentioned was provided for. Clauses 52 and 53 of Lord Melbourne's Bill were to the following effect:—

"Clause 52. The Council of every borough to which a separate commission of the peace shall have been granted, as hereinafter mentioned, or a committee of the Council to be specially appointed by the Council in that behalf, shall hold a special meeting in the month of September in every year, for granting licences to persons to keep victualling houses, alehouses, and canteens, and to sell ale, beer, and all other exciseable liquors by retail within such borough, and after September 1st, 1836, all such licences within any such borough, granted otherwise than by the Council of such borough, or such committee of the Council as last aforesaid, shall be null and void.

"Clause 53. That after September 1st 1836, the councillors of every such borough shall act with all the powers, and subject to all the disqualifications and penalties in the matter of granting such licences, enacted concerning justices of the peace by the Act of George IV., for amending the law for regulating the licensing of all houses in England and preventing disorders therein. The town clerk shall act in the same manner as prescribed to clerks of the justices, and all provisions of the said Licensing Act (of George IV.) shall apply to the licences to be granted by the Council."

This Bill was introduced into the House of Commons by Lord John Russell and Lord Howick, the present Earl Grey, was associated with him in the conduct of the measure. In introducing it Lord Russell made the following remarks:—

"Then with respect to another part of this measure, which refers to what I consider a part of the police of the town—and a part which has often led to very great abuses—I mean the power of granting alehouse licences, it is proposed that this power shall not be vested in any of the magistracy. We think that it ought not to be mixed up or confounded with the duty of administering justice, but that it should be left to the Council or to a committee of the Council. I think that the Council being elected by the ratepayers—under the popular mode of election now proposed—although no doubt many of the members may have a desire to favour their friends or promote their own private views as a body—will always act under popular control—and be less likely to abuse the power of granting licences than magistrates, in whose case the robe of justice is sometimes employed to cover a great enormity of abuses."—[3 Hansard, xxviii. 555.]

He begged the House to remember that it was not he (Mr. Cowen) who had made these observations, but the distinguished Whig statesman who was the author of the Reform Bill. The Corporation Bill passed the second reading without a division. Conspicuous amongst its supporters was no less a statesman and orator than the late Lord Derby, who gave it his most emphatic approval. As soon as the measure came for consideration in Committee, however, the late Sir James Graham proposed an Amendment to the clause relating to licences. The right hon. Member for Cumberland was not favourable to the absolute transfer of licensing power to the councils. He proposed to give to the county magistrates concurrent jurisdiction with the corporate authorities. His Amendment received a qualified support from Mr. Sotherton Estcourt—a Gentleman whom hon. Members on the other side of the House would recollect as a recent Colleague. In the debate on the Amendment, Lord Howick made a rather remarkable speech, which he would quote in full—

"Lord Howick said, it appeared to him that his right hon. Friend the Member for Cumberland did not properly perceive the view upon which his Majesty's Government had devolved the power of granting licences to the Town Councils. The difference between the views of his right hon. Friend and those of the Government was this, that while he contended that the power of licensing was a judicial function, he (Lord Howick) contended that it was a power which had no relation whatever with the judicial functions of the magistracy. The right hon. Baronet said, that the Crown was the fountain of all authority, and the chief conservator of the peace, and that all the authority of the Magistrates was therefore derived from the Crown. Now one of the great abuses of the present state of the Magistracy was, that it not only was without responsibility to the Crown, but was beyond the control of the people. The Government thought that the Magistrates ought in the first place to be chosen upon the recommendation of the people, but should derive their power from the Crown. It was upon that principle—a principle which he conceived to be perfectly in accordance with the principles of the constitution—that they had introduced this provision. If the distribution of alehouse licences were left in the hands of the Magistrates, it might be made the vehicle of great political power, which would probably be exercised for political purposes. The power was certainly an invidious function, but it was necessary that it should be placed in some hands or other, and they thought it most important that the hands in which it was placed should not be those of the Magistrates who had the administration of criminal justice. They thought, in short, that the administration of criminal justice and political power should be kept as far separate as possible. And it was upon that account that they took the granting of alehouse licences out of the hands of the justices. He admitted that the contrary had been the late practice, by the statute law, but he contended that it was not so by the principles of the constitution. It was only subsequent to the Revolution that the power of licensing was first given to the Magistrates. His firm belief was, that it would be of less mischief to the people themselves, if the power of licensing were not united with the administration of justice."—[3 Hansard, xxix. 212-13.]

He again begged the House to understand that the observations he had been reading were not his own, but the observations of the eminently Conservative statesman, Earl Grey. The late Mr. Edward Baines, the Member for Leeds, Mr. Parker, the Member for Sheffield, and other Gentlemen, warmly supported the views of Lord Howick, and said harder things against the magistracy than he (Mr. Cowen) now dared to use. Even Lord Sandon declared, in the same discussion, that the publicans were the most dangerous and objectionable political party in the State. Upon a division, Sir James Graham's Amendment received only 166 votes, while the clause proposed by Lord Howick received the support of 211 hon. Gentlemen, thus being adopted by a majority of 45 in a House of 377 Members. He (Mr. Cowen) believed it was not generally known at the present day—either in the House or in the country—that Parliament had by such a substantial majority adopted the principle of local option with respect to publican's licences. He had had the pleasure of hearing on three or four occasions the Permissive Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle discussed in the House. In each debate he had heard this argument advanced. No, it was not an argument. It ought not to be dignified by that name. It was simply an objection. So much strength appeared to be in the remark that in the course of a single afternoon he had heard it repeated no fewer than three times, by three different speakers. The objection was that hon. Members declined to vote for the Permissive Bill because that proposal had never yet been voted for, or advocated by, a statesman of repute or influence. A more feeble objection he never heard urged. Was it not a fact that men of weight and influence never espoused a cause until it had become too strong for them to resist? It was always the obscure men, and the men of little worldly influence, who championed unpopular truths. They were fishermen and workmen who first embraced the doctrines of Christianity. The abolition of slavery and of the slave trade, the advocacy of political reform, of free trade, and our great fiscal changes, had all been in the first instance battled for by obscure men below the Gangway. It was only when these principles had been preached and popularized, and when the people had been educated to a knowledge of their truth and a recognition of their justice that the dignified occupants of the two front benches lent them their countenance and patronage. The Leaders on the front forms—men of weight and influence—decried and disparaged unpopular causes till the said causes became too strong for them. They then adopted them, and usually ignored the services of those who had advocated them in the day of doubt and difficulty. The only instance he recollected where the services of obscure men were cordially and heartily recognized by an influential personage in the State, was when the late Sir Robert Peel so mag-unanimously confessed his obligations to Mr. Cobden for the conversion he had effected in his mind on the question of Free Trade. But whatever might be the objection of these weak-kneed politicians to vote for the Permissive Bill, they could have no such ground of objection to the Bill now before the House. It had the advantage, or disadvantage, of having had its principles adopted by all the leading Whig statesmen of this last 40 years. The Bill was prepared and introduced by Lord Melbourne's Administration. That Administration comprised many well-known politicians. Lord Melbourne himself, who was the very impersonation of the juste milieu doctrines that received such general acceptance at the present time, had associated with him as Colleagues the late Lord Lansdowne, Lord Holland, Sir John Cam Hobhouse, Mr. Spring Rice (the late Lord Monteagle), Lord Morpeth (afterwards Earl of Carlisle), and the Earl of Clarendon. As his Home Secretary he had Lord John Russell, a statesman who earned the confidence and esteem of his contemporaries, and had won for himself the undying praise of history. Then there was Lord Palmerston, a statesman whom hon. Gentlemen opposite were constantly complimenting; Lord Howick, a nobleman of great ability, of large experience, and against whom the charge of extreme views had never yet been preferred; Mr. Thomas Babington Macaulay, our brilliant historian; Sir George Grey, formerly Member for Morpeth; Mr. Henry Labouchere (afterwards Lord Taunton); and others who had also become distinguished. All these statesmen approved of the principle he was contending for, and the Bill which he had quoted from was introduced with their authority and sanction. Amongst the 211 Members who voted for it were some of the best known and most highly esteemed politicians of modern times. The list included the names of Joseph Hume, General Thompson, Sir John Bowring, George Grote, the historian of Greece, and the lamented Judge Talfourd. The Irish Members had apparently supported it in great force, as there were no fewer than five O'Connells, including the great Liberator in the number. Mr. William Smith O'Brien also voted for the licensing clause in the Bill, and amongst other names was that of Mr. John Walter, the founder of The Times newspaper, and the late Mr. Edward Baines, whose name was still held in high repute in the North of England. If, therefore, conventional politicians declined to vote for the Permissive Bill in consequence of its only being supported by obscure Members, no such objection, surely, could be urged against the principle he was advocating. It had been sustained by the most distinguished and illustrious names that modern Parliamentary life had furnished. He had tried to ascertain what were the objections that had been made to the Bill. He had found them stated at publicans' dinners, and in the few Petitions against the Bill that had been presented to the House. All the objections reduced themselves into two. The first was with respect to expense. It was said that these Licensing Boards would entail a heavy cost upon the ratepayers. He thought that a very feeble objection; because, if the Boards accomplished the objects that were contemplated, the expense would be a very small matter indeed. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that any large outlay would attend the creation of the Boards. The working expenses would be the same then as the working expenses of the licensing magistrates were at the present time. It was provided by the Bill that the clerk to the justices should render the same services to the Board as he did now to the justices. The probability was that the cost of the Boards would, therefore, be no more, but positively less, than was involved by the existing system. The expenses of the elections would necessarily depend upon the size of the Union. He had had some experience of contested local elections, and he had also made inquiries of persons who had more knowledge of the subject than he had. He found that the probable expenditure that such contests would entail upon the ratepayers would range from a farthing to a penny in the pound. Of course this was a mere estimate. It might be more, or it might be less. If it was a penny in the pound for three years, that could not be termed excessive taxation. A man who paid rates upon £100 would, in three years, be called upon to pay 8s. 4d. He dismissed, therefore, the question of expense, and was a little surprised at its being raised. The next objection was, that the election of the Boards would produce agitation. This he at once admitted. The agitation would be useful popular education. Every year when the election came round the whole question of intemperance would be fully discussed in every Union of the kingdom. The injury that drunkenness inflicted on the community and on individuals would be pointed out, and the election would be made a valuable means of inculcating the truths of sobriety. He confessed that he looked to this result as one of the benefits arising from the establishment of these Boards. Agitation purified the mental atmosphere, and cleared the moral perception of mankind. The surface of a still and placid lake might be pleasant to look upon; but if its waters were stagnant they contained within them the seeds of disease, of destruction, and of death. On the other hand, the water of the mountain stream that rushed ruggedly over rocks, and beneath hollows, carried along with it in its current health, life, and freshness. Fear of agitation! Agitation had been the very stay and bulwark of our national prosperity. If they wished to see the evil effects of the want of agitation, they had but to look across the Channel. For more than 20 years the French people were deprived of the right of agitation. The Press was fettered, and the right of public meeting was denied them. They were allowed to laugh, dance, and be merry, to make money and grow rich; but they were forbidden to take any part in the practical affairs of the nation. For a time this succeeded; but in the end the inevitable explosion took place, and they might have read a few years ago in the ruined cities, the burning hamlets, and the desolated plains of mutilated and dismembered France, a lesson on the folly—the stupendous folly—of trying to restrain the natural and necessary right of agitation which every free people must enjoy. In the mad and sorrowful and criminal excesses of the Commune, they might learn the protest of the French against the unreasoning curtailment of free discussion. The lack of agitation begot indifference, and indifference begot corruption. It would be a fatal day for England when they ceased to allow the fullest and most complete agitation of all questions of popular interest and right. But he was willing to allow that the persons who raised the cry against agitation did not, necessarily, speak against political movements. They had in view the injury that the agitation was likely to do to the liquor traffic. He knew that the first condition of all success in commerce was security, and the publicans felt that if the existence of their licences were insecure, their trade might be diminished. He felt the force of the argument, and admitted that there was something in the objection. But he would beg the publicans to remember that they enjoyed a monopoly which brought them wealth, and influence, and political power. For that monopoly they must pay. Their trade, too, inflicted a heavy tax upon the community. Policemen had to be kept to protect and defend their customers. Asylums and workhouses had to be built to provide for them in their old age. When the publicans had drawn away their brains and their fortunes they threw them for support upon the people. It was only right, therefore, and natural that the people who had to pay for the consequences of this traffic should exercise over it a wholesome and proper control. Another objection made to his proposal was that instead of producing too much agitation, it might probably produce too little. This was rather a contradictory objection. Then there were gentlemen who urged that the licensing power should not be given to special boards, but should be given to town councils. To this principle he had no objection. It acknowledged the right of the ratepayers to control the licensing, and that was what he was contending for. But he thought that the members of town councils had already as many duties to discharge as they could properly accomplish, and every year more were being thrown upon them. Men were elected to be members of town councils in consequence of their knowledge of local matters, of sanitary and municipal affairs. If they vested in this body the licensing power, they would introduce an element of unnecessary conflict. In some places where the licensing party was strong the licensing question would overshadow all else. In others, where they were weak, it would be ignored. The question would be judged and settled often by side issues. He thought this was objectionable, because it was quite possible to conceive a man very fit to be a member of a town council, and yet very unfit to be a member of a licensing board, and vice versa, a man might be a good member of a licensing board, and a bad member of a town council. Another objection to the town council was that they only existed in boroughs, and not in counties, and therefore if they were to extend these licensing powers to counties, they would have to create boards on purpose for them. Boards of Guardians were spread over both towns and counties, and possibly they might be more acceptable than town councils for granting licences. A better suggestion still would be that, instead of handing over the power to either guardians or councillors, they should have a board composed of representatives from all the local boards. The school board might send two members, the guardians two, the council two, the local board two, the burial board two, and so forth. A board of this kind might easily be chosen. He did not think, however, that any one of these proposals was so good as that he had suggested—namely, that of making a distinct and separate board for the express purpose of granting licences. Any one of the suggestions would be better than the existing plan. The best would be distinct boards, as he had proposed; and the next best would be a board selected from representatives of the other Boards. The cry that had recently been got up against the multiplicity of local boards he did not attach much weight to. He thought there were too many elections, and it would be a saving of expense and some trouble, if, instead of having so many organizations, there was one general municipal Parliament in boroughs, and district boards in counties. If the duties of all the separate bodies could be merged in one general assembly, there would spring a certain benefit; but still it was necessary for them to recollect that those distinct bodies, having only one class of questions to consider, fulfilled their duties better than they would do if they had one great body without the division of labour that now obtained. If there was one principle acted upon more generally than another in modern times, it had been the division of labour. Its soundness was acknowledged, and accepted in manufacturing, in commercial, and in political life. Years ago, when a man went to serve his time to be an engineer, he undertook to learn all the duties of engine building. Now a lad was apprenticed to be sometimes a fitter and sometimes a turner. A youth went formerly to be both a pattern maker and a moulder, at one and the same time; now these were two distinct departments of the same trade. In the minute articles of manufacture, one set of men dressed, another filed, another sharpened the goods that were made. In commerce, too, it was the custom for tradesmen to try to deal in a speciality. In that House the same thing was witnessed. One member mastered Indian affairs, another was conversant with military matters, and another was most at home on social questions. It was impossible for one man to master everything, and by this division of labour and thought they got greater results. The same thing held in provincial towns. Some men took an interest in municipal matters, some in Poor Law discussions, some in educational work, and it would, he feared, be injurious to cause a separation. He thought, too, the difficulty of numerous elections might be overcome in this way. All the local contests might take place in one day in the year. They now had their municipal elections in November, guardian elections in spring, and their school board elections at all times. If the whole of these could be arranged to take place in one day the expenses would be lessened, the interest would be increased, and the division of work that he had described would be maintained. Amongst these contests, the election of members of the licensing boards might also take place. He was asked whether he thought his proposal would have the effect he contemplated. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to believe that it would increase rather than decrease the number of public-houses. This might be so. No one could foretell. There was nothing more difficult and uncertain than political prophecy. Whatever the Gentlemen on that side of the House might think or say, there was no doubt they were astonished to find that the result of the first election under household suffrage and the Ballot had been the return of a large Conservative majority. Possibly the establishment of licensing boards might multiply the number of taverns, and, as a result, the amount of drunkenness. The effect of this, however, would be to rouse the

Possibly the establishment of licensing boards might multiply the number of taverns, and, as a result, the amount of drunkenness. The effect of this, however, would be to rouse the lieve, from the early part of that speech, that those who opposed the Bill were not as sincere in their wish to discourage intemperance as the advocates of the measure. Now, he begged to say that he would yield to no man in his desire to do everything, in the House and out of it, to check the sin, crime, and misery connected with intemperance; therefore, in opposing this Bill, he hoped it would not be understood that he in any way desired to encourage opportunities for drink or to strengthen the cause of intemperance. He entirely agreed in the eloquent remarks of the hon. Member for Newcastle, in which he appealed to the House on behalf of the independence of the lower orders. He (Mr. Pell) failed, however, to see that the cause which the hon. Member had so much at heart would be really advanced by the scheme which he proposed, and which would give rise to so many inconveniences, that he believed a very short reference to them would induce the House to reject the Bill. First of all, the Bill proposed to create no less than between 600 and 900 new authorities, or new boards, in the country, with all the apparatus belonging to boards, such as clerks, stationery, board-room, and places of meeting. Those officers and this machinery would have to be provided certainly in 648 districts, that being the number of Unions throughout the Kingdom. He thought that was an objection of sufficient moment to cause the House to pause before they gave their support or acquiescence to such legislation. Then there was to be a new election every third year, and it was to take place in the month of July—in the busiest period of the season, and the hottest, at a time when beer was most sought for relief in heat and dust. The expense of creating these boards would fall upon the ratepayers. In the case of the Burial Boards in England, the Acts which established them were founded on good reasons; but they had failed in realizing the purpose they were intended to effect, although they cost from between £134,000 and £140,000 a-year out of the rates. These boards were not very numerous in the country, but the House could judge from them what would be the expense of creating and maintaining the boards proposed by this Bill in from 700 to 900 districts. The clerk would have to be paid, the returning officer would have to be paid, and it was provided in the 14th clause that all law costs—and he presumed those connected with the damage of existing interests—should come out of the rates. Then there would be the expense of the poll, which would be forced on the inhabitants of every little village; while the polling itself was a very objectionable proceeding. The hon. Member had not suggested how and where these elections were to take place, but would throw this disagreeable duty upon the Home Office. He had, however, put a certain limit to the licensing board. It was not to consist of less than five members, nor more than 21, and every adult might insist upon his right to be heard and claim a poll if he chose. But that was not all. A provision was made for filling casual vacancies caused by disqualification, and the disqualifications were specified, bribery, corruption, and bankruptcy; and to these was added a very remarkable cause of disqualification, which at once proved what the hon. Member considered might possibly be the character of the board, and that was, “any member of the board who should be imprisoned for any crime”—which he supposed might possibly include drunkenness—would be disqualified. So that it was anticipated that even the Chairman of the new board might be apprehended under the warrant of the very authority which it was sought to displace, and sent as a prisoner to the county gaol. Amongst the persons disqualified from serving on the board were all beersellers, brewers, and dealers in malt, whether wholesale or retail. Why, he would ask, should not the coffee seller and tea-dealer be equally handicapped? With regard to what the hon. Member had described as mechanism for the manufacture of drunkenness, as far as his experience as a magistrate extended, he (Mr. Pell) thought the action of the present licensing authorities must be admitted to be one rather of undue restriction than extension of the number of public-houses; at all events, the restriction was a general one, and the justices knew what they were about. He had been a great walker in his life; but that pleasurable recreation would be rendered unenjoyable, if he found himself in a county in which this proposed law had come in force. Unions were very large areas, especially in the North of England, where some of them were open, wild, inhospitable tracts, and it would be necessary to have something like a geological map, which instead of indicating the alluvial and other kinds of soil, it would indicate the districts where the travellers would have no chance of getting anything to drink. That would not only be a great inconvenience, but it would have a bad effect on the people themselves. It was either right or wrong that the people should have an opportunity of obtaining a glass of beer. If it was not wrong to refresh themselves, and if it did them good to drink a glass of beer, it must be wrong to put an absolute stopper upon the means of obtaining it. In such a matter as regulated opportunity for procuring that which it was not wicked to drink, it would be unwise to let the control pass out of the hands of the justices. He knew that in many cases property rose in value by the establishment of decent inns, and it was just the same with churches. In the great towns—take Leicester, for instance, which was remarkable in the Census for a large increase of population—directly a suburban field was brought into the market it was bought and parcelled out into building allotments—and what was the first thing that rose up? The first thing, he was proud to say, was a church. What was the second thing? A public-house. The beer and the Bible were brought closely together; and, let him observe, not an unholy connection. Churches might be used for wrong purposes as well as public-houses. It was the use which sanctified. It was the spirit of devotion with which you entered the one, and the spirit of temperance with which you entered the other, that gave the true character to the building. What was true in this populous country with reference to the church and the public-house seemed to be true in the case of Robinson Crusoe, who, when cast on the desolate island, Defoe tells us, took a dram and prayed. He could not give his assent to the preposterous proposals of this Bill, which would lead to results so entirely different from those which the hon. Member anticipated; and he trusted the system of licensing public-houses under Lord Aberdare's Act would receive a much longer trial

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Walter Barttelot.)

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that in rising, as he did with very great pleasure, to support the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle, he would state at the very outset that he had no sympathy with those who clamoured for the total suppression of the drink traffic. He was one of those who believed it to be a fair and legitimate traffic, within proper limitations; that with such limitations it might be made to conduce, as it was intended, to the convenience of the public. Nor could he see that it was just that those who, from the circumstances in which they were placed, could at their own convenience and at their own time enjoy in moderation such a supply of wine and beer as they might think necessary from their own well-stocked cellars, should seek to bar the poorer man from that which was his only representative of the cellar—the public-house. Therefore, it was that though he had always voted for the second reading of the Permissive Bill, inasmuch as it embodied, and because it embodied, the principle of local option, which he thought a right principle, he had never hesitated to state that he believed the extreme to which some of the promoters of that Bill would go for the total suppression of the liquor traffic, was un-English, arbitrary, and never likely to be carried into effect in this country. Therefore it was that he was able to give his support to the measure which had now been so ably introduced by his hon. Friend, because he believed it to be moderate and just, and because it was one which from the soundness of its reasoning, the justice of its conclusions, and the correctness of its principles, ought to commend itself to the judgment and approval of all right thinking men in this country. What did this Bill propose to do? It proposed to make no change whatever in the licensing law as it stood at present, except that it proposed to transfer the power of dealing with licences from the magistrates to an elective Board. He should be the last person to suggest that the magistrates did not carry out their duty now to the best of their ability. On the contrary, he believed that under circumstances of great and almost unparalleled difficulty they did in the main administer that power which was entrusted to them impartially, and for the benefit of all. But the question was not as to the spirit in which they administered the law—the question raised by this Bill was, he took it, whether or not they were the people of all others who were best calculated to understand the wants of the community, from their knowledge of their wants and necessities. That was the principle which lay at the root of the demand which had caused the introduction of this Bill. The magistrate, as had been already said by his hon. Friend (Mr. Cowen), was in some respect the person of all others who was least suited to know from personal experience the evils and horrors of drunkenness. He lived, it might be, in his pleasant residence, far removed from the slums and narrow lanes of towns. Vice came before him never except in the shape of the prisoner in the dock. But what was the position of the ratepayer, whom it was proposed to entrust with this power? In every particular his position was the very reverse of that of the magistrate. He lived in crowded neighbourhoods; he had often thrust upon him without his consent a public-house where there was no necessity for one; he knew from experience the great pecuniary loss of having his property depreciated in value, and the moral loss of having his family, his servants, and his children exposed night and day to the evil example of foul language, blasphemy, and all the evils of drunkenness. Therefore he said it was absurd and anomalous that the dealing with this question, which was thoroughly and entirely a question of the wants and necessities of the people, should be left entirely to a class who, from their circumstances, whatever might be their virtues, could have no knowledge at all of the requirements of the case; and this was one of the greatest, if not the principal, argument in favour of this Bill. But there was another matter in which the present system had evils which could not be hidden; and that was, that in the whole question of the renewal and transfer of licences the people who were principally concerned—the ratepayers—were absolutely unrepresented. They had no voice in the matter. At brewster sessions and on other occasions when licences were dealt with, the whole matter was treated as though it concerned two classes alone—the publicans who received and the magistrates who granted the licences. The ratepayers who were vitally concerned—for whose conveniences these licences were supposed to be granted—the people on whom fell the whole burden of the evils of drunkenness—were absolutely ignored and left out of the question altogether. [“No, no!”] Well, he dared say it would be left to some speaker who might follow him to show in what respect that was not the case; but it appeared to him to be so. There was a certain amount of representation he knew, but what did it amount to? Why, the arguments of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) were in themselves the very best reply to that. He argued that the present system, though it would admit of improvement, was practically sufficient for the purpose; and what did he say? That public-houses had diminished and that licences had decreased in number; but he never contested the fact that in spite of all that which might be attributed to the happy results of magistrates’ efforts, crime and misery, and especially such crime and misery as were directly traceable to drunkenness, had increased in the large degree given in the figures quoted by his hon. Friend (Mr. Cowen). He (Sir Henry Havelock) did not hear him attempt to contradict that. It remained for him to show that his arguments did not answer themselves on that point. It was, then, an open question; but they did believe, and their belief was supported by a very large majority of thinking men of this country, that the best way of dealing with that question would be to put it in the hands of the people principally concerned. He admitted that that was experimental; they went from experiment to experiment in all those matters, but they had heard nothing adduced from the other side to disprove their view. One objection which had been made with considerable force was that their proposal would increase the number of elective Boards. No doubt that might be the case. The elective Boards had been enumerated,

and their number was considerable; but he would ask those who used that argument whether they supposed that any one of the existing Boards could be competent to deal with this matter? Would it be desirable, for instance, to put the question of licences in the hands of the School Boards, or of the Local Boards of Health, or of the Highway Boards; or, though last not least, in the hands of the Burial Boards? He thought it had been proved to demonstration that if any amendment were required in this matter, and if it was desirable that the power of dealing with this question should be transferred from the present hands—a point for which there was a popular demand—then it was also true that if it was to be dealt with by different hands it must be by Boards specially formed for the purpose. Should this Bill be passed into law it would remedy a grievance of very long standing. They hoped that before long they might have County Boards formed; and, when that was the case, he did not see why those duties should not be transferred to them; but for the present separate Boards should be formed, and then when the County Boards were formed they would have valuable experience already gained for them to go upon. Another objection which had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), struck him as a very peculiar one. He objected to this power being transferred to other hands because he wanted to know whether the Boards would have the respect of the public. But he (Sir Henry Havelock) thought the very fact of their being selected for that serious and responsible duty by large majorities was an evidence that they would be respected. The hon. Baronet asked also whether their position would be such as was desired, but their selection by their fellow-citizens for such a position was an evidence of that. It would be quite as good an evidence of their power to deal with this question as the nomination of a magistrate whose appointment was made without any selection whatever. Then, it seemed singular to him that the hon. Baronet should be wrong in his facts as to these rating Unions, for he was unaware of the fact that the rating Unions extended into more than one county, and were partly urban and partly rural, but dealt with common funds. [Sir WALTER BARTTELOT denied that he had so stated.] Then there was another objection against these Boards, and that was as to the expense of them; but he did not think that that expense would be very large. His hon. Friend (Mr. Cowen), who had worked longer than himself in this matter, had fixed the limit of the expense, and it was very trifling. He (Sir Henry Havelock) thought that probably his estimates and conclusions in this matter were correct—at all events there could be no question that, if in a small degree they should succeed in reducing crime, in reducing drunkenness, and in reducing police and prison charges, the expense of these Boards, even if three-fold more than was estimated, would give a very large balance to our benefit. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) said some things which he heard with considerable regret. He thought when he spoke of the possibility of leading members of these Boards being locked up at the time they might be wanted he betrayed a levity, if he might use the term, which contrasted painfully with the gravity, the solidity, and the force of the arguments adduced by his hon. Friend (Mr. Cowen) in support of the Bill. This, no doubt, was an exceptional measure; but the Bill was brought forward in response to the earnest desire of men who had given attention to this question for many years past, who knew the facts, and who, while being desirous of doing full justice to the merits of the magistrates, told them plainly that no solution of the question had yet been arrived at, and no means devised for dealing with drunkenness in its worst forms. It was sometimes said—he (Sir Henry Havelock) would not say with what truth—that there was a sort of natural alliance between the Conservative Party and the publicans. He did not think that need be the case; but, at all events, there was now an opportunity for the Conservatives to show how hollow and baseless was the charge, and that in this matter they were above all Party considerations, and had at heart only the true interests of the country. He thanked the House for the patience with which it had listened to him. His only excuse for intervening was that in his borough, he believed, the question was originally initiated. He knew that at large and crowded meetings, where the alternative claims of the Permissive Bill and some such measure as this had been discussed, there had been a considerable preponderance of opinion in favour of the measure now proposed. It had its objections, certainly, but he thought it also had advantages which had been well stated, and which deserved more consideration than they had received from some of the speakers on the other side. This sad fact, at all events, remained: that up to the present time nobody had been able to devise means of dealing effectually with drunkenness, which was the moral canker of the country; which was paralyzing their vast industrial energies; which was extending its ground, and which, unless some means were taken to check it, would continue to lower the moral standard and social tone of this great country.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that in rising to oppose the Bill he thought it desirable, in the first instance, to clear away one or two fallacies which had been imported into the question by hon. Members opposite. In the first place, he maintained that this Bill, wherever it might be put into force, contained within itself the very worst and most objectionable features of the Permissive Bill. If it were right to place in the hands of the ratepayers, and of the ratepayers alone, the power with which this Bill sought to endow them, who would be safe from the most unreasonable and unreasoning form of election that could possibly be imagined? He had never approved of the method of election involved in the Municipal Corporations Act. He thought it was wrong ab initio, and it remained wrong now; and so long as that statute continued unrepealed it would stand out as a grave error of legislation. The same objection prevailed, with even greater force, against the present measure. If ratepayers, as distinguished from both owners and inhabitants generally, were the only persons to be called upon to elect members of the proposed licensing board, that would have the effect of excluding what he called the better element in almost every one of our large communities, and would undoubtedly take the matter out of the hands of a very large body of the population. Nobody in that House had any desire or wish that temperance, reasonably carried out, should not have its full strength, its full influence, and its full effect in the country; but temperance did not mean teetotalism, and he knew no body of men who were more intemperate, at all events in their language and in their views, than teetotalers were; but if this Bill became law, a contingency of which he was happy to say there was no probability, it would provide that while teetotalers might by the manipulation of an election be put upon the licensing board, every brewer, licensed victualler, and maltster, who entertained different opinions was to be excluded from a seat on the board. Was that fair or even reasonable on one side or the other? Indeed, would it not be certain to provoke the worst passions and call out, in all probability, the most riotous elements of a contested election? But that was not the only point, for no distinction whatever was made between counties and boroughs. Some hon. Gentlemen, and even the proposer of this measure himself, went so far as not only to mix up counties and boroughs, and county and borough representation, but they confused them as well as mixed them up; for he saw that it was provided by one section of the Bill that the area should be precisely the same as it was now for Poor Law purposes. In the borough which he (Mr. Wheelhouse) represented there were no less than four areas for Poor Law purposes; and one of them having lately been extended, took within its limit a large number of out-townships in the county. What was to be done with the licensing board under such circumstances as these, since the borough authorities had no jurisdiction in the county, nor vice versa? They had been told that day that drunkenness was considerably on the increase. He gave his emphatic denial to any such statement, at least with regard to England. He believed it to be on the decrease, and it was of course the interest of every one of the community to use every means to assist in its abatement. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) had heard this allegation about the increase of drunkenness iterated and reiterated, but that did not make it any the more true. No reliable evidence could be adduced in support of it. On the contrary, he asked them to go into the large towns of the country, into the great centres of industrial activity, into places where the people mostly congregated, and they would find, if they took the trouble to inquire, that drunkenness was constantly on the decrease there, and for the best of all possible reasons, the drunkard could find no one to employ him. He found, moreover, that by the machinery of the Bill they were to have yet another election. They had now, as it was, elections almost innumerable, and the rage for elections was still so great that they were threatened with being eaten up by elections of one kind or another. The so-called advocates of economy in that House were always saying—"Cut down expenditure;" but they found that on all questions of this kind those same "economists" were always the very first to cry out—"Tax the people," "Throw it on the rates," "It is a public question," "They will bear it," and so on—nevertheless "by all means you must at the same time cut down your expenses." He merely dealt with questions of this kind in a plain, practical, conscientious manner, and he trusted from a common-sense point of view. How many elections had we now? We had school-board, local-board, burial-board, and other elections. He did not know what was the cost of school-board elections, borough or district ones; but he believed it was very great. He did not know either what the cost of local-board elections was, but he knew it was very large. He did, however, know what the cost of an election for an enormous borough constituency was, and it was by no means small; and still they were now asking again to throw upon the shoulders of the ratepayers an election—for what? Merely to take out of the hands of the justices—a class of gentlemen who, he believed, whether in the counties or the boroughs, formed a most impartial tribunal—to put into the hands of a body of men who should be elected once a-year, or every two or three years, subject to all the vicissitudes of change in the feelings and in the ideas which permeated our town council and ward elections, and were, he ventured to think, the worst forms of elective bodies that ever were maintained. That was not all, by any means. They were told they were also to give power by this Bill to appoint clerks and officers, not merely almost without limit, but according to the views of the board when it should be elected. This was an expense which, he thought, ought not to be put upon the ratepayers, and he trusted they would hear no more of it. He did not look, however, only at the matter of cost, serious as that was. He looked at the effect which, perpetually recurring elections for this purpose would have on the community. He looked at the almost constant bickerings to which they would give rise, and which it was assuredly wiser to allay than to foment. He looked, also, at the fact that there was a particular class of persons who made it their business to stir up questions of this kind continually, and he felt there was no other course open to the House but to reject this Bill. These boards, as proposed, were to consist of from five to 21 members. In the case of a board of five members, with a quorum of three, the chairman's casting vote would decide on questions involving the domestic convenience of an entire locality. And in a case where a quorum of three attended, two of whom were teetotallers, the same result would happen, and the licensing or the non-licensing power would be vested practically in one person. To that provision he offered his strongest opposition. It might be said that that could happen only in a sparsely populated district. That might be so, but the fact proved his case. Exceptio regulam probat. If they went into large and populous districts, he wanted to know where they could get a board of 21 members who could more satisfactorily perform their duties than the magistrates to whose hands they were now entrusted? They would have a great and cumbrous board, elected probably in a manner anything but satisfactory, instead of a body averaging nine magistrates, competent to do the work impartially, and upon the whole efficiently. To such a board, however, those powers were to be transferred from the justice of the peace. The election of the board would be by cumulative voting, to which he entertained no very strong antipathy per se. He took, however, a preliminary objection, and maintained that there should be no board and no election; and as the present licensing boards, whose decisions were reviewed by the confirming committees, were amply sufficient to deal with the questions referred to them, the turmoil and contention to which the elections would give rise would far more than outweigh any good that could possibly result from them. At present, was there any distinct allegation that the justices did not do their work thoroughly well? The only complaint he heard made of them, was that sometimes they were too restrictive in their action. All through the North that was the opinion that was commonly pronounced upon them. He much wished that the old course of legislation on these questions had never been departed from. Was it quite clear that the innovations caused by grants to wine sellers and grocers had not given rise to much which did not proceed from the licensed victualler; but for which he was most unjustly made to bear the whole of the blame? When they looked at the character of this Bill, they would perceive that it did not reveal any purpose of doing real good but that it proceeded on that everlasting Radical intention of "doing something or other." Every one of these boards was to be an utterly irresponsible tribunal. According to the Bill, the moment a board was formed—and it was to be formed compulsorily—there was to be no appeal from its decisions, though they might be come to by the casting vote of one person in the manner he had described. Was there any justice—was there any reason in that? And what was sought to be done was (as he had said before) simply to put into the hands of an irresponsible board that which was now in the hands of gentlemen, and reasonably and satisfactorily performed by them. Then the entire cost of these boards was to be guaranteed out of the rates. Provided they could satisfy some competent tribunal that they had acted in conformity with the powers given them under the Act, the ratepayers would have to indemnify their members for any costs and damages in which they might be cast in an action at law. The inhabitants, therefore, were not only to be saddled with the expense of the elections, but any member of these boards was to be indemnified for an act of his, no matter how wrong-headed or how stupid it might be, provided it turned out to be in accordance with the Act. Could anything be more objectionable than that? He was quite aware that there was a class of persons which was constantly talking about the trade of a licensed victualler as if it deserved nothing short of utter annihilation; but he was quite sure the day was far distant (if, indeed, it ever should come) when such an extreme view would find acceptance either in the country or in that House. In addition to what had been said with regard to this Bill, he was somewhat amused by a statement made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), in which he rather assumed that his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. Pell) was afraid somebody might be unable to perform his duties because he might be imprisoned during his term of office. He found that the provision was not introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, but was in the body of the Bill itself. In Section 29 it provides, in the language of the section, at the instance, he supposed, of the hon. Member for Newcastle himself, that in the event of any member of the licensing board. . . . "being punished by imprisonment for any crime, he shall cease to be a member and his office shall thenceforward be vacant." Does that not show the Bill to be cumbersome? If a magistrate were convicted of crime, we know perfectly well that his seat would be vacated. An elected member of a board was just as unfortunate; but in that case he was to be gibbeted again, after his punishment for the offence he had committed, before the whole world, because he had done something, was convicted of a crime, and suffered imprisonment. What about that state of things? They were told that this licensing board, when constituted, was to be an utterly irresponsible tribunal; whereas, at present, if justices did wrong, their decision, generally speaking, in all such cases, could be appealed from in the Court of Quarter Sessions. In the old Act they knew that under the licensing laws of George IV. that appeal was granted. Justices, if doing wrong, might be set right, and, surely, that was fair, and just, and reasonable; but under the proposed Bill the moment there was a board formed there would be no appeal from its fiat; that decision was to be final. Was there either reason or justice in such a state of things? One man might harass the whole trade of an entire county or province. He hoped he had now shown the House that such an attempt was utterly unreasonable. If any one looked at this Bill, to see to what extent it was proposed to lead them—he did not care in what light they regarded it, the House could not fail to find it so thoroughly impracticable that whether it emanated from Sunderland, or whether the honour of its birthplace were accorded to Newcastle-on-Tyne, or, indeed, wherever it came from, he, at least, hoped it would never find a foothold for a single day in the House of Commons.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that, with the permission of the House, he should like to state the reasons for which he supported the second reading of the Bill, and, at the same time, to make a few observations upon the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. This was the first time he had taken part in any debate in the House upon this subject; and therefore he desired to say that he felt the present position of this question to be such—and such the state of ideas as to the remedies which were necessary to meet the terrible position—that it only remained to those who, like himself, were anxious in some way or other to meet the evils that existed, to support any and every proposal which appeared to give any possibility, however remote, of leading to a practical solution. But with reference to the Bill immediately before them, he might say that his objections to it would not be such objections as had been urged by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Wheelhouse). They would be that the Bill did not go far enough to meet the terrible and portentous evils which existed. If they analyzed the speech of his hon. and learned Friend they would find that he fell back upon the true old Conservative principles. In the first place, he denied that any evils existed—[MR. WHEELHOUSE: No, no!]
—in the second place, he denied that there were any persons who perpetuated those evils; and, in the third place, even supposing the evils to exist, he objected to placing in the hands of the people the control of the remedy. Here they had exhibited in the purest and most unaffected manner the method of Conservative thought and argument. It was hardly worth while, and it was not necessary in this House, after what had taken place here, and after the significant vote of last Friday, to demonstrate to hon. Members on either side how great were the evils; and he was only surprised to find that even the hon. and learned Gentleman could manage so far to blind himself to the actual facts of the case as to get up in this House and make such affirma-tions as he had done. He (Mr. Jenkins) did not think it necessary to meet that. He thought the evil was admitted by the action taken by the House, and by the facts proved; and, he might add, the responsibility for these evils were brought home to the clients of the hon. and learned Gentleman who generally spoke as the representative of the publican interest. The main criticisms of the hon. and learned Gentleman simply referred to details of the Bill, which would be much better treated in Committee—they had to join issue with him simply upon one question, and that was as to the advisability of changing the present method of licensing, and of adopting some plan by which a more direct and immediate popular control should be brought to bear upon the granting of licences. When they came to that question, they at once saw what a difference there was between the view that the hon. and learned Gentleman took of the state of the matter and that which we took. He said that in granting the power to the ratepayers by popular election to select those who were to grant these licences, they were excluding from representation the interest which was most concerned. But what he (Mr. Jenkins) wished to point out was that there was a certain fallacy in that argument; because he did not look upon the publican interest as he did upon the other interests of the community. He looked upon it as an exceptional interest, demonstrated to be in the main not in harmony with the general interest of the community—nay, which was hostile to those interests. If they were to look upon it as they did upon other interests—if it were the agricultural interest, or the shipping interest, or any interest of that sort, which had its footing upon the same basis as other classes and interests in the country—the case would be different: but it was admitted, by the exceptional legislation which this House had adopted with regard to it, that it was an interest which did not coincide with the general interests of the community—that it was an interest to be exceptionally treated; and therefore he did not acknowledge the force of the argument used by the hon. and learned Gentleman against the principle of popular control by that particular point. He (Mr. Jenkins) said that his objection to the Bill was that, in his opinion, it did not go quite far enough. He must confess he should have preferred some Bill intermediately between the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the Bill now brought forward by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen). But he thought it must be admitted that the question had arrived at this position: that it was found that that body which had been so lauded by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, which now had the power of granting licences, had done its work so inefficiently and so little to the benefit of the public—[Mr. WHEELHOUSE: No, no!]

 —When the hon. and learned Gentleman said “No,” he would ask what he thought of a body which in Salford licenced one public-house to 134 of the inhabitants—whether he thought that was a body entitled to the confidence of the public? He would ask him whether he thought that in over-supplying a district with the means of intoxication in the way in which they were over-supplied in Liverpool, in Salford, in Manchester, and in innumerable towns throughout this Kingdom, they had sufficiently won the public confidence by the method in which they had discharged their functions? They went a little deeper than that, and they said this was one of those questions in which they might properly ask that there should be popular control. Who were the men most concerned in this matter? Was it the publican who made money out of the people, or was it the people for whose benefit the publican was established? Surely it was the people who were to enjoy the benefits of a State-established bar who ought to have something to say with regard to the number of licensed houses which are to be supplied. They came down to this point—that as it was the people who were most interested in the establishment of these houses, so it was to the people that the right should be granted by saying how many of these houses there should be. And here he might say that he was not disposed to go the whole length with his hon. Friend behind him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and allow total prohibition in every locality of the sale of intoxicating drinks. They must reserve the rights of minorities: but they could be reserved in a way, as he believed, consistent with the public interest, and yet in a way which would be consistent with the establishment of this most important principle contained in the Bill—the principle of popular control; and because that was the main principle of the Bill, and because he believed that upon that principle, however developed, this question was to be settled, that he intended to give his vote with his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle.

MR. W. S. STANHOPE, in opposing the second reading, said, it had been stated in the course of the debate that the Bill chiefly affected the boroughs; but he had looked through the Bill and he could not find the word even mentioned. But he wished to look at the Bill from a practical point of view; and, first, he would ask what were the objections to the licensing authority, and whether any improvement was likely to be effected by the proposed change. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Jenkins) had complained that in certain places too many public-houses had been licensed. But the hon. Member forgot that up to 1869 the justices had very little control over the number. The chief question that arose on the licensing day was not whether an additional licence should be granted, but whether certain beer-houses should be brought under the more immediate control of the magistrates by granting spirit licences to them, and up to that time beer licences were granted by the Excise, without any reference to the requirements of the district around. He thought a more reasonable objection to the present system would be against the present largely-increased facilities given for the sale of spirits by grocers and wine-licensed tradesmen. Much more drunkenness was occasioned by the sale of spirits than by the sale of beer. The Act of Lord Aberdare provided for the appointment of a licensing committee of the court of quarter sessions, and he believed the proceedings of the licensing Committees had proved most satisfactory. The magistracy in counties were appointed by the Lords Lieutenant of the counties respectively, who would select them on account of their general fitness, and in pursuance of the Act of 1872 the licensing committees were selected on a broad basis, irrespective of politics. In boroughs the election of magistrates was in a larger degree determined by political considerations, but as the Lord Chancellors for years past had been, in general, members of the Liberal party, hon. Gentlemen opposite ought not to have much now to complain of them. If it were desirable that the elective element should be introduced he was willing, but he should like to see the change made on the old foundations. He should not object to a licensing committee composed partly of magistrates and partly of ratepayers, as he had known such a mixed body work extremely well during the cattle plague. The bill proposed that every Union should be made the area of an electioneering contest every three years. Hon. Members opposite appeared to be quite mistaken as to what the effects of that would be. In the first contest the Temperance and Permissive Bill party from their superior organization might have the best of it; but their restrictive measures would have the sway only for a short time. The pressure of the temperance party, which was not, after all, very temperate, would be found intolerable, a reaction would follow, and at the second election the publicans might gain the day, and there would be free trade in licences on every side. Therefore, even if it was desirable that the ratepayers should have more influence, the mode proposed by this Bill was the worst possible that could be devised for bringing it to bear. He would not enter into the subject of increased cost thrown on the ratepayers, as the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had very ably dealt with that point; but he would only point out that it was from the opposite party that proposals for increasing the burden of local taxation were always made without any circumstances to render it necessary, though they were also the individuals who extolled the virtues of economy, and who made retrenchment their cry. There were many practical objections to the working of the Bill which he could easily anticipate; and one of them was that these Boards being made subject to the Home Office would often find themselves involved in conflict with the Poor Law authorities, and no Home Secretary would very much care to be charged with the duty of reconciling their differences.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the great question was whether the existing system was hostile to the public welfare. If it were, why endure it? If not, why restrict it? Now, as it seemed to him, the trade was licensed because it was deemed to be beneficial, and it was restricted for the prevention of abuses. The restrictions were imposed because a monopoly was given, and those restrictions were all in favour of the public interest. Of course everybody was prepared to denounce drunkenness, but in this case there was very often exaggeration. Then what constituted drunkenness? As to the outward and visible signs of drunkenness, he saw much less of it in the streets of London than when he first came to the metropolis. Crime and pauperism were not on the increase; drunkenness he had believed to be the great cause of crime and pauperism: then, if crime and pauperism were not on the increase he inferred that drunkenness was not on the increase. He drew from the fact of the diminution of crime and pauperism that there was a diminution of drunkenness. But the question was, was this Bill better as a remedy than the existing state of things? Would this Bill tend to a diminution of drunkenness? What effect would this Bill have on the boroughs? He could not conceive a more direct incitement to corruption and contention than such a measure as this. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) asked how could magistrates appointed under the present system be expected to do their duty in granting licences, considering the manner of their appointment? Had he considered from what class the licensing magistrates in boroughs were generally taken? Why, they were generally selected from members of the town council—a body elected by the ratepayers—and these men retained their appointments under successive Governments. Generally speaking, it was rarely that a borough justice did not owe his appointment to popular election. But a question of this kind could not be settled on such grounds. He would ask any man to consider for himself what would be the character of an election for a licensing board? How would it be conducted? There would be great excitement and corruption of every kind; you would have the pecuniary interest of a particular trade engaged on the one side, and their opponents on the other. It was impossible to have such an election conducted without excitement and corruption. Would not all the publicans, feeling their fortunes at stake upon the issue of such an election, spend their money and distribute their beer to promote their own cause? Would not the supporters of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) act in a similar spirit to advance a cause which they believed so just? At all events, this was a question above all others respecting which there was the greatest temptation for agitation and corruption, directly influencing the community in the most prejudicial way. That was simply the ground on which he could not support the Bill. If the Bill were enacted it would create more drunkenness during an election than it could ever put an end to. It would offer a temptation to a powerful party to make the whole of the electors drunk for one month in order to make them sober for the other eleven. Every publican would open his house and invite the ratepayers in, and say, "Vote for the present system." How could you expect him to do otherwise? He had great pecuniary interests at stake. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) said he was prepared to sacrifice everything for the great principle of popular representation. But we were not suffering from any defect of popular representation in this country. The attention of Parliament was constantly occupied with all kinds of popular questions. We had municipal elections, school boards, religious questions, and now a new element was proposed to be introduced—a licensing board. Did anyone think that a more popular system of representation than the present could be found? The licensing magistrates were men brought into public life by popular election, and appointed and retained by successive Governments; could a Board be composed of more popular materials on any other system? The advantages of the proposed system were not apparent, the disadvantages were as clear as noon-day. The Bill would create great excitement and confusion, turning on the question of beer every November. The sole end and object of the election must be beer.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Sir, I do not share the horror which has overwhelmed my hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) who has just sat down at the bringing in of this Bill. On the contrary, I am exceedingly glad that this House is now beginning to turn its attention to what I consider to be useful and practical legislation. I was getting very much tired of the subjects we have been discussing lately. I am glad we have got out of the mud of the Suez Canal, the mysteries of blending Irish whiskey, the curiosities of the Royal Titles debate, and Central Asia, and matters of that kind, and are now discussing a Bill brought in by my hon. Friend (Mr. Cowen), which is intended to do something to increase the happiness of the people of this country. [Laughter.] Well, hon. Members seem to laugh when I say this Bill is intended to produce happiness to the people of this country; but I presume that that is its object, and that it ought to be the object of all our legislation in this House; and with the object which this Bill ostensibly sets before us—that of reducing intoxication in this country—we are all agreed. I am perfectly sure that everyone who has spoken has said that—why, I think even the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) said he was a great enemy to drunkenness. I remember there was a meeting in the winter of some association in Leeds, and he wrote a letter, and said at the beginning of it—"No one hates drunkenness more than I do"—and, strange to say, his constituents received the announcement with roars of laughter. But the question is not, I venture to say, to-day, whether drunkenness has increased or not. We might argue till 6 o'clock on that matter without coming to any satisfactory conclusion. I think it is bad enough, whether it has increased or not—and individual evidence does not go for much on that point; even the evidence of so good a witness and so admirable an advocate as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) does not weigh very much in the matter. He told us that he did not see many people drunk when he walked about the streets. What streets does he walk in, I should like to know? It all depends upon that. There is a very old story told of Dr. Johnson that he said he went through Scotland without seeing a tree; but that was because he kept the blinds of the carriage down. Some people do not see drunkenness in this country because they take care not to look in the right place. It is bad enough, both in England and in Ireland. I was reading in a newspaper the other day what a man saw in Dublin on a Saturday night. He said he walked with the police down a place called Bride Street. He described the horrible state of the evil of drunkenness, and he said to the police—"Do you take up everybody who is drunk?" The policeman said—"Sir, if my Superintendent and I were to draw a rope across the street and sweep the whole street before us, I do not think we should have caught many people sober enough to tell us that they were not drunk." Surely that is a state of things which in any civilized country should cause horror in the mind of any man, even of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford. It causes much more horror in my mind than the introduction of this Bill. The evidence on all hands ought surely to satisfy us that the Bill is needed. We had the opinions of the Irish Judges quoted the other night; and if you choose to read the remarks of the English Judges when on circuit you will find they give evidence equally strong that drunkenness causes the greater amount of crime and wickedness in this country. Then the question arises, is nothing to be done at all? We have had two Governments which have tried their hands at reforming these licensing laws. There was the late lamented Liberal Government. Well, Mr. Bruce, the present Lord Aberdare, did his best. Then came my right hon. Friend whom I see opposite, and he did his worst: and both Parties, and the leading men of both Parties, having tried their hands at it, I suppose, looking at it simply in a political point of view, we are to be told, both on that side of the House and on this, that we may now sit quiet as there is nothing more to be done. But I am happy to say that is not the opinion of the country; whatever we politicians may think sitting here in the calm and security of this House, that is not the opinion out-of-doors. I do not know whether hon. Members noticed a very remarkable circumstance that took place last week, when a memorial was presented to the two Archbishops of the National Church, signed by upwards of 7,000 of the clergy of this country, calling the attention of those Prelates to the evil state of things in this country, and urging them to do something or other, and, I am happy to say, giving a pretty straight hint at the end of that memorial that the Permissive Bill was the proper thing to do. What did the Archbishop of York say only a few days ago? I must mention this, because during the latter part of the debate there has been an attempt to minimize the evil, I think, by some of the speakers. He said in Westminster Abbey, only the Sunday before last—

"And was it to be supposed that all this flood of poison"—as he called it, using much stronger language than I dare do—"left England and the English race where it found them? If so, then physiology might as well burn all her books, and religion admit that her first premises were unsound."

That is pretty strong language from one of the heads of the National Church. And then what does my hon. Friend propose in this Bill? It is a very simple change, I think. He says—

"Trust the people who suffer from the evils which arise from these places where drink is sold—trust the people to say whether they will have them or not."

Surely these places where drink is sold are set up for the good of the people—if they are set up for any other purpose, then it is a sin and a crime. Surely they are set up for the good of the people, and you who have been elected by the people might surely trust them to come to a decision in such a small matter as this. Sir, this is not the Permissive Bill—I wish it was—but it is very like it. What I have proposed in this House at different times—perhaps I may be allowed to propose it again at some future time—is simply that the people shall have a veto on the granting of licences by any authority which may be appointed to grant licences. I think that it is a simpler plan than that of my hon. Friend. I know it has been very greatly opposed. It is very difficult to fight against the powers that be—against vested interests; it is very difficult to fight against that great power whom my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter Barttelot) described—the interest of the licensed publicans—the other night as men who were as respectable, as industrious, as honest as any other class in the community. That is my point—they are too industrious. But, although I have suggested a way of attacking the evil, I am not going to find fault with my hon. Friend for bringing in a similar Bill, which runs on rather different lines. I hope I shall never be so bigoted as to reject what is good in any one else's measure because I do not think it quite so suitable as that which I have ventured to propose; but, as I am speaking on the Bill of my hon. Friend, will he allow me to point out one or two defects—although they have already been pointed out? I think that it will be unnecessary to elect these boards which he proposes all over the country in certain parts, because there you have already the benefit of prohibition. You have these parishes and districts where there are no public-houses, and there you have the greatest comfort and the greatest blessing arising from that state of things; and I do not see why my hon. Friend should set them to work to elect Licensing Boards when they have all the blessings of being without licences already. I quite admit that there is force in the arguments used by Members on the other side against this Bill. There would be a good deal of confusion, perhaps, and conflict, in electing these boards—although not nearly so bad as an election at Oxford, which my hon. and learned Friend seemed to have in his mind when he spoke of the danger. There will be a certain amount of confusion, perhaps, and the thing may resolve itself into a fight between the Good Templars and the Good Tipplers; but, even if that should take place, my hon. and learned Friend need not be so much alarmed. It would only come once in three years; whereas the existence of these drink-shops creates confusion, tumults, riots, murder, and misery every night in the year throughout this country. Although, Sir, I greatly prefer my Bill—the simple veto, making no change whatever in the licensing authorities, making as little alteration in the law as possible—though I greatly prefer that, and shall have the opportunity of advocating it soon—still, I cordially support this Bill of my hon. Friend, which is more ambitious, more comprehensive, more extensive than mine, but which, I hope, if carried out, will prove equally useful. I do rejoice very much at this debate, and at much that has been said in it. I think the hon. Member who spoke last but one, representing one of the divisions of the great county of York (Mr. Spencer Stanhope), said, and said truly, that no question at the present day was exciting so much interest as this question of how we are to promote the temperance of the community; and, if the House will allow me, I will refer to what has taken place at elections lately, and I will mention instances of Gentlemen sitting on both sides of this House who have found that what the hon. Member stated in his speech just now is perfectly true. I do not see the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) in his place. He sits on the Conservative side—oh, I beg his pardon, he is there—he will correct me if what I state is untrue. I am informed that at the election he declared to those whose votes he was soliciting that he was in favour of this principle of local option, which is embodied in the Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle, and the consequence was that, although a staunch Liberal politician opposed him, he was himself considered Liberal by the people of Aberdeenshire, and there he sits to represent them at this moment. Turn to this side of the House, where is my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), lately returned amongst us? He can tell us, if he speaks, what was the most absorbing question at his election, and who worked the hardest for him—the men in favour of local option. The same at Burnley. Well, I was taking part in an election the other day in which my right hon. Friend the Judge Advocate was interested, and I know he made a speech there—not in my presence, but in my neighbourhood—in which he said that he had been for 20 years electioneering in that county in which the election took place, and he could say from his own knowledge that there was no question which interested people so much as that question which we are now discussing—the question of giving the people the power to get rid of these places which afflict them so much. And to come to the very latest election that has taken place in the United Kingdom—I am told that both the Liberal and the Conservative candidates for West Aberdeen the other day declared that they were in favour of this principle which gives my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford so much horror and despair. It seems to me that the time is approaching when this matter, having taken hold of the hearts and the minds of the people, will produce some great changes. I believe that slowly and surely there is forming in this country what I may call a party of national sobriety who say that they will put that before everything else—that they will make that the first question in their political creed; because they hold that Mr. Cobden was right when he said years and years ago that the temperance question lay at the foundation of every social and political reform. And I am quite confident that even in a party point of view the day is coming when that political party which declares in favour of the public as against the publicans will obtain the greatest amount of support in this country. I wish my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) would take the lead of that party. He has two favourite subjects in this House—namely, orthodoxy and intoxication. I am sometimes inclined to think that he might be called “The Lord Protector of Protestants and Publicans.” I wish he would take up this question, because I am satisfied that whatever party—whether it be on that side or on this—shall first take it up will find that it will consolidate their own power, redound to their credit, and in the end confer great blessings on the people of this country.

MR. HENLEY said, that before he saw the names on the back of that Bill he formed the opinion—which he had not got rid of—that it was intended to increase drinking, for he was certain that the Bill instead of decreasing would very greatly increase drunkenness. The Bill provided a succession of elections; and he had never yet known elections in which the quart pot had not come into free play. The end would be that the question would become a struggle between the saints and the sinners, and between the two the public interests would be sacrificed, the one party trying to make the people all teetotallers, and the other to make them all drunkards if they could. He did not believe that drunkenness depended on the number of public-houses. For instance, in the Midland and Northern police districts, it was shown that drunkenness existed in an inverse ratio to the number of public-houses. The real cause of intemperance in this country was that the humbler classes, stimulated by the high wages given them in order to make a profit from their labour, were led to work beyond their strength, and consequently took to drinking to recruit themselves. If they drove a horse for 15 miles continuously along a road they would find that they could not keep it from the water trough unless they tied up its head. So if they still drove the working classes at the rate they were now doing, they would not diminish drinking.

MR. PEASE thought the House would come to the conclusion that the state of things in the county of Oxford must be different from what he apprehended it was in other parts of the country. Neither the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Henley) nor the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) seemed to be able to trust their constituencies of a popular body with their having anything to do with the granting of licences. They were all agreed in one thing, and that was the desire to put down the excessive drinking which took place in the country, and which was such a disgrace, but he must confess that he was surprised and somewhat pained by the speech of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), in which he stated that in his county there was never a church built but a public-house came close to it. He hoped the hon. Member was in jest when he stated that, and not in earnest, and that he did not mean to insinuate that it was a thing which the people of Leicestershire approved of. The two things, the church and the public-house, seemed to him to have very little to do with each other. With regard to the Bill before the House, there had been some criticisms passed upon it, which he thought it would thoroughly bear. In the first place, the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) had spoken of the large number of boards existing in the country, and the disadvantage of adding another to the number. Anyone who had any knowledge of those local boards would be aware that there were far too many of them. He himself lived near a country town where there were only 4,000 or 5,000 inhabitants, but yet they had their local boards of health, a burial board, a school board, a highway board, and a board of guardians, and his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle would add another to the number. That was no argument, however, as to the principle of the Bill. It was a matter of detail which he had hoped his right hon. Friend opposite would have taken steps to deal with. The local organizations in the country required limiting, for, directly they were established, they had the power of taxing the ratepayers. Were they going on with the creation of those boards, or was it intended ultimately to amalgamate them? This, however, was a matter of detail entirely, whether they were to appoint one board, in districts such as his own, to take all those local matters in hand. The main argument against the Bill seemed to be that while they allowed certain persons to act on the burial board, on the board of health, on the school board, on the highway board, and on boards of guardians, they were not prepared to go a step further and allow them to look after those public-houses. The county which he had the honour to represent, and which he was sorry to say stood very high in the annals of drunkenness, had been referred to, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had stated that the drunkenness there was owing to the manner in which men were employed, and that long hours of toil led to exhaustion; but that was not so; it was because that wages at one time ran high, and at the same time the hours of working had decreased, which gave the men much longer time for drinking. Thus there was more drunkenness on the part of the men who were drunken, but the drunkards were a small portion of the men. In that county building societies and other provident institutions had gradually prospered during the time of high wages, but at the same time drunkenness had gone on increasing. It was the fact also that the magistrates in the county granted fewer new licences than were granted generally in the country. He believed they stood lower in the number of public-houses, and higher in drunkenness in proportion to the population, than in any population in the country. But the people of the county generally were in favour of the Bill before the House, and had petitioned extensively in its favour. They said that although the magistrates might have been perfectly zealous in the past, and might have done what they thought right, yet the law should be more stringently enforced and the number of houses limited. The hon. and gallant

Mr. Pease

Gentleman the Member for West Sussex spoke of vested interests. Well, he believed that any board they might appoint would look well after those interests. They knew the publicans as neighbours. They knew their characters, and the character of their houses, and whether they were properly conducted or not, and he had no hesitation in saying that local boards would find out a great deal more about the public-houses and perform the work of granting licences quite as efficiently as would the magistrates, who, as a general rule, might not be so well acquainted with the district and the characters of the people. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) opposed the Bill because he said it was too much like the Permissive Bill, but he (Mr. Pease) would support it because it was very different from the measure on two points. The first point was that the Permissive Bill placed no power whatever in the hands of the ratepayers of dealing with licences, but said that either all public-houses should exist as at present, or they were to have none at all. The present Bill, however, gave a discretion to the ratepayers. When they came to look at the action of the Bill, he did not think they need tie themselves to the details of the measure, for those might be altered in Committee. For his own part, he thought some of the details would work very badly; but the principle of the Bill was that the representatives of the ratepayers should have charge of those public-houses, rather than the magistrates appointed by the Crown. He believed that the more they confided in local authority the better the law would be carried out. He had great confidence that if they allowed the representatives of the ratepayers to exercise discretion in this matter, it would be exercised very wisely. He would not take away the public-houses altogether, but would make them what they ought to be—houses of call for proper refreshment; and by doing that they would be helping to do away with drunkenness, which they all so much deplored.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who had entertained the House with a very amusing speech, said, although he did not like the Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) as much as his own Permissive Bill, he approved of it as a step in that direction. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Pease) said he did not like the details of the Bill, and yet he was prepared to support it. But what the hon. Member called the details were, in fact, the principles of the Bill. What were they? It was a Bill to disestablish the power of the licensing magistrates, and to establish a licensing board in their stead. The question for the House to consider that day was not whether they were in favour of sobriety or intemperance, but whether they were prepared to take away the licensing power from the magistrates of England, who had exercised with discretion the power imposed upon them by Parliament. The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) said, the people of the country were satisfied with the magistrates; then why disturb them? but he added that the inhabitants of Durham had petitioned in favour of this Bill. The hon. Member surely knew that there were always persons going about the country getting up Petitions, and that when most people were asked to sign them they did so without knowing exactly what they were signing. He (Mr. Talbot) submitted that there would be no security whatever that the county of Durham would not be a great deal worse off than it was at present if this Bill passed. What, he asked, was to prevent the publicans from bringing their forces to bear upon the electors of such a board as that proposed by the hon. Member for Newcastle? And were the magistrates who had done their work so well in the county of Durham to be removed by a Bill of this sort? For his part he could certainly not give his support to such a Bill.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had stated that he had promised his constituents to vote for the Bill. He had promised nothing of the kind.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I said I had been informed to that effect on good authority.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had agreed to support to a certain extent the principle of election of county boards very much the same as had been mentioned earlier in the debate by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. S. Stanhope). He had agreed to support the principle of the Bill of the hon. Baronet, but not the Bill which was now before the House, against which he would certainly vote, as he thought it would be most injurious.

MR. NORWOOD said, as his name was on the back of the Bill, perhaps he might be allowed, in a very few words, to explain the reasons which induced him to support the measure, especially as during the several years he had been in the House he had never taken part in a licensing debate. His own feeling was to view with considerable jealousy any attempt to interfere with individual liberty in matters of this kind: and he had not yet had sufficient courage to record his vote for the Permissive Bill. With regard to the observation made by a preceding speaker, to the effect that the Permissive Bill and the present measure were identical, he took a very different view of the matter. He could not support the measure of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, because it did not trust entirely to the popular control as did this Bill. It gave the public merely a veto in the issuing of licences, whilst this Bill took a wider and more practical view, and gave general control to the parties most interested—namely, the ratepayers. Representing, as he did, a large industrial town in the North of England, he could say that the question was one daily growing in strength, and was receiving every day more and more attention. It was a peculiar fact that hon. Members who had introduced the measure represented large constituencies in the North of England. It appeared to him that, of all the propositions that had been made as to this question of licensing, this was the most reasonable. What was there unreasonable in permitting the ratepayers of districts to have this power? Was not intemperance a fruitful source of the increase of the rates—of poverty, crime, and insanity? Then as to the proposal to transfer from the justices this power of granting and controlling licences, the Legislature, in other cases, had seen the importance of taking work out of the hands of the local justices. Stipendiary magistrates had been appointed, because it was found that the local magistrates were liable to be influenced by local circumstances. It was, for instance, found in his own neighbourhood, that some magistrates were too lenient to the seamen, and that some were too much the other way, and that the solicitors who had cases of this kind used to arrange accordingly. Then it was notorious that the power the local magistrates possessed at the Brewster Sessions was used for political purposes. It was said that the plan of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) might not work satisfactorily. If it did not, no one was to blame but the people themselves. There was another reason why the Bill should be accepted—namely, that the ratepayers were the only persons who knew the requirements of the districts. Although in the original Licensing Bill power was given to the justices to fix the hours of closing, and in his own borough that power was used satisfactorily, the present hard-and-fast line was adopted in the amending Act. He supported heartily the principle involved in the Bill. The details might not be altogether perfect, but he was sure that the working population of the North of England were determined before long to have this power of control over the sale of intoxicating liquors.

MR. RATHBONE: I entirely agree with the promoters of this Bill in thinking that the mode of licensing is unsatisfactory. I think it indefensible that it should rest with a few sitting magistrates, acting as they have to do with no clear acknowledged principle to guide them, to give away a monopoly privilege which is worth £100 to £300, aye, in some cases as much as £2,000. But, on the other hand, every step we have taken so far in the licensing system seems only to be followed by an increase of drunkenness. But I will not enter into that question here. All that I wish to urge upon the House is this—that such having been so far the result or want of result of our legislation, we ought not to legislate further without facts upon which to found our legislation; and if the House will lend me its attention for a very few minutes, I think I can show that the facts and experience, not only of this country, but of other countries, are different from what they are supposed to be by the great bulk of those who are at present advocating legislation, and those who are resisting it. I have taken the utmost pains to get at the truth, for having shared the popular delusions on this subject, I am most anxious not again to act or speak on insufficient grounds. It has generally been assumed almost as an axiom by licensing reformers that the amount of drunkenness bears some direct proportion to the number of houses open for the sale of drink, and it is almost invariably assumed that the few experiments tried in the contrary direction have been entire failures. Now, I have analyzed carefully, the statistics of this subject, so as to minimize the danger of error arising from the fact that in different towns drunkenness is treated with a different amount of severity. The statistics given in a recent letter in The Pall Mall Gazette, had been (I think not unfairly) criticized, because, in the first place, the writer went further than can be proved by statistics when he stated that the statistics in question proved the inverse of the popular delusion; and also because it so happened that the towns which have the fewest public-houses are situated in the North of England, those with the most public-houses in the South of England. Their circumstances, therefore, are very different. But in order to compare towns as nearly as possible under the same circumstances I have divided them into North and South, so that wages and climate may correspond, and according to the population, so that the kind of town compared may correspond, and the result will prove to any man, and has proved, I think, to all whom I have shown the figures, that there is no direct proportion whatever between the number of the public-houses licensed for the sale of drink and the amount of drunkenness. I will merely state to the House the result as to the 19 towns North of Birmingham which have a population of over 50,000. I have arranged them in order, two ways—first taking as No. 1 the town having the fewest apprehensions for drunkenness in proportion to the population. I then, in fresh order, take as No. 1 the town with the fewest licensed houses in proportion to population, and I find that the numbers which attach to a town in its order of merit as to drunkenness and as to licensed houses, do not in the least correspond. For instance, of these 19 towns, Norwich has the fewest apprehensions in proportion to population, but the most licensed houses. Leicester comes second as to apprehensions for drunkenness, but eleventh as to the number of licensed houses. Sheffield, third as to apprehensions for drunkenness, is fourteenth as to licensed houses. Bradford, fourth as to apprehensions for drunkenness, is fifth as to licensed houses. Leeds, fifth as to apprehensions for drunkenness, is second as to licensed houses; and so on. And, taking the other end of the list, Manchester is the only town whose position as to drunkenness and the number of licensed houses corresponds. It has more public-houses than any other town but one, and it has a greater number of apprehensions for drunkenness than any other town, one alone being excepted. The one town, I regret to say, is Liverpool; but I wish the House to mark this—it has been assumed of Liverpool by those who know not the difficulties with which it has to contend that the cause of the amount of drunkenness which prevails there is the excessive number of licensed houses. But what is the fact? Liverpool has fewer licensed houses than any of the 19 towns over 50,000 inhabitants in the North of England except six. I need not trouble the House with further statistics, I shall be happy to show the tables to any hon. Member; but I will only say that, taking the towns with between 50,000 and 40,000 inhabitants, the towns with between 30,000 and 20,000 inhabitants, and the towns with between 20,000 and 10,000 inhabitants, as well as those with under 10,000 inhabitants, the results are similar. The statistics, when taken for so large a field, show, if thoroughly gone into, there is no direct proportion whatever between the amount of drunkenness and the number of licensed houses. But what has been the experience of other countries? I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. Carnegie, for a translation of the report of the committee of the municipality of Stockholm on drunkenness, which I have no doubt has been seen by other hon. Members. The report is a most admirable one. They have gone carefully into everything—such as good harvests, prosperous times, new police regulations—which might distinguish the comparisons they draw, and they show that their deductions are borne out by the real significance of the statistics. They have had in 1855 a reform in their licensing laws, and in 1864 a change in their police regulations. They have reduced the number of dealers in alcohol “bran vin,” their drink. From 1,200 in 1793 they reduced them to 700 in 1847, to 500 in 1850, and there are now only 280 houses licensed to sell for consumption on the premises, and 30 retail shops for consumption off the premises, the last in quantities not less than three-tenths of a gallon; and the question they set themselves to answer was this—“Have these measures attained, or at least brought us nearer, the attainment of the desired object? The result is, that they come to the conclusion that they have not, for they show that the amount of cases punished for drunkenness has increased from 1 in 88 of the inhabitants in 1851 to 1 in 46 in 1874. They go on to propose the adoption of the Gothenburg system, by which the monopoly of the sale of drink is practically in the hands of the public and for their benefit. Now, I am not disposed to express any dogmatic opinion on this subject. I repeat, what I think we want is such careful inquiry as shall give us facts, and not public notoriety, as the foundation of our legislation. That notoriety, as far as I can judge of it, is marvellously unreliable. Just let me give another and a most striking instance of this, because it is a case which I should really have supposed impossible had I not known it to be true. I have no doubt that a great part of hon. Members present believe that the system of open licensing in Liverpool was tried, and proved a failure, and that, as has been stated, it led to such an enormous increase of drunkenness that the magistrates recoiled from their experiment. The Liverpool experiment was upset after only three years’ trial, on the universally asserted, and as far as I remember the then uncontradicted, statement that drunkenness had enormously increased; and it has now been assumed that the drunkenness of the town since has been to a great extent owing to Liverpool being exceptionally provided with public-houses, instead of having fewer than most other towns, or most other large towns. There has seldom been a more curiously generally received popular fallacy than the Liverpool experiment. Two years after it had been given up, on an investigation into the state of crime it turned out that drunkenness, instead of increasing enormously, had actually decreased in proportion to population during the experiment, and some of the young magistrates, who,

against the experience and against the wishes of the older magistrates, upset the experiment, have since become convinced of the error of their ways. But, let me add, the experienced magistrates in Woolton and Prescott, a suburban district of Liverpool, were not then led away without investigation to upset a system which they had commenced. They persisted in it and persist in it now, and are perfectly satisfied with the results, which is more, I think, than any other body of magistrates in the Kingdom will say. In consequence of my having stated this, the temperance party in Liverpool sent their worthy agent, Mr. Smyth, to collect the facts, and I hold in my hand the results of his inquiries, as taken down in his presence. In 1867 there were in Woolton 35 licensed houses. In 1876 there were in Woolton 35 licensed houses. During the interval four licensed houses have been shut up and four licensed houses have been opened. In 1876 the licensed houses are of the same character as they were in 1867. They are not more magnificent in 1876 than they were in 1867. He found that some of his friends did not agree with him in this; but, at any rate, I can speak myself as to there being no such development into the dangerously magnificent gin-palaces as has taken place in Liverpool under the restrictive system. He also stated that there was much less open drunkenness in 1876 than there was in 1867; that the place in 1876 was more orderly than it was in 1867; but that the ministers of religion did not believe that there was any diminution (in 1876 as compared with 1867) in drunkenness, but that it was not so visible. He considered that this was in consequence of the repressive power of a police barracks in the middle of the population, and he said that a lawyer who had been in the habit of coming over to the police court to defend prisoners charged with drunkenness had ceased to do so, because there was not so much open drunkenness. In other words, under the free licensing system not one single additional public-house has been opened. The mere fact of the magistrates steadily refusing to renew licences wherever a house was in the least disorderly has kept them down to their original number, even with an increase of population, and has prevented them creating the dangerous gin-palaces to which a large number of the houses in Liverpool have during the last few years been converted. And this brings me to the point to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the House. I do not hesitate to say that the magistrates and police of England, if they would only enforce the existing laws, have ample powers in their hands to shut up one-third of the public-houses, and reduce, by at least a quarter, the crime of the Kingdom by simply refusing to renew the licences of any houses doing a disorderly trade. They did this in Luton, and they are, I am happy to say, taking steps in the same direction in Liverpool, and I believe also in Birmingham. When I was in Liverpool in January a man consulted me about a friend of his, who was anxious that his son should go in for the Civil Service examination. I found that the friend about whom he wished to consult me was a licensed victualler, that he was evidently a respectable man, anxious about the character and welfare of his children. His public-house was in a most respectable neighbourhood, and, presumably therefore, both from the character of the man and position of the house, doing a more respectable trade than I fear many public-houses in Liverpool. His friend told me that he was tired of the trade, and wanted to get out of it, for he could no longer carry it on with the same advantage as before; that since the new inspectors had been put on the police had increased their vigilance, the magistrates had become stricter, and the publicans were no longer allowed to sell drink to men who had had too much, without fear of an endorsement on their licences; and that this alone had reduced his takings by £700 a-year. Consider what an amount of evil and demoralization preventible under the present law, if strictly administered, that £700 a-year represents. Consider the benefit of such strictness applied to those parts of the town where drunkenness prevails and a drunken trade is more unscrupulously carried on. If the exertions of the friends of temperance were directed to force on magistrates this efficient execution, our present laws then would be able to accomplish much; and I would further urge that a strict, thorough, and complete examination of the facts, and experience of this and other nations should precede further legislation on the question. I think I have said enough to show that the loose but generally received popular impressions which have been so broadly asserted and so easily accepted are popular fallacies, and an unsound foundation for legislation. The Swedes seem to believe that their system of monopoly, of which the profits go to the community, is the right one. There is, on the other hand, a growing opinion in this country that the best system is what has been described as freedom with responsibility—namely, limiting the number of public-houses, not capriciously, but by preventing them from doing a drunken trade, and shutting up those that do it. Let both be carefully examined, as well as the result of our present system—that strange system, enormously and artificially increased by the monopoly profits of the liquor traffic, the temptations to those that carry it on, their wealth and means to tempt others, and their power to make the enforcement of the law against drunkenness and disorder almost impossible.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, I may say I am glad, at all events, that this Bill has been introduced to the House by the hon. Member. I have observed that some of those hon. Members who have expressed themselves ready to support him also say they are not prepared to go to the length of supporting all the details of the Bill. Therefore, I am glad to find the supporters of the Bill do not advocate entire suppression of the liquor traffic. I can assure them they will find that the Party which favours national sobriety is not limited to one side of the House—the object of all of us is to abolish as much as possible the amount of drunkenness in the country, and the only difference between us to-day is as to the best mode of carrying out that object. Then will the Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle effect the purpose he has in view? If you take the power of control away from the justices, and transfer it to an elected Board, then I am very much inclined to think that the results will be the other way. I confess that I regretted in the early part of the speech of the hon. Member for Newcastle to hear him make remarks which I think were unjust and unfair on the magistrates of the country. I venture to say that our magistracy do not use their power in licensing matters simply for the purpose of promoting Party or political interests. I believe that the great majority of them approach the subject of licensing quite as earnestly as hon. Members opposite, and are equally with them desirous to promote temperance. But when speaking of the magistrates we must remember what they have done, and judge them by their efforts during the last 300 years. It must be remembered that there have always been limitations to their power. In the present day the law has practically placed a restriction on them which has destroyed their power to deal wisely and judiciously with cases in their own localities as they arise. If we are to proceed to deal with the licensing system, would it not be better to improve so far as possible the machinery which already exists, and the working of which you know, and give to the magistrates their full powers, and see if they will not use them with discretion and enforce them for the benefit of the country, and use their best endeavours for the diminution of the vice of drunkenness? Now, we have heard a variety of arguments used to-day to show why we should adopt the principle of this Bill, and we have been told that if we go to Sweden we shall see the advantages of investing Local Boards with this power. But I would remind hon. Members that the system in Sweden is very different from the system which is proposed under this Bill. For under this Bill you will have a perpetual change of licensing authorities accompanied with all the excitements of an election, and by the influences which we know are brought to bear on such elections. When elected, the Board will have the power of destroying the vested interests of a particular trade, and would place that trade in the future at the discretion of the newly-elected members of this Board. In my opinion, the main object of legislation on this subject would be destroyed and the trade lowered if the principles of this Bill were adopted, for no man with capital and respectability would like to go into a trade which is liable to be destroyed every three years. This is a point which has been lost sight of during the debate to-day. I believe that if you were to improve the character of those who carry on this trade, you would do more towards lessening the evils which you seek to check than you could possibly do under this Bill. If you have a

Licensing Board this might occur:—a majority of one, holding temperance views, would destroy the whole trade of the district for three years, and then, where there is such an uncertainty, you would not get persons of character and respectability to come into the trade. Although the hon. Member for Newcastle has said that drunkenness has increased according to the facilities given to obtain licences, I do not believe that is a proposition which he would be able to support. We have heard the direct opposite from the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), who quoted from statistics he himself moved for as to the number of public-houses and the number of convictions in towns. I will only mention one case. Out of the whole of these Returns the county to which the hon. Member belongs (Northumberland) stands at the top of the list for convictions for drunkenness, and the county which I have the honour to represent (West Essex) stands at the bottom. I will take two examples—in Durham there were 11,671 convictions for drunkenness, and 1,766 licensed houses. In Essex—and I do not forget the difference in the population—there were 507 convictions and 2,259 licensed houses; therefore, in Durham you have 10 convictions for every public-house, while you have 4½ public-houses in Essex for every conviction. If we look at the Bill which the hon. Member asks us to read a second time to-day, I confess that to me it bristles with objections. I see in that Bill a prospect of nothing but agitations. The Bill provides that the country should be divided into small electoral districts—practically about one-fourth or one-third of a Parliamentary district—and an election is to take place in them not less than once every three years. But the elections are not confined to three years, for there is to be a fresh election when any member dies or is incapacitated, or when a member caring so little for the honour done him neglects to attend the Board for six months. These elections must be carried out according to certain provisions—and supposing, as is most likely, the voting is to be by ballot, in each district only one-third the size of a Parliamentary district there must be polling-booths erected, and you must have all the machinery that is necessary for the election of a Member of Parliament; and, though the expense has been made a light thing of, yet I think the rate-payers will find it no slight burden. The Boards will have their paid officers, and the only restriction as to their salaries would be the approval of the Secretary of State. All expenses are to come out of the local rates. Now these local Boards are to be entrusted with powers which you do not give to your magistrates, for you give them power to decide cases without appeal. The magistrates of this country, supposed to be influenced by local circumstances, are to be succeeded by a body of men, who, as I think, would be a great deal more open to local influences, for they are living amongst the people and in daily intercourse with the people on whose application for licences they have to decide, and it is not to be supposed that private interests will not be brought to bear upon them. As an example, we had it in evidence from an Inspector of Police before the Select Committee that in the borough in which he resided it was impossible for the police to obtain convictions against disorderly houses in consequence of the Watch Committee refusing to allow cases to be brought before the magistrates; and this would show how local influence could be brought to bear against the promotion of temperance. If the magistrates instead of the Watch Committee had the power to deal with such matters in that borough, then drunkenness would not have been so rife in that borough. Any attempt to upset the present system should be approached more carefully than, as I think, it has been approached by the hon. Member. I do not think this Bill will carry out its object and the object which we all have—namely, the diminution of the vice of drunkenness, and for that reason it does not deserve to be read a second time.

MR. J. COWEN said, he would not trouble the House with many observations in reply. He had only to say that the Bill had been discussed on points of detail—the issues that had been raised were side issues, and no attempt had been made to grapple with the principle of the Bill. He desired, therefore, to point out clearly the question upon which he asked a division. At the commencement of his observations he distinctly stated that the details of the Bill were of small consequence, were matters for future consideration, and if needed could be altered and amended; but the principle on which the Bill was founded was the principle of local option—the principle that the control of the licences should be left to local bodies popularly elected, and responsible to those whom they represented. All sides of the House were agreed that this trade must be regulated. At present the magistrates regulated the licensing. The magistrates were not popularly elected; they were an irresponsible body to a great extent; they held their offices for life; they were to a large extent drawn from a section of the community not affected by public-houses; and he thought, therefore, they were not the best to be entrusted with these powers. On the contrary, a body specially elected for the purpose of discharging these duties by the ratepayers, responsible to those who elected them and affected by their decisions, seemed to be the best qualified for the purpose. That was the principle of the Bill, and upon that and not upon the details he went to a division.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

ELECTION OF ALDERMEN (CUMULATIVE VOTE) BILL—[BILL 46.]

(Mr. Heygate, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Faicett, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Morley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HEYGATE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that whereas at present the election of councillors in all municipal boroughs in England was established on a fair principle—namely, by the voting of the ratepayers in their separate wards—the aldermen were elected by the Town Council at large, and even the aldermen who were not outgoing voted for those who were to fill the vacant places. It thus happened that in the present system a majority of 1 among the councillors on the side of either party would carry the nomination of all the aldermen for that particular municipal borough. The result was, that in every borough where party politics were introduced, or in nearly all those cases—and unhappily these elections became every year more and more political in their character—there might be a total exclusion of the representation of the party of the minority in this matter. Both political parties were equally to blame for this result. Various propositions had been made to remedy the evil, but he thought the best remedy would be the introduction of the cumulative vote. It must be the object of every well-wisher of municipal institutions that the opinion of the ratepayers should be reflected in the election not only of councilmen, but of aldermen, though that was not the case under the present system.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the further proceedings on Second Reading stood adjourned till To-morrow.

Then the other Business upon the Paper was taken; until it being ten minutes to Six of the clock—

The House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

TURKEY—OUTRAGE AT SALONICA.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, If Her Majesty's Government have any objection to communicate such information as they may have received respecting the outrage at Salonica; and, whether it is correct that British ships of war, as well as those of other countries, have been despatched to Salonica and Besika Bay?

THE EARL OF DERBY: In answer to the first part of my noble Friend's Question, I have to say that I have received official communications on the subject of the unfortunate occurrence of the murder of the two Consuls at Salonica; but these communications have reached me by telegraph, and they are necessarily brief. The information they contain is in substance identical with that which has appeared in the newspapers. I am therefore not in a position to throw light on the details of the occurrence. I am, however, happy to be able to state that the Turkish Government has shown a very proper feeling in the matter, and that nothing has been left undone by it to secure the punishment of the offenders and afford reparation to the relatives of the sufferers. In answer to the second part of my noble Friend's Question, I have to say that it is a fact that in consequence of communications received from our Ambassador at Constantinople Her Majesty's Government have thought it desirable that the Admiral commanding in the Mediterranean should bring up the vessels under his command to Besika Bay. One ship has been despatched to Salonica; and, in addition, orders have been given for a gunboat to go up to Constantinople. I may mention that undoubtedly there has been a great deal of excitement among the Mahomedan population at Constantinople, and considerable apprehension among the Christian population; but the latest accounts state that the agitation has been much allayed, and I hope, therefore, there is no further danger.

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT, having recapitulated the statements and suggestions contained in a letter written by him, and recently published in The Times newspaper, asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend to adhere to the plan of Knightsbridge Barracks now on view in the Tea Room of the House of Commons, and whether tenders have been accepted for the works?

Earl De La Warr

EARL CADOGAN in reply, said, that it was not intended to make any material alterations in the plans referred to by the noble Viscount. No tenders had been accepted, because none would be asked for until the Vote had passed. He might, he thought, be allowed to say that the authorities at the War Office were as anxious as the noble Viscount to make the newly-constructed barracks completely efficient in a sanitary as well as a military point of view. The old officers' quarters were to be renovated and an entirely new wing built, which would contain a mess-room, billiard-room, &c., and officers' quarters over them. The important point was the question of money. It was the opinion of the architect that if this new wing were added the old quarters might be made as good as could be desired; but if the course suggested by the noble Viscount were pursued, and they were entirely to pull down the old officers' quarters and the old riding school, and rebuild them on the sites pointed out by his noble Friend, an extra cost would be caused of at least £15,000, and such an expenditure the Secretary of State did not feel inclined to incur. The noble Viscount was very right in objecting to the married men being compelled to live in the disreputable slums in the neighbourhood; and admirable provision had been made for the married men in the new barracks, so that room would be found for all except 20. If the present officers' quarters were pulled down and a new building erected further west, we should be erecting a structure in front of houses which at present had an unintercepted view of the Park; and this might create a difficulty and arouse opposition from the inhabitants of those houses. The owners of house property in that neighbourhood had already shown themselves somewhat difficult to deal with. As to the sanitary condition of the barracks, the Inspector General of the Medical Department had reported that it was satisfactory.

LORD SANDHURST drew attention to a letter written by Sir Henry Cole, pointing out the advantages of a site about 100 yards to the north of the present barracks, and added that for his own part he had no wish to raise any opposition to the Government in this matter, and merely desired that it should be settled in a manner pleasing not only to the inhabitants of Knightsbridge, but to everybody interested in the question, which was one not solely of local importance, but affecting London in an art sense to a considerable degree.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON remarked that as there were only one or two Bills, of no great importance, and unlikely to lead to discussion, down for to-morrow night, it might be convenient to their Lordships that the House should adjourn to-morrow afternoon, after the appeals had been heard at 4 o'clock, until Monday.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE CLOCK TOWER.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the light of the clock in the Tower of the Houses of Parliament is extinguished at midnight when the House is not sitting; and, if so, whether, seeing the great advantage of an illuminated clock in such a prominent position, he will give instructions that in future the light be not extinguished until daylight?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for having put this Question. It is true that the light in the Clock Tower is extinguished at midnight when the House is not sitting; but, as it has been represented to me that it would be a great convenience, especially during the winter months, to the working classes and others who are compelled to leave their houses at an early hour, I will give the necessary directions that the light shall be kept burning until daylight.

EGYPTIAN FINANCE—CONVERSION OF THE DEBT—DECREES OF MAY 2.

QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the conversion of the Egyptian Debt, in the terms of the Decrees of the 2nd May, does not affect the security to this Country for the sum of about £200,000 per year payable in respect of interest on the Suez Canal shares; and, whether the consent of Her Majesty's Government, as a creditor of Egypt, was asked and obtained prior to the publication of those Decrees?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he did not see that the conversion of the Egyptian Debt in the terms of the Decrees of May 2 affected the security this country had for the £200,000 a-year. That sum was and had been included in all the arrangements, he believed, proposed in reference to the charges which were to be borne by the Egyptian Government. The consent of the British Government was not asked prior to the publication of the Decrees of the 2nd May; but those Decrees were issued solely in accordance with the caprice of the Egyptian Government.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked Mr. Attorney General, When he will introduce the Bill to carry out the Report of the Select Committee of last Session on the Corrupt Practices Prevention and Election Petitions Acts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that a Bill was in course of preparation, and he hoped to be able to introduce it in the course of a week.

INDIA—ARMY FURLOUGH RULES.

QUESTION.

MR. MORRIS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Furlough Rules, published by the Governor General of India in November 1868, fixed the rate of exchange at which officers on leave in England, who accepted those rules, were to be paid; whether those rules have been altered by the late Secretary of State for India; if any Memorials from officers have been received who had accepted the rules of 1868, complaining of such change as unfair; and, if he is aware that Memorials have been addressed to the Government of India by officers on the same subject, and what reply has been given?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that the Indian Furlough Rules of 1868 had been revised by the Secretary of State in July, 1871. Complaints had been received at the India Office from officers who had accepted the rules, complaining of the change; those complaints were under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council, and in a few days he (Lord George Hamilton) would be able to give the hon. Member a definite answer as to what the reply would be.

ARMY — SURGEONS OF MILITIA REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is not the case that in some thirty-five Militia Regiments the posts of Surgeon or Assistant Surgeon, or both, are vacant, owing to the appointments having been suspended for more than a year "pending new regulations;" and, if he will state, for the convenience of candidates waiting for appointments, how soon the vacancies are likely to be filled up?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY answered the first Question in the affirmative, and added that it was not intended to fill up the vacancies until the Militia Warrant, now under consideration, had been confirmed. It would not be long before this took place.

EDUCATION — MODEL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If any decision has been come to by the Government with reference to the complaint as to the increase of fees payable in the Model Schools in Ireland, which was brought before the Prime Minister by a Deputation in the month of March last?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The special complaint urged by the memorialists was that in January last a new fee of £1 per quarter was added by the Commissioners of Education in Ireland to the scale of fees previously existing in the model schools. Having inquired into the matter, the Government find that even this increased fee cannot be taken to represent the real value of the education given in the model schools; that it will only be exacted from children whose parents are in such a social position as to be well able to pay for the whole cost of their children's education; and that the children of poor parents, and those in training for the office of teacher, can still avail themselves of the benefits of these schools at a scale of fees descending as low as 1*d.* per week. Under these circumstances, the Government have not considered it advisable to interfere with the decision of the Commissioners of Education on the point, as they cannot anticipate that it will lead to the results feared by the memorialists. But they fully recognize the necessity of maintaining the model schools in efficiency and usefulness, and the working of the new scale of fees, and of the system generally, will be carefully watched with that object.

PUBLIC HOUSES (IRELAND)—SUNDAY CLOSING.—QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to give effect to the Resolution of this House on the subject of the sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It will be in the recollection of the House that in the course of the discussion to which the hon. Gentleman refers an offer was made by the Government that in the event of that Motion not being pressed they would introduce a Bill during the present Session for shortening the hours during which public-houses are permitted to remain open in Ireland on Sundays. That proposal, however, was not accepted, and the House, by a large majority, affirmed the principle of the Resolution for total Sunday closing. In these circumstances the hon. Gentleman asks whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to give effect to that Resolution. Well, Sir, the very large amount of Government Business on the Paper, and remaining to be disposed of, would in any case make it very difficult for us to deal with the question during the present Session; and, considering that the Resolution was opposed by the Government, and that the matter is one which involves a good deal of practical difficulty, we think it is but reasonable that time should be given for consideration and inquiry, in order that we may decide on the course we ought to adopt.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—THE SUMMER ASSIZES.—QUESTION.

MR. COLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in "The Times" of Monday the 15th instant, stating that—

"By a list of the Summer Circuits of Her Majesty's Judges published on Friday morning, the Circuits are to commence at least eight days before the time at which they commenced last year;"

and if such statement is correct; if so, whether it was the intention of the Judicature Act that the Circuits should be commenced at so early a date as to withdraw nearly the whole judicial strength from London and Middlesex, diminishing thereby the opportunities for the trial of causes in these important places; also, as several of the Circuits if commenced at the times mentioned will conflict with the County Quarter Sessions which by law must be held in the week commencing on Monday the 26th of June; and, whether any provision will be made to obviate the difficulties which must necessarily arise therefrom?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had consulted the Judges, and he was informed that the statement in The Times was correct. He must, however, decline to say what was the intention of the Judicature Act on the subject, as that ought to be gathered from the Act itself. By that Act the Courts created by Commission of Assize, Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery were among those transferred to the High Court of Justice; and by one of the Rules framed by the Judges under the Act, and which were laid before both Houses of Parliament, the sittings of the Court were fixed. Michaelmas Sittings were to commence on the 2nd of November and end on the 20th of December; Hilary Sittings on the 11th of January, and end on the first Wednesday before Easter; Easter Sittings were to extend from the first Tuesday after Easter week to the Friday before Whit Sunday; Trinity Sittings from the Tuesday after Whitsun week to the 8th of August, and the Long Vacation was to commence on the 10th of August and terminate on the 24th of October. The Judges considered that the Courts of Assize, of Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery, being part of the High Court of Justice, were subject to those Rules, and that it would not be proper that they should sit after the 10th of August, and it was with that view he was informed that the Circuits had been fixed. With regard to the withdrawal of judicial strength from London and Westminster, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that three Judges sat at Nisi Prius in London and Westminster during the time of the Assizes, and that during the whole of that time sittings in banco were held in each Court once a week.

CRIMINAL LAW—MR. BRAVO—THE INQUEST.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the manner in which the inquest on Mr. Bravo was conducted; whether some of the medical men who had attended Mr. Bravo did not tender their evidence to the Coroner and were not refused a hearing by him; whether the Coroner is not by law required to read over to each witness a written report of the evidence given by the witness, and to procure the signature of the witness to the same; whether, in the case of the inquest on Mr. Bravo's death, the Coroner complied with such requirement; and, whether he intends to direct further inquiry into the cause of Mr. Bravo's death, and also into the conduct of the Coroner, and the proceedings before him?

MR. CALLAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the mysterious death of Mr. C. D. Bravo by poison at Balham on the 21st ultimo, the facts of which are stated in the "Morning Post;" whether several of the physicians called in to attend him and persons in the house were not examined on the inquest; whether all accounts of the inquest were withheld from the public Press; whether Sir William Gull received a positive assurance from the dying man that he had not attempted to take his own life; whether, notwithstanding this important fact, Sir William Gull was not examined by the Coroner; and, whether an open verdict having been given by the jury, after only two meetings, it is his intention to give directions for a fuller investigation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I need hardly say that the consideration of this very painful case has taken up a great deal of my attention. I will answer the Questions as far as I can; but as some of them have been a little altered from the terms in which they stood on the Notice Paper last night, I have not been able to obtain full information as to the whole of them. I am asked first, whether some of the medical men who had attended Mr. Bravo did not tender their evidence to the Coroner, and were not refused a hearing by him; and whether several of the physicians called in to attend him, and persons in the house, were not examined on the inquest? I am very sorry to say there were a great number of physicians—I think amounting to four—who were not examined before the Coroner, and that some of the servants also were not examined. I am not able, for the reason I have just stated, to say whether they tendered their evidence, but I am not aware that they did; and, at all events, their evidence was not taken. I am asked whether the Coroner is not by law required to read over to each witness a written report of the evidence given by the witness, and to procure the signature of the witness to the same? and whether in the case of the inquest on Mr. Bravo's death the Coroner complied with such requirement? I believe that to be the law, and I am sorry to say that the law does not seem to have been complied with in this instance. I am asked, next, whether all accounts of the inquest were withheld from the public Press? That I am not able to give positive information about, but rather negative information. I cannot find that an account of the inquest was sent to the public Press, and I am informed that it is not usual to do so, and that it was not done in this instance until after an account of the matter appeared in The Daily Telegraph and other newspapers. Then I am asked whether Sir William Gull received a positive assurance from the dying man that he had not attempted to take his own life, and whether Sir William was not examined by the Coroner? Sir William Gull was not so examined; but he writes me word that he received no assurance from the dying man that he had not attempted to take his own life. And, lastly, I am asked whether, an open verdict having been given by the jury after only two meetings, I intend to direct any further investigations into the cause of Mr. Bravo's death, and also into the conduct of the Coroner? The second day of the inquest was on Friday, the funeral took place on Saturday, and on the Monday detectives were placed in communication with the friends of Mr. Bravo in order to inquire into the circumstances. The police have had further instructions to give every assistance in their power to investigate this case. I have thought it right not only to do that much, but to put the matter into the hands of the Solicitor to the Treasury—there being no Public Prosecutor at present—to take such steps as he may think fit in order that the facts of the case may be ascertained. No expense will be spared and no time will be wasted in sifting the matter to the bottom. So far as the inquest and the Coroner's verdict are concerned, the House knows that I have no power over the Coroner. All I can say is that, from the facts I have stated, I, for one, am entirely dissatisfied with the way in which that inquest was carried on; and after much consideration I have thought it best to place the whole of the papers in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown, who will advise me as to whether there are grounds for making application to the Court of Queen's Bench for the issue of a writ ad melius inquirendum, or whether any and what further steps ought to be taken.

AT SALONICA.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in view of recent occurrences at Salonica, any, and, if so, what vessels of the British Navy have been ordered to proceed to the coasts of Turkey?

MR. HUNT: Her Majesty's ship Swiftsure is at Salonica. Admiral Drummond, the Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, is on his way to Besika Bay with either three or four ironclads, and he will be joined by the Devastation from Malta. A gun-vessel has been ordered up to Constantinople.

GLOUCESTER DISTRICT REGISTRY.
QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is proposed to abolish the District Registry of the Court of Probate at Gloucester; and, if so, whether he can state to the House what measures will be taken to prevent the great inconvenience to residents in the county of Gloucester, as well as to professional men, from the abolition of a local Registry for proving wills and taking out letters of administration, which has existed at Gloucester for more than three hundred years?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that no definite decision had been come to upon the subject. It rested entirely with the Lord Chancellor, the Treasury having only a limited interest in it.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE "LILY OF DEVON."—QUESTION.

MR. BATES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will cause to be laid upon the Table of the House the depositions of the Master and Officers of the barque "Lily of Devon," of Plymouth, as taken before the police magistrate, Mr. Paget, in October 1874, with the reasons assigned by that gentleman for dismissing the complaint of the master against three of the crew of that vessel for plundering the cargo?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the offence not being technically an indictable one, no depositions had been taken, nor was there any record of the reasons which actuated the magistrate in dismissing the charge. If the hon. Member would move for a copy of the notes of the evidence of the trial, or anything connected with it that was in existence, it should be produced as an unopposed Return.

ARMY—SUPPLIES TO MILITIA REGI-MENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DEASE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is usual and according to law that contracts for supplies to Militia regiments during their time of training should be entered into without advertisement?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, there was no law regulating the mode in which contracts for supplies to Militia regiments during their period of training should be entered into. Whenever possible, advertisements were issued; but in some cases this was not practicable; but even then the officers in charge of districts were compelled to show that the supplies were necessary and the amounts paid for them reasonable.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES ACT—AR-REST OF AN OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR AT HAMBURG.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the circumstances connected with the arrest, by order of the Hamburg Courts, of Mr. Whinney, the Official Liquidator of the London and Hamburg and Continental Exchange Bank, Limited, in October 1874, and his being compelled to repay, at the expense of the English shareholders, moneys which he had recovered in England under the judgment of an English Court?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government was giving attention to the matter, and as soon as possible the House should be informed as to what was intended to be done.

INDIA—BOMBAY REVENUE JURISDIC-TION ACT, 1876.—QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether "The Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction

Act, 1876," lately passed by the Legislative Council of India, has been as yet submitted to the Secretary of State for his approval; if not, when he expects to receive it; if he has any objection to lay a Copy of it upon the Table of the House; and, whether a Memorial of the Inhabitants of Bombay against the Act, adopted at a public meeting held on the 18th day of April 1876, has been received at the India Office; if so, whether he will lay a Copy upon the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We received the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act by last mail, but we have not yet received the Memorial of the inhabitants of Bombay against it. The Secretary of State will not consider the Bill until the Memorial has been received by him, and as soon as he has considered the Act there will be no objection to laying it, together with the Memorial, upon the Table of the House.

METROPOLIS—VICTORIA PARK.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the First Commissioner of Works, If his attention has been drawn to certain abuses in the management of Victoria Park; and if it is his intention to cause an official inquiry to be instituted?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Yes, Sir, by the courtesy of the Editor of The Hackney Gazette I have seen the letters which appeared in that journal addressed to myself, and to which I suppose the hon. Member for Hackney alludes. The letters not only reflect on the management, but they contain serious charges against the officials of Victoria Park; but they are anonymous, and I think the House, and I am sure the hon. Member himself will agree with me that I ought to take no notice of charges so grave made against officials in whom I have reason to place confidence until the writer of the letters will have the goodness to come forward in his own name and enable those who have been accused to meet the charges thus brought against them.

UNITED STATES.—THE "ALABAMA" AWARD.—QUESTION.

MR. BATES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington any report as to the disposal of the sum paid by Great Britain to the United States Government under the "Alabama" award; whether or not it is true that a surplus of upwards of two millions sterling remains in the hands of the United States Government after the payment of all claims on the indemnity; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table any Correspondence on the subject?

Mr. Dunbar

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he had made inquiry at the Foreign Office on the subject and found that there had been no report from Washington as to the disposal of the amount which the Geneva tribunal gave by their award. A Commission was appointed some time ago under an Act of Congress to investigate the claims, and the Commission would not finish its sittings until the 22nd of July. It appeared that there would be a considerable surplus; but the Commission had been precluded from inquiring into the claims of the insurance companies and certain other claims, and the rate of interest they allowed was restricted to 4 per cent. Bills had been introduced into Congress in order to admit the claims which were before excluded, and to allow the payment of a higher rate of interest than was originally fixed. Her Majesty's Government had no knowledge as to any particular arrangement likely to be arrived at. There had been no correspondence with the Government on the subject, and the only information they had was from the proceedings of Congress. Therefore Her Majesty's Government had no Papers to lay on the Table of the House.

NAVY—CREED REGISTER.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MOORE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether in the Royal Navy there is a Creed Register of the religious persuasion of each person on his first joining the service; and, if not, whether there would be any objection to having such register kept?

MR. HUNT replied that such a Register was kept.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill further to provide for Elementary Education.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

VISCOUNT SANDON rose, amidst cheers, to bring in a Bill to make further provision for Elementary Education. The noble Lord said, he hoped that the kindness with which he had been received was a good omen of the friendly spirit in which this great and important subject would be dealt with by the House. Many of his friends had asked him whether he was fully aware of the great importance of the subject which he opened, and the risk which Her Majesty's Government would have to encounter in touching it. He could assure those who put the question to him that after the experience he had had during the past two years no one could be more fully alive to the importance and the gravity of the subject than he was; but, on the other hand, having watched the constant calmness with which it had been treated since 1870, he did not think that the risk Her Majesty's Government would have to run in dealing with it would be very great, because he was satisfied that both sides of the House would meet any measure affecting the education of our children in the most careful and most considerate manner, and in a most determined spirit, to shape it in a form that would meet the requirements of the country. He was also quite sure of another point—namely, that the parents of this country would look with disapprobation on any one who attempted to turn this great question into anything like a Party matter. It was of far too much importance to the interests of the working classes and the employers of labour in the future and to the interests of the country at large to be treated as a Party question. He, for one, should, on the part of the Government, endeavour to rob the subject of anything like a Party character. He had no doubt the Gentlemen opposite would aid him in preserving that spirit of impartiality throughout their debates on the subject. He should at the outset like to lay before the House a sort of picture of the position in which the Government had found themselves with regard to education when they looked upon the matter with a view to action. The Lord President and himself had given the question their most anxious, careful, and constant attention for a long period. They had looked at it primarily in the interest of the children; and, secondly, in the interest of the country as a whole. They had received considerable assistance from different sources in the course of their labours. There was, in the first place, the mass of evidence bearing on the subject which had been collected by the Factories Commission, whose Report had only recently been laid before the House. They had also the advantage of the judgment of that most able body of Commissioners—whom he took that opportunity of thanking for the untiring labour, ability, and zeal they had displayed, although he did not entirely concur in all their recommendations, and he was satisfied that both sides of the House must be proud of such Colleagues as the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding (Lord Frederick Cavendish), the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), to whom the country owed a deep debt of gratitude. They had also had the assistance of the elaborate Report of the former Commission on the Employment of Women and Children in Agriculture. They had taken the opportunity also of consulting all Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools with regard to the treatment of the leading features of this measure. The measure, therefore, would not fail from lack of information on the subject on the part of its framers. They had, in addition to all this evidence, received an infinite number of communications on the subject from persons of all shades of political opinions, many of whom were of influence and experience, and Her Majesty's Government had carefully considered the suggestions which those communications contained. As to the Government measure itself, he wished at once to warn the House that it did not pretend to embody a proposal for a general re-construction of our educational system, and further that it did not pretend to be a reversal of the policy of the Act of 1870. The House would agree with him that it would be very hazardous for any Government to attempt to reverse a policy which had received the formal approval of the country, unless they had the strongest evidence that the national policy had undergone an entire change. Now that the franchise had been lowered it would be most unwise to lead the people to believe that there would be a general reversal of policy whenever there was a change of Government. That could only be justified on the ground of a great change in the national wish, and it would be the height of pedantry to say that when the country came to the conclusion that a mistake had been made, it should be tied down for all time by the judgment of a past Parliament. But there should be no change in the broad lines of a policy without the nation clearly wished for the change. Her Majesty's Government felt that they should carry out what they believed to be the deliberate wish of the nation as experienced in three Sessions of Parliament—that no child in the country should hereafter enter on the struggle of life without having those simple tools needed by our present civilization to enable him to work his way hereafter, and that he (Viscount Sandon) took to be the determined and final and settled wish of the whole country, and not merely of a particular section. He knew that some people had demurred to that being the deliberate wish of the country, but he thought he could test it by taking the case of an individual child. Suppose the child came before a farmer at the Board of Guardians, and that the child was found unable to read or write or do the simplest sum in arithmetic, would not the farmer speak in the strongest manner of the gross and culpable neglect displayed by the parents of that child? Take the case of an employer of labour. He doubted if one employer of labour could be found who would not speak in equally strong terms of parental neglect if, when sitting on the bench of magistrates, a child was brought before him totally ignorant of the elements of learning. Take the case of a country gentleman at petty sessions. From his knowledge of those gentlemen he had not the slightest doubt if an agricultural child came before him in a state of gross ignorance he would remonstrate strongly with the parent as to his gross and culpable neglect. If they would not tolerate a single child being kept in a state of gross ignorance, why should they tolerate whole masses of children being kept in a similar condition? To go further, they had had several debates in Parliament on the subject, and Members would recollect that there was a remarkable concurrence of opinion on both sides that this great measure of universal elementary education ought to be dealt with. It might be said it was all very well to talk in the abstract; but was there any tangible evidence that the country was willing to make sacrifices for this object? The evidence was overwhelming. Nothing could afford stronger evidence of the wish of the country than its willingness to spend money. Since the year 1839 there had been spent upon school buildings the sum of £13,000,000, of which £8,000,000 were expended before the Education Act of 1870, collected by voluntary effort, and £1,700,000 granted by Government. The annual Government grant amounted to £1,000,000, a similar sum was obtained from the school fees paid by the parents, and £660,000 was collected by voluntary subscriptions. Therefore it appeared on every side that the country was in thorough earnest upon this question. The result of this expenditure had been to provide school accommodation for the enormous number of 3,150,000 children. He asked the House to look at the manner in which the wish of the country on this subject had been met. There were only two classes of schools which they had to take into consideration. First, there were the private adventure schools, which were set up by private individuals for their own profit. Those schools were very numerous, and generally exceedingly bad. They were kept by people who generally knew nothing about learning. They were often very crowded, and very mischievous to the children. Then there were the public elementary schools which received the Government annual grant, and which were obliged to have a conscience clause and certificated teachers. There was another class of schools which were efficient, but which received no Government money, and were not under Government inspection. These for his present purpose might be put aside, because they were so few, and were year by year diminishing in number. There had been a large decrease in the attendance at the private adventure schools, and they were now dwindling. The number of private adventure schools in the year 1871 was 6,153; in 1875 the number was 4,849, being a decrease of 1,304. The number of children attending private adventure schools in the year 1871 was 151,955; in 1875 the number was 130,571, being a decrease of 21,384. He hoped those schools would ultimately disappear altogether. How did children attend and take advantage of school accommodation in obedience to the wishes of the nation? They ought, at the lowest calculation, to have 3,250,000 children in daily attendance at their schools; whereas they had 1,800,000, so that there remained 1,450,000 to be accounted for. He thought they could not account for them even in the private adventure schools, and he was at a loss to say where those children were. With regard to the 1,800,000 under instruction, did they get sufficient instruction from their schooling? There, again, he thought the figures were not satisfactory. Only 200,000 of them offered themselves for examination in the three upper Standards, and 800,000 for examination in the three lower Standards. He need hardly ask how many of the children passed who offered themselves for examination in those Standards. The result, therefore, was not at all satisfactory as to the schools which had been provided at so much expense for the children of this country. He thought he had a right to say that the quiet, sober wishes of the country had been very greatly disappointed in this matter. What sort of education was it that the sober, quiet, right-thinking people of the country wished to be supplied to the children of the working classes? He had not a shadow of doubt that it was the settled sentiment of this country that sound elementary instruction should be provided for ordinary children, and that all talent and merit should have an opportunity of rising. That was no novel doctrine. It had prevailed ever since the revival of learning in the time of the Reformation. That he believed to be the wish of the country, and since he had been in office the Education Department had shown its anxiety to meet that wish by the very large improvements introduced into the Code last year. Assuming that it was the wish of the country that all children of talents should have an open career before them, he thought the sentiment of the country with regard to children who had no particular talents—and he believed they constituted the great bulk of children—was that, at any rate, a simple modicum of learning should be secured to them. He thought the kind of education which the country wished to be given to the great mass of children who had no particular ability or aspirations was very well sketched by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who had said—

“What I would wish to see in this country is that every child should be able to read, and to comprehend what he reads; that he should be able to write, and to write so well, that what he writes can be read; and that, at the same time, he should know something of the simple rules of arithmetic, which might enable him to keep a little account of the many transactions which may happen to him in the course of his life.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxviii. 1289.]

He (Viscount Sandon) could not forget the very earnest desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) to secure a solid education to the children of this country. At a time when people were running wild about fanciful schemes of education that right hon. Gentleman had the courage to say that he wished, above all things, that all children should receive the simple elements of instruction. He (Viscount Sandon) would ask the House seriously to consider whether it would be right on the part of the State to create artificially, he might say, by State regulations, a whole population whose great ambition would be merely to wield the pen instead of the plough or the shuttle, as if the former occupation were superior to the latter. He could hardly think that any nation in its sober senses would for a moment lay down that as its object; nor did he think it would be a matter of State policy to bring the whole working classes into the idea that there was something very superior in using the pen to the implements of a mechanic or artizan. The education that the country wanted was ready for all the children of the country. We had schools open for all the children of the country. We had teachers, and in almost all the schools the teachers were well able to give instruction. Everything was there except the children to whom we wished to give the benefit of this education. As the wish of the country was perfectly clear and education was perfectly ready for all classes of children that desired it, he should like the House to run over quickly with him, if they did not think he was occupying too much of their time, the law with regard to the labour and education of children. By the action of school boards under the Education Act of 1870 bye-laws had been passed with regard to the compulsory education of children to a very large extent. At the present moment the children of a population of 10,000,000 out of a population of 22,000,000 were kept from work and kept in school to the age of 10. They were only free to labour on receiving a certificate of having passed a certain Standard, and they were then subject to a modified half-time system, unless they received a certificate of having passed another standard. How was that provision enforced? It was enforced by visits to the homes of the children by attendance officers, who looked after children in all the streets and alleys of a town, by bringing the parents before magistrates, by fines, &c. By the Scotch Act of 1873 the duty of a parent was declared to be to provide for his child elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic from five to thirteen years of age, unless a certificate were given by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors that the child was able to read and write and had a knowledge of elementary arithmetic. Under the Scotch Act all reasonable fees were paid for poor parents out of the poor rate. The Act to amend the Scotch Education Act of 1873 enacted that the children of out-door paupers from five to thirteen years of age must go to school unless a certificate of having passed a Standard had been obtained from one of Her Majesty's Inspectors. He then came to the factories and workshops, putting aside textile factories. No child could be employed under eight years of age. There was no education certificate required at eight years; but from eight to thirteen years there must be half-time certificates. In the glass, metal, and fustian trades there were special later ages. Then, in mines no child could be employed under 10 years old; but there was no certificate needed at 10 years; and certificates of half-time attendance were required up to 12 years. Next came the Textile Factories Act (1874), by which no child under 10 years could be employed. No certificate was needed at 10, so that the child might begin to work at 10 in complete ignorance. The child must then continue half-time attendance up to 14 years of age unless he got a certificate of proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic. It should be noticed that the Factory rules were primarily sanitary; education, he imagined, being their secondary object. He next came to agricultural gangs, in which no child could be employed under 10 years of age. Then there was the Agricultural Children Act passed in 1873, but which only began in 1875. Under that Act no child could be employed under eight, and not then be employed unless it brought a certificate of 250 previous attendances (or six months). After 12 months' labour it must have a certificate of school attendance for another 250 times, or it could not work under 10 years of age. After another 12 months' labour it must attend school for 150 times, and get a certificate, or it could not work under 12 unless it had passed Standard IV. That Act was enforced by a fine of £5 on the employer of the uncertificated child. As no one was bound to enforce the Act, it was put in force in only some 11 or 12 counties, and was there generally worked by the police. He had given the House a sketch of the Acts which regulated the education of children up to the present time. The great mass of the children now in employment were hampered as to the age at which they might go to work; in many trades the limit was fixed at 10 years, and none could go to work without some certificate of school attendance, or without having passed a certain Standard. Did those Acts give sufficient security that the children of this country went to school? They illustrated, he thought, the English habit of very slow and cautious progress in those matters; and they also read them the lesson that, in all their operations, they could not be too gradual. But they also gave the impression of general confusion, general inconvenience, and very inadequate results. They had, for instance, a school board on one side of a river and none on the other side; and parents might cross the stream and escape from its rules. Again, between the different kinds of labour—that of textile factories, of workshops, and of mines—they had constant conflict and confusion, the employers frequently complaining of the injury inflicted on their various industries by the inequalities as to age and other matters; while, for the parents, nothing could be more vexatious than to find that, on a change of their abode, they were brought under different rules. Why should a parent, in choosing a particular industry for the employment of his child, be hampered by having to calculate how far his choice would be affected by these conflicting rules? What they wanted in these matters was simplicity and uniformity of arrangement. Let him recapitulate the state of things at which they had arrived. They found themselves in the face of a country which had made enormous sacrifices for education; and, while he acknowledged that the employers of labour had made sacrifices, that the country gentlemen had made sacrifices, that the ministers of the various Nonconformist bodies had made sacrifices, he must never omit to bear his testimony to the enormous pecuniary sacrifices which the clergy of the Established Church often, from their miserably small incomes, made on behalf of education. The ministers of all denominations had done much in that great work, but he still claimed the palm for those of the Church of England. They had done all in their power, not to shut the book of knowledge to the working classes, but to throw it widely open to them. With those great sacrifices, schools had been provided for 3,150,000 children; yet these schools were attended day by day by only 1,800,000 children. They had the great irregularity that he had described, which was very much caused by the neglect of the parents, by the great value also of the children's wages, and likewise by the absurdly low fees charged in the schools for the excellent education they gave, for when the parents saw how ridiculously cheap the education was they often treated it as of no worth. On the other hand, he found in case after case which had been brought before him from all parts of the country, that where the fees had been raised to a sensible amount there they got a regular and fixed attendance. Looking, then, at the irregularity which caused their sacrifices to produce so small a return, he thought he had made out a case to show that some further legislation was really needed, and that any Government which did not bring forward some scheme for amending that state of things would be grossly neglecting their duty. How were they to deal with that great difficulty? There were different modes of doing so. They might propose universal school boards and tell them they must adopt a system of universal direct compulsion. That, of course, was simple enough. But then they had to remember that, although that proposal had been brought before the House three times, 164 Members was the largest number which had ever been found to vote for it. And even out of those 164 some, whom he called the leading spirits, said that they voted for universal school boards with the simple wish that the children might be sent to school, and that they would readily accept any machinery that was offered in the place of the school board. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) expressed that opinion very strongly; and the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) stated, if he rightly understood him, that, if they could secure the primary object of getting the children to school, he did not care how they attained that object or what schools they had to attend. Now, as to universal school boards, the House, he was sure, would not think that he had ever shown an undue hostility to school boards. On the contrary, on many occasions he had defended their action in regard to bye-laws when he thought them right, and he had lost no opportunity of expressing—what he believed to be the fact—that the country owed a very great debt of gratitude to the gentlemen serving on school boards—whether they liked the policy or not—for their self-devotion to the task of providing schools and getting the children into them in the large towns of the country. They had done a great work; they were called upon by Parliament to do it, and it would be exceedingly shabby, because of a little wave of unpopularity, not to acknowledge their labour to be honest and good. But that did not alter the view of the Government as to the very serious danger which hung around any proposal for creating a system of universal school boards; for there might be universal school boards without board schools. Surely no one would think of establishing all over the country so costly a machinery, inflicting everywhere the turmoil, the expense, the animosity of feeling, and, perhaps, the disturbance of triennial elections, in order to create a municipality merely to get the children to school. He imagined that such a machinery would be far too large except in the towns. Moreover, they had been told that it would not be unreasonable to ask that a board school should be within reach of every parent in the land; that it would not be unreasonable to ask that no Government grants should be made to any schools except those which were under the management of the ratepayers; and also that it might be profitable to the cause of religion, and would not be unreasonable, to insist on all school-board schools being secularized. So that, if the Government were to propose a universal system of school boards, trying in a feeble manner—because the restrictions would be swept away—to confine them only to the duty of securing the attendance of the children at the schools, he believed they would be sounding the knell of every voluntary school in the country, and the proposal would probably lead in the long run to the one thing which he believed the country would detest and abhor—namely, one general system of secular instruction. He put aside, therefore, at once and for ever the proposition of universal school boards as the way of meeting the difficulty. Should they, then, oblige existing local authorities to pass bye-laws for universal direct compulsion? Hitherto direct compulsion had not been enforced in any part of the country, excepting by those who directly represented the ratepayers; that was to say, no locality had put itself under the law of direct compulsion unless at the will of the people of that locality. Direct compulsion meant constant visits to the houses and streets where the people lived; it meant a large body of visitors and attendance officers, who had the duty imposed upon them of going constantly to the parents and questioning them as to the attendance of their children at school. That was what he might call a system of domiciliary visitation. Now, if people wished to put themselves under that system, he had nothing to say against their doing so; but it would be a very serious thing for Parliament to say as the law of the land that this system of constant visitation should be imposed upon the people. He was sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not like direct compulsion in itself, and only regarded it as a means to an end. Supposing they were to establish direct compulsion and put it into the hands of the local authorities, was it quite clear that, as time went on, they might not be affecting very largely the national character of the English people, who had always prided themselves on their independence? It was not a sufficient argument to say that direct compulsion existed in foreign countries. It might or might not be good for them; but he had always understood that one of the points on which we plumed ourselves as a nation was that we were accustomed to be led instead of driven. Parliament would be, consequently, taking on itself a great responsibility if it decreed that there should be a constant interference with the habits of the people, and that parents should be relieved of their proper responsibilities. He put the system of direct compulsion aside therefore as unsuitable for this country. Supposing, then, they endeavoured to solve the difficulty by having one Act for the country and another for the towns—adopting, say, the 10 years' limit for town industries and in the country giving effect to the Agricultural Children Act by providing some authority to enforce it? Well, in that case there would be a fatal inconvenience to the employers of labour, and a tendency to make children shift from town to country, and vice versa. That system, therefore, would not be very sound. Moreover, was the Agricultural Children Act of such a nature that the Government would be justified in adopting it as their own? As the House was aware, children under that Act had to be provided with three certificates of school attendance—first at 8 years of age, secondly at 10, and lastly at 12. It was impossible in speaking of that Act not to give a meed of praise to his hon. Friends the Members for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) and Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who in a most gallant manner stepped forward and determined to do their best to secure the advantages of education for the whole of the agricultural children. But it appeared to him that Parliament would not be justified in inflicting that Act permanently on the farmers of this country; and, after all, what did we gain by having two periods of 250 attendances and one period of 150 attendances? Did they insure a fair knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic on the part of the children? He was sure the House would agree with him that that system was not one which ought to be made permanent. There would be a vital evil in dealing with the question merely as one of labour, because if Parliament did not interfere with the schooling of idle children, parents would have a strong inducement to keep their children from work. Children then, being neither at school nor at work, would in all probability become bad and mischievous, and that by legislation. None of those plans, in short, appeared to the Government satisfactory, and he would now run rapidly over the proposals which the Government had to make to the House. In the first place, he would say that, profiting by the example of the Factory Acts, they intended that their course should be a very gradual one. The Government had looked very carefully over the evidence given by Messrs. Redgrave and Baker before the Factories Commission—who, he supposed, were about the best judges of the labour and educational condition of the country—and were more than ever impressed with the necessity of dealing with the subject very gradually and cautiously. Their proposals, therefore, would not come to their maturity for five years—namely, till the year 1881. He might also say that no child now 11 years of age would be affected. As to the school board system, they proposed that all localities might have a school board in the same way as they might have them now. They left that to the free choice of the locality, and they retained the power to oblige localities to have school boards if they did not supply sufficient school accommodation. They proposed to repeal, while adopting certain portions of the Agricultural Children Act. Then, Town Councils and Boards of Guardians might pass bye-laws, just as school boards now could, for a parish on the requisition of its inhabitants, providing for compulsory school attendance on full or half-time, but they could have no power to establish or maintain schools. The Government, in other words, were of opinion that the representatives of boroughs who were now entrusted with the duty of asking for a school board, and, therefore, of enforcing compulsion if they liked, might very well be entrusted with the powers of a school board themselves; and that Boards of Guardians, who were now practically rural municipalities, might well be entrusted with the passing of bye-laws not merely on their spontaneous suggestion, but for any parish in the Union which asked for such bye-laws in the same way as it now asked for a school board. A meeting of ratepayers in a rural parish might at present ask for a school board, and therefore for compulsion. The Government proposed that that same meeting of ratepayers should be able to say—"We should like to have bye-laws for compulsion. We asked the Board of Guardians to pass those bye-laws, and we wish to have them without the burden of a school board." So far the whole country was put on the same footing as to the power to have bye-laws for compulsion. Now came a more important provision. As the House, no doubt, felt much more was wanted to secure instruction for all children. The Government, therefore, proposed that no person should be allowed to take into his employment, under the same penalty as was provided in the Factory Acts, any child under 10 years of age, or any child of 10 years of age and under 14, without a certificate. That certificate might be one of two things. It might be a certificate of efficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, ascending to Standard IV, or it might be a certificate of attendance, for 250 times in five previous years in not more than two public elementary schools. The reason for this alternative certificate would be obvious. It was impossible to shut their eyes to the fact that there were a great number of stupid children. If they looked at the evidence of the Factory Commission they would see that the leading Inspectors had all acknowledged this fact—that in any legislation with regard to education they must make allowance for what they called "dunces." Now this double certificate would have a very important effect of securing the very regular attendance of all the children up to 10. The parent would not like to risk his child passing in the Standard form prescribed for children of 10, and he would wish to have two strings to his bow, and to secure that he should, in addition, regularly attend for five years. On the other hand, he would not trust to the

250 attendances in each of the five previous years, because he would fear that illness might come, and thus the parent would have an inducement to push on the instruction of the child. What was wanted was to fix the responsibility of the child receiving instruction primarily on the parent, with whom it ought to rest; and the whole key of the present Bill was that, instead of its being the parent's interest to keep the child from school, and to dodge the compulsion officer, in order that he might earn a trifle, this Bill would alter the law, and not only make it the parent's interest to compel the child to go to school, but to question the child how he was getting on with his reading, writing, and arithmetic, because he would tell the child—"I want the help and support of your labour as soon as you become 10 years old." The effect of this clause would therefore be of the greatest importance, and he repeated it might be said to be the very key of the Bill. Of course, there must be certain exceptions to the clause. One standard lower would be accepted for a certificate where half-time had been secured under the Factory and Workshops Act, &c., Acts, and where any local bye-laws secured the attendance of children at half-time up to 13 years of age. He need hardly say, further, that it would be necessary to accept reasonable excuses such as were to be found in the Education Acts. The clause, for example, would not be enforced on parents or employers where there was not a public elementary school within two miles. The Government did not wish to take a pedantic course or to prevent the employment of children, who were attending school, in occasional jobs such as pulling turnips or keeping away the crows, and the Bill would not interfere with their casual employment at any odd times, so long as that employment did not interfere with their efficient instruction. The clause went on to make another exception with regard to the employment of children during the hay harvest, the grain harvest, and generally during the ingathering of the crops. This was a reasonable and a large exception; but it was necessary, in order to obtain the result they desired, to avoid anything like pedantry in the treatment of the children. The House might ask how the certificate was to be given. It would be a great convenience to the employers of labour if they could simply say, when a child sought employment—"Where is your labour pass?" The employer in that case need not inquire whether a child had passed Standard IV., or whether he had satisfied the law as to the proper number of school attendances. All he would have to say would be, whether in town or country—whether he was a farmer, manufacturer, or any other employer of labour—"Where is your pass?" The question then arose how the child was to get this pass. It was proposed that the one certificate should be given by the teacher at examination, and that the State should supply a very simple card such as had been recommended by Mr. Redgrave, upon which should be stated the age of the child, and that this card should be given to him when he had either passed the standard or had made the proper number of attendances. This would be a great relief to the employers of labour, and especially to farmers, who would much prefer this labour pass to the duty now imposed upon them of asking children, it might be, three times over—"Have you got your certificate?" He was aware, with regard to the 10 years' limit, that it was very important, and the House would, perhaps, allow him to quote the evidence, which showed the necessity of establishing a general uniform age below which a child should not go to labour. Thus Mr. Redgrave was asked—

"Would you recommend a general uniformity of age for commencing labour on any account?" He replied:—"Certainly, including agricultural labour."

"What would be that limit of age?—Ten years, subject of course to exceptions in the case of trades, which I mentioned before."

"What are your reasons for selecting the age of 10?—Because it seems to be the general age which is selected throughout the country."

Mr. Redgrave also stated that children under 10 were little employed in agriculture—

"As to the question of agricultural labour, your belief is that there are hardly any children employed in agriculture at the age of eight?—The law says eight years of age; but the fact is no children are employed in agriculture at that age. In the Census Returns the numbers are as small as possible."

"They are employed at nine, are they not?—Very few indeed under 10. When Mr. Pell brought his Motion forward I went fully into the question and prepared statistics for Mr. Cross, and I was surprised to find how very few children under 12 were employed in agriculture."

He had himself inquired very carefully into this subject, and although some children of less age might be employed in certain manufactures, the testimony as to women and children was that the best feeling of the farmers and the labourers was enlisted in declaring that under 10 no children need be habitually employed in agriculture. He now came to the enforcing authority. This would be, in the first place, the school boards, which might continue to exist, and which would have the same power as at present of enforcing more stringent provisions than would be found in the present Bill. They must not, however, go below its provisions. The other enforcing authorities would be the Town Councils and the Boards of Guardians, both of which might, if they pleased, act by committees. The Town Councils would be able to appoint a School Attendance Committee, and the Boards of Guardians might appoint a special committee for the Union, and also, if they pleased, for every parish in the Union. That was a matter for the local authorities to settle among themselves; but in all the regulated industries of the land—such as factories, workshops, and mines—the Government Inspectors, and not the local authorities, would enforce the Act. It would be undesirable that the employers of labour should be annoyed by the visits of two classes of Inspectors. The Government Inspectors would therefore alone be responsible for the working of the Act in these great industries. The House would wish to know how security would be taken that the local authorities should examine any deficiency on the part of the employers and look after the children. He proposed that the same strong powers should be taken as under the Education Act. The Education Department had the power of declaring the school boards in default if they neglected their duty, just as the Local Government Board had a similar power in regard to Boards of Guardians; and if the provisions of the Act were not carried out it would be the duty of the Department to see that this should be done for a period of two years. The responsibility would then again fall upon the local authorities. This default was not, however, likely to occur, and he had the fullest confidence that the provisions of the Act would be carried out by the Town Councils and the Boards of Guardians. The Town Councils were well informed as to the wants of their respective boroughs, and no body of men were better acquainted with the needs of their districts than the Boards of Guardians throughout the country. There was still another point of great importance—the case of neglected children under 10 years of age. It might be said that this Bill held out a great inducement to this class of children to avoid labour and remain in idleness. On the contrary, he was not aware of any class of persons more intolerant of the idle, wandering, good-for-nothing class of children than Town Councils and Boards of Guardians. The employers of labour knew that these children generally came to no good. The ratepayers looked upon these children as certain to increase the rates, and the farmer viewed them as ne'er-do-wells, who robbed his orchards and became poachers afterwards. That was the class of child they had to deal with. He hardly knew what to call them; he would venture to use—not in the Act, of course, but in the observations he had to make—the old English term "wastrel." If it appeared to the local authorities that the parents of any child who was under the Act prohibited from being taken into employment continued habitually and without excuse to neglect to provide such reasonable instruction as would enable it to obtain a certificate, or such child was found habitually wandering about, it would be the duty of the local authorities to take certain steps, which he would presently explain. But those children were not to be dealt with under 10 years of age, unless there was a school within two miles reach, or if the child was kept away from sickness or any other unavoidable cause. But if no reasonable excuse could be given for absence, the local authority was bound to take this action—first, warn the parents of the wastrel children that they ought to be sent to school, or otherwise comply with the Act; and if the parent did not see that the Act was complied with he was brought before a Court of summary jurisdiction. Here came in the only direct compulsion in the Bill. The Court might then order regular attendance in some school, and a fine of 5s. might be imposed. But whether a fine was imposed or not, the local authority might commit the parent, on further default, to an industrial school. [Laughter.] He meant commit the child; he was not sure that it would not do the parent good. Then they made an alteration with regard to the Industrial Schools Act, which they had been urged to do, and said that the managers, on the application of the local authority, might give a licence to the children to leave after one month, instead of 18 months. That had been strongly urged upon them by some of the school boards, which urged the temporary seclusion of the child in an industrial school without going to the extent of 18 months. The Bill made provision that any person might call the attention of the local authorities to cases of neglected children. The whole object, then, was pretty clear—they put the whole responsibility for the education of the children in the hands of the existing authorities in the locality; they had not only to carry out this Act, but they were responsible for carrying out the Industrial Schools Act, and in this way they hoped to strike a greater blow than had been hitherto struck at that class of wandering children who so long had been the despair of those who cared for their welfare. Now as to the modifications which they proposed to introduce. The Act would come into full operation in 1881. In 1877 children of nine years of age, and not those of 10, would be prohibited from employment. In that year the Standard which the child would have to pass would be only the second, and the attendances would only be for two previous years. For safe progress they felt it essential to begin very low, and he would strengthen that by quoting from the evidence of Mr. Redgrave, who was asked—

“Would you not be in favour of some educational standard to be exacted from the child at the age of 10, before he is allowed to go to work as a half-timer?”

He replied—

“I think you may be able to do that eventually; but, unless you had the very lowest possible standard, you could not do it now.”

This was fully borne out by the condition of the people in the great centres of industry. In 1879 and 1880 they would rise to Standard III., and in 1879 the attendance would be required for three previous years, and in 1880 for four previous years. So in 1881 no child would be employed under 10 years of age, and not then without a certificate of having passed Standard IV., or of having made 250 attendances in five previous years. Before closing this part of his remarks, he would point out what Standard IV. did. It secured that a child could read with thorough intelligence, write small hand, and do the four rules of arithmetic and compound rules as far as money was concerned. He thought that was a very good outfit for the child. He might sum up as follows:—1, school boards as now, if desired or ordered; 2, direct compulsion, full or half time, if localities desired, in hands of existing authorities; 3, existing local authorities constituted as protectors and guardians of children to be superseded if in default as such. There were two or three subsidiary proposals which he had now to lay before the House. Those who were aware of the working of Government grants must know that there was one weak point which was felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The poorer districts had the least aid given to them. In places like Bethnal Green, where they could not ask for large fees, and where they could not get subscriptions, there the Government grant, however well the children might do—and, happily, in Bethnal Green, as among the agricultural children, they did very well—because they happened to be poor, was cut down. This was a matter that did not affect voluntary more than board schools. It was one of simple justice, or, rather, endeavouring to remove an injustice. They had endeavoured to find a test as to poor districts, and to see if they had any precedent to go upon. They looked into the Act of 1870, and they found there the definition of a poor district was where a 3d. rate on the property produced less than 7s. 6d. per child the extra Parliamentary grant was made to board, but not to voluntary schools. If they looked again at the Scotch Act of 1872 they would find that where the rate produced less than 7s. 6d. per child an Imperial grant was made. If they looked further into the Scotch Act they found that the relief was given to voluntary as well as to board schools in every poor county, such as Inverness, Argyll, Ross, Orkney, and Shetland. They found, therefore, in those Acts something to guide them as to what had hitherto been considered to be a poor district. They took a somewhat similar standard of the poverty of a district, but they did not propose to go so far as the Scotch Act. They proposed that the Parliamentary grant in poor districts should not be reduced unless it was twice as large as the income produced from local effort. He would endeavour to show the House how that would work. In an ordinary district they gave £1 to meet £1 from the locality. In poor districts £1 would be given to meet 10s. If a school's maintenance was £120 now, they gave £60 grant to meet £60 fees, rates, or subscriptions; but in poor districts for £40 of fees, rates, and subscriptions they would grant £80. As to the poor districts, how did the Bill propose to deal with them? They would take London generally by Unions. In towns above 5,000 population they would take ward divisions, or areas with separate rates, or special divisions suggested by the municipal authorities approved of by the Local Government Board and the Education Department. Smaller boroughs would be dealt with as Unions, and the parishes would be the units of the whole country. This was the proposal which the Government had to make on this difficult and important question. They felt bound to try to meet a great injustice. The actual sum of money to be granted would not be very large, but it would be distributed in the poorer parishes where it was most needed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am sorry to interrupt my noble Friend, but I do not quite see how the poor districts are to be defined.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Where a 3d. rate produces less than 6s.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Perhaps there will be no objection to explain how in places where there are no school boards it is to be ascertained that a 3d. rate would produce only 6s.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had, perhaps, better ask the right hon. Gentleman to wait until he saw the clause. The point was a difficult one, but they had tried to face it, because they thought there was a real injustice and there seemed to be a precedent in former Acts.

With regard to existing school boards, it was proposed to remove what was believed to be a very great grievance. At present if a by-vacancy occurred in a school board, it was obliged to go to the expense of an election; and there was this additional anomaly, that while the principle of cumulative voting came into operation at a General Election, the effect of it was lost at a by-election, so that a gentleman who was elected under it to represent a particular section of the community if he died had not the chance of being returned at a by-election. [Laughter.] That remark was worthy of some of his hon. Friends in another part of the House; but, of course, it was understood that the party who secured representation by means of the cumulative vote had not the chance of doing so at a by-election. The cost of a by-election was also very serious, amounting in one town to £1,200 and in another to £1,500. To obviate this outlay and inconvenience it was proposed that a school board should have the power of filling up a casual vacancy. There was another provision which might be considered a tentative one. They had lately in their provisions respecting education acted on the system of forcing parents to drive their children to school, and also that the child might go to labour at the age of 10. They proposed that where a child took a double certificate—where a child at 10 years passed Standard IV. and also had a certificate of attendance for five years—they proposed to give it a honour pass. That would be a great encouragement to the more intelligent and orderly child. That honour pass would give the child a free education for the next three years. This was proposed as a mark of distinction more than a money benefit, and it was supposed that the number who would gain this honour pass would not be very large. All the middle class schools held out this sort of encouragement to deserving children, and the Government thought it would create a sense of emulation and dignity in many of the schools; and those who possessed a certificate of that character would occupy a somewhat higher position than the others. He had now gone through the principal provisions of the Bill, and desired only to make a few general remarks in conclusion. The country had set its mind on the instruction of the people as a necessity. It had made sacrifices year after year, and yet those who were at the head of the Education Department had to admit that there were more than a million of children who were getting no species of education at all. Our system had been built up gradually. It had been the work of men of high intellectual attainments and of all shades of politics. It had been built up not only by politicians, but by that remarkable class of men—the Inspectors of Schools. They were a distinguished body, not only for the work they had done, but for the Reports which they had made. The school system had been built up not only by them, but by those in the Education Department, who, though not so well known, clearly deserved a meed of public praise. It remained now to put the coping-stone on this great work; and it must be done with caution and care, for if we attempted to overweight the edifice of which others had laid the foundation, we might endanger the stability of the stately building of national education. He would leave the Government measure to the judgment of the House; but he would claim for it certain qualities. While it was cautious, it was bold; it was comprehensive; it was straightforward; and happy would be the Government which should be successful in placing the coping-stone on this great work. He might say happy would be the Parliament which, in a sound and sensible spirit, reconciled the claims of the great industries of the country with the more pressing claims of the poor children. Whatever might be the fate of the measure, the more it was examined, the more, he believed, it would be appreciated. He hoped, at any rate, the House would never forget that they had to get rid of that great canker of gross and brutal ignorance which was a disgrace and a shame to our people. They had also to take care that the door was kept open to talent from whatever quarter it might come. Further, if the measure should pass, he would entreat hon. Members to remember it was not their business to depreciate the dignity of hand labour. While we held high the intellectual standard, let us not undervalue the labour of the hand as compared with that of the head. But, whatever legislation they might adopt, he hoped that nothing would be done to strike any blow at the religious teaching of the people. He hoped and believed that would remain one of the main features of the education of this country. He wished he could express more than a hope; but he trusted that any proposals would be carefully watched which would tend to undermine the provisions for religious teaching. Further than that, they had kept steadily in view that, however great their wishes and aspirations might be, and however great their zeal for education might be, they must take care that they should do nothing to destroy that self-reliance, that independence, that sense of responsibility which in the past had nerved the nation to its greatest successes, and without which we could not hope for the vigour that would enable us to command the world in future. The noble Lord concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that although the noble Lord had explained his measure in so full and able a manner, it would be difficult to understand it fully until it was printed and in the hands of hon. Members. For the same reason he could not say he had formed any positive opinion on it. He had heard with the greatest possible pleasure the opening remarks of the noble Lord, because they showed that he and the Government had fully comprehended what was required in an amending Act. They had attempted certainly to meet the attendance difficulty; but he was rather disappointed afterwards to find that the Government had not proposed to enforce by positive enactment the obligation upon the parent to see that his child was taught, but how far that might really be done by the clauses he could not tell till he had seen the Bill. He could not, however, mention the provision that no child under the age of 10 was to be allowed to work at all without expressing his gratitude to the noble Lord. He thought the country would be quite ready for that enactment; but he believed he understood the noble Lord also to say that no child above 10 should be allowed to work unless he produced a certificate of having passed a certain Standard, or of having made 250 attendances for the five years previous. There would be many children in that position, for there was a time—namely, the period between the ages of 10 and 13, when they had no right to say to a child that because his parent had neglected his education, therefore he was to be idle.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Any child that is continuously, and habitually, and without reasonable excuse, not sent to school is to be dealt with by the local authority; so that is provided for.

MR. W. E. FORSTER understood the effect of that clause would be direct compulsion throughout the kingdom, and if they really enforced that duty there could be no objection to put it in a form that might render it more palatable to those whom it immediately concerned. He confessed, however, he was still of opinion that a great many of the difficulties of that part of the subject would have been met if his noble Friend had been ready to declare that there was to be an enforced attendance throughout the kingdom. There were other important provisions in the Bill of which it was impossible to form any distinct opinion until they saw the measure in print. With respect, for instance, to poor districts, how could they be ascertained where there was no Board? He looked with jealousy on the idea of giving up the principle that the locality must find as much money as the central Government. By relaxing this principle they would run great danger of establishing a bureaucratic system or of fostering extravagance in the districts, because they would be spending not their own money, but the taxes. Doubtless the Government would have regard to this difficulty. He was exceedingly anxious that an amending Act should be passed this year, and he thanked the Government for attempting to meet the difficulties of the case. He was so anxious they should be met that he was sure he could speak for a good many besides himself when he said that every assistance would be given to the Government to enable them to carry their Bill, if it really met these difficulties. While he was anxious that the second reading should not be unreasonably postponed, he yet hoped it would not be taken so soon as to deprive hon. Members of a fair opportunity of communicating with their friends on the subject.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he had listened with attention and with a great deal of interest to the statement of his noble Friend. He was glad his noble Friend had sought to meet the difficulty with respect to poor districts, which at present were very badly pressed. The great defect of the Act of 1870 was, that by it the House abrogated its own responsibility as to religious education, and threw the question whether children should be virtuously and godly brought up upon the shoulders of a chance majority of local elections, decided possibly upon side issues, and liable to be disturbed every three years. It was a most important question to decide. He considered the children of the country should receive a religious education. It was not because their parents might be found indifferent to it that the children should be neglected. It might be said, why did they not provide for a religious education in 1870? He regretted that the Liberal Government, then in power and with a large majority, had failed to do so, and to make it a part of their policy. Things, however, had changed, and he hoped religious education would no longer be neglected. He would take the case of Birmingham, where there were 7,000 children in the schools who never had their minds impressed with a word of prayer. He trusted that the time had arrived when the school boards would be compelled to adopt religious education as a part of the instruction to be given to the children; for he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford in his speech at North Tawton, that parents generally were anxious that their children should be instructed in the Bible and the great truths of Christianity. He took it that the people of Birmingham were very anxious to have the question settled, and Parliament should decidedly step in and settle it. He thought the House might call on Her Majesty's Government to consider whether this important matter should not be introduced in the Bill. His noble Friend stated that the country wanted simplicity and uniformity in the matter of education. They had got it as far as regarded secular education: he called upon his noble Friend to go a step further and give it in the matter of religious education. His noble Friend was anxious to place the coping-stone on our educational system; but the system would not be completed unless that stone also were placed upon it.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had listened with great interest to the speech of the noble Lord, and he hoped the House would aid in making the Bill as complete as possible. But he confessed that he was disappointed in what he heard from the noble Lord in reference to the question of compulsion. The noble Lord expressed his apprehension that the whole scheme might break down if compulsion were enforced. But in Scotland they had universal school boards and universal direct compulsion, the result being that the Scotch were doing their work well, were educating their people, and everybody was content. He could not see why they should be lagging behind Scotland for the next few years, or why Scotland should possess advantages which England could not lay hold of. But whatever the noble Lord might do, he hoped he would not follow the advice of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Kennaway) and introduce anew the religious difficulty. The noble Lord said he would accept Amendments; and if that were wisely done, the Bill might be made the coping-stone which the noble Lord desired, but not if the recommendations of the hon. Baronet were adopted. He believed it was most desirable that children should be trained to a love of virtue and of God, and he felt that the school boards deserved credit for what they had done in that way. But if the noble Lord failed in that, he apprehended he would find himself in hot water. The noble Lord had stated it was the intention of the Government to repeal the Agricultural Children Act. He should be glad to know whether this Bill would also override the Workshops Act? [Viscount SANDON intimated that it would do so.] He thought that the noble Lord had adopted the right line in fixing 10 years as the minimum age for children to work; but he thought it would not have been difficult to have provided that during the period from 5 to 10 years, when the child could not work, the local authorities should take care that he should go to school. With regard to a certain standard of attainments, he thought that the educational certificate should set forth the age of the child, so that it should be ascertained by reference. Children were taught by their parents to be untruthful as to their age; and if a child in certain districts were asked the question he would reply—"Do you mean my school age or my factory age?" With regard to hand labour, he hoped the House would do nothing to discourage it. It was of the greatest importance that children should be taught a good manual trade. It was not by education alone that they could all succeed. Look at France, for instance. A man with a certain amount of education in France got 20 francs in an office, whereas he would get 40 francs in the mines if he applied himself to the work or at the trade of a carpenter. The fact was that their education was defective. He heard a farmer in Devon object to education because, he said, if a young man could write nothing would do but he must be a policeman or a railway porter. If, however, all the young men were educated they could not all be policemen and railway porters. He asked the noble Lord to turn his mind to a country where every child was educated, and where every child passed not only the Fourth Standard, but the Sixth Standard. Switzerland, they were told, was likely to rival England in her manufactures. The Government in that country saw that no children should go to work until they were 14 years of age, and they were now bringing in a Bill for that purpose. He should be happy to assist the Government in making this a better Bill, and no Party consideration would induce him to throw any obstacles in its way.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked one question, and would make one single appeal—Was it not possible for some further provision to be made in this Bill for the better education of blind and deaf-mute children? And he made the appeal on behalf of those little ones because, while they needed help even more than either sighted or speaking children; they were most of them unable to participate in the advantages of the former Act, although their parents necessarily had to contribute their full quota to the school-board rate wherever there was one, as well as to all other burdens local and imperial.

MR. CLARE READ understood from the speech of the noble Lord that the agricultural interest was to be placed on exactly the same footing as all other industries, as far as education was concerned. Now he for one, must protest against that, because, while all other industries could regulate their employment, it was impossible for agriculture to do it, because it was dependent on the weather and daylight. It was impossible to apply the same rule to agriculture as to manufactures. What he particularly objected to was that no agricultural child should be put to work until the child was 10 years old. It was quite true, as had been said by the noble Lord, that children did not go to work habitually till that age, but the word habitually made all the difference. There was certain work on the farm which was done cheaper and better by children than by anybody else, and probably would not be done at all if they did not do it. The noble Lord had misinterpreted the provisions of the Agricultural Children Act. That Act did not provide that there was to be an alternative year's work and an alternative year's schooling. It laid down the principle that the schooling was to go on when the work was not going on. The Factory and Workshops Acts were originally passed to maintain the health of the children employed, but no such regulations were necessary in the case of agriculture, because the Royal Commission reported that the health of women and children employed in agriculture only suffered from exceptional causes, as under the gang system. The idea of half time in the agricultural districts was simply preposterous and ridiculous. It would never work. He should not have objected to absolute compulsion in the case of children from five years old up to the time when they were employed in agriculture; but he objected to what he understood to be the provisions of the Bill on this head, and did not think that Boards of Guardians in the agricultural districts would be the best persons to enforce these provisions.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), that it was inconvenient to discuss the Bill in its present form; but there was one important provision on which he should like to make a few observations—namely, the clause relating to what the noble Lord called “wastrels.” He (Mr. Playfair) understood that if a parent habitually allowed his child to become “a wastrel” he was to be fined 5s., and afterwards, if the fine proved ineffectual, the child might be sent to an industrial school. [Viscount SANDON: The child may be sent there without fining the parent.] Virtually, then, the child and not the parent would be sent to prison, though it was the parent who was chiefly responsible. The industrial school was really a prison where children on the verge of crime were detained; and would the interests of education, which people should be led to regard as a good and worthy thing, be served by associating these children with others on the verge of crime? In his opinion, the whole system of industrial schools in this country was being carried out in a lax way, and it had been his intention early next Session to call attention to the growth of these schools as an ease to the poor rates, and to the unsatisfactory results there produced. The proposal of the Bill was a mode of bringing compulsion to bear upon the “wastrels” which he considered an extremely dangerous one, and one which would want more satisfactory arguments to recommend it than they had heard so far.

MR. A. MILLS insisted that the principle of sending children to industrial schools was not a new one. The London School Board were in the habit of sending hundreds of children to them, and the effect of the alteration proposed in the Bill would be to limit the period for which children were sent to these schools. Instead of being mischievous, therefore, the change introduced by the Bill would be a beneficial one. There was another point which required attention. Out of some 1,650 school boards in England and Wales, between 200 and 300 had no schools. It was now proposed to authorize Town Councils and Boards of Guardians to pass compulsory bye-laws; but if this were done, surely the people of the districts in which these school boards were situated should have some power of getting rid of them. He regarded school boards as a necessary evil; but where they existed without schools and compulsory powers were entrusted to other bodies, he failed to see why these boards should be allowed to continue. Again, about 260 school boards, including that of London, had passed bye-laws, not only allowing children to read the Bible, but giving them such religious teaching as was suitable to their capacity. Now, he did not want to rouse anything like a religious war; but did it not follow logically that in the schools where religious teaching was allowed the Government should take care that the results of this teaching should be tested by inspection, as in the case of reading, writing, and arithmetic? He wished to add his testimony of high approval of the Bill shadowed forth in the speech of his noble Friend.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he did not wish to find fault with the Bill which had been so clearly and eloquently described by the noble Lord, and which on the first blush seemed to be a most excellent measure. There were three points, however, on which he desired further information. If the Guardians and corporations were empowered to discharge the functions now exercised by school boards, the country would want to get rid of the school boards. He would, therefore, ask whether the noble Lord proposed to take a power of dissolving school boards? He understood the noble Lord to define a poor place as a place where if a rate of 3*d.* were imposed, it would not produce 6*s.* per child, and to say that for every pound raised the Government would give £2. This provision he approved very much indeed, because it tended to benefit the voluntary and religious schools. Again, he understood that if a child got a double certificate, the fees of that child were to be paid, not out of the rates, but by the Government. In the case of honour passes this was a good provision, but it was the first step towards free education, and in that light it deserved serious consideration. He wished to know whether any rules would be made respecting the school which the child should go to in such a case?

MR. HERMON said, he thought it was important that political economy should be taught in the schools, as the masses were liable to fall into error on that subject. At present the error was in the nature of a struggle between labour and capital. This was detrimental to the interests of the country, and he hoped the noble Lord would consider whether he could not provide some prize for proficiency in a study which would do so much good to the nation.

MR. KAY SHUTTLEWORTH said, he rose not to make a speech, but to deprecate the making of speeches at this stage of the Bill. The noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) had made his points so very clearly, that it would be easy to single out isolated points in the Bill, and discuss them. But such a course would not be useful. For until the House had seen the Bill, and grasped the combined effect of these isolated provisions, it would be impossible to pronounce an opinion upon them. He hoped the noble Lord would be able to announce that the Bill would be in Members' hands within a day or two, so that ample time for consultation with friends and constituents would be allowed after the second reading. He would point out an error in the noble Lord's speech as to the provisions of the Agricultural Children Act, which required continuous schooling as a condition for continuous work, and not, as the noble Lord had stated, alternate years of schooling between alternate years of work. He would congratulate the noble Lord on having opposite him the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) who had had experience of the difficulties of the subject, and who, in common with all on that side of the House, would consider the Bill in a fair and impartial spirit.

MR. BIRLEY considered that this discussion was not purposeless and useless, as stated by the hon. Member who had just spoken, but that it would indicate to the Government the opinions of the House on the subject of the Bill. He wished to express his decided approval of the way in which the noble Lord had dealt with the question of compulsion. The religious difficulty was one which he believed could very easily be got over. He remembered that under the Revised Code of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) instruction in the Bible was one subject for which a grant could be earned. He much wished that that system were revived, as he believed it would meet the views of the vast majority of the community. He was of opinion that what was proposed in the Bill as to poor districts would really be a just measure of relief; and he trusted that they would all, on whatever side they sat, co-operate with a view to make the measure practical, useful, and satisfactory, not merely to the working classes, but to the nation at large.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he thought that it would have been well if the Canadian plan had been adopted. If compulsion, either partial or total, should be combined with heavy rating, education, instead of becoming popular, would be considered by many people a very great evil. The only way of making education popular with this class was to make it cheap. Nothing was more remarkable than the waning popularity of school boards, and the weariness of school board elections. In the presence of the necessity of contributing to the rates for educational purposes, voluntary contributions were falling off to a very serious extent.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thanked the noble Lord for having adopted so many of the recommendations of the Commissioners, but thought that the measure of the Government, as shadowed forth by the noble Lord, was full of inequalities. He asked how far the noble Lord proposed to assimilate the educational provisions with the various Labour Laws, many of which were very dissimilar one from another? He understood that the general provision was that only children over 10 were to be allowed to work; but was it proposed that the different provisions of the Workshops Act, the Mines Act, and the Factories Act should all remain in force? He could hardly think that it was intended that all these different provisions should be allowed to remain. It was proposed that a child should be allowed to go to work who had passed a certain standard of education, or who had attended school a certain number of times; but might this attendance be in any school whatever? [Viscount SANDON: Public educational schools.] He was glad to hear it. Would the Bill extend to Ireland? And, if so, how did the noble Lord propose to deal with children who came over from Ireland to seek employment?

MR. PELL observed, that those who had laboured to secure that agricultural children should be educated and that the law of the land should be obeyed had had no easy time of it, and had not received as much assistance from the Government as he thought they might have expected. If all parties had long ago laboured honestly for the spread of education all the country over, there would be no need now for the stringent measures imposed upon them. The country party in that House had done their duty in this matter honestly; but he was afraid the result had proved the effect of their labours to be somewhat imperfect. He gloried in being able to give his assistance to the promotion of the object in which they were now engaged, and hoped that when the Bill had been passed into law its provisions would be honestly carried out.

MR. WHALLEY said, he hoped that encouragement would be given by the Government to the use of training ships. These institutions were maintained by voluntary effort, and that kind of support would be stimulated and encouraged by the recognition of the Government and of Parliament being extended to it.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought that the voluntary schools had a right to sympathy on the part of the Government and of Parliament, for they had been doing the work of education when others had been only talking about it; but he did not find in the proposals of his noble Friend as much encouragement as he thought they deserved. Voluntary schools represented not only the principle on which the education of the country was conducted before the question became popular, but also the principles of economy and the strong religious feeling of the country. There was no security that religious education would continue to be given in board schools, which were managed by boards variously constituted and armed with the power to stop religious education at any time in the schools over which they had control. In the voluntary schools alone was there security for permanent religious instruction, and he hoped that the noble Lord would not turn a deaf ear to the Amendments which would tend to improve the condition of voluntary schools. He thought that some explanation was required in reference to the system of giving relief to poor districts. Would a school in a poor hamlet be assisted though the parish might not itself be poor? The question as to taking power for the extinction of boards also deserved attention, and a provision to that effect ought to be included in the Bill. Again, he should like to know whether "honour passes" would be given in voluntary schools; and, if so, from what fund they would be provided?

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD thought the present mode of conducting education in board schools did not provide for the simple and unsectarian religious instruction that all must desire to see afforded, and he hoped the attention of the Government would be directed to this point. Comparing the number of children attending voluntary schools with the number attending board schools, he contended that the voluntary schools constituted the national system, and that it was the board schools rather than the voluntary schools that should be regarded as a "temporary expedient," and that on these grounds the voluntary schools deserved the careful consideration of the Government and the generous support of the House.

MR. DIXON, said, it was quite competent for Birmingham or any other district to have religious teaching in the schools if they thought it desirable. There were voluntary religious schools within reach of the children attending the board schools, where parents could send their children if they wished them to be taught sectarian religion at school; and if they did not avail themselves of those schools their not doing so showed that they did not value them so highly as had been stated. The burden of the religious instruction given in Birmingham board schools devolved upon the members of two or three leading non-conforming sects, the members of the Church of England having stood entirely aloof from it. There had not been sufficient time to form an opinion of the work that was being done under these difficulties, and therefore he hoped the House would suspend its judgment upon that experiment. He asked when the Bill would be in the hands of Members, and he expressed a hope that time would be given for the country to consider its provisions.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that in the guarded criticisms which had been passed upon the Bill he could not help noting an under current of feeling in its favour, and that was, perhaps, more full of promise than an enthusiastic chorus of approbation. The Bill would be in the hands of Members on Saturday or Monday—he could not absolutely promise it on Saturday, owing to an accident which had befallen the draftsman—and the second reading would be fixed for the 12th June. As to the virtual repeal of the Agricultural Children Act, he had already expressed his sense of the service done by it. The hon. Members for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Reed) and South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) were pioneers who had achieved success, and if this Bill passed, it would be partly owing to the work they had done. The Act was a good measure for its purpose, but it was not one that could be expected to be permanent. He would remind the House that the proposal to commit "wastrel" children to industrial schools would only take effect in the last resort. Of course, the the Bill did not contain any provision for the abolition of existing school boards; if it had, he should have been certain to mention it. He did not see that the honours pass entitling to free instruction would tend to free education any more than Exhibitions and Scholarships at the Universities, in the middle-class schools, and in the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners. The teaching of political economy or any other subject in the schools was a matter to be dealt with in the Code. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) had made suggestions which were highly valued by the Government. The 10 years system would apply to the whole of the country. No existing Act or power of local authority could put the children in a less advantageous position as regarded education than they would be in by this Bill; but the Bill would not interfere with existing provisions which put them in a better position, nor would it prevent local authorities making further provisions for education. He thought the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) who asked whether the provisions of the Bill would extend to Ireland would agree with him that it would be dangerous to undertake an Education Bill for England and Ireland at the same time. In reply to the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), he must remark that it would have been unwise of the Government to have introduced fresh legislation with regard to the agricultural children until it was seen how the recent measure operated. The object of the present measure was to cast responsibility as far as possible upon existing local authorities, which would add to their importance, while its effect would be to reduce the cost of getting children into the schools to a minimum. The hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had referred to the grave and important subject of religion; but the House would see that that was not a matter on which he ought to touch at the present moment. The Government were much indebted to the hon. and gallant Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins) for having sent them a very important scheme, and he was sorry that he could not now go into the reasons that had induced them, after very careful consideration, not to accept it. The expense of the "honour passes" would be but small, while the proposal would operate very beneficially upon promising children. Should the attempt fail, it would die a natural death at the end of five years. In conclusion, he thanked the House for the very friendly reception they had given to the measure, and he trusted that hon. Members would consider the Bill very carefully as soon as it was in their hands. He could assure the House that Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to give all Amendments which were in harmony with the main principle of their Bill their very best attention. On the whole, he hoped they would be able to pass a measure which would be perfectly satisfactory to the parents of children, to the employers, and to the country generally.

MR. STORER said, the compulsory attendance of children at school in the agricultural districts until they were 10 years of age would give great dissatisfaction in the agricultural districts, because it would greatly reduce the incomes of poor persons, many of whom were widows with barely sufficient means to maintain their families. It would also be very inconvenient, and create an increase in the amount of wages to be paid for labour. He hoped the noble Lord would re-consider that provision of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

[BILL 124] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice, observed, that on the 31st of this month there would be not only the famous equine contest of the year on Epsom Downs, but on the same day would be celebrated the Centenary of the publication of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations. A distinguished Finance Minister of former days would take the chair at that celebration, and another distinguished Finance Minister would discourse with eloquence upon the sagacity, wisdom, and truth of the principles inaugurated by Adam Smith. He would seriously invite the distinguished men who proposed to be present upon that occasion to give their opinions to the House on the subject now under consideration. Adam Smith had laid it down that the people of a State ought to contribute towards its expenses as nearly as possible according to their respective abilities—that was to say, in proportion to the incomes they respectively enjoyed under its protection. The proposals now made in regard to the Income Tax he regarded as being in direct violation of that maxim. It had been suggested that in proposing those additional exemptions and remissions the Government were seeking to gain popularity; but popularity hunting was the resort of feeble and expiring Administrations, and, judging from recent divisions, the present Government was strong enough to stand upon its convictions of what was right, without condescending to unworthy compliances. He found the explanations of those proposals in the warm sympathetic sentiments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman had told them that the persons who would be specially benefited by those remissions would be the struggling members of certain professions, including clergymen and clerks, widows and unmarried daughters. If the right hon. Gentleman had meant industrial struggling by brain or hand, he could have agreed with him; but by including widows and unmarried daughters he meant also social struggling to obtain more comforts and enjoyments than their means afforded. He (Mr. Hubbard) maintained that while it was the part of legislation to give every possible relief to struggling industry, it was not the part of legislation to attempt to equalize the gifts of Providence. The principle of the Income Tax required to be well understood. Being a tax levied for the benefit of the whole community, it should be levied upon everyone in the same proportion, so that his means remained proportionately the same as before. There were certain qualifications to be applied to that special rule. The means of subsistence with regard to unskilled labour must be considered. In the earlier periods of the Income Tax a deduction of £50 was allowed as being the measure of the cost of subsistence for unskilled labour. Subsequently that deduction had been raised to £60, and at the last revision of the tax it was still further raised to £80. That limitation of £80 was, in his opinion, most liberal, for £80 a-year was rather more than 30s. a-week, and, as everybody knew, 5s. a-day for unskilled labour was ample compensation. He knew of no sound argument either in favour of carrying the total exemption from the tax up to incomes of £150 or in favour of extending the benefit of the deduction to incomes of £400. It had been argued that whereas artizans earning £3 a-week or £150 a-year, were mainly untaxed, they should remain untaxed; but that the same exemption should be carried into other incomes of £150 a-year also. He differed from the assumption which laid at the bottom of that argument. He knew that in certain establishments mechanics receiving about £3 a-week had to be returned by their employers to the Inland Revenue Office, and they were not untaxed. It was absurd to say that these exemptions ought to be made because of the increased cost of living. With respect to the area over which direct taxation would range if the changes proposed by the present Government were carried into effect, taking the Income Tax under Schedule D, he found that 437,000 had been charged Income Tax, and of these only 220,000 were paying on £100 and upwards, and the result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal would be still further to reduce the number who would be taxable. Look, again, at the stockholders under Schedule C. The number of these was 231,000. The number of those paying under £100 was 192,000, but the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would reduce the 39,000 now taxable by 12,000, and only 27,000 would in future be liable to taxation. If they turned from the funds to the land the conclusions were equally unsatisfactory, for it might be calculated that there would be a great diminution in the number of landowners of the country liable to taxation if this scheme were passed. Here was a population of 27,000,000, half a million of whom were the chief contributors to the taxation of the country, while, at the same time, the number of electors was 2,500,000. How did this tally with the maxim so constantly urged upon them that there ought to be an affinity between electoral privileges and contributions to the taxes? Why should the line be drawn so as to include only one-fifth of the whole of the electors? If a sweeping change were to be made, all these questions should be gone into. The tax as it stood was bad enough, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to render it still more mischievous, and he thought the House ought to express its opinion in such a way that the Government might be led to re-consider its position. If this Resolution were carried the Government and the House might take such steps as they deemed to be necessary for the public interest. If they withdrew the exemptions, they might either reduce the amount of the tax as it stood, or make the proposed concessions in some other way. There was hardly any alternative that he would not prefer. Besides, the introduction of these exemptions would lead to great administrative inconvenience. The assessors of Income Tax now knew very well who were entitled to relief; but if fresh lines were drawn, new difficulties and new conflicts would arise. This was an occasion when Party predilection should give way to a sense of justice. He would earnestly entreat the House to vindicate on that occasion the principles of the great political economist whose centenary was about to be celebrated. In conclusion, he asked the House to rescue their legislation from the danger of Socialism.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to extend the range of absolute exemption from Income Tax to incomes of £150, and to extend the limit of partial exemption from incomes of £300 to incomes of £400, inasmuch as these additional exemptions would injuriously affect the equitable proportion in which all incomes of like nature should be assessed,"—(Mr. Hubbard),

MR. LAING said, he must give a preference for the scheme proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The view which they took of exemptions would, of course, be influenced by the opinions they held as to the desirability of the Income Tax being permanent or not. He thought those who, like himself, believed that the Income Tax was an essential and a vital part of our financial system, and that it was desirable to retain it at a moderate amount as a great instrument of financial power, would generally be found in favour of exemptions, thus throwing overboard some of that unpopularity which affected the principle of the tax generally and putting it upon a more secure foundation. As regarded the principle of exemption, he thought the fallacy which ran through the argument used against it was that it seemed to be assumed that the whole taxes of the country were levied direct. A great portion of our Revenue was raised by indirect taxation, and when they came to the lower scale of incomes, especially of the labouring classes, in point of fact they spent a larger percentage of their incomes in articles which paid taxation than the man of larger income did. One great argument in favour of the Income Tax was that the tax was an instrument of great national power. By the simple expedient of adding 1*d.* in the pound the Government could easily raise a larger sum than foreign countries could obtain without great stress and inconvenience. The other great argument was that the tax was the means by which they could in tolerably fair proportions equalize the incidence of taxation upon the middle and lower classes of the community. The broad conclusion was that with an Income Tax producing £5,000,000 direct taxation the equilibrium between direct and indirect taxation on the different classes was very fairly maintained. If they abolished the Income Tax, they would destroy that equilibrium. The exemptions, then, he viewed as made on a fair basis and not on any Communistic principle. That being so, it seemed to be a simple question of degree whether they should draw the line at £100 or £150. He desired

the Income Tax to be maintained, and he therefore wished to relieve it from the unpopularity which attached to taxing a large number of small incomes for the sake of realizing a comparatively small amount. He had been alarmed ever since the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) proposed the repeal of the Income Tax as part of the programme with which he appealed to the country at the last General Election, and, entertaining this alarm, he desired to defend the citadel of our financial system by every fair and legitimate means. It was consistent with principle and precedent to go back, as they were doing, to what might be called the old and accustomed limit which accompanied the tax for a series of years, and which had the authority of eminent statesmen in its favour. Under these circumstances, he should give his vote against the Motion of the right hon. Member for London.

MR. SANDFORD said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had asserted that he was opposed to the existence of the Income Tax, and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had in a letter which was published in a newspaper stated that he did not know a single person who was a friend to the Income Tax. He begged to undeceive the hon. Gentleman, for he (Mr. Sandford) was a friend to that tax, and he should be sorry to see property relieved of it and an equivalent burden thrown on Customs and Excise, or, in other words, on the shoulders of the working classes. When the tax was originally imposed by Pitt it was a graduated Income Tax; and it was altogether too late to say that exemptions from it rested on principles of socialism. Exemptions had been adopted by every Parliament and by every Minister by whom the tax was laid on. In his opinion the principle of exemptions was only just, because wealth did not contribute its fair share to the taxes of the country. The burden of the tax fell most heavily on the possessors of small incomes which did not rise with the price of commodities when the wages of working men did rise. Even indirect taxes were levied with some unfairness. Inferior tobacco paid 100 per cent, and the better class of cigars from 10 to 20 per cent; cheap claret paid 15 per cent, and the better quality 2 per cent; beer paid

50 per cent; spirits, 100 per cent; inferior tea, 23 per cent; and superior tea, 10 per cent. Thus the burden of indirect taxation fell unequally on the poorer classes, and it was only stern justice to exempt them from the Income Tax. He would have preferred that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have exempted altogether incomes under and up to £150, and should have taken off £120 from incomes up to £400; but as they had so many amateur Chancellors of the Exchequer he would not add another to the number, and would support the proposal of the Government.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was the last person who would wish to abolish the Income Tax, although he certainly desired to keep it as low as possible.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, that the question to consider was why the extra 1*d.* had been placed upon the Income Tax, and how the surplus to be obtained from it should be applied? In about six years nearly £7,000,000 of taxation had been removed from sugar, and 68,000,000 lb. in 1874, and 97,000,000 lb. in 1875, had been used for brewing. This had been caused in a great degree by the malt duty increasing the price of malt. This and other remissions that had been made would mainly benefit those who would come within the proposed exemption from the Income Tax. During the past four or five years some £3,000,000 had been added to local taxation, and the people who paid that had the first claim to the benefit to be derived from any surplus that there might be in hand. If the right hon. Gentleman carried his Motion to a division he should feel very much inclined to support him.

MR. DODSON looked upon this question of abatement and exemption from the Income Tax as one of a very serious character and he was very glad that it had been raised. He believed that there was a considerable amount of opinion upon both sides against these exemptions. No doubt the effect of them would be to create favour for the scheme of the Government for the increase of the tax; though it was possible, as had been alleged, that the proposal of these concessions had been made entirely upon its own merits. If, however, this was so, why was it not made in 1874, when the Government had a magnificent surplus of £5,500,000, the legacy of their predecessors, and reduced the tax from 3*d.* to 2*d.* It looked very like a bid for favour that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer added to the aggregate amount of the Income Tax, two out of three persons who paid under Schedules D and E would pay less when the tax was increased than they paid at the present moment, whilst the remaining one-third would pay more. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) made exemptions, but he made them on behalf of a more necessitous class, and when he had a surplus, when he was reducing the tax and giving relief to all who had to pay it. But it was difficult, if not impossible, to find a principle upon which the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to rest. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to extend exemption from Income Tax to all incomes under £150 a-year. The reason assigned was that wages had considerably increased, so that more wage-earners came within the range of the Income Tax as it at present stood. It seemed to him a very odd kind of proceeding because men's wages were raised, and their incomes were increased, to exempt them from the payment of the Income Tax. And what was the reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fixed on £400 as the sum below which the abatement was to be made? The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that a man having a pound a day ought to have an abatement, but that to place the figure at £400 would look better. His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, concurred in viewing the Income Tax as an "emergency" tax to be resorted to in time of war; or urgent demand. The right hon. Member for Greenwich had contemplated abolishing it altogether in ordinary times; while the right hon. Gentleman preferred to keep it alive at a low figure, holding that it was important not to destroy its structure. But then it should be maintained as an efficient structure, not only actually but potentially. What, however, was the plan before them? The changes proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer involved, as he told the House, a surrender per penny of the tax of £130,000 a-year. But if an emergency arose and they had to raise the tax to 1s. the loss would amount to £1,560,000 a-year; and if they had to raise it to 1s. 6d., it would amount to £2,340,000. But if to the proposed exemptions and abatements they added existing exemptions and abatements, which the right hon. Gentleman the other night told the House were £150,000 per penny of the tax, the total surrender would be, on a 1s. Income Tax, £3,432,000 a-year; on 1s. 6d. Income Tax, upwards of £5,000,000. Another objection to undermining the tax, besides diminishing its productiveness, was that the more they made it a tax which was to be voted and imposed by the many on the few, the more the objections which the many would have to war or other extraordinary expenditure would be diminished. Sir Robert Peel fixed the Income Tax at £150 when many articles were subject to taxation, which since that time had been made free. Therefore, men were in a better position to pay the tax. Did the right hon. Gentleman consider the need for the addition to the tax transitory and confined to this year? If so, he ought to beware how he undermined the structure of the tax on account of a million or so which he wanted for a particular year. But if the right hon. Gentleman did not consider the need temporary, but saw the tide of expenditure rising against him, still more ought he to beware how he undermined the structure of the tax, because in that case he might require next year another penny. If the Income Tax was to be kept alive at a low figure in ordinary times in order that they might resort to it in an emergency, it must be kept alive on a broad basis, in order to make it as productive as possible, without invidious exemptions and distinctions. It might be that such exemptions were popular, and that at this time of political apathy the classes who were injuriously affected by them were indifferent. But it was the duty of Members in that House to look beyond the popularity of the moment, and not to be apathetic, but to consider the ulterior consequences of these exemptions. The representations of the Opposition might be ineffectual; but it was all the more incumbent on Members opposite who held the same opinions to express them freely, because, by so doing, they at all events might hope to influence the Government.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought there was considerable difficulty in ascertaining the exact issue raised in this interesting debate. The arguments put forth with so much force by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) told against there being no exemptions whatever rather than against the particular ones recommended in the Bill now before the House. Up to the present time, however, so long as there had been an Income Tax at all, there had been exemptions. Every Government who had been responsible for an Income Tax had felt that to propose to tax the lowest form of income—that arising from labour—was to propose something which could not possibly be carried into practical effect. Sir Robert Peel exempted incomes under £150. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) having made great changes in other taxation, by which the lowest incomes were benefited, brought down the exemption to £100. Another right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) gave some relief on incomes up to 300 a-year. The principle, of exemptions, therefore, had been recognized by every statesman and every Chancellor of the Exchequer who had dealt with the Income Tax up to the present time, and the question now was not whether there should be any exemption, but whether the particular proposals in the Bill were so radically bad that the House should reject them altogether. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hubbard) said it was improper that any class of the community should escape taxation, and there was no Member on either side of the House who would not heartily concur in that principle. But even if it were desirable to do so, it was admitted to be practically impossible to get at the wages of labour. The suggestion had been thrown out that the Government might go to employers, and not only ascertain the amount of wages paid, but, through them, stop the Income Tax on the weekly earnings of working men in their service. Now, it was not within the power of the employers to make any such stoppages, and he was quite satisfied that to attempt to carry any legislation of this kind into practice would end in miserable failure. Strong as the statement might appear, he believed it absolutely impossible to collect an Income Tax from labour throughout the country. You could not reach a labouring man, because his weekly wage was not based on the certainty of annual employment. For a week or a month he was employed in one place, and then he disappeared, to be employed in another place, or not to be employed at all for some time. How could you fairly deduct from such a man a given proportion of his weekly wage? If, then, it was impossible to tax weekly wages, even though these might amount to £150 a-year—and of late working men's incomes often came up to that sum—surely it was most unfair to tax the clerk and struggling professional man upon incomes of no larger amount? If so, it was not unfair to extend the existing exemption to £150, and thereby the object of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) was met, for much was done to keep alive the Income Tax for future use in times of emergency by fixing it on a basis which was just and reasonable in itself, and which excited no opposition in the country. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that if the tax were raised hereafter in time of war to 1s. in the pound, exemptions would amount to a very large sum, and the productiveness of the tax would be greatly impaired. But would the Income Tax be the only tax to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have recourse in such an emergency? In such an emergency the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to say to the House—"There are other indirect taxes which must be considered, and other sources of income which the House must be asked to provide for us;" and these taxes would fall directly and immediately on the persons of small incomes who would be exempted from the direct payment of Income Tax. Had any calculation ever been made of the proportion of taxable articles that must be paid by the father of a family who consumed tea, malt, and spirits, who lived in a house which paid house tax, and who was liable to rates and the other charges incident to a small income? The course which the Government asked the House to adopt would, he believed, be justified by the result. It might be true, as the right hon. Gentleman had remarked, that some people would pay less than under the present system, but the question was whether, on the whole, the adjustment was a reasonable and a proper one. In various ways exemptions from taxation had been recognized by the House, with a view to relieving those who were not too well off in the world, and he hoped, therefore, that the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be accepted.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, the Secretary to the Treasury had made out an excellent case for absolute exemption up to £150, which used to be called the territory of labour, and which ought to be excused, but he had not said one word as to the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) against extending the exemption from £300 a-year up to £400, which was the real question now before the House. He wished to say that he thought it was an extremely inconvenient practice to bring forward Resolutions in a Budget, and get the House to accept them before they had the opportunity of discussing them when embodied in a Bill. If there had been a previous discussion, much of the difficulty which they must all experience in dealing with this question would have been avoided. For himself, he would say that he had always been in favour of a general rule of taxation and no exemptions; but the Income Tax was of an exceptional character in itself. They had admitted that there should be certain exemptions, and everyone knew that the greatest hardship was felt by the small payers of the tax. Incomes of £100 and £150 felt the pressure excessively, and there should be no cavilling up to that amount, but there he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have stopped. He saw no reason why the limit which had been partially carried up to £300 should now be extended to £400. The exemption of the lower class of incomes—which were, in fact, mere living incomes—was no doubt a great advantage, especially in rural districts, where people knew each other's affairs, and where there was a dislike to appeal for remissions or reductions. The result was that the assessors were in the habit of gradually and steadily increasing the amount of the tax without any real reason for doing so, and the taxpayer submitted in silence. He was an Income Tax Commissioner, and when those additions were made he always called upon the assessors to show on what ground they made the addition, without asking the taxpayer what he had to allege against the increase. It was most unfair and unjust to keep on increasing the tax on the simple responsibility of the officer without knowing whether or not he had just grounds for doing so. While he perfectly agreed in the entire exemption of incomes under £150, he saw no reason why there should be even a partial exemption up to £300, and if they assented to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer he would ask—why not extend the partial exemption to £500?

MR. THOMSON HANKEY maintained that there should be only one real ground of exemption—namely, the difficulty of collecting the tax after it had reached a certain low figure. He declared that all exemptions were objectionable and vicious. He had that day been sitting for three hours in the City of London receiving appeals from householders who claimed to be rated to the Inhabited House Tax at 6*d.* instead of 9*d.* in the pound or totally exempted. He agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir Walter Barttelot) that there were no good grounds for a partial exemption up to £300; and if the exemption was extended to £400, why not to £500, to £700, or even to £1,000? If they did that they would ruin the Income Tax, and adopt the dangerous and revolutionary principle of a graduated tax.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought they were greatly obliged to his right hon. Colleague (Mr. Hubbard) for having brought forward this most important question. The Secretary to the Treasury had not, in his opinion, done justice to the Government by confining his argument to the case of the small taxpayers, and leaving untouched the different case of the larger taxpayers, except by saying that they could make their wishes known in that House, while the smaller taxpayers could not. That appeared to him to be a very dangerous argument indeed. The House should in all cases decide on the taxation necessary to meet the wants of the country, and then levy it equally, without any reference to the representations of classes or interests who might have the power of making representations to that House. The hon. Member admitted that logically there should be no exemption at all; but he argued that all Governments had admitted the principle of exemption in the case of the smaller incomes. That was true; but the novelty in this case was that the Government proposed to carry the figure at which exemption would end to a higher point than it had ever been carried before, while, at the same time, the income taxpayers above that point were to pay additional taxation. He did not see how that course could be justified—to increase the taxes of one class at the very time when they were decreasing the rate of taxation in another. The figures placed before the House by his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers)—and they had not been challenged—showed that the number of persons who would be benefited by the plan of the Government were 400,000, while there would be only 170,000 above the line of £400—that was to say, that the great majority of the payers of Income Tax under Schedules D and E were to have a remission of taxation at a time when about one-third were about to have the charge upon them increased. Finance of that kind was, he maintained, dangerous and impolitic, and by no means Conservative. Indeed, he must call the proposed exemptions not exemptions at all, for they would, so far as numbers were concerned, be the rule. Now, according to the statements of the Prime Minister, as quoted by his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract, an increase in direct ought to be paralleled by an increase in indirect taxation, and that argument the Chancellor of the Exchequer had attempted to parry by saying that it was one which might be applicable when the Income Tax stood at 4*d.*, but not when it was only 2*d.* in the pound. It struck him, however, that the principle that where there was a general increase of taxation it was desirable that it should be felt by as many classes in the community as it could be made to cover, and not that it should be levied on one particular class, was applicable to both cases. That was the interpretation which he put on the statement of the Prime Minister that direct and indirect taxation should proceed together, while the way in which the Government acted up to that statement was by proposing that there should be an increase in direct taxation only, and that the addition thus made should not be paid by all taxpayers who contributed to the Income Tax, but by a portion of them only. He could not help thinking that, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, as was said, be disposed to be warm and sympathetic, it was scarcely the time to exhibit those feelings towards one class of the community when he was putting the screw upon another; and the circumstances were, he contended, now very different from those which existed in 1853 and in 1873, when remissions of taxation were made. He regretted, he might add, that any man occupying the position held by the Secretary for the Treasury should have admitted—for his language amounted to that—that, although there might be large remissions of indirect taxation, greatly benefiting those on whose behalf they were made, nevertheless, even in time of war, it would be impossible to retrace the step with respect to the Income Tax which the Chancellor of the Exchequer now invited the House to take. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman had seen in the newspapers that the question was one which had been debated in the colonies, in France, and in other parts of Europe. If so, he should like to ask him whether this country was to set the example of an increasing class of exemptions with the view to relieve those whose incomes were between £100 and £150 a-year? For what did the Government want the additional 1*d.* of Income Tax? They did not want the whole sum to provide for additional expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that he required this additional 1*d.* in order that he might have a surplus to redeem the promises he had made in providing further relief for local taxation during the present year and next year. The House was, therefore, going to vote the additional 1*d.* of Income Tax partly to meet a deficit, partly to meet prospective promises in the relief of local taxation, and partly in making exemptions in order to render the Income Tax more popular. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) said that the Government threw overboard the unpopularity of the Income Tax by these exemptions, and that opinion was endorsed by the Secretary to the Treasury. They had, therefore, come to this—that in their present state of prosperity, with a Conservative Government in power, having at their command a majority of 100, they could not maintain an Income Tax except by cutting off from liability all incomes below a certain amount. They were so afraid of imposing taxation on those on whose votes they relied for maintaining that majority that they had recourse to this immoral and dangerous proposal. Although he indulged at times in a little Party language—[Ironical cheers—just as the cheers he now heard were Party cheers, and just as hon. Gentlemen opposite also occasionally indulged in a little Party language—yet they must admit that he had to-night abstained from saying anything of a Party character. He had only supported one of his Colleagues for the City, and he had used no stronger language than his right hon. Friend had done. He confessed he did not think the proposal of the Government was either wise or Conservative. Was it Conservative to say that they would relieve the majority, on whom until now it was a responsibility to pay this tax, and to throw it upon the minority? Was it a Conservative proposition to say that, because a Party was able to make itself heard in that House, therefore they would deal differently with them from the rest of the community? He had never heard a less Conservative proposal. He would freely admit that it was a philanthropic, a warm, and a sympathetic proposal, but it was not Conservative. It was not advisable to introduce too much philanthropy into politics. The proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer might win the Government considerable applause, but philanthropy in finance was thoroughly dangerous. There was no step more likely to promote democratic agitation than to grant exemptions which would lead to demands for further exemptions, in which there was no principle and no bottom, and which could be argued from precedent to precedent until they reached that graduated Income Tax which was the dream of many Socialists and Communists. If those observations were warmer than those with which he commenced his speech it was because hon. Gentlemen opposite wished that a warmer character should be given to his observations. He would admit that his right hon. Friend and Colleague had made an unpopular proposal; for no doubt among the 440,000 persons exempted there were probably an immense number who were borough electors. Well, he would share in his right hon. Friend's unpopularity, and, should he go to a division, he would gladly "tell" with him, so that, irrespective of political differences, two Members of the City of London might on this occasion make a protest against the proposal of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sure no one could object to the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down—that it certainly could not be objected to on the ground of its having infused a little life into what had been for some time a rather dull debate. The speech of his hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury, which was of a reasoning and temperate character, did not compare in vivacity with some portions of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but no one could object to Party feeling in that House. He thought they were a good deal too scrupulous in the matter, for he did not see why persons engaged in the conduct of business which raised questions between Party and Party should be so very squeamish about using language of a Party character. There was, however, one thing to which he did object in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was when divesting himself of a Party character he put himself in the position of a Conservative, and from that point of view spoke on the question now before the House. Now, throughout the whole of this discussion, and especially so in the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), they ran the danger of falling into a kind of argument which was both dangerous and inconvenient. They had been promulgating theories which, however plausible they might be, were not capable of application. He was not disposed to enter into a discussion with his right hon. Friend as to the merits of the quotations he made from Adam Smith, or as to the precise construction to be put upon the doctrines laid down by that great and distinguished man; and used as these arguments had been by his right hon. Friend on this and other occasions, and by other Gentlemen who had taken part in this debate, he feared they might be led to follow them up carelessly to very inconvenient conclusions. The point upon which the argument of his right hon. Friend turned seemed to be this—that they could make taxation perfectly equal and just to all persons, and, moreover, that this particular tax could be made so that it would bear equally upon all classes of persons. Taking that as his starting point, his right hon. Friend said by these exemptions they were destroying that equality, and therefore he condemned the exemptions. In arguing thus his right hon. Friend had this advantage over the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he was able to discuss theories and lay down abstract propositions without running the risk of being asked to put them to the test of application. If difficulties arose his right hon. Friend could get over them by a mere shrug of the shoulder; whereas if he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) indulged in such speculations he might get into serious difficulties. If the Income Tax were made the sole tax they would have to raise it to so high a figure that complaints would certainly come from those upon whom it most pressed, and there would then be a real danger of the bugbear with which they were now threatened—that of a graduated property tax. Their proposal was not, he thought, open to the objections that had been urged against it. Arguments might be used against it which would give it the appearance which hon. Members opposite had attributed to it; but he could not see how the tax, with the proposed exemptions, differed in any degree in principle from the tax as it had existed from the first. He could not see that the extension of exemptions changed the principle by one jot from what it was under exemptions proposed in former times. In Pitt's time, when the tax was first suggested, it had a direct reference to the amount of the assessed taxes paid, but it very speedily took another form, founded always on the principle of certain exemptions from the smallest incomes. When Sir Robert Peel introduced it in 1842 the limit was fixed at precisely the same point which was now reached—that was, £150 a year—and it must be remembered that at the time Sir Robert Peel did that, he was taking off considerable burdens of taxation from persons who did not possess that amount, and the Government were being taunted, as had always been the case, when alterations were made in taxation, that in taxing some persons they were relieving others. Sir

Robert Peel's exemption continued until 1853, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich reduced it from £150 to £100, and what was the reason he gave for fixing it at the lower figure? It was in order to exempt what he called "the territory of labour," which he defined at £100 a-year. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) put it to the House whether that territory of labour was not better defined by the sum of £150 than by the sum of £100. The key to what the Government proposed was that they believed that men living by wages did in great numbers make wages fully equal to £150 a-year, but could not be made to pay the tax. His right hon. Friend said they ought to be made to pay it. In theory this opinion might be a sound one, but the difficulty was how to get them to pay. There was a discussion the other night upon this very point, and three or four employers of labour confirmed his statement that it was not only inconvenient but impossible to exact the tax from men who were living by wages. A working man receiving £3 a-week might be thrown out of employ before a month was over, and might not, therefore, get £150 in the year, and it was practically impossible to make him pay. This being so, great injustice was done to the class who were living side by side with these working men, who were obliged to keep up a better appearance, and who, living in fixed residences, could not escape from the tax. It was not from any sentiment, softheartedness, or philanthropy, but from a sense of the justice and prudence of the course they were taking, that the Government proposed to exempt such persons from the tax. Another reason given by the officers practically concerned in the collection of the tax was that it was among this class of persons in receipt of small incomes that the greatest amount of difficulty and friction was met with. He had been asked—"Why do you now extend the exemption to £150? Why did you not do so two years ago?" The reason was that two years ago the Government had but just come into office, and that it was very difficult to treat the Income Tax definitively. He had then stated that he did not think the Government would be justified, on so short a notice, in making any definite proposals, and that they reduced the tax by 1*d.* in the pound having regard simply to the requirements of the year, and reserving any other question. As a matter of fact, the figures upon this very point were then taken out; but the Government thought it inexpedient to deal with the question until they saw the real position of the country. They had now come to the conclusion that, taking into account the probable condition of the country for some time to come, it was desirable to maintain the Income Tax at a low figure, and keep it in reserve as an emergency tax. He stated in 1874, and he repeated it the other day, that the arrangements were made on the faith of their having a true picture of the necessary expenditure of the country presented to them as left by their predecessors; and when, after more careful inquiries, they found that this expenditure must be increased, they saw that to keep the Income Tax at 2*d.* was to keep it at too low a rate. In fixing the amount of the tax it was not a question of popularity or sympathy, but what was the real strength of our financial system, and the strength and power of appealing to that tax in cases of emergency depended on its being put on incomes as now proposed. As to the number of persons to whom the exemptions applied it was difficult to give any positive answer, many persons being taxed under more than one Schedule; but he was prepared to accept the general and rough statement that had been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), that between 200,000 and 300,000 persons would obtain entire remission, and about 200,000 would receive benefit from the exemptions. [Mr. CHILDERS: Between 400,000 and 500,000 would be benefited.] Probably the number might be 450,000 or 460,000 altogether, or say 500,000, of whom one-half perhaps would have the benefit of total exemption. No doubt a certain number of persons were freed from the Income Tax; but if it ever became necessary to raise large sums by taxation for any particular purpose, other kinds of taxation would, of course, be resorted to. It might be theoretically wrong to increase taxation in a direct form only; but that principle ought not to be pushed too far in practice. For his own part, he did not think a Finance Minister ought to lay down and slavishly adhere to any abstract doctrines. What he ought to do was to endeavour to raise his taxation in the way most in accordance with the general interests of the country, and the least injurious to trade and credit. The whole aim of the Government was to give solidity to our financial system. They were endeavouring to put the Income Tax on a footing which would enable them to raise it without difficulty in a great emergency, and they were endeavouring to deal with the Debt of the country in such a way as both to keep its credit good and to have a reserve to which recourse might be had in case of necessity. By reducing the pressure upon struggling professions the Income Tax would be made more tolerable, and by making it more tolerable it would be rendered more available. As to remissions, it was as well to bear in mind what the history of the tax had been. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich first proposed a 7*d.* tax on incomes above £150 and a 5*d.* tax on those between £150 and £100, they heard very little about the evils of graduated taxation, and that system, with some variation, continued for nine or ten years. At last, in 1863, the right hon. Gentleman, acknowledging the unfairness of the tax, introduced the principle of deductions, fixing the deduction at that time at £60 a-year. Subsequently he again spoke of the pressure of the tax on small incomes; and although he did not himself propose any further dealing with it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer under him as Prime Minister did again in 1872 propose a further extension of the system. The ground on which it was proposed was the inconvenience arising from too sudden a jump from the point at which a man was exempt from Income Tax. A sort of graduated system was introduced, on very scientific principles, according to which the sum of £60 was to be deducted where the maximum of exemption was £200, and £80 where the maximum was £300. It was now proposed that the amount deducted should be not £80, but £120, because of the arithmetical proportions of those figures, and that the deduction should be carried up to the higher figure of £400, instead of £300. The real key to the proposal was the deduction or remission of the tax up to £150, and, as the natural corollary to that, the deduction of £120 instead of £80. The principle on which the whole proposal rested was identically the principle on which these remissions had been founded for many years past. Some of the criticisms they had heard he thought could hardly be said to have been advanced seriously. He thought the criticism that it would be right to do this if they were reducing the tax, but wrong when they were raising it, was very difficult to follow or appreciate. They had been told that this was an emergency tax, and that they ought to take care not to do anything which, if the tax were raised to 1*s.* or 1*s.* 6*d.*, would sacrifice a considerable amount of the revenue we might get from it. But if that argument was to be held good for anything, we ought to do away with the exemptions that already existed. By putting the Income Tax on the basis on which the Government proposed to put it, the House, instead of giving a stimulus to what he regarded as a most dangerous policy—namely, that of a graduated tax—would carry out further the exemptions which tended to prevent that danger. In conclusion, he hoped that the House would adopt the scheme of the Government instead of the view put forward by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hubbard), which, though ingenious in theory, would not be found suitable in practice.

MR. GLADSTONE: I can assure hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that I am sincerely anxious to relieve them from the necessity or occasion of listening to me in any statement or argument upon this important question; and, after listening to the speeches that have been made it occurs to me that I may possibly, by putting a question at the outset, relieve the House altogether from that necessity, and remain, except in so far as the very few words I am about to say, a silent Member on this occasion. I noticed that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury in his speech confined his defence absolutely and exclusively to that portion of the proposal of the Government which raises the limit of total exemption from the Income Tax from the sum of £100 to £150 a-year; and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following the Secretary of the Treasury, delivered a careful and elaborate defence of that single portion of the proposal which raised the limit from £100 to £150, and although he offered, amidst what I may call the emphatic silence of hon. Members on that side of the House, some apology for the remainder of the proposal—namely, that of raising the deduction from £80 to £120, and the maximum under which that deduction applies from £300 to £400—though he made that kind of apology for these portions of the proposal which I fully admit decency required, yet, on the whole, the impression left on my mind was that it was not disagreeable to him, at all events it was not intolerable to him if at once we were to offer him some assistance in throwing overboard that portion of his cargo, and that it might shorten our proceedings if he were to give us an explicit explanation on that point. I think I am justified in asking my right hon. Friend whether he is prepared to assure us that provided the House is ready to adopt the alteration of the limit of absolute exemption from £100 to £150 he on his part is ready to abandon the two other proposals of raising the deductions from £80 to £120, and the limit of incomes upon which that deduction is to be made from £300 to £400. I make no excuse whatever in offering my right hon. Friend and the House a distinct bribe on the subject, because he will get away at least half-an-hour earlier from a discussion which I myself wish to avoid.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will not stand in the way of my right hon. Friend proceeding with his argument.

MR. GLADSTONE: Though I esteem the statement of my right hon. Friend as a very high personal compliment, yet I would willingly forego it if he would explicitly state what I think he has implicitly done in the observations he has made. I really think he might as well spare himself the trouble, whether I am right or wrong, of pushing those two portions of his proposal, because unless I mistake the genuine feeling of the House itself it is a feeling of dislike to those two proposals. Therefore I must, under protest and under compulsion from the Members of the Government who will not relieve me from the necessity, proceed to state why I think this is an important matter, and upon what footing I place the remarks I have to make. I do not think it necessary to answer many of the points in the speech of my right hon. Friend, because I am extremely anxious to keep out of this discussion whatever belongs to the distinction between the two Parties in this House; but one observation of his I must meet with a mild protest and objection. He objected to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), on the ground that he had assumed and taken upon himself to denounce this measure from a Conservative point of view. Says my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—"You have no right to denounce this measure from a Conservative point of view. What have you to do with Conservatism? What do you know about it? Hold your tongue on the subject." But my right hon. Friend forgets, I will not say the established slang, but I will say the established formula of each of the two Parties. A Conservative when he goes to his constituents says—"I am a Conservative, but I tell you also the Conservatives are the best of Liberals." If he is a Liberal, he will say—"I am a Liberal, but I tell you also the Liberals are the best Conservatives." I know from my own personal experience that the professions of my Friends on this side of the House are perfectly sincere. But the right hon. Gentleman says it is impossible for the language of a Conservative to be also that of a Liberal, or that the language of a Liberal can be that also of a Conservative; and, therefore, I am afraid he thinks that the corresponding professions by Gentlemen who sit behind him have not at all the same character and stamp of sincerity as undoubtedly belong to those made on this side. Let us get rid, however, of expressions of this kind. Sir, I feel this is an occasion on which the entire responsibility of the decision that is to be given lies with the majority in this House. You, the Members of the majority, have it in your power to carry the proposals of the Government. For us, it is no very difficult matter to make our protest, and to point out what we conceive to be the rights of the case, and the danger of the course on which you are inviting us to enter. If the communications that have been going on upon the Treasury Bench have led to an alteration of intention, and if the right hon. Gentleman is now prepared to say he will dispense with this portion of the

Mr. Gladstone

MR. LAING said, he must give a preference for the scheme proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The view which they took of exemptions would, of course, be influenced by the opinions they held as to the desirability of the Income Tax being permanent or not. He thought those who, like himself, believed that the Income Tax was an essential and a vital part of our financial system, and that it was desirable to retain it at a moderate amount as a great instrument of financial power, would generally be found in favour of exemptions, thus throwing overboard some of that unpopularity which affected the principle of the tax generally and putting it upon a more secure foundation. As regarded the principle of exemption, he thought the fallacy which ran through the argument used against it was that it seemed to be assumed that the whole taxes of the country were levied direct. A great portion of our Revenue was raised by indirect taxation, and when they came to the lower scale of incomes, especially of the labouring classes, in point of fact they spent a larger percentage of their incomes in articles which paid taxation than the man of larger income did. One great argument in favour of the Income Tax was that the tax was an instrument of great national power. By the simple expedient of adding 1*d.* in the pound the Government could easily raise a larger sum than foreign countries could obtain without great stress and inconvenience. The other great argument was that the tax was the means by which they could in tolerably fair proportions equalize the incidence of taxation upon the middle and lower classes of the community. The broad conclusion was that with an Income Tax producing £5,000,000 direct taxation the equilibrium between direct and indirect taxation on the different classes was very fairly maintained. If they abolished the Income Tax, they would destroy that equilibrium. The exemptions, then, he viewed as made on a fair basis and not on any Communistic principle. That being so, it seemed to be a simple question of degree whether they should draw the line at £100 or £150. He desired

the Income Tax to be maintained, and he therefore wished to relieve it from the unpopularity which attached to taxing a large number of small incomes for the sake of realizing a comparatively small amount. He had been alarmed ever since the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) proposed the repeal of the Income Tax as part of the programme with which he appealed to the country at the last General Election, and, entertaining this alarm, he desired to defend the citadel of our financial system by every fair and legitimate means. It was consistent with principle and precedent to go back, as they were doing, to what might be called the old and accustomed limit which accompanied the tax for a series of years, and which had the authority of eminent statesmen in its favour. Under these circumstances, he should give his vote against the Motion of the right hon. Member for London.

MR. SANDFORD said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had asserted that he was opposed to the existence of the Income Tax, and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had in a letter which was published in a newspaper stated that he did not know a single person who was a friend to the Income Tax. He begged to undeceive the hon. Gentleman, for he (Mr. Sandford) was a friend to that tax, and he should be sorry to see property relieved of it and an equivalent burden thrown on Customs and Excise, or, in other words, on the shoulders of the working classes. When the tax was originally imposed by Pitt it was a graduated Income Tax; and it was altogether too late to say that exemptions from it rested on principles of socialism. Exemptions had been adopted by every Parliament and by every Minister by whom the tax was laid on. In his opinion the principle of exemptions was only just, because wealth did not contribute its fair share to the taxes of the country. The burden of the tax fell most heavily on the possessors of small incomes which did not rise with the price of commodities when the wages of working men did rise. Even indirect taxes were levied with some unfairness. Inferior tobacco paid 100 per cent, and the better class of cigars from 10 to 20 per cent; cheap claret paid 15 per cent, and the better quality 2 per cent; beer paid maximum, the deduction from its efficacy becomes an enormous deduction. If the tax were raised to the amount of 2s., at which it stood for many years together during the revolutionary war, the total deductions from the tax by the exemptions would be very little short indeed of £10,000,000 a-year. If the sum of 2s. should seem to some Gentlemen a visionary sum, I may remind them that even in the Crimean War, which only lasted a little more than a twelvemonth as to its active operations, and when we had peace within two years from the time war was declared, even in that short and most fugitive war we raised the tax to the sum of 1s. 4d. Then, in the next place, we say this is a mode of securing the perpetuity of the tax. But the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury says that is perfectly true, and that is the merit of the proposal. He stated for the first time from the Treasury Bench that the tendency of this proposal to perpetuate the tax was one of the merits which had commended it to the approval of the Government. The hon. Gentleman since he has been in office cannot have had time to refresh his memory on the subject of the declarations of the manifesto or counter manifesto issued by the Prime Minister at the time of the General Election. The hon. Gentleman has forgotten that at the time when it was my duty to point out that we had a state of things in which we could part with the Income Tax, and we recommended parting with it, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire disputed entirely our title to make ourselves the patrons of the abolition of the Income Tax, and said—"The Liberals are those who have always kept on the Income Tax; the Conservative Party are those who have always striven to take it off." The Secretary of the Treasury, forgetful of the solemn declarations of his Leaders, which amount almost to the profession of a political creed, says that because this proposal tends to the perpetuity of the tax it is considered as one of its recommendations in the eyes of the Government. It has been truly said that this is a proposal by which, I will not say you bribe the majority, but by which you induce the majority of the actual taxpayers to acquiesce in the increase of the tax by making that increase positively and absolutely beneficial to them. You encourage them to run in upon the minority, for you are going to make the increase of the taxation of the minority re-imburse and compensate the State for the relief you are going to give to the majority. Is that a safe principle? What does my right hon. Friend say upon that? He says it was the very thing Sir Robert Peel did in 1842. I take issue with him. I ought to know something about that, for it was my duty to fight the tariff of 1842 through the House of Commons. He forgot that the tariff of that year was not directed to the remissions it made to the relief of the great articles of consumption bearing upon the subsistence of the people. It was directed to the liberation of trade by the abolition and the reduction of duty upon raw material. Let my right hon. Friend mould his proceeding upon the basis of Sir Robert Peel, and we shall have very little to object to in it. My right hon. Friend says it does not signify whether you make these exemptions when the tax is increased or when it is diminished. I protest against that doctrine. I have serious doubts whether we were right in 1872 in raising the maximum up to which the deduction was allowed from £200 to £300; but I say it is a totally different thing to do what is done by my right hon. Friend—namely, to purchase the relief of one man under the same act and law at the expense of another, who is called on to pay for the relief as well as his own share of the tax. I must say a few words to the House, and especially to the majority, upon the nature of this proposal as to the principle it involves. My right hon. Friend showed a not unnatural disposition to get rid of the discussion of principle under the name of theory. It is not at all a bad plan—and my right hon. Friend seems to have adopted it in his speech—when you find the discussion of the principles of finance to be inexpedient to disparage and denounce them as theories, and as not fit to be entertained in an assembly of practical men. However, I do not think the theories of finance at all irrelevant to the discussion of practical measures of finance. Those who have been soundest in the theory of finance have been those who have brought about all the practical improvements in the practice of finance. I object to these two proposals, putting them in a totally different category from the first of the three proposals—namely, that which raises the limit of exemptions from £100 to £150 a-year. I do not desire to join issue with the Government, and do not now make appeal to the House on any limited and narrow ground such as would be the subject of discussion so long as it was confined to £150 a-year. It is true that was the original minimum of the Income Tax, and it would be idle to attempt to reproach any Government that thought that circumstances made it desirable to return it to that limit. I should only have to say I thought the time was unfortunately chosen, for I do not think a period when a tax is raised is the right period to give relief to a large class of payers of the tax. But I do not desire to enter into that, as I do not think it involves any principle of taxation. The question raised with regard to the other two classes is of a totally different character. Besides the number which my right hon. Friend admits will be entirely relieved from the operation of the tax, another 200,000, having incomes between £150 and £400 a-year, will be relieved under Schedules D and E. That number is an absolute and considerable majority of the entire number of persons paying Income Tax above £150 a-year. The portion upon whom you are going to increase the tax does not consist of more than 150,000 or 160,000 persons; the portion upon whom you are going to diminish the tax, after putting aside those whom you are going to relieve from it, is about 200,000. Schedules A, B, and C contain an uncertain but very large number of persons that ought to be added to those figures; and this, as everyone acquainted with the tax must know, must largely increase the majority of those whom you are going to relieve, and largely reduce the minority on whom you are going to place increased burdens. Is this a safe proceeding? What is the virtue of this figure £400? I never but once happened to hear the figure 400 introduced as a figure of cardinal virtue and power in matters of finance. The people of England are eminently Conservative in matters of taxation and finance. We do not find the labouring classes in this country desirous to enrich themselves at the expense of the State or their richer neighbours. But once I did read a pamphlet that did appear to be full of the most mischievous trash, but the very proposal in the pamphlet was to a certain extent in sympathy with the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer; for the writer laid down this fundamental doctrine—that every man ought to have a fixed minimum income secured by the State, and he was led evidently by the same directing genius that has moved the mind of my right hon. Friend; only he applied his principle more largely and consistently, to fix upon the income which should be secured to every man by the State the sum of £400 a-year, £200 for the maintenance of his wife and family, and £200 for his own recreation, enjoyment, and satisfaction. My right hon. Friend said—“If you object to exemptions on £400 you object to exemptions altogether.” If that is to be said, what argument could be used when some future Minister, who was still more warm and sympathetic in his nature than the present one, raised the limit to £500 a-year. Is there a danger in this way of handling the Income Tax, or is there not? That is the question which I wish in all sincerity and earnestness to address to every one of you who sit on the opposite side of the House, because I know those on this side of the House do not desire to have it addressed to them. I do not wish to preach to the converted. I am far from thinking that with the dispositions that prevail in this country the theories of Socialism and Communism have for us the real danger which they present on the Continent of Europe. I believe we may commit many faults, and play a great many pranks—dangerous and mischievous pranks—and still the good sense of the people of England would save us from Socialism and Communism. But they are evils of such a character that I should like to keep the margin between us and them as broad as possible, and I object to these proposals because it trespasses on that margin. I will endeavour to prove what I say. Of all the taxes on our Statute Book the Income Tax is the only tax through which it is possible that Socialism or Communism, or anything like them, can, in the nature of things, find an entrance into our system. It cannot be done by indirect taxation, indirect taxation seeming to hit all alike, while it probably hits with greatest severity the poorer classes. It cannot be done through our stamp laws, for, speaking generally, they are rigidly impartial. For the most part, though they may fall on the property of the country, they fall upon it within measure, and I have never heard it spoken of as unjust that the property of the country should pay largely and liberally for the advantages it derives from government. I do not believe it unjust that the rich man should pay more liberally than the man of lower position. But the unrestrained adoption of that doctrine is full of danger to the State; and I ask whether it is wise for us to give the smallest scintilla of countenance to that doctrine by adopting any proposal such as that now before us, unless on grounds very much stronger than those stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury? Take the case of those other taxes which fall upon property—the succession and legacy duties. These duties can never be made the means of introducing gross inequalities, because the very nature of them, requiring the realization of the property in order that the money be paid, absolutely forbids the doing of injustice. On the contrary, in the Income Tax we have a law admitting of being dealt with in a very different manner, and in one which would have given satisfaction to the Commune of Paris. We have only to strike the pen through the figure in one line, and in lieu of that to insert some other figure. It is the real and only avenue through which these dangerous principles can be introduced. Of course, I do not mean that the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to introduce these principles. He is as much opposed to them as we, though not more; but I am not speaking of intentions, I am speaking of the tendency of the right hon. Gentleman's proceeding. It has always been felt that the Income Tax had its dangers. In the old Income Tax there were various forms of exemption, which, when it was renewed in 1842, it was felt to be wise to get rid of. Since that time we have endeavoured to stand on a principle. It is intelligible, and the Income Tax has boasted of its equality—at least of its theoretical equality. It is a blot in it, and starts from a basis where it can be shown that it sins at its outset against its own first principles. At the same time, it was felt impossible to levy the tax upon the smallest incomes. It was impossible to levy it upon the wages of labour, and that led to the principle that the wages of labour should be exempted. This, then, is the principle upon which the tax has stood from that day to this. It was necessary to ascertain the proper point of transition from the wages of labour to those incomes that were taxable in the sense that they could be got at, and as very cruel anomalies arose it was thought better to graduate the transition. This is the history of the mode in which the subject has been dealt with. If it has been dealt with too liberally, I feel confident I shall carry your assent when I say that is not a reason for going forward. It is, I say, an additional reason for stopping short. If we have already done too much, it is a reason for not doing more. It is impossible to say that incomes between £150 and £300 a-year are now unjustly taxed, and it is impossible to say that the revenue officers have found any difficulty in levying upon these incomes. It is impossible to say with regard to incomes between £300 and £400 that any of those considerations can apply which originally dictated the exemption of incomes below £150. Now, Sir, this is not a question upon which we should indulge a mere sympathetic feeling. If sympathetic feelings are to govern our discussions you may surrender tax after tax, and limit after limit, and your operations will never come to an end. We should adhere to the wise practice of former years, when necessity was the cause of exemption; and if we have given too liberal an interpretation already, and have come too near a danger, that is a great reason why we should come no nearer. These are considerations of such importance that I have felt it my duty to lay them before the House. I have no disposition to push my views with regard to the class of incomes between £100 and £150; but I earnestly hope these classes of exemptions now proposed by the Government will receive careful attention, and that Gentlemen speaking from the other side of the House, and with more authority and more favour than I can command, will back the appeal I have made and save us the necessity of any division on the question now before us.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he was opposed to the first part of the Amendment, but he was favourable to the second—namely, that it was inexpedient to extend the limit of exemptions to incomes of from £300 to £400. He could not, however, assent to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who asked them to vote for the Amendment, as he believed the effect of carrying it out would be fatal to the Bill. In Committee every Member could give effect to the opinions which he entertained.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would vote for the exemptions, not because he approved them altogether, but because the principle upon which they were founded approached what was right. In his opinion, incomes under £300 should be entirely exempt. The right hon. Member for Greenwich seemed to have forgotten that the poor man paid in indirect taxation much more in proportion than the rich man paid.

MR. FLOYER said, nothing could have been more clear or convincing than the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the exemptions up to £150, and though there was some objection to raising the sum to be deducted from £80 to £120, yet that objection was not very material. He felt, however, that there was a strong objection to make the deductions from incomes under £400 instead of £300; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman himself was not altogether satisfied with that part of his proposition. If, therefore, he voted against the Motion of the right hon. Member for the City, he desired to guard himself against being precluded from voting against a portion of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM trusted the Government would not at that stage of the Bill make any change in their proposals. It was entirely without precedent for a Government to make promises of remission of taxation in a Budget speech and then of their own accord to depart from the pledges they had given. There was no new principle involved in what the Government proposed—it was a step, and a very short step, in the direction taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They were now told that by fixing on the limit at £400 they were touching the verge of Communism; but that they were quite safe when the limit was £300. He was not frightened by any such assertion. He hoped the Government would not depart one jot or tittle from their proposal. At an election which had recently taken place in the North of England the constituency had received the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman with the greatest favour.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not wish to prolong the debate, but he would say a word as to the effect of the Amendment. If the hon. Member (Mr. Floyer) thought he was more likely to obtain his object by opposing the proposals of the Government in Committee, he was of course at liberty to do so, though he could surely accomplish this result more effectually by supporting the Amendment. But the hon. Member (Mr. J. R. Yorke) was under a misapprehension in supposing that the Amendment, if carried, would stop the progress of the Bill. The only result would be to negative the Motion that the Speaker do “now” leave the Chair; and if the Amendment were then carried, it would be in the power of the House to amend it.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved that the Order for the Committee be discharged for the present in order that the measure might be referred back to the Select Committee.

MR. RAIKES said, he did not wish to offer any opposition to the proposal before the House, but he thought it right to point out some important changes which had been introduced into the Bill in Committee. If it re-appeared before the House again in the shape it now was, it would be his duty to trouble the House at much greater length on the matter in pointing out the remarkable provisions which had been inserted in the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE would like a more definite statement of the proposals in the Bill which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) considered so objectionable.

Order discharged; Motion agreed to.

TURKEY—SECOND NOTE OF THE THREE POWERS.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question on a subject of considerable interest. We are informed that in consequence of the failure of the Andrassy Note, the Three Powers—Germany, Russia, and Austria—have agreed to a second Note. We are further informed that France and Italy have concurred in this Note; but that Her Majesty's Government decline to be a party to it. If this representation of affairs be accurate, it would appear as if the communications on the subject have come to an end. I have, therefore, to ask the noble Earl if, without any injury or inconvenience to the public interests, the noble Earl can give now, or a short time hence, information to the House as to the exact state of this most difficult of questions?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, nothing can be more legitimate than the Question put to me by the noble Earl opposite. But I confess that at the present moment I am not in a position in which I can, in justice to the other parties concerned, give detailed information as to the result of the late conferences at Berlin. Your Lordships and the public are probably aware that these conferences ended in an agreement between the Governments of Russia, Austria, and Germany to make certain propositions to the Porte with a view to the pacification of the Turkish Provinces now disturbed and the termination of the state of civil war. These propositions, so agreed upon by the three Powers, were laid before the Governments of France, of Italy, and of England, with a request for their adhesion. The French and Italian Governments gave an immediate assent. Her Majesty's Government, after a careful examination of the proposals, found themselves unable to do so. I may say that we came to that decision with regret; and I may perhaps be allowed to add that in taking that view we were not in any degree influenced by a motive which I have seen imputed to us—namely, the fact that we had not been consulted in framing the document to which our assent was asked. If we had thought the plan proposed likely to effect its object, the consideration to which I have referred would not have weighed with us. I am afraid I cannot give further explanations of our reasons for refusal; they would hardly be intelligible, unless I could lay the proposals themselves upon the Table, and that I am not in a position to do. They have not yet, I believe, been formally communicated to the Turkish Government; it is even possible—though I do not at all assert that it will be so—that they may be modified before they are so communicated; and that being the case, I should not be justified in publishing them without the consent of the Powers with which they originated. As soon as that objection is removed there will not be the slightest desire on my part or that of my Colleagues to keep back from the House any information we may possess on the subject.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.

(NO. 85.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: I need not recapitulate the various stages by which the public mind was first directed to the subject of vivisection and the Government induced to advise the Crown to issue a Commission, the Report of which is now the basis of the present Bill. Last year a noble Lord in this, and a right hon. Gentleman in the other House, introduced Bills dealing with it; but the subject is not only an extremely painful, but it is a difficult and delicate one to deal with. On the one hand there is the danger of going too far; on the other, the danger of not going far enough: on the one side there is the strong sentiment of humanity; on the other, there are the claims of modern science. It is a sea strewn with rocks, and it is not easy to steer safely through them. Personally I can hardly describe with how much pain I have waded through the horrible details of an almost sickening subject in order to arrive at the necessary conclusions; personally I can hardly say with how much effort I now bring the subject before this House on behalf of Her Majesty's Government; but I am sustained in what I feel to be the difficulty of the task, first of all by the feeling that legislation is right and necessary, next by the unanimity of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the subject; lastly by the fact that the conclusion of that Commission is in harmony not only, as I hope, with the general opinion of the intelligent and humane people of this country, but with much of the highest professional opinion—surgical, medical, and even physiological. And if I may be allowed I would venture to offer my humble tribute to the well-balanced and temperate reasoning of that Report, and to the wisdom of the general conclusions at which the Commissioners have arrived. I will take example by them, and I trust that I shall, in stating a case which is more than usually open to controversy, say nothing which can justly provoke irritation on any side. And first as to the present law. Up to the time of the passing of the 3rd of George IV. there was no legislation for the protection of animals, and our early literature, whether prose or poetry, shows abundant evidence of the national brutality on these subjects; since then there have been a series of enactments passed with humane objects, and affording legislative protection to domestic—but only domestic, animals. It is therefore enough to sum up this part of the subject by briefly saying that only domestic animals are so protected; that as to vivisection the protection afforded to those animals is insufficient; and that for animals which are not domestic there is no protection at all.

My first proposition, therefore, is that legislation is necessary from the defect of the law, my next and much more serious proposition is that legislation is necessary from the nature of the case. Now the practice of vivisection in its more objectionable form has been mainly carried on abroad. It is to foreign countries that we owe the painful interest which is now felt in this country with reference on the subject. It is from the Continent that the warning has come, thence that the impulse has been received; it is there that the mirror is held up in which the worst and most hideous of those practices are reflected. But indeed for experiments conducted abroad it is probable that public attention and sympathy would not have been awakened in this country. It is not necessary for me to prove the existence of this practice abroad. It is abundantly stated in books, in periodicals, in scientific writings. It stands as a confessed and admitted fact. What that practice has been abroad it is too painful—it is happily also unnecessary—to narrate in anything like detail. It has been carried on for every imaginable purpose, and for no purpose at all—for the investigation of disease, for scientific research, and for wanton curiosity, and this with a barbarity that must shock the dullest and the coldest nature. Experiments have been prosecuted with an exquisite refinement of torture not merely for hours, but for days, for weeks, and, in some cases that have been recorded, even for months, on the same living and palpitating animal—prosecuted, I say, until even in foreign towns public decency has been scandalized, and the dull sense of morality, which is never wholly extinct amongst men, has been stirred into life. But in England, whatever may be the abuses committed, they are at most but a feeble reflection of what has been done abroad. I notice, in the evidence taken by the Royal Commission, a remarkable tribute paid by the Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of

Cruelty to Animals, to the greater humanity manifested in this country, where there was, he said, an entire difference in the practice of vivisection in this country as compared with the same practice abroad. But, at the same time it is clear, and it is admitted, that the practice exists in this country, and that, side by side with it, there exists no sufficient security that abuses may not arise, even in our medical schools and great institutions. In the Appendix of this Report, there is a table given of between 30 and 40 public institutions, of which more than 30 admit the existence, more or less, of the practice. In the very great majority of those cases it is, I hope, clear that anæsthetics are carefully used, and that precautions are taken to prevent suffering in the animal; though I do not consider that I should be justified in saying that this is invariably so. But it is not enough that we may, to some extent, trust to public opinion and high professional authority in those schools and institutions as securities against abuse; but there is a much greater danger. Experiments are carried on in private houses by the young and ignorant and callous, with no check of public opinion, and there is reason to believe that gross abuse does here exist in connection with experiments so conducted. Your Lordships are in possession of the Report of the Commission, and therefore I will not read many or lengthy extracts from the evidence, but it may be well that on this point I should refer to the conclusion of the Commission itself—

“There can be,” they say, “little doubt that experiments have been and now are performed occasionally by private persons, of whose numbers we are able to form no accurate computation.”

And further on they refer to the evidence of Dr. Anthony, residing near Birmingham, who knew young men who carried on those experiments in private houses from mere curiosity. They conclude by referring to cases—

“in which the unpractised student has taken on himself without guidance, in his private lodgings, to expose animals to torture without anæsthetics for no purpose which could merit the name of legitimate scientific research.”

But the matter does not end here. Not only is vivisection carried on in private houses in this country, and therefore out of the ken of public opinion, but there is a constantly widening growth of the practice. It is growing, as all such practices must grow, from its own internal vitality: it is growing with the development of the new schools of physiology and biological research: it is growing, because the students themselves are more and more in the habit of frequenting foreign schools, and return to this country with the traditions and the modes of those schools. I have myself endured so much mental pain in reading what was done in some of these foreign schools that I will not wound the ears of those to whom I am speaking. I will not repeat what I have read. I indeed could scarcely do so in Parliamentary phraseology; but to those of your Lordships who may desire to look more closely into these horrible details, very sufficient evidence will be found in the Appendix to the Report of the Commission, and in a hand-book which has become a text-book in our surgical schools, and was edited by a high authority, to whom I will immediately refer, Dr. Klein. It is scarcely necessary to point out that this book, which bases its teaching amongst other things upon experiments that have been performed upon living animals, must act as a powerful encouragement to students to repeat those experiments: as, indeed, is illustrated in the evidence of one witness, who, when questioned on the point of repeating experiments on the same animal, testified with much emphasis to the necessity of constant and reiterated repetition in the general practice of physiological experimentation.

But it is said that anæsthetics are used, and that consequently there is no pain. I wish it were so. There is, unfortunately, ample testimony that in many cases no anæsthetics at all are used, and that even the use of them is frequently of a very partial and defective kind. There is in the evidence given before the Commission a statement by Dr. Klein, to whom I have already alluded, which is extremely instructive in itself, and illustrative of that point to which I am now directing the attention of the House. Dr. Klein ranks high as a scientific man, he is conversant both with foreign and English practice, has studied at Vienna, and is lecturer on general histology at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He received the report of his evidence as taken by the shorthand writer, and he returned it corrected—not in accordance with the custom by which witnesses before Commissions and Committees are permitted to make verbal correction, but so altered and amended that the Commission felt bound not to receive it in that form. Dr. Klein then requested that his evidence should be withdrawn. The Commissioners rightly, as I think, declined to comply with his request, but they included in the Minutes, the shorthand writer's note, as it was originally taken, and then placed in parallel columns, in the Appendix Dr. Klein's amendments. I have now before me arranged side by side the two versions of Dr. Klein's evidence, and I shall take the liberty of reading to your Lordships the original, and, as I am bound to think, the more faithful expression of Mr. Klein's opinion. He was examined on the use of anæsthetics, and here are some of his examinations as reported by the shorthand writer:—

“What is your own practice with regard to the use of anæsthetics in experiments that are otherwise painful?—Except for teaching purposes, for demonstration, I never use anæsthetics where it is not necessary for convenience.”

Again, there followed question and answer—

“But do you think that where it is only a question of time a professor of physiology is not bound to consult humanitarian feelings?—An investigator has no time. I myself, when I am going to make an experiment for pathological research, have no time really with regard to what the animal will feel.”

The subject was pursued, and in reply to Mr. Forster, Dr. Klein's practice and opinions were further elicited—

“Do you not sometimes find an inconvenient interruption from the cries of the animal?—Only then I do use chloroform: that is what I said; I use anæsthetics for convenience sake.”

“And it is only because the dog might howl, or get into contortions that you would use anæsthetics at all?—Yes.”

“And you think that the view of scientific men on the Continent is your view, that animal suffering is so entirely unimportant compared with scientific research that it should not be taken into account at all?—Yes, except for convenience sake.”

I venture to hope that no one in this House will endorse these answers of Dr. Klein, and whatever may be the difference on matters of detail, I do not hesitate to affirm both for myself and for every person in this House that such an expression of opinion is simply detestable. In connection with this part of the subject, I ought to add that a so-called anæsthetic known as urari or curari, has the effect of paralyzing all the nerves of motion, while it allows the nerves of sensation to remain in their normal condition. I have read somewhere of a very eminent French Professor who, having administered this to a dog, remarked to his pupils—"You observe that there is in his face no sign whatever of suffering, and yet he is enduring the most diabolical torture." The Bill now before your Lordships absolutely prohibits the use of urari as an anæsthetic, for independently of the atrocious cruelty, practices such as these must lead to the demoralization of those who assisted in them.

I come now to the consideration of the principles on which legislation ought to proceed in order to deal with such abuses whether existing or possible; but I will pause for a moment to refer to an objection which is sometimes urged to any legislation. We are told that field sports ought to be put in the same category as vivisection. I pause indeed to allude to this objection, but I will not dignify it by the name of argument; and so groundless, rhetorical, absurd, is it that I will not condescend to reason upon it. I notice it only that it may not be thought that I have overlooked it. Well, then, what ought to be done? There are the views of two extreme parties. There are some for the total abolition of vivisection, there are others who, as claiming to speak for a section of the scientific world, object to any restriction. To those who advocate the total abolition of the practice I give credit for the highest intentions and feelings, but I entreat them to consider that by refusing all compromise on this subject they are defeating their own objects, they are sanctioning the continuance of great evils, and with that continuance they are fostering a demoralization amongst those who are guilty of cruelty to an extent and in a way which may make the present great wrong far worse in the future, and far more difficult hereafter to eradicate. But it is impracticable to contend for a total abolition; and if so, do not let us fall into the greatest mistake to which legislators are liable—do not let us pass an impossible law. Were total abolition in this case insisted upon by Parliament, one of two consequences would follow—either there would be a general rush of medical students abroad, where they would be under no restraint; or they would betake themselves to the dark holes and corners of this country, where, out of reach of all public opinion and the wholesome influences of a controlling morality, they would with inferior appliances, and far greater indifference to the sufferings of animals, carry on these practices at their pleasure. On the other hand, those advocates of vivisection who claim for it total exemption from all restriction, claim for it an exemption which is granted to no other practice, class, interest, or profession; which I trust will never be granted, and which healthy English public opinion will not endure for one moment. Nor can I believe that the highest authorities in medicine or surgery desire such an exemption. As far as I can gather their opinions, expressed in this Report or elsewhere, I understand it to be the reverse. They have agreed to accept restrictions in the case of vivisection, and it is one of the great merits of this Bill that, being founded mainly on the lines of the Report of the Royal Commission, it will not only have the support of the distinguished men who composed that Commission, but also I hope the concurrence of all the great lights of the medical, surgical, and scientific world. Of course, there may be differences of opinion with respect to details, but these authorities have given in a substantial adhesion to the principle embodied in the Bill; and if the Bill is in the nature of a compromise it is not, perhaps, the worse for that.

Now, what are the principles of legislation which are profitable and expedient? The Commissioners in their Report give in the first place the reasons which in their opinion justify legislation; they next go on to argue that it is impossible to abolish the practice, and that even if it were possible it would not be desirable to do so, but that it is essential that existing abuses should be restrained. Moreover, so far back as 1871 the British Association appointed a Committee to inquire into the subject, and that Committee reported the following conclusions:—

law or fact already demonstrated; in other words, experimentation without the employment of anæsthetics is not a fitting exhibition for teaching purposes. (3.) Whenever, for the investigation of new truth, it is necessary to make a painful experiment, every effort should be made to ensure success, in order that the sufferings inflicted may not be wasted. For this reason, no painful experiment ought to be performed by an unskilled person, with insufficient instruments and assistants, or in places not suitable to the purpose; that is to say, anywhere except in physiological and pathological laboratories, under proper regulations. (4.) In the scientific preparation for veterinary practice, operations ought not to be performed upon living animals for the mere purpose of obtaining greater operative dexterity."

These recommendations do not stand on their own authority alone, great as that authority is. They are endorsed by the highest names, including Professors Darwin, Owen, Huxley, and Sir William Gull. And if this Bill goes somewhat beyond them, I may safely affirm that there is nothing in it which is at variance with them. And now, lastly, what are the principles which Parliament ought to keep in view in dealing with this difficult question? The principal object which this Bill recognizes as one to justify vivisection is the lengthening of human life, or the lessening of human suffering. Whether, indeed, science has gained by vivisection what she claims to have gained even by the mouths of the most moderate advocates of the practice is perhaps open to doubt. On the one hand such facts as were ascertained by Hervey are, I apprehend, indisputable; on the other, it is quite certain that many eminent men have deeply regretted the extent to which vivisection has been carried, and Dr. Nelaton, the eminent French surgeon, no mean authority in himself or as representing the French school, if I mistake not, has expressed himself as, on the whole, unfavourable to the practice. Probably, however, in fairness and on the general balance of testimony, it must be admitted that experiments in vivisection have tended to lengthen human life and lessen human suffering. But, admitting this, we must be clear that the object in view is worth the experiment. Pain ought to be spared altogether by the use of anæsthetics; and where this cannot be, then it should be reduced to a minimum, and death should be immediately and mercifully inflicted. Under no circumstances can it be right to sanction the infliction of torture for minor or secondary objects; for the purposes of illustration in schools; for exhibitions to mixed audiences, as has sometimes been the case; by the young or the inexperienced; in secret, or for the acquiring of manual skill. It may be said that the study of medicine and surgery, or physiology, involves, and will more and more involve, like many other studies in these later days, an experimental process. This is true; but, on the other hand, there is this marked difference, that in this case the experimental process involves also the infliction of pain; and where this is so we have a right to take guarantees against that pain, especially where there is reason to believe that any part of it is unnecessary. We endeavour, therefore, under this Bill to provide guarantees which will secure a certain amount of Government inspection, will bring the light of public opinion to bear, will invoke the aid of the higher professional authorities, and will lay down certain regulations.

The Bill opens by prohibiting in express terms and as a general principle the practice of vivisection; but it proceeds to concede various cases in which this rule may be relaxed under certain safeguards and conditions. Thus it allows an exception for certain purposes of teaching, subject to anæsthetics; it allows further an exception for purposes of research even without anæsthetics; it allows exceptions in the case of a criminal trial, and on the responsibility of the presiding Judge; it allows, in fact, exceptions as to the use of anæsthetics, but only in most rare cases; and in these cases a certificate from certain professional authorities, and the sanction of the Secretary of State are necessary. As the almost universal rule, the animal operated on must be put to death the moment the influence of the anæsthetic passes away, if pain will be the result of a prolongation of life. An exception is, indeed, allowed in this instance, but only in very rare cases and under precautions such as those to which I have just referred. By the 6th clause any public exhibition of vivisection is declared illegal. Clause 7 provides for a registry of the place in which experiments by vivisection are conducted; and the following clause for a licence by the Secretary of State to any person whom he may think qualified to perform such experiments.

Subsequent clauses provide for inspection and reports. The legal proceedings under the Act are to be summary, with a power in the person charged to elect to be tried on indictment. In the case of summary convictions there is an appeal to the Court of quarter sessions.

Clause 5 rests on a peculiar and different footing from the other provisions of the Bill. By it there is an immunity from vivisection in the case of dogs and cats. This exception may not, perhaps, be strictly logical; but we need not always be guided by strict logic: there are even yet higher principles and considerations; whilst, as a matter of fact, there is a legislative precedent for a distinction between domestic and other animals in Martin's Act. If, indeed, there are any animals who, by their habits and companionship with man, are connected with him by familiar and often by very touching bonds of sympathy it is the dog and even the cat. It may, perhaps, be added that a large number of dogs are now stolen for these horrible purposes, and a trade in direct violation of law, and demoralizing to the persons who, whether as sellers or buyers, conduct it, has sprung up.

I have now briefly traversed the ground on which this measure rests. I have argued it for the most part on the lower grounds of expediency, of past legislation, of professional opinion; but I cannot take my leave of it without reminding your Lordships that there is a yet higher law of religion and morality under which it falls—a law which neither individuals nor nations can disregard without paying a heavy penalty. If, indeed, Christianity recognizes one vice as specially worthy of abhorrence it is cruelty for its own sake, and if religion, through successive generations, has set the crown on one quality more than another it has been on the great and absorbing virtue of sympathy—sympathy with man and woman, with freeman and slave, with child and animal. And ever since Christianity was founded, the stream as it ran has broadened with its course, down from its fountain head in the merciful precepts of the Old Bible Law through mediæval saint and reformer, through poet, and painter, through writer and artist, until it distinctly and unequivocally embraced the animal world and took a legislative form, rebuking the oppressor, giving protection to the helpless, and, like all good works, bringing a reward with it in the gentler nurture of children, and the kindlier sympathy between man and man. In England we have never been quite dull to this appeal; our merciful legislation on this subject has been earlier than that of other nations, and it is now simply desired that this legislation should be carried one legitimate step further. I remember some years ago seeing in one of the darkest parts of this great town a reformatory into which were gathered the degraded and outcasts of society. And when I noticed in every room the presence of flowers and tame animals, I was told by the excellent manager of the institution that it was by fostering the love alike of animals and flowers, when other sympathies were dead, that the first gleam of a better feeling arose among the inmates. And in truth this love of animals does insensibly link itself on to a whole sphere of love and religion. All will remember the famous words of the poet—

“ He prayeth best who loveth best Both man, and bird, and beast ; ” and I may also remind some here present of a passage in a delightful book written by Sir Humphrey Davy in the sunset of his life, and tinged with the sober colours of his mature intellect—a philosopher who is not unworthy to be set by the side of the ablest of modern men of science—where he says—“ I was in my early youth a sceptic, and it was by considering the qualities and properties of animals that I first learnt to believe.” It may, perhaps, be said that the misery around us which can be relieved is only a drop in the ocean. But that is a specious argument, which if it were admitted might be made a plea for every wrong and injustice. The world is doubtless full of suffering and wrong, and it is as impossible to prevent the one as it is to redress the other; yet this is no reason for acquiescing tamely in every form of evil and abuse; and amidst the highest questions of public policy it is something to devote one chapter of our domestic legislation to such an object as the present, to raise the standard of public thought, to relieve one fraction of the misery around us, and to reconcile the high laws of modern science with the still higher laws of morality and religion.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a.
—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he would admit that the Government took a wise course in appointing a Commission, and that the Report of the Commissioners did them great credit; but he could not help thinking that the Report went a little beyond the legitimate conclusions of the evidence, and the Bill a little beyond the Report. There was no definition of "animals" in the Bill; it seemed to take in every animal, from the elephant downwards to the smallest insect ever put under the microscope, and no form of animal life was to be experimented on under the Bill. He thought there ought to be some definition, and that the animals to which the provisions of the Bill were to extend should be put into a Schedule. He quite agreed that there should be no public exhibition of experiments on animals. Then the Bill created a new definition of "cruelty," and the offence under the Bill was described as "subjecting animals to experiments for scientific purposes." But animals might still be subject to pain inflicted for no purpose of science. He would undertake to say that one of their Lordships in a good day's rabbit shooting would inflict more pain than scientific men in a whole year of physiological experiments. Notwithstanding all that had been said, it was unfortunately the fact that pain was daily inflicted upon animals for purposes of amusement, curiosity, and vanity. Birds were killed that they might be worn on the top of ladies' bonnets; they ransacked the Arctic regions for their seal-skins, and India for their ornaments; and then we were told they were so humane that they could not bear the idea of inflicting pain upon animals. Horses, in 99 cases in 100, were subjected to cruel and painful operations—would those operations come within the Bill? The "firing" of horses was a cruel operation, yet it was never attempted to administer anæsthetics during its performance. Again, was there no cruelty witnessed at the Zoological Gardens, in which they put a rabbit into the den of the boa constrictor? It was a security that at present these scientific experiments were usually performed in a laboratory and in the presence of other scientific men; but what he was afraid of was that the effect of the Bill might be to increase those performances in private houses which they wished to prevent. It was all very well to refer to the example of the Anatomy Act. If the body of a man were taken to a Professor for anatomical purposes, it would be known; but who could tell when a scientific man carried home a frog for his experiments?—and it was usually a frog upon which these experiments were tried. It would be almost impossible to prevent experiments, and it was better they should be performed in a laboratory, where a certain number of men might see them. Another difficulty had been alluded to by one of the medical men, who said—

"When a surgeon cannot try experiments on animals he will probably try experiments on his patients."

That was not a very agreeable prospect! A late President of the College of Surgeons said that surgeons sometimes abused their opportunities; and he instanced the case of a surgeon who was in the habit of pausing over a splendid operation, while he was expatiating on the brilliancy of the performance. If it were true that, if experiments were not made on animals, surgeons would experiment on man, they would, of course, make experiments on their patients, and it was probable that such experiments would be made on the poor in the hospitals rather than on the rich. He objected to Clause 3, which said that—

"The experiment must be performed with a view only to the advancement by new discovery of knowledge which will be useful for saving or prolonging human life or alleviating human suffering."

And that it must be performed in a registered place, and by a person duly licensed. There ought to be security enough in requiring the performer to hold a licence; at all events, it was totally impossible to say what the effect of an experiment might be. It was a common practice, if anyone was suspected of having been poisoned by a pudding, to give some of the pudding to a dog; but under this Bill that could not be done; the persons interested in the discovery might eat the pudding themselves, but they must not give it to a dog. He did not like the character of the certificate that was to be required by an operator. One of the signatories was to be the President of the Royal Society; but the President of that Society might chance to be an astronomer or a botanist, and know nothing of physiology. There seemed to be something suggestive of trade unionism in naming the Presidents of the Royal Colleges of Surgeons and of Physicians of London, Edinburgh, or Dublin; for a man might be unknown to any one of them, and yet be a very clever physiologist, and because they happened to know nothing about him he might be unable to get a licence. Important discoveries were often made by comparatively unknown men rather than by the most prominent physicians and surgeons, and yet such students were to be prevented from prosecuting their researches. He would enforce the use of anæsthetics where it was possible to use them; but in many cases it was not possible. In the case of a poison, an antidote, a new medicine, or an inoculation, you could not resort to the use of an anæsthetic, because it would defeat your object, which was to see the actual operation of the specific under natural conditions. It was said that vaccination had saved more lives than were destroyed by the wars of Napoleon, and vaccination was arrived at by experiments on animals. He was sorry to see some doubts thrown on the value of vaccination by an eminent public man within the last few days, because he believed it had been a great blessing to the world. While assenting to the principle of the Bill, he feared its provisions would go too far to prevent original research, and he therefore trusted it would be well considered and amended in Committee. The object of physiology was to prolong human life and mitigate human suffering. It was necessary that experiments should be performed on animals, and he trusted we should be careful to preserve and maintain the opportunities of performing them. Many discoveries were made almost by accident; the value of chloroform, for instance, was discovered by distilling red ants, which certainly inflicted pain upon animals; and it was not desirable that the possibility of such accidental discoveries should be diminished by too restrictive legislation.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the Bill did not go as far as could be wished, but, nevertheless, he desired to thank the Government for bringing it in. The excitement throughout the country was very great, as was shown by the Petitions that had been addressed to Parliament; and they would have been more numerous and forcible if the people had not believed that the Government would legislate on the Report of the Commission. To show the strength of the feeling which he believed predominated in the country, he would quote the language of one Petition, which was as follows:—

“That your Petitioners, feeling that cruel experiments are on no grounds justifiable, hereby humbly entreat your Honourable House to legislate for the total abolition and utter suppression of what is termed ‘vivisection,’ or the cutting-up of living creatures, or otherwise torturing them, or putting them to death by torture, under any scientific pretext whatsoever. Perpetrators of these atrocities allege that they physically benefit mankind, though competent authorities deny the assertion. But, even if it were so, no physical gain can possibly equal the injury caused by the moral degradation of the feelings which such barbarous experiments must naturally induce.”

The supporters of the Government measure would, he feared, be misrepresented, or, at least, misunderstood, for it could not be denied that the feeling of the country was in favour of total abolition; but, knowing the difficulties which surrounded the question, he was prepared to accept the Bill, which only imposed restrictions; and he did it upon this ground—that while he believed restriction might be effective, he feared that abolition would be a dead letter. Now, if it had been difficult to obtain evidence before the Royal Commission for information, how much more difficult would it be to obtain evidence for a prosecution when all the men of science were opposed to the measure. All sorts of arguments were urged against interference, but he had heard none so groundless as those of the noble Duke. Field-sports might be justifiable or unjustifiable, though he had nothing to do with such sports. The argument was not applicable to him. He never hunted a fox in his life; many years ago he hunted a hare, and he then determined from that time never to do so again. But he would not go into the question of field-sports at all. They were beside the question. One evil, supposing this to be an evil, did not palliate another. Was it not permitted to abate suffering, though it could not be extinguished altogether? Common sense drew a distinction between them and prolonged deliberate mutilation, the submitting of animals to torture from hour to hour and month to month. The argument derived from field-sports was, if good at all, good only against those who hunted, and it was no argument whatever to the mass of the people of these lands who never hunted, and who yet were the Petitioners that demanded these prohibitions. But, if the amusements of the fine folk of England were to be quoted as reasons why there should be no restriction on vivisection, let those amusements be contrasted with the amusements of the vivisectors, with that continuous excitement of morbid curiosity which found its employment and recreation in ingenious and prolonged suffering. M. Brachet, an eminent French physician under Charles X. and Louis Philippe, who obtained the physiological prize from the Institute, narrated the following experiment:—

"I inspired a dog," he begged noble Lords to observe the rich language of science, "I inspired a dog with the greatest aversion for me by plaguing and inflicting some pain or other upon it as often as I saw it."

Here was a precious pursuit of knowledge!—

"When this feeling was carried to its height, so that the animal became furious as soon as it saw or heard me, I put out its eyes; I could then appear before it without its manifesting any aversion."

What a discovery!—

"I spoke, and immediately its barkings and furious movements proved the passion which animated it. I destroyed the drum of its ears, and disorganized the internal ear as much as I could."

This was the language of absolute relish—

"When an intense inflammation which was excited had rendered it deaf, I filled up its ears with wax. It could no longer hear at all. Then I went to its side, spoke aloud, and even caressed it, without its falling into a rage; it seemed even sensible to my caresses."

What a heart the man must have had! It was thought necessary to repeat this experiment, in order that there might be no uncertainty in the result—

"And what," observes Dr. Elliotson, who criticized the case, "was all this to prove? Simply that if one brute has an aversion to another it does not feel or show that aversion when it has no means of knowing that the other brute is present. If he had stood near the dog on the other side of a wall, he might have equally proved what common sense required not to be proved. I blush for human nature in detailing this experiment."

Dr. Elliotson wrote well. Why did not every man blush who heard of it? And here let the amusements of the French physiologist be compared with that of a day's fox-hunting! It might be said this was a foreign practice; but what was the testimony of Sir William Fergusson, that great and eminent surgeon? He said—

"The impression on my mind is that these experiments are done very frequently in a most reckless manner."

He added—

"I will give you an illustration of an animal being crucified for several days, perhaps; introduced several times into a lecture room for the class to see how the experiment was going on."

What was this but sheer amusement? Could science have gained, by a cold-blooded, systematic, cruelty such as this, one hair's breadth of knowledge for the use of mankind? This, perhaps, was gained; a proof was gained of what men can bring themselves to do when science is degraded to a wretched monomania. Sir William was asked if he believed that much of this was going on, and his answer was—"I believe a great deal of reckless mutilation is going on among students in private houses." Well, all sorts of objections had been urged, heavy and light. Seal skins, it was stated, were obtained by reckless means. Now, first, an effort had been made by law to appoint proper seasons for the seal-fishing; and, secondly, this argument was effective only against those who wore that kind of fur, and not against the millions who, dressing in cotton and woollens, demanded that animals should be protected. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) in a controversy he had with a distinguished man—an eminent surgeon—when he was urging on him the necessity of moderation and care in physiological experimentation, received for reply, that he must look at home and ask himself if he did not indulge in paté de foie gras (pie of geese with livers artificially diseased). Why, he, and the masses who sympathized with him, had never tasted paté de foie gras in their lives, and probably never should taste it. All he could say was, paté de foie gras brought its own punishment with it—being as indigestible as it was wicked. Now, this evil of vivisection was extended over the whole of Europe, and was beginning to be very rife in this country. Dr. Haughton, on this point, fully confirmed the testimony of Sir William Fergusson, and stated—

“I believe that a large proportion of the experiments now performed upon animals in England, Scotland, and Ireland are unnecessary and clumsy repetitions of well-known results; that young physiologists in England learn German and read experiments in German journals, and repeat them then in this country. There is a good deal of that second-rate sort of physiological practice going on,” all of which their Lordships might believe was as useless as it was atrocious. Now, if vivisection had been exhibited to their Lordships for the first time, all would have shrunk from it with abhorrence; but now, suddenly, they were confronted with a long-established system; and they had to deal with the arguments and facts of learned men of very various dispositions. Vivisection was urged as a grand necessity for the prolongation of human life and the alleviation of human suffering. Doubtless, there were many and great names in favour of the practice, but there were also great names who questioned the necessity, and hesitated to believe that any real good had resulted at all in proportion to the thousands of hecatombs of animals that had been slaughtered and tortured in this terrible pursuit of science. Sir William Fergusson observed that—

“Mr. Syme lived to express an abhorrence of such operations, at all events, if they were not useful. . . . His ultimate authority was strongly on the other side, as expressed in a special report of his own. . . . No man, perhaps, said Sir William, has ever had more experience on the human subject than Mr. Syme . . . and I myself have a strong opinion that such an expression, coming from Mr. Syme, was a mature and valuable opinion.”

When asked whether his own opinion in mature life was much less favourable to these experiments than when he was young—

“Yes,” he replied, “because I had not the same grasp of the subject at that time. I was more, perhaps, influenced by what other people had done and by the wish to come up to what they had done in regard to such matters, but the more mature judgment of recent years has led me to say to myself now that I would not perform some of the operations at this present time that I performed myself in earlier days.”

This was of weight. Professor Rolleston stated—

“Haller fell in his later age into a permanent anguish of conscience, which is shown in his epistles, reproaching himself most bitterly for his vivisection. These are Krug's words. . . . I think I may say this (but I shall not give the name), that it is within my own personal experience that a person who has a considerable name before the world, and has performed a large number of vivisections in his time, has expressed himself to me as exceedingly sorry that he ever did them—did them, I should say, to the extent to which he did.”

To these might be added the names of Dr. Child, Dr. Crisp, and others. But further. In the life of that accomplished man, Sir Charles Bell, was to be found this passage—

“In his study of the system of circulation, as in that of the nerves, Charles Bell was necessarily compelled to make more than one experiment in comparative anatomy; but he abstained as much as possible from torturing animals, which he considered, in most cases, a useless act of cruelty, less certain in result than was commonly supposed, and less profitable than an attentive study of pathological phenomena, because vivisection not only alters the substance of the mutilated organs, but disturbs, more or less profoundly, the natural condition of life, and excites, through pain, irregular motions differing from those expected or previously observed, &c.”

Why, this passage was almost an answer to the whole inquiry; not only did he avoid torture, so far as he could, but he considered the study of pathology superior to the practice of vivisection. But here was, no doubt, the difference in the minds of the experimentalists; pathology was long, and vivisection was short; study a bore, but action an amusement—

“Sir Charles admitted that his own opinion was not the opinion of some of the best and most virtuous men he had ever known, but that for his own part he could never convince himself either by the experiments he witnessed or by any of those related to him.”

What a testimony from such a man! But he wished particularly to call their Lordships' attention to a letter written by Sir Charles Bell himself—

“I should be writing,” he said, “a third paper on the nerves, but I cannot proceed with—out making some experiments, which are so unpleasant to make that I defer them. You may think me silly," would their Lordships mark these words?—

"but I cannot perfectly convince myself that I am authorized in nature or religion to do these cruelties :"

would they pause here for a minute? Sir Charles proceeded, and—

"for what?" he said. "For anything else than a little egotism or self-aggrandizement; and yet, what are my experiments in comparison with those which are daily done, and are done daily for nothing?"

Their Lordships might be assured that the people of England rested their hatred, no lighter term could be used, of this terrible system on the grounds suggested by Sir Charles Bell. It was with many of them not simply a matter of feeling, it was one of religion. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) did not believe that it could be eradicated; he hardly believed that it could be partially subdued. A violent unqualified opposition to their wishes might bring on such expressions of sentiment as would end in the most coercive measures, and the formation of a public opinion, hostile alike to science and to scientific men personally, in the matter of vivisection. But this Bill did not demand the solution of the difficulty whether vivisection were really necessary or not; it went only to the extent to which the men of science would go in limitation of an acknowledged evil. Now his noble Friend had stated facts. He would add one or two. It was impossible to describe the feelings they excited. The narrator in this instance was M. Bouillaud, a man of high scientific name, and one of the most conspicuous physicians in the Medical School of Paris. The account of the eleventh experiment began thus—

"I made an opening on each side of the forehead of a young dog, and forced a red hot iron into each of the anterior lobes of the brain"— would their Lordships observe the light jaunty way in which he relates his chamber sport?—

"Immediately afterwards, the animal, after howling violently, lay down as if to sleep. On urging it, it walked or even ran for a considerable space; it did not know how to avoid obstacles placed in its way, and on encountering them groaned, or even howled violently. Deprived of the knowledge of external objects, it no longer made any movements either to avoid or approach them."

As if common sense would not have taught this to any one—

"But it still could perform such motions as are called instinctive. It withdrew its feet when they were pinched, and shook itself when water was poured upon it. It turned incessantly in the cage as if to get out, and became impatient of the restraint thus imposed."

After noting many revolting details, he said—

"It slept occasionally for a short time, and on awakening began its mournful cries. We tried to keep it quiet by beating it, but it only cried more loudly. It did not understand the lesson; it was incorrigible."

What stuff! to say nothing of his feelings; was the man in his senses? Some days elapsed, and the journal continued—

"Its fore legs are now half paralyzed in walking, or rather in dragging itself along; it rests upon the back of its foot, bent upon the leg. No change has taken place in respect to his intellectual power; as its irrepressible cries disturbed the neighbourhood I was obliged to kill it."

Here the atrocious prolongation of torture should be noted. This gentleman was insatiable; he presented another rich experiment, rich in showing what men can do and what animals must submit to. Another young dog, so went the narrative, that had been exposed to similar suffering from having had "the cranium and cerebral hemispheres sawed transversely," escaped from its torturer by a comparatively easy death—

"To prevent its plaintive cries disturbing my neighbours"—what humane consideration!—"I enveloped it in a thick sack. On examining some time afterwards, I found that it had died from suffocation."

Another dog was selected—

"Possessing the reputation of being lively, docile and intelligent."

The anterior part of its brain was transfixed on the 28th of June, and day after day, for several weeks, it was tortured in every possible way, and the effects recorded. After detailing the results, he said, on the 7th of July—

"When menaced it crouches, as if to implore mercy," could anything, except a demi-fiend, have felt or written in that way?—

"but it does not in consequence obey. It, on the contrary, utters cries which nothing can repress, similar to those of an uneducated dog, whose intellect is undeveloped."

What did their Lordships think the dog would have replied to the developed intellect of his torturer, could he have spoken? The very dumbness of the animals should be a powerful appeal on their behalf—

"I watched it attentively," he went on, "for the remainder of this and for the first 15 days of the succeeding month."

The ferocious prolongation of suffering should again be observed. But to sum up, in the words of Dr. Walker, let them listen to a choice category of experimental recreations—

"Forcing substances into the stomach of a dog after exposing the gullet, and tying it to prevent vomiting; opening the abdomen, tying a portion of the small intestine in two places, opening the intermediate portion, and injecting a noxious fluid into it; starving rabbits till they would eat dead frogs; forcing boiling water into a dog's stomach; boiling frogs; starving pigeons till they dropped from their perches, and then cutting off their anterior or posterior extremities to show that this caused death when the organism was exhausted from want of food."

Did man, from all this, walk in greater honour and greater security? and was it not now clear to their Lordships that they ought to do something to put a check upon such wild, wanton, and superfluous, cruelties. Now let them hear Dr. Acland, a very eminent physician—what did he say?—

"The number of persons in this and other countries who are becoming biologists without being medical men is very much increasing. Modern civilization seems to be set upon acquiring almost universally what is called biological knowledge, and one of the consequences of this is, that whereas medical men are constantly engaged in the study of anatomy and physiology for a humane purpose—that is, for the purpose of doing immediate good to mankind—there are a number of persons now who are engaged in the pursuit of these subjects for the purpose of acquiring abstract knowledge. That is quite a different thing. I am not at all sure that the mere acquisition of knowledge is not a thing having some dangerous and mischievous tendencies in it."

That very striking and most true observation deserved serious attention—

"Now it has become a profession," he continued, "to discover, and to discover at any cost."

Mr. G. H. Lewes said—

The Earl of Shaftesbury

"One man discovers a fact or publishes an experiment, and instantly, all over Europe, certain people set to work to repeat it. They will repeat it, and repeat it, and repeat it."

Mr. Lewes was right. Unless checked, they would repeat any amount of cruelty without the slightest addition of knowledge. Dr. Haughton said—

"I would shrink with horror from accustoming without foresight or forethought, large classes of young men to the sight of animals under vivisection. I believe that many of them would become cruel and hardened, and would go away and repeat these experiments recklessly. Science would gain nothing, and the world would have let loose upon it a set of young devils."

Was not, he asked their Lordships, the great rush of them already begun? Dr. Anthony, another high testimony—

"Knew himself of instances of young men, from mere curiosity, carrying on these experiments. Could mention them, but I should scarcely like to do so. . . . No anaesthetics are used to diminish the pain of the creature."

Of course not, it would be too much trouble. Respecting demonstrations by professors to students, Dr. Anthony said—

"I believe the more you keep the scenic element away the better. . . . The reason. . . . is the existence of morbid curiosity. There is a morbid curiosity which is known to medical men well with reference to operations of all kinds."

That was just what had been asserted all along—

"There are a certain number of persons who are very fond of coming to see the different operations at the hospitals. I look upon that, and particularly upon the desire of seeing these experiments on animals, as something very, very morbid indeed."

Could anything, he asked their Lordships, be more illustrative than the written statement put in by Mr. James B. Mills?—

"Observing from the daily papers that Mr. Ernest Hart alleges that students do not perform experiments on living animals as an exercise in the prosecution of their studies, I beg to forward to you a summary of my experience in that respect during my College career at Edinburgh. I am a veterinary surgeon, and I feel it my duty to aid your Society in repressing unnecessary experimentation; surveying the past as I do with much regret, so far as I have participated in the practices which I am now compelled to condemn. At Edinburgh the veterinary students and the medical students frequently associate for pleasure and for study. The experiments were certainly never designed to discover any new fact, or elucidate any obscure phenomena, but simply to demonstrate the most ordinary facts of physiology. Our victims were sometimes dogs, but more frequently cats. Many of the latter were caught by means of a poisoned bait, the animals being secured whilst suffering from the agonies caused by the poison, when antidotes were applied for their restoration. They were then imprisoned in a cupboard at the students' lodgings, and kept there until a meeting could be arranged. Sometimes the students secured their victims by what is known as a cat hunt—that is, a raid on cats by students armed with sticks late at night. I am not prepared to say that the object of the students was to commit cruelty, or that there was any morbid desire to witness pain, but I say emphatically that there was no other motive than idle curiosity and heedless, reckless love of experimentation. What, for instance, could justify the following experiment, performed for the purpose of witnessing the action of a cat's heart? The operator first of all made an incision through the skin of the animal's chest, extending from the neck to the belly. The skin was then laid back by hooks, in order to enable the operator to cut through the cartilage of the breast-bone, and to draw his knife across the ribs for the purpose of nicking them. This process is necessary to enable him to snap the ribs and lay the fractured parts back, which also are secured with hooks. It is needless to say that such operation is a most cruel one; but it is only one of several others performed at Edinburgh. Now, the action of the heart is well known, and is one of the first things taught to students of physiology, and can be taught as well without experimentation as with. In a few cases the animals were narcotized, when no suffering was caused either in the process of poisoning or in the after experimentations."

The repetition, then, their Lordships would see, was for diversion, not for knowledge.

"The securing an animal for an operation like the above requires experience and care, and it is fearful to witness the struggles of the animal while this is being done. I desire to exonerate the Professors from any participation in the experiments performed by students, which were conducted at the private lodgings of students, when none but students were present."

On cross-examination, Mr. Mills confirmed these statements. He said—

"The experiments" (made chiefly on cats and dogs) "had no other motive than idle curiosity and reckless love of experimentation."

All the students (a class of 70 or 80) assisted more or less at these useless experiments. They were sometimes done in public in the yard of the college—

"The habit of doing such things is sure to go on unless a stop is put to it."

He referred to a special case which occurred last winter session. A horse was bought for the purpose of dissection.

This animal was subjected during a whole week to various operations, such as tenotomy and neurotomy, &c. The operations were "very painful." No anæsthetics of any kind were given. The experiments were made "all over the animal." Edinburgh, it was clear, would soon be a match for Paris in competitive examinations on animal torture.

"A dog, too, which was first half poisoned and then restored by an antidote, received 'brutal usage.' The brains were knocked out by a hammer."

The story of the horse was subsequently confirmed by Principal Williams. Dr. Scott, also, might be heard on the easy indifference of these lovers of scientific truth. After describing how he ceased to attend the physiological lectures in Edinburgh on account of the cruelty he witnessed, he said that—

"It did not provoke the slightest symptoms of abhorrence among those who witnessed it." He "never knew an operation cause the least abhorrence to a medical student."

Vivisection, he believed, went on among students in their own rooms. But few things had alarmed him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) more than something he saw lately in the text book of the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education, a book entitled Lessons in Elementary Physiology, by Thomas Huxley, LL.D., F.R.S. Had he not seen it he could hardly have believed it possible, strange and numerous as were the novel things that sprang up every day. In the preface to the first edition, Professor Huxley said—

"The following 'Lessons in Elementary Physiology' are primarily intended to serve the purpose of a text book for teachers and learners in boys' and girls' schools."

In the next place, it was strongly insisted—

"that such experiments as those subjoined shall not merely be studied in the manual, but actually repeated, either by the 'boys and girls' themselves, or else by the teacher in their presence, as plainly appears from the preface to the second edition. There it was said, 'the knowledge' which is 'attainable by mere reading, though infinitely better than ignorance,' yet loses 'almost its whole worth as an intellectual discipline' to those who seek it only in books. Where then could it be sought but in the living animal?"

And the last phrase showed it by asserting the necessity of the knowledge "arising from direct contact with fact." But, that there might be no doubt, he asked their Lordships' attention to the passage in the ninth edition, page 52—

"If in a rabbit," the Professor stated, "the sympathetic nerve which sends branches to the vessels of the head is cut, the ear of the rabbit . . . at once blushes . . . To produce pallor and cold in the rabbit's ear, it is only necessary to irritate the cut end of the sympathetic."

It was manifest that the incision to make the ear of the rabbit blush must be on the living, and not on the dead, animal. And was that the way, he asked, to bring up children? Was that the progress we had made in the 19th century? From ignorance, perhaps, the tendency of children was to be cruel, and who did not know the necessity of daily rebuke to check that propensity? But under this unprecedented scheme of intellectual training they were to be accustomed, from their earliest years, not only to witness, but to inflict, agonies of pain on the poor helpless creatures they should be taught to love and protect. Sir Astley Cooper must have been brought up after this fashion. In his life by his nephew, Bransby Cooper, we read the following story:—

"During this time, Astley, who was always eager to add to our anatomical and physiological knowledge, made a variety of experiments on living animals. I recollect one day walking out with him, when a dog followed us and accompanied us home," mark this—the dog is taught by nature to confide in man, "little foreseeing the fate that awaited him. He was confined for a few days, till we had ascertained that no owner would come to claim him, and then brought up to be the subject of various operations. The first of these was the tying one of the femoral arteries. When poor," mark the pity, "poor Chance, for so we appropriately named the dog, was sufficiently recovered from this," mark the brutality of that tender care, to cure him for further suffering, "one of the humeral arteries was subjected to a similar process. After the lapse of a few weeks the ill-fated animal was killed, the vessels injected, and preparations were made from each of the limbs. It appears," the biographer continued, "that the dogs sacrificed in my uncle's scientific researches were not unfrequently procured in this manner."

That was, as the biographer had stated elsewhere, by agents, who obtained the animals by every form of illicit art—

"Nothing but the objects which led to these delinquencies," added the historian, "could offer an excuse for such proceedings."

The Earl of Shaftesbury

And so they had there, as elsewhere the full indulgence of the precept, that the end justifies the means. But he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) must go further. He did not know whether their Lordships would hesitate to join him in believing that in such an ardent adoration of science, worshipped and pursued under the high pretext of the universal alleviation of human suffering, pursued for discoveries that were to raise man's intellect by perpetual progress, in this kind of knowledge, with an increasing relish for it; the step was very narrow between the vivisection of the animal and the vivisection of the human being. It had been so in old times; it might be so again. Dr. Macaulay, in his valuable work Plea for Mercy to Animals, said, that the system prevailed in the days of Celsus, in a time of refinement and what was termed high civilization—Celsus wrote with horror of the cruelties perpetrated on living men and living women. But the world was returning, he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) said, to many of the opinions of those earlier days; and why not, then, to their practices? This was no mere conjecture. It was to be recollected that Cheselden, one of the most distinguished surgeons of the last century, wishing to investigate a surgical question, had proposed to try the experiment on a criminal condemned to death, but the opposition which was manifested on this occasion prevented his desire being carried into effect. That was good; but people became familiar very soon with strange things often proposed; and science at that time had not then, as now, been deified. But something was dawning even in modern minds. The testimony of Dr. Rutherford gave cause for quietude—

"In your judgment," he was asked, "are operations of that description upon the dog to be taken as evidence of what the effect would be on a human being?"—"Certainly not; but merely as suggesting what the action would be, that is all. The experiment must also be tried upon men before a conclusion can be drawn."

Exactly so; and if in the fanatical authority of science, and the equally fanatical obedience to it, some conclusions were declared to be absolutely necessary, criminals, as heretofore, might be utilized for the purpose—For, though scientific men were no worse, they were no better, than other men, most of whom succumbed to temptation and opportunity. Professor Rolleston seemed to entertain a similar apprehension—

“With regard,” he said, “to all absorbing studies, that is the besetting sin of them and of original research, that they lift a man so entirely above the ordinary sphere of daily duty that it betrays him (in other lines of original research as well as this) into selfishness and unscrupulous neglect of duty;”

and he added the testimony of an eminent Professor. Mr. Skey, said he, wrote in his work—

“A man who has the reputation of a splendid operator is ever a just object of suspicion.”

No doubt, for opportunity to such men was almost irresistible. But these operations appeared to blunt the understanding in many as much as they hardened the heart. Some learned men had actually declared that animals were like puppets—they kicked, cried, and made a noise, but had no feeling whatever. Such was the attempted despotism of science over common sense. Others urged that animals were not to be pitied, because they had no foreknowledge of what was going to happen. But, if that was so, it was the best and most fearful argument he had ever heard, and one conducing to the issues just mentioned, for the vivisection of babies and idiots, for they would have no foreknowledge of the torture that awaited them. But the strongest part of the whole evidence to show the degradation of moral feeling was that of Dr. Klein, who was employed officially by the Medical Officer to the Privy Council. These were some of the questions put to him, and his answers to them—

“When you say that you only use anæsthetics for convenience’ sake, do you mean that you have no regard at all to the sufferings of the animals?”—“No regard at all.”

“Then for your own purposes you disregard entirely the question of the suffering of the animal in performing a painful experiment?”—“I do.”

“But, in regard to your proceedings as an investigator, you are prepared to acknowledge that you hold as entirely indifferent the sufferings of the animal which is subjected to your investigation?”—“Yes.”

What could surpass or even equal such philosophy as that? And finally, a gentleman, whom he would not name, bore testimony to the “kindness” of Dr.

Burdon Sanderson and Dr. Klein. When interrogated—

“Whether he did not think that the habit of regarding animals as a mere battery of vital forces on which particular results are to be studied, necessarily to a certain extent produces the effect of diminishing the sympathy with their sufferings?” he said “I think not. I do not know anywhere a kinder person than Dr. Burdon Sanderson.” “Or than Dr. Klein, for instance?” asked the Commission. “I have no reason,” said this gentleman, “to think otherwise of him.”

That opinion, from such a person as the gentleman he would not name, completed his (the Earl of Shaftesbury’s) conviction of the evil effects of those practices on a kind and generous nature. But to conclude, the subject was inexhaustible; it was impossible for him to compress within a small compass all the arguments that might be urged, and all the facts that might be adduced; but he was not pleading for total abolition, he was pleading only for mitigation of the system, and surely there was no wisdom in declaring that one evil should continue to exist because another could not be put down. Up to this point scientific men were with the advocates of restriction. England had prohibited bull-baiting, cock-fighting, prize-fighting, all of which had, in their day, no end of logic and sentiment in their favour; and why should she not hold her place among all the nations of the earth, and be the first to reduce, within the closest possible limits, the sufferings inflicted by man on the whole animal creation?

LORD HENNIKER said, he might, perhaps, be allowed to make a few remarks on the subject of vivisection, dealt with in the Bill before the House, as he had taken some interest in it, and last year brought in a Bill to deal with it. He readily withdrew the Bill on the appointment of a Royal Commission, and it would afford him much gratification if he could suppose that its introduction had in any degree tended to bring the question to an issue. He believed his Bill was all that public opinion would have sanctioned at the time; but during the last year a great advance had been made. The public had been roused to a sense of the real position of affairs by the unanimous Report of the Royal Commission, on which two well-known physiologists served. He believed also that the feeling on the subject was not confined to this country but was spreading to other countries. In Sweden and in America a movement against the practice of vivisection was on foot, and he believed that a Bill was actually in print in America, and its promoters were only waiting to see what action was taken in this country before introducing it to the Legislature. The Government deserved the thanks of all those who agreed with him in thinking that legislation was necessary, for bringing in this Bill. They had introduced a stronger measure than that he had himself ventured to bring forward last year, at the same time it was not of too stringent a character — too stringent legislation would be unwise. Perhaps those persons who wished to see the practice of vivisection absolutely prohibited might think the Bill did not go far enough, but he would venture to remind them that there was such a thing as going too far, and particularly in regard to a question of this kind—if it went too far it was almost certain to be evaded. They were not dealing with an uneducated class of men, but with the most cultivated and intellectual class, and he believed — whatever some physiologists, who acted on purely selfish motives, might feel—that the leading men among them would set the example by loyally carrying out any reasonable measure which might be passed; he believed also that public feeling would be against passing too strong a measure. The Bill of the Government should secure the support of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for it embodied many important suggestions made by that Society last year, with the exception of one—namely, that the use of curare should not be prohibited as an anæsthetic. He hoped there would be no modification of this clause, for, although the discovery was wonderful in itself, it was so terrible in its effects that its use ought not to be sanctioned. As to those who practised in physiological schools, no one, for a moment, wished to cast any sweeping condemnation upon them—they appeared willing to accept any reasonable measure. But it appeared to him that when fresh schools for scientific teaching were being established every day, and the taste for scientific research was increasing, the proper time had arrived for dealing with the question, so that all might know on what ground they stood; and he thought that the Bill introduced by the Government offered a fair basis of a settlement of this question.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he did not wish to enter into any discussion on the principle of the Bill, with respect to which their Lordships seemed to be practically agreed, but desired to point out that one of its provisions was much more stringent and sweeping than anything recommended in the Report of the Royal Commission. He referred to the sub-section of Clause 3, which would absolutely prohibit a class of experiments which, although they might give a certain amount of pain, were neither unimportant nor unnecessary, and which might be productive of great utility in dealing with the diseases of domestic animals such as cattle and sheep. During the time of the cattle plague numerous experiments were tried which proved unsuccessful; had this Bill then been in operation these experiments could not have been tried, and the result would have been a prohibition against experiments of any kind. It would be a strong thing to interfere with experiments for discovering the causes and remedies of diseases in cattle and sheep—especially as they were usually attended with very little pain and the diseases were becoming more widespread and severe than formerly. It appeared to him also that Clause 5, which absolutely prohibited experiments on dogs and cats, went considerably beyond the recommendations of the Commission, and ought not to stand in its present form. All were agreed that effectual provision should be made against the infliction of wanton cruelty, but care must be taken not to make restriction too stringent. He would propose an Amendment in Committee on the subject.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, no time should be lost in putting a stop to vivisection as it was now practised, for it had been stated, and the report had not been contradicted, that women carried lobsters and rabbits and other animals to vivisect them in girls' schools. Such education was only fit for the daughters of Danaus. The philosophers wished to introduce this study of anatomy into the elementary schools, whilst they excluded from them the Bible.

LORD WINMARLEIGH expressed, as a Member of the Royal Commission, his satisfaction at the way in which the Bill had been received by the House. But he wished to refer to a point that had been raised relative to the absolute exemption of two classes of animals—cats and dogs—from vivisection. He believed such a distinction was unnecessary. The Commissioners did not name those animals in their Report because they had confidence that efficient legislation would follow on their Report, and that, if it were properly carried out, neither dogs nor any other domestic animals would be subjected to anything like unnecessary cruelty. As to the objection made by the noble Earl who spoke last but one (the Earl of Shaftesbury), he would only say that he would find that the investigations to which he alluded might be carried out under another clause of the Bill. The noble Earl said it had been shown that Harvey had not discovered the circulation of the blood by vivisection; but Harvey's own words quoted in the Report, proved that this statement was incorrect. He preferred the evidence given before the Royal Commission by Professors and recognized authorities to the pamphlets and the statements which he saw in the public prints. The noble Earl doubted whether any benefits had been derived from vivisection. He (Lord Winmarleigh), on the contrary, was of opinion that many remedies for complaints could be traced to the practice. This Bill of the Government being based on the recommendations of the Commission, would receive the support, not only of the physiologists, but also of all reasonable anti-vivisectionists. The persons who took an ultra view of vivisection could not found their arguments on the evidence adduced before the Commission. They had been led to adopt exaggerated notions, which hitherto had carried too much weight in the country. Believing that the Bill would prevent all abuses, and fairly combined the views of physiologists and philanthropists, he should give it his cordial support.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL denied the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that the Report of the Commissioners had gone beyond the evidence, and in that view he was supported by Sir Thomas Watson, Sir George Burrows, Sir James Paget, Dr. Acland, and other eminent members of the medical profession. Men like Mr. Darwin, Professor Owen, Mr. Huxley, Sir William Fergusson, Dr. Taylor, and Professor Gamgee concurred in thinking that the practice of vivisection called for regulation by superior authority, and far from being afraid of the restrictions recommended by the Commission, would be willing supporters of any measure which did not go beyond its recommendations. We were passing through a scientific revival, and a great start was being given in this country to the practice of vivisection. Everything depended, therefore, whether we should seize the opportunity for wise legislation. If we controlled the system in its infancy we should have an advantage which might never occur again. In the Bill generally he had the greatest pleasure in concurring, reserving to himself the right of suggesting some Amendments in Committee in points where the Bill had gone beyond the views of the Royal Commission. It had been a painful duty on the part of the Commissioners to go into the horrible details connected with this subject; but if his noble Friend should be able to carry this Bill into law, they would be amply rewarded for their painful duties. The Government would do credit not only to themselves, but to the country if they were able to pass a measure of this kind on a subject which had interested the people of England from the Sovereign on the throne to the humblest of her subjects. The Crown and Parliament of this country would set an example to the civilized world by dealing with this subject in a manner which, as he believed, while it avoided any interference with the claims of science, would recognize the just claims of humanity.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS ACT—NORWICH AND BOSTON ELECTION COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with precedent, to recommend to Parliament legislative action, based upon the Reports of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of Corrupt Practices in the City of Norwich and the Borough of Boston?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had not time to communicate with the hon. and learned Attorney General or his Colleagues in reference to the action that ought to be taken upon the Reports of the Norwich and Boston Election Commissions, but he would make a statement on Thursday or Monday.

IRELAND—THE UPPER SHANNON—BALLYCONNELL CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the dilapidated condition of the Ballyconnell Canal, and of the various works connected with it; and if he can state who is responsible for the due application of the presentment annually raised for maintaining the Canal; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made as to why the swing bridge at Lanesborough has been allowed to remain for more than 12 months out of repair, and generally as to the bad state of the buoys and beacons on the Upper Shannon, with the view to having them put in proper repair?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: All the matters referred to in the hon. Member's Question are under the control of the Board of Works in Ireland, which is a department of the Treasury, and not responsible to the Irish Government. But I am informed by the Board of Works that steps are about to be taken to repair the Ballyconnell embankment; that the trustees who represent the counties of Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon are responsible for the due application of the presentment annually raised for maintaining the canal; that the swing-bridge at Lanesborough has been allowed to remain for some time out of repair because the small funds available for the repairs on the Upper Shannon navigation were more required for other works, but that it will be repaired this summer; and that the buoys and beacons on the Upper Shannon were much injured by last winter's floods, but have by this time been replaced.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—ATTENDANCE AT SCHOOLS—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in the half-year ending Christmas 1875, the number of children in average attendance at the voluntary schools of the Tower Hamlets and Marylebone Divisions of the London School Board did not show a decrease of 1,082 and 714 respectively, whilst in the same period the increase in the Board Schools amounted only to 716 and 128 respectively; what amount of accommodation has been provided by the London School Board in the Tower Hamlets Division; whether, in the half-year ending at Christmas 1875, there was not accommodation for 412,259 children in "efficient" schools in London, and whether the average attendance for the same period was not 288,497 only; whether, in spite of the compulsory bye-laws and the opening of several large Board Schools during the period above mentioned, the general result has not been a reduction in the average attendance of children in the voluntary schools of 5,310, whilst the increase in the Board Schools has only amounted to 6,774, leaving a nett increase for all the "efficient" schools in London (both voluntary and Board) of 1,464 only; and, how many schools were opened by the Board during the same period, and what was the amount of additional accommodation thus provided?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I have referred my hon. Friend's Question to the London School Board, and will now give him their reply. It is true that in the half-year ending Christmas, 1875, the number of children in average attendance at the voluntary schools in the Tower Hamlets and Marylebone divisions showed a decrease of 1,082 and 715 respectively, and that in the same period the increase in the Board schools in these divisions amounted only to 716, and 128 respectively. The London School Board has provided accommodation for 19,758 children in the Tower Hamlets division, of which accommodation for 955 children has been added during the half-year above mentioned. It is also true that in the half-year ending Christmas, 1875, there was accommodation for 412,259 children in efficient schools in London, and that the average attendance for the same period was 288,497. During the half-year ending Christmas, 1875, it is true that there has been a reduction in the average attendance of children in voluntary schools of 5,310, the increase in Board schools amounting only to 6,774, leaving a nett increase upon the efficient schools of London of 1,464. I am, however, bound, as a matter of justice to mention to the House that the School Board has informed me that the half-year which ended last Christmas was exceptionally bad, owing to the severity of the weather and the sickness which prevailed; also that the half-year which my hon. Friend has taken includes the holidays, and that the winter quarter is, as a rule, the worst for attendance. I must also mention that if you compare the last half-year which my hon. Friend has taken with the corresponding half of the preceding year, instead of comparing it with that ending in June, it will be found that in the Marylebone schools there was an increase in average attendance of 716 in the Board schools and 268 in the voluntary schools, and in the Tower Hamlets of 1,932 in the Board schools and 406 in the voluntary. In fairness, also, it should be added, as the question is a very important one, that the Board informs me that if you compare the average attendance for the whole of the metropolis between 1875 and 1871 the increase in the average attendance in Board schools has been 78,645, and in the voluntary schools 35,551.

THE EUROPEAN ASSURANCE SOCIETY ARBITRATION.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been directed to the judgments delivered on the third instant by the Court of Appeal of the High Court of Judicature, in two cases arising out of the affairs of the European Assurance Company, which had been decided by Lord Westbury, and wherein his judgments had been confirmed by Lord Romilly, but against which decisions appeals had been brought by the Official Liquidators; if any similar appeals are now pending, and if the Official Liquidators still receive the salary of £4,000 per annum; and, if so, whether the same rate of remuneration will be continued during the progress of the present arbitration; and, if any arrangement could be made by which the Arbitrator could sit from day to day, in order to expedite the progress of the business, instead of only occasionally, as at present?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the appeals referred to had been properly brought under the Act 38 & 39 Vict., c. 157, and that judgment had since been given upon them. He was unable to answer the remaining questions of the hon. and learned Gentleman, having no control over the Arbitration, and it not being part of his duty to ascertain the particulars referred to in the hon. and learned Member's Question.

PETITION OF MR. CHARLES HENWOOD. QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the honourable Member for Southwark (regarding previous postponements), Whether he now proposes to withdraw his Motion in reference to Mr. Henwood?

COLONEL BERESFORD: I beg to say, in reply to the Question put to me by the hon. Member for Hythe, that I am not one of those persons who, having "put his hand to the plough looketh back," and emphatically to assure him that from the moment I undertook to present Mr. Henwood's Petition for the consideration of this House, I have never halted nor faltered in my intention to bring the subject-matter of that Petition to a direct issue on the earliest day the Forms of the House will admit of my doing so. In fact, a Notice of Motion for a Select Committee stands in my name for Friday, June 9, and is No. 1 on the list, and I shall be glad if the hon. Member for Hythe will now join with me in an appeal to the hon. Member for Pembroke, who has expressed so much anxiety for the appointment of a Committee, but has taken no steps, that I am aware of, to secure it, to urge upon the Government the desirability of granting this Committee of Inquiry unopposed.

KOREA—PROPOSED TREATY.

QUESTION.

MR. PENDER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence received from Sir Harry Parkes, Her Majesty's Minister at Yeddo, on the subject of the Treaty lately concluded between the Japanese and Korean Governments; and, if instructions have been given to negotiate a Treaty on behalf of Great Britain with Korea?

MR. BOURKE: No instructions have as yet been given to negotiate a Treaty with Korea, but Her Majesty's Government are in communication with other Governments as to the course which it may be advisable to pursue. There will be no objection to lay on the Table Papers on the subject of the Treaty between Japan and Korea. I need hardly say that Her Majesty's Government would be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity for extending British trade in the East, but we know very little about the Koreans, and from the little we do know, it would appear that there is a strong aversion on their part to hold any communication with foreigners. The case is, therefore, one in which it is desirable to act cautiously, and, if possible, to act in concert with other Powers.

SIERRA LEONE — THE FINANCIAL POSITION.—QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that any of the Government officials at Sierra Leone have been informed that, in consequence of the financial condition of the Colony, their salaries cannot be paid in full for the present, but that such sums as may be possible will be paid them on account, until the finances of the Colony improve?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, he was not aware that the financial position of Sierra Leone was as sad as the hon. Member represented it to be, though there certainly was a deficit in the colonial revenue. That deficit arose mainly from a decrease in the amount of Customs duties, and this was one of the grievances which it had been proposed to remedy by the cession of territory to France. The latter scheme having been abandoned, it would now be the duty of the Government to look into the matter, with a view of relieving the colony from its financial difficulties.

NAVY — ENGINEER OFFICERS AND ENGINE-ROOM ARTIFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When he expects to be able to communicate to the House the scheme for the improvement of the present unsatisfactory position of the Engineer Officers and Engine-room Artificers of the Royal Navy?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he could only repeat what he had stated some time ago, that he could not promise to lay the scheme before the House very speedily, the matter being one of very considerable difficulty.

MR. GORST gave Notice that on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, he should call attention to the subject, and to the urgent necessity for taking steps to remedy the existing unsatisfactory state of things.

CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is his intention to advise Her Majesty to extend Her Royal mercy to the prisoners still suffering punishment for offences in breach of their allegiance to Her Majesty?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it will be convenient to the House, in reference to this Question, which to a certain extent comes forward periodically, that it should have a clear conception of the number of persons who are at present in the situation described by the hon. Gentleman, because I think that without they have that information it would be difficult for the House to comprehend the circumstances under which any Government thus appealed to is to arrive at a conclusion. At present I find that there are only 15 persons who can come under the description of which the hon. Gentleman has availed himself. There are two of those persons in prison for the crime of murder; they were convicted of murder, and the sentence of death was passed upon them, and that sentence was commuted to one of penal servitude for life. I refer to this fact because on a previous occasion, in a discussion in this House, the case was noticed as one in which the individuals in question were guilty of high treason, and it was urged that that being the case, it was not right to allude to the circumstances of murder connected with the particular incident, because the prisoners must be looked upon as political offenders, provided they were found guilty, either of high treason or of treason-felony. I find according to the record they were not found guilty of high treason or of treason-felony, but they were prosecuted for the crime of murder, and found guilty of murder; and, therefore, under these circumstances, I do not think that we should be justified in admitting that they are to be considered as political offenders. It appears, then, that of these 15 persons—omitting the two to whom I have adverted—there are six in prison in England. A case which has excited great attention is the case of Michael Davitt, who was convicted with another man named John Wilson. They were charged with treason-felony, with conspiring to depose the Queen, with levying war against the State, and with supplying arms to the Fenian organization, and they were both found guilty. Wilson was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment, Michael Davitt, his confederate, to 15 years' penal servitude. Now, it so happens that Wilson has worked out his time, whether entirely or with some of those attenuating conditions that attach now to almost every punishment I do not exactly know; but certainly he has served his time; and Davitt, who was sentenced to double the term, is still in prison. It is for the House to remember that the Judge, when he sentenced Davitt, respecting whom so many efforts of interposition are making, to double the period of servitude to the term passed upon the other offender, must have considered that there was in his crime very aggravating circumstances. Now, Wilson has just worked out his seven years, and it becomes necessary for those who are responsible for these matters to consider whether it is politic to permit a man who has been found guilty by a jury of very aggravated conduct to find himself equally free at the termination of half the period of his sentence with the comparatively harmless man whom the same authorities thought deserved a far lighter punishment. I think, however, that this is a question which society should not determine hastily, and which we ought to consider very deeply before we proceed to take action with regard to it. Then there is the case of Daly. Well, I have gone through these cases, and with the exception of these two, I find that the remainder in England are all military. There are three soldiers who are in prison in England for very aggravated cases, of knowledge of intended mutiny—knowledge of a conspiracy against the Queen, and not revealing it, and in their instances even taking an active part in the conspiracy. All the rest of the military convicts have been transported to Western Australia; and with regard to them, before I answered the Question of the hon. Gentleman I should have made myself acquainted with their exact and precise position. It is from no want of pains on my part that I have not succeeded in obtaining that information, for I should much like to know the exact condition of those persons. Two of them have, I understand, worked out their time, and are now free, and I cannot but believe, from something that has reached me at different times in regard to this matter, that those who are not free are in a position very different from that which is generally contemplated in this House as being connected with the condition of convicts in a state of penal servitude; and I would remind hon. Gentlemen that if pardons were offered to any individuals who had connected themselves with those disturbances in Ireland it is not highly improbable that conditions would be insisted upon in those pardons by which those receiving them would be compelled to absent themselves from this country. ["Hear, hear!"] That assent only proves that it may not be impossible that many of these convicts in Western Australia are, in fact, at this moment enjoying a state of existence that their Friends in this House are quite prepared they should accept, and by commencing, and perhaps pursuing, a life of some prosperity and comparatively little restraint, it is a question whether the attainment of the object desired by those Friends and the country would very much avail. I have thought it necessary to put these views on this subject before the House, and I will briefly recapitulate my remarks. There are only six of these Fenian prisoners imprisoned in England, and I doubt whether, except in England, any are enduring any hardship. Two of them are murderers. ["Oh, oh!"] They were convicted of murder, and I do not see the wisdom or charity of regarding them as political offenders. With regard to the case of Davitt, that, it is said, is a hard case, because his companion is free; but I beg to remind the House that in that instance his conduct was considered very aggravated, and that in justice to those who, like Wilson, have behaved with more moderation, though guilty of misdemeanour, it requires considerable hesitation before one interferes with the verdict of a Court of Justice. Then there are the cases of the three soldiers also imprisoned here, whose offences are of too grave a nature to allow them to be passed over. All the rest are military cases, and I would remind the House that since the question was mooted last year, and a Return moved for by an hon. Gentleman, two of these prisoners have become released in the natural course of the regulations, according to the punishment they were called upon to endure. Under these circumstances, the House will see that these are not cases to be decided in an off-hand manner, and, having indicated the principle which I think ought to govern any Minister in a case of this kind, I am bound to say that I am not prepared to advise Her Majesty to release the prisoners referred to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. O'CONNOR POWER begged to move the Adjournment of the House, in order to record his protest against the decision which the Government had arrived at upon the subject. The announcement just made by the Prime Minister would, he believed, be received in Ireland with mingled feelings of surprise, regret, and indignation. He could not sympathize with the right hon. Gentleman in the hesitation which he had displayed in answering the Question of his hon. Friend. The memorial which they had presented bore the signatures of 138 Members of the House of Commons, who believed that the time had come when those prisoners might be released from their confinement; and he could not but express his condemnation of the policy of perpetuating political animosity by keeping the men in prison. He felt it his duty to protest against the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government of trampling, as they were in this instance, on fallen foes. It ought to be the policy of that Government to lay aside animosities in that struggle; and now, when Ireland was remarkable for peace and tranquillity, the opportunity might be taken for cementing the friendship which was growing up between the two countries by an act of clemency and generosity. It seemed to him that the appeal made by so many hon. Members ought to have more weight than it seemed to have had with the right hon. Gentleman, and especially at a time when the whole nation was rejoicing at the safe return of a Member of the Royal Family. He could only record his protest against the decision the Government had come to in the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. O'Connor Power.)

MR. ANDERSON: Lest it should be supposed that all hon. Members sitting below the Gangway on this side of the House entertain the same opinion as that expressed by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, I beg to say that I rise to record my cordial approbation of the statement which has been made to the House by the First Lord of the Treasury. Regarding the Petition, signed by 138 Members, to which the hon. Member for Mayo has referred, I may observe that very great pressure was put upon hon. Members to sign that requisition. I myself was asked no fewer than six times to sign it; and I know that other hon. Gentlemen were repeatedly asked. Moreover, statements were made to them which were not in accordance with the facts communicated to the House by the Prime Minister this evening. For my part I refused to sign the memorial unless a clause was introduced excepting from it the extension of mercy to those who had been found guilty of murder through being connected with the Fenian affair at Manchester or with the Clerkenwell outrage, and as that was not inserted, I persisted in my refusal. Many hon. Members on this side of the House refused in the same way; and I believe that a considerable number of those hon. Members who did sign the memorial signed it in ignorance of the fact that the clemency asked for was to be extended to the prisoners guilty of other crimes than that of breach of military allegiance. ["Name, name!"] I am not provided with names; but I have no doubt there are plenty of hon. Members who can endorse the statement I have made. If the right hon. Gentleman agrees, as I understand him to agree, to remit the sentences of those military men in Australia, under certain conditions of non-return to this country, I think he will do all that the House can expect of him.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought it right to say a few words in connection with that affair. It was a question which really concerned the honour of England more than that of Ireland. This question of the punishment of a few men might not seem a great matter; but if England were the great and powerful country that it ought to be, these things could not occur. It was generally supposed that the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces was one of those who had great objection to the remission of these sentences. That was not strange in a country which had entrusted the command of the Army to a German Prince not identified with England, and who could have no sympathy with either its interest or honour. It was not strange that this clemency asked for should not be granted by the Prime Minister, a Gentleman who had truckled last year to Prince Bismarck, and who was an alien in race and religion to the people of England. England had been brought so low that on a recent occasion, when the Eastern Question was raised, the three Emperors settled what they would do, and only then asked England whether or not she would agree. [Cries of "Question!"] That was the question; England's honour was involved, and if she was afraid to let some half-dozen poor Irishmen out of prison, it did not speak well for her.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had spoken of two of the prisoners as being murderers, meaning those who had been convicted at Manchester. He had also spoken of soldiers subject to imprisonment in Western Australia. He had also spoken of those military prisoners who were in prison in England, and whose military crime he was disposed to consider a greater one than that of those in Western Australia. He (Mr. Parnell) was speaking of Davitt and Wilson, found guilty of selling arms. With regard to the Manchester affair, he held in his hand a book called The Rights of American Citizens, which could be seen by any Member, as it was ordered by the United States Congress as a Return. It gave a report of the trial of Condon and Maloney at Manchester. If any hon. Member would take the trouble to read the evidence—if the right hon. Gentleman himself would take the trouble to read the book, he would see that the evidence against Condon was given in full, and he would find that there was not a particle of evidence to connect him with that murder. At the very outside his name was mentioned by three or four witnesses as having been in the crowd around the van. He was not mentioned as being near the van, except by one man who said a stone fell on Condon's head from the van; but he was attended by a surgeon who said the wound was not caused by a stone, but more likely by a policeman's bludgeon. As regarded Maloney, he was apprehended in London after the three men in Manchester were hanged. He was convicted upon his own statement to a fellow-workmen that he had been present at the attack on the van; but there were many men who knew that Maloney was no more at Manchester on the day of that business than he (Mr. Parnell) was. He was put on his trial and found guilty of murder, and sentenced to be hanged, but the sentence was afterwards commuted to penal servitude for life. There were many men who believed in their own hearts that neither Condon nor Maloney was guilty of that affair. He was sorry that the hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Tipperary (Mr. Stephen Moore) was not in his place that evening to stand up and say he believed that Condon was perfectly innocent of the crime of killing Sergeant Brett at Manchester. With regard to the military prisoners who were confined in Australia, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension when he represented to the House that they were in a better position in Australia than they would be in this country. He (Mr. Parnell) remembered that the late Mr. Ronayne, before he left London to go to Cork—and he was a man with special information on the subject—told him it was supposed that the convict establishments in Western Australia were about to be given up, and, as a consequence, the prisoners, if not released, would be sent to penal servitude in England, so that it would be additionally hard to those men, who had been enjoying some absence from penal restraints, should they be brought back and put in such convict prisons as Chatham or Dartmoor, and subjected to the rigour of English penal servitude. He threw out those hints in order that the right hon. Gentleman might inquire into the matter. With regard to the three prisoners who were now in prison in England, M'Carthy, Chambers, and another, M'Carthy was a brave soldier, who had fought, and fought well, for England in many parts of the world. Was it fair, after that man had had 10 years in penal servitude—10 years of discipline, which was given in order to effect reformation in the minds of thieves, murderers, and the worst of criminals—was it fair to keep the man in imprisonment any longer? With regard to Davitt, who was sentenced to 15 years' penal servitude by a Judge, he might say that the man who only got seven years was an Englishman; and he did not know how much effect Davitt's being an Irishman might have had with the Judge. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen might say "no, no," but it was very hard to be superior to prejudices on all occasions; and he had little doubt that when this man was sentenced to 15 years' penal servitude, the fact of his being an Irishman, and the fact of this occurring just after the Clerkenwell Explosion, and after the murder of Sergeant Brett, which created a great deal of feeling in the minds of the middle and upper classes of this country, had some influence in determining the sentence passed on him.

MR. CALLAN regretted that the Prime Minister—he had no doubt unwillingly—had felt himself compelled to refuse the prayer of the Petition in favour of the political prisoners. He gathered some hope, however, from the subdued cheers with which that announcement was greeted, so different in tone and intensity from the vindictive cheers which greeted a similar announcement two years ago, that the time would soon arrive when the appeal for mercy would be yielded to. He rose to repudiate, in his own name and the names of the hon. Members for Limerick and Mayo, and the noble Lord the Member for Clare, the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), that they had obtained signatures to the declaration laid before the Prime Minister on false pretences. He repudiated with the most thorough contempt which the usages of Parliament allowed the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow. The language of the hon. Member was insolent to the House and unbecoming the position of a Member of Parliament. There were attached to that Petition the names of 138 Members. When the hon. Member made the charge of false pretences he should have proved it, and he (Mr. Callan) called upon the hon. Member either to give the names of the Members who had obtained signatures to the Petition under false pretences, or to withdraw the charge.

MR. ANDERSON: I did not use the words false pretences.

MR. CALLAN: I took down the words of the hon. Member at the time they were used, and they were "false pretences." ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the hon. Member for Glasgow has disavowed the use of those words.

MR. CALLAN accepted the disavowal. He himself went to Members of Parliament whose signatures he was anxious to obtain. He went to the noble Lord the Member for Northumberland and the noble Lord the Member for Calne and took them to the Library and directed their attention to the offences for which those men were detained.

MR. M. BROOKS desired to express his extreme regret that he had asked the Question that day; in the first place, because it had provoked a reply which would keep alive a sore in Ireland which her well-wishers would desire to see healed; and secondly, because it had provoked a scene and language from hon. Gentlemen which he was sorry to have any part in bringing about. He disavowed any sympathy with the words of the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Biggar), and he (Mr. Brooks) believed that he would speedily regret that he had been led to make use of them. He would on an occasion which would not be remote give the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister an opportunity of replying to that part of the question which concerned the Royal mercy. In Ireland it was believed that justice had been vindicated by the long imprisonment that had been endured by these men, and that the time had come when the Prime Minister could no longer say that mercy could fairly or with justice be withheld from them.

MR. BRIGGS, as one of the Members who signed the Petition, desired to repudiate, as far as in him lay, that he could for a moment have solicited pardon for those who had been concerned in murder. He perfectly recollected asking the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who asked him to sign the Petition, whether it included those men who were concerned in the affair at Manchester or in the affair at Clerkenwell. The hon. Member replied that it was solely intended for the purpose of obtaining the release of those who were concerned in purely political offences.

MR. STACPOOLE appealed to the Prime Minister to give a favourable consideration to the Memorial which had been signed by so many hon. Members. He believed that an amnesty for the political prisoners would do much good by calming the feeling of irritation which still prevailed in Ireland.

MR. WADDY said, he rose with great regret and some feeling of shame to say that he also was one of those hon. Members who signed the Petition. He could give his support to the statements of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Briggs). When an application was made to him to sign the Petition, he put the question twice distinctly whether it was intended to include and did include men who had shed blood. He was distinctly told that it did not include those who had been convicted of shedding blood at all, and had that assurance not been given his name would never have been put to that Petition. Having heard that day what had been stated by the First Lord of the Treasury, he (Mr. Waddy) was perfectly and entirely satisfied with the statement which had been made. Moreover, considering the temper and language of some hon. Members who had spoken upon the subject, he felt very strongly that it would be dangerous to let forth from their confinement men who were likely to be worked upon by persons in a superior position, but with so little command over their own temper and judgment as to use such language as had been unfortunately heard that evening.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he rose on a point of Order, and he desired to explain that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs) had not accurately represented the scope of his reply in regard to the declaration which he was asked to sign. He (Mr. Power) stated that it did not necessarily call for the release of those who were engaged in the Manchester outrage, and it left upon the Government the responsibility of drawing a line between the different classes of prisoners. ["Oh, oh!"] He recollected very well what he said. The declaration left to the Government the responsibility of drawing a line between those prisoners who had been convicted for offences that were political and those that were non-political. It appeared from the tone of the Prime Minister's observations that he desired to convey the impression that the prisoners still confined were not suffering very severe treatment. He would give the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary an opportunity of bringing the question to the test of examination by calling attention to the subject in the House. As his only object in moving the adjournment of the House was to get an expression of opinion, he was ready to withdraw the Motion.

MR. BUTT said, that after the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) he could not but think that his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo acted perfectly right in raising the discussion, although there was some inconvenience in discussing how these prisoners should be treated upon a mere question of adjournment. He could not quite concur in the statement that had been made with respect to the Manchester prisoners. He believed there had been no subject in England which had been more misunderstood than the case of those prisoners. Technically, it was undoubtedly a conviction for murder. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen who laughed would not do so, if they had the slightest conception of the nature of the English law on that subject. They were convicted without the slightest proof that they went there for the purpose of bloodshed. They were convicted on the well-known principle of English law that if a number of men were engaged in a common illegal enterprize, and that one of them shed blood in the course of that enterprize, even those who never contemplated it were guilty of murder, though they never struck a blow. He said more than that. He might say it was an established rule in a criminal case that a verdict must stand altogether or must fall. What took place here? Why, prisoners who, upon the same verdict, were convicted of capital offences were released two or three days after, because it was clearly proved that the verdict was wrong. The verdict, which was manifestly mistaken, was the same verdict upon which these men were kept in prison. If their offence had had nothing to do with political crime, he believed that they would have been released long ago. They might remember that they were dealing with a remnant—and a small one—of a treasonable conspiracy. The leaders of that conspiracy were released long ago, and the Government were now called upon to consider whether, having released the men who were the leaders, the men who led these soldiers into their crime, the latter should not also receive the benefit of clemency. They must consider whether that would be wise at that time. He believed the releases already made had had a most beneficent effect in Ireland, but that was marred every day by retaining the men who still remained in prison. He did hope they might have an opportunity by-and-bye of fully putting the question before the House, and when they did refer to the case of the soldiers, or that of Davitt, he would appeal with confidence to the justice and generosity of the House to say that the time had now come when they would allow their Sovereign to boast that there was not a single political prisoner confined in any gaol in her dominions.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, that his name was on the Petition, but no pressure was resorted to to induce him to sign. He found mercy staring him in the face, and he would remind the House that they would all want mercy some day.

MR. D. TAYLOR said, he had refused to sign the petition for the release of the fenian prisoners as he did not think that they could ask the Government to release prisoners who had been guilty of murder; but he thought the Royal mercy might be extended to the other prisoners convicted of treason only.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—ARRESTS UNDER THE VACCINATION ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that two tradesmen of Leicester (Palmer and Eagle) have been sent to prison for breach of the Vaccination Act, they having ample goods to distrain on; whether they were handcuffed, although they made no resistance whatever; and, whether this is in accordance with law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed the statements in the Question were substantially accurate. He believed the magistrates had the power to commit persons to prison without first issuing a distress. It must be remembered, with regard to that part of the case, that the discretion rested with the magistrates, and also that these persons had only to put their hands in their pockets and pay the money to put an end to the matter. They had plenty of money, and they might have paid if they chose to do so. With regard to the latter part of the Question, he was sorry to say it was true that the men were handcuffed. He could not, however, imagine why a man, because he did not pay a small fine, should be treated in the same way as a man who had committed a criminal offence. It seemed to him an abuse of a petty power which he should do his best to put down in the future.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the Postmaster General, If he will lay on the Table of the House Copy of an Official Report sent by the Postmaster of Glasgow to the Post Office in London, proposing that there should be a Controller of the Telegraph system in the east, west, and north of Scotland, and certain other things?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: No official report of the nature indicated in the Question of the hon. Gentleman has been received at the Post Office. I am, therefore, unable to lay it upon the Table of the House.

TURKEY—THE BERLIN CONFERENCE. QUESTION.

MR. BRUCE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury the following Question, of which I have given him Private Notice:—If it is true, as stated in the public journals, that Her Majesty's Government has declined to join in the new proposals made to the Porte by the Northern Powers at the recent Conference at Berlin?

MR. DISRAELI: Yes, Sir; it is true that Her Majesty's Government have been unable to concur in the proposals which have been drawn up by the Governments of Russia, Austria, and Germany, and addressed to the Porte, and which since have been acquiesced in by the Governments of France and Italy; but we have no information at present that those proposals have been formally communicated to the Porte, and until we have that information I think it would not be fair to the Powers concerned if we placed the proposals on the Table.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to know, Whether the right hon. Gentleman could state the commencement and duration of the Whitsuntide Recess?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, before the Question were answered, he should like to ask whether it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to proceed with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill that evening, and after what hour it would not be taken? Also, whether it was his intention to proceed with the Valuation Bill and the Motion relating to the exclusion of strangers?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we do not intend to proceed with the Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill after half-past 10; but in case the Merchant Shipping Bill does not occupy much time, we propose to go on with it. Under these circumstances I do not think I need say anything about the Valuation Bill. With regard to the Notice which I have given respecting the Business of the House and the Exclusion of Strangers, I think it would be inconvenient to bring that subject forward at a late period, and I will see what arrangements can be made that will least interfere with Public Business. I will then communicate with the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) who has taken an interest in the matter. With respect to the holidays, I intend to propose that the House should sit on Thursday, the 1st of June, and rise that evening, and meet again on the following Thursday.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.—[BILL 49.]
(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, the following new clauses were brought up, read a first and second time, amended, and added to the Bill.

After Clause 17, insert the following clause:—

(Provisions of signals of distress, inextinguishable lights, and life buoys in passenger steamers and emigrant ships.—36 & 37 Vic. c. 85, s. 18.—See 17 & 18 Vic. c. 104, s. 301.)

“Every sea-going steamship and every emigrant ship shall be provided to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade—

“(1.) With means for making the signals of distress at night specified in the First Schedule to ‘The Merchant Shipping

Act, 1873,' or in any rules substituted therefor, including means of making flames on the ship which are inextinguishable in water, or such other means of making signals of distress as the Board of Trade may previously approve; and

"(2.) With a proper supply of lights inextinguishable in water and fitted for attachment to life buoys.

"If any such ship goes to sea from any port of the United Kingdom without being so provided as required by this section, for each default in any of the above requisites the owner shall, if he appears to be in fault, incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and the master shall, if he appears to be in fault, incur a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds."

"Nothing in this Act shall apply to any ship whilst on the inland waters of Canada."

CAPTAIN PIM moved, after Clause 3, to insert a new clause providing that all masters in command of British merchant ships should orderly perform, or cause to be performed, Divine service in their respective ships on the Lord's Day, and should, as far as possible, cause Sunday to be observed as a day of rest for the crew.

Clause (Observance of the Sabbath,) —(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the Government could not, as he had said in Committee—interfere with merchant ships in this particular any more than they could enforce such an observance in a private household. He must therefore oppose the clause.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM proposed a new clause providing that all applicants for examination as masters, mates, and engineers, if of foreign birth, should produce papers of naturalization, showing that the applicant had been for three years previously in the exercise of the rights of a British subject.

Clause (Foreign masters and officers,) —(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time,"

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY objected to the clause, on the ground that it would interfere with the right of owners to contract with whatever captains they might select to command their vessels. He could see no reason why owners, being British subjects, should not employ Norwegians or any other foreigners for that purpose.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM proposed a new clause, providing that any captain or person in command of a vessel under the British flag who neglected to take soundings, thereby causing the loss of such vessel, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

Clause (Neglect of taking soundings,) —(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY objected to the clause, on the ground that a special regulation with regard to neglect of soundings might imply that other kinds of neglect were less important. There were general provisions against all neglect of duty.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM proposed a new clause, containing provisions whereby the justices of the peace for a county might establish training ships for the purpose of training boys for the sea service.

Clause (Training schools and ships,) —(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY objected to the clause as not coming within the scope of the Bill. He declined to enter on the merits of the proposition.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM moved, after Clause 5, to insert a clause providing that an action for damages might be brought against the owner of a vessel in case of death by default of the owner.

Clause (Action for damages against owner in case of death from default of owner,)—(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY objected to the clause, on the ground that it was superfluous. The first part was provided by the 5th clause of this Bill, and the rest was a repetition verbatim of Lord Campbell's Act.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. GOURLEY moved, after Clause 5, to insert the following clause:—

"If a managing owner, ship's husband, or agent of any vessel, deems it necessary to ask for a survey of seaworthiness in hull, machinery, equipments, stowage, or stores for the conveyance of cargo, the Board of Trade shall, through a Board of Trade surveyor, order the vessel to be surveyed on payment of the survey fees, and in the same manner as if called upon to survey by one-fourth of the crew."

This privilege did exist until a short time ago, when the Board of Trade issued an order to their surveyors not to make such surveys.

Clause (Managing owners may require survey of vessel,)—(Mr. Gourley,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the adoption of the clause would place on the Government a responsibility—namely, that of a general Government survey of all ships—which was especially excluded by the Bill before the House and in every Act previously passed upon the subject. It was incompatible with the objects of the Bill and antagonistic to its principles, and he must ask the House to resist the Motion. The only ground upon which the Government undertook the survey of passenger ships was the safety of passengers, and the same ground did not apply to all ships carrying cargo, with seafaring crews who knew what they were about.

MR. MAC IVER said, the Board of Trade had formerly taken a more reasonable view of this question of survey.

VOL. CCXXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

The present proposals of the Government were most objectionable, for to encourage surveys on complaint of the crew was practically to encourage insubordination, and led directly towards such cases as those of the Lennie and the Caswell. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House were quite mistaken in supposing that the legislation of 1873 and of last Session had worked satisfactorily in relation to survey, and nobody seemed to understand the incidence of their own legislation less than the various statesmen who had from time to time directed the operations of the Board of Trade. So far from being advantageous to British shipowners, the actual result of recent legislation was simply the depreciation of British shipping. Good second-class ships were now unsaleable almost at any price, and the only buyers were foreigners who would not give half their value. The hon. Gentleman then read a telegram from Messrs. C. W. Kellock and Co. in confirmation of these statements, and concluded by supporting the clause moved by the hon. Member for Sunderland.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE would not follow the hon. Member who had just spoken into a discussion of the Act of 1873. The question before the House was, whether any shipowner having a doubtful ship should be permitted to obtain a survey from the Board of Trade? It appeared to him that a dishonest shipowner might avail himself of the proposal, and by hoodwinking the surveyors as to the real nature of the vessel, get a certificate of seaworthiness. This was the most dangerous form of Government survey ever proposed to the House, and he was glad the right hon. Gentleman would not listen to it.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that the object of his hon. Friend was good, but the clause was a bad one. If it were carried, a shipowner had only to get a seaman to write a letter to the Board of Trade and send a sensational telegraph to the hon. Member for Derby, and he would get his vessel surveyed and compensation besides for detention.

MR. SAMUDA said, that the passing of the clause would entirely stultify the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM moved, after Clause 15, to insert a clause providing that all

British passenger ships making long voyages should take one man from the Royal Marines for every 500 tons, for the purpose of instructing the crew in fire drill, &c., except in time of war; contending that such a provision would prove beneficial both for the naval and merchant service.

Clause (British passenger ships making long voyages to take disciplined men to teach fire drill, &c.)—(Captain Pim,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the clause.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN PIM, in proposing a clause, in lieu of Clause 22, relating to the load-line and the displacement of a ship, said, it was the last he should offer to the House. What he had proposed had been from a sense of duty, because he knew of the present horrible state of the Mercantile Marine, on which we depended for the food we ate, and which, if a war broke out, would leave us to be blockaded as completely as Metz or Paris. He, however, would not proceed unless the Government gave him some hopes of their support.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had considered the clause, and could not accept it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SYKES moved the insertion of a clause, after Clause 37, to provide that under certain circumstances power should be given to local authorities to reduce local light dues, subject to the approval of the Privy Council.

Clause (Power to reduce local light dues.)—(Mr. Sykes,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had no objection to the proposal.

SIR HENRY JAMES wanted to know, in the event of the proposal being adopted, whether any charge would be thrown on the Consolidated Fund to make good the amount of light dues asked to be remitted?

MR. E. JENKINS maintained that the clause was out of place, as the Bill had nothing whatever to do with light dues.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY admitted it was foreign to the general scope of the Bill, but it would prove a convenient measure, as it would enable such bodies as the Hull Trinity House to take the action they desired in the way of reducing tolls, without being put to the expense of promoting a private Bill. General lighthouse authorities had the power, and it was desirable that local authorities should by Order in Council be able to do the same.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT contended that that was not a sufficient argument for the introduction of the clause.

MR. T. E. SMITH held that any proposal with respect to light dues ought to be brought forward as a separate measure.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY took a similar view, and reminded the House that he had only very recently presented to the Prime Minister a memorial on the subject of lights.

MR. WILSON hoped the House would allow the clause to stand.

LORD ESLINGTON objected to its introduction into the Shipping Bill. The subject ought to be dealt with on its own merits.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that after the expression of feeling which had taken place, it would be more convenient to withdraw the Amendment, which in his opinion went beyond the immediate scope of the Bill.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL BERESFORD moved a clause to the effect that in all vessels with a passenger certificate from the Board of Trade when the passengers are in excess of the number which can be carried in the ordinary boats in the event of disaster at sea, such vessels should, in addition to such boats, be required to provide means for saving life by rafts or other appliances in such proportion as the Board of Trade might deem sufficient, and it should be in the discretion of the Board of Trade to allow shipowners to substitute rafts for a portion of the boats, such rafts to be approved by the Board of Trade.

Clause (Provision for rafts and other appliances for safety of life,)—(Colonel Beresford,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought the law as it stood was far better than the clause which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had proposed. His clause would require the deck to be crowded with a number of boats, two-thirds of which probably would become rotten and unusable, and certainly all of them could not be lowered or manned in case of emergency. The law provided for an ample number, and gave the Board of Trade power to alter the scale when desirable.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, the President of the Board of Trade was not aware of the progress of invention in life-saving appliances. The Admiralty had ordered 28 Berthon canvas boats to be stowed away conveniently in transport ships, and each ship could carry a sufficient quantity to receive every one on board in case of shipwreck. A boat of 30 feet long could be folded up into 2½ feet of space, like a cocked hat. This indifference and ignorance of the Board of Trade would continue the wasteful loss of life which might be easily prevented.

MR. MACGREGOR suggested that life belts should be added to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member, so that some second chance of safety should be provided for all. As to what had been called cocked hat boats, he feared they would have the same tendency to go below as the captain of a man-of-war in a fog.

LORD ESLINGTON thought encouragement should be given to the carrying of large life rafts on board ship, and that ships should be allowed to carry no more than a certain number of passengers.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON approved the object of the clause.

MR. SAMUDA thought the proposed clause would not be the means of saving life, but might have the reverse effect.

MR. RATHBONE believed that the Board of Trade already had sufficient powers in reference to that subject, and that no new enactments were necessary.

MR. D. JENKINS said, the difficulty with regard to boats was to get them launched safely. If rafts were substituted for one or two boats, he believed it would tend to save life.

The House divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 178: Majority 93.

MR. D. JENKINS, in moving the following clause:—

"That from and after the first day of January, 1877, every British ship exceeding 100 tons register shall be provided with a certificate of classification or of survey from Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or the Liverpool Underwriters' Registry, or the Bureau Veritas, or from such other association or associations as the Board of Trade may from time to time sanction for the purpose; or a certificate of survey from the surveyor or surveyors appointed by the local marine board of the district, such surveyors to be taken from a list approved of by the Board of Trade from time to time. Such certificate shall state the fitness of the vessel for the trade in which she is employed, and the period for which such certificate is granted. Provided always, That this shall not apply to vessels having passenger or other certificates from the Board of Trade, or to any vessel or vessels which the Board of Trade may from time to time exempt," said, he had placed the conditions of survey on the broadest basis. He did not confine shipowners to any one association, and all he required was a test of mere seaworthiness. The clause did not require ships to be certified A 1, or according to any letter. The surveyors could not be appointed by a better qualified body than the Local Marine Board. He proposed to exempt vessels under 100 tons from the operation of the clause, in order not to harass the owners of small coasting vessels. The effect of the clause would be to lessen interference on the part of the Board of Trade with the Mercantile Marine, and to get rid of the Courts of Survey Appeals, which would entail a large and unnecessary expenditure. What he asked for was additional security against loss of life at sea.

Clause (Certificates of classification of British ships,)—(Mr. David Jenkins,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. PLIMSOLL supported the clause, and hoped the Board of Trade would display its wisdom in accepting it. It was one of three or four points, the discussion upon which would determine whether the Bill was to be an efficient one for its purpose, or whether it would be such an illusory measure that those who had been engaged in the movement for the protection of life at sea would have to renew and continue it. The hon. Member for Falmouth who proposed the clause had for many years been a captain of merchant seamen, he was now an extensive shipowner, and in both capacities had much experience. The clause met all the objections which had been urged against somewhat similar attempts. It did not throw upon the Board of Trade the duty of detaining and surveying all unclassified ships, nor incurring the risk of damages and compensation if they were improperly delayed. It would not relieve the shipowner in the slightest degree from the responsibility which attached to him as to sending his ship to sea in a seaworthy state; while at the same time it secured such a satisfactory and complete certificate of seaworthiness that within a twelvemonth every ship that did not meet the proper requirements would be swept from the seas. He implored the Government, for their own sakes, to accept the clause and the House to pass it.

MR. MAC IVER supported the clause, and thought it would lessen the work of the Board of Trade. Much as he objected to compulsory classification in certain forms, he felt the Government proposals with respect to survey were so bad, that something must be done to improve them, both in the interest of the shipowners and the public. The clause of the hon. Member for Falmouth seemed to him to provide all the security which could be required with the minimum of interferences.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he objected to the proposed clause, because it presented in slightly altered terms, but essentially the same in substance, a principle which had been already discussed at great length on three separate occasions, and upon each decided by a large adverse majority. The Board of Trade would not be justified in detaining any ship which they had not reason to believe was unseaworthy, compensation was secured for unreasonable detention, and any person lodging a complaint in reference to a ship except one-fourth of a crew would be obliged to give security for costs. No injustice could, therefore, in the end result from the detention of a vessel, even though she were found on survey to be seaworthy. He would not farther enter into the question of detail. The simple fact was, that the clause was identical in principle with that moved by the hon. Member for Derby when in Committee, and was antagonistic to the principle on which the Bill was founded, which threw the responsibility as to the safe condition of ships on the shipowners themselves. The objection that had been taken to previous similar suggestions, as to their throwing private societies into partnership with the Government, applied also to this. But there was a more objectionable point in this suggestion. There could not be a worse body to elect surveyors than the Local Marine Boards, because they consisted of the shipowners of the district, or of those immediately connected with them. The proposal of the hon. Member for Falmouth, therefore, amounted to allowing shipowners to certify the seaworthiness of their own ships. The effect of the clause would not be to relieve the Board of Trade from the duty of interfering with the Mercantile Marine, but the opposite. It would first offer to secure for the shipowner a guarantee of safety from a private society, or else from the Government; but as the Government certificate would be the easiest to procure, being necessarily of a minimum standard, in time the Government would supersede the private societies, and have the task of certifying all, or the risk of an implied certificate when its power failed of reaching all in reality. If the House should adopt the new principle proposed by the hon. Member, it would undo all they had done, and the Bill might as well, in fact, fall to the ground. He therefore confidently appealed to the House to reject the clause.

SIR ANDREW LUSK observed, that if surveyors were wanted, and it was deemed necessary to appoint persons to control this branch of the trade of the country, those persons ought to be appointed by the Government, and ought not to consist of men appointed by a voluntary society like that of Lloyd's, who elected themselves and were not responsible to any one.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 98: Majority 38.

Clause 4 (Sending unseaworthy ships to sea a misdemeanour).

MR. MAC IVER moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 16, to leave out "British." Wherever their cases were parallel all vessels should be treated alike. We had a perfect right to prescribe the conditions under which cargo was to be shipped. We already did so in regard to passengers, and we had an equal right to prescribe the conditions under which either cargo or passengers were to be received; and in each case without distinction of nationality, and certainly without affording any ground for fears of retaliation on the part of foreign States so long as our regulations were reasonable. The practical question was the reasonableness of the regulations. If it was the intention of the Board of Trade to continue to interfere unreasonably with British shipping, he at once admitted the necessity of very great caution in extending such regulations to foreign vessels in our ports; but he hoped it was not yet too late for the Government to re-consider some of the provisions of this Bill. No foreign State would long tolerate the extended system of Board of Trade espionage provided for British shipping under Clause 6, and the criminal liabilities under Clause 4 were equally objectionable and likely to be equally useless. But whatever these criminal liabilities were, whether they were intended to be real or only intended to be a kind of "scarecrow," he felt that they ought not to be confined to British shipping. They ought, if they were such as should be applied at all, to be applied equally—as regards persons residents in British ports—in the case of all vessels despatched from British ports. The crime surely did not depend upon the flag. He thought he had left the Board of Trade in a dilemma. If they meant to legislate reasonably, his Amendment could not be resisted, but the acceptance of his Amendment clearly involved others. Surely the Government would not disregard the views of every seaport in the Kingdom on such a matter. It was the undisputed fact that respectable ship-owning opinion everywhere was opposed to this clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, to leave out the word "British."
—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Member appeared to know the intentions of the Government on the subject better than they did themselves, and the opinion of the seaports better than their Representatives in that House. The Government could not accept the Amendment, which would be absolutely impracticable. If carried, it would affect to make every shipowner, of whatever nationality, at whatever port in the world, who sent a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state, guilty of a misdemeanour in England. He need hardly say it was not competent for them to do that.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS, as one of those who were anxious to extend the operation of this measure to foreign shipowners, felt that it was perfectly impossible to adopt the rough-and-ready plan of the hon. Member for Birkenhead.

MR. MACGREGOR said, he was sorry he was not able to support the Amendment, because the hon. Member for Birkenhead had given great attention to the subject, and had made many remarks in these discussions which had been listened to with great pleasure by the House.

Question, "That the word 'British' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. MAC IVER, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 20, to leave out from "misdemeanour" to the end of the clause, said, he did so for the purpose of raising discussion on that portion of the clause which allowed a shipowner to give evidence in his own defence. This was regarded as a privilege, but it was in reality an obligation and a hardship. Evidence would be expected from people who had none to give, and innocent men might find themselves in real difficulty if "allowed," or in other words "expected," to prove their innocence.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, to leave out after the word "misdemeanor," to the word "conviction," in page 2, line 8.—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT protested against the provision in this clause which allowed a shipowner charged with misdemeanour to be examined as a witness in his own favour.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 24, to leave out from the word "Where" to the words "as follows," in line 30, inclusive.—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 6 (Power to detain unsafe ships and procedure for such detention).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, the following Amendments were made:—

In page 2, line 35, after "detained," insert "there shall be forthwith served on the master, agent, or owner of the ship a written statement of the grounds of her detention, and."

In page 3, line 12, after "overloading," insert "and with the consent of the Board of Trade where a ship has been provisionally detained on any other ground."

In sub-section (9), page 3, line 36, after "Trade," insert "with the consent of the Treasury."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Liability of Board of Trade and shipowner for costs and damages).

On the Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Amendment made, in page 6, line 5, after the word "sole," by inserting—

"And if the cause of action arises in Ireland, and the party aggrieved resides there, he may bring his action in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland, and a copy of the summons or writ left at the office of the Queen's Proctor in Dublin, shall be sufficient service of the same on the Secretary of the Board of Trade."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Mac Iver

Clause 11 (Power to require from complainant security for costs).

MR. MAC IVER moved, as an Amendment, to omit the second paragraph of the clause, which provided that where a complaint was made by one-fourth of the seamen, and was not frivolous or vexatious, security from the complainant should not be required. The clause, as it stood in the Bill, would tend greatly to increase insubordination.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 10, to leave out after the word "mentioned" to the word "Where," in line 18.—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

MR. MUNTZ thought the clause required modification, but he could not support the proposal of the hon. Member.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY hoped that the House would not re-open this discussion or alter the existing law and the Bill by striking out this portion of the clause.

MR. WILSON hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

LORD ESLINGTON thought this part of the clause mischievous, and challenged the President of the Board of Trade to get up in his place and say it would work. The want of discipline on board ship was caused in a great measure by the knowledge among the seamen that this provision existed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that as the House had now agreed not to have a general survey, but merely to institute one in special cases, he thought the clause should stand in its present shape.

MR. MAGGREGOR opposed the Amendment. He thought there was a good deal of merit in the clause as it stood. He would remind the House that the clause provided against frivolous and vexatious complaints by the men, but would suggest that the word "seamen" should be limited by the introduction of "able" or "able and ordinary" so as to exclude stewards, cooks, cabin-boys, and other persons who in some cases outnumbered the seamen.

MR. RATHBONE concurred in the suggestion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it would be necessary, in a case of law to define the term "able seamen," and that he thought would be a difficult matter.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the words "able seamen" would exclude engineers and stokers, who might really know much more of the state of the ship than the deck hands.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, lines 19 and 20, to leave out the words "the complaint was made without reasonable and probable cause," in order to insert the words, "she was not at the time of such complaint unsafe within the meaning of this Act."

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 19, to leave out after the word "That" to the word "cause," in line 20, inclusive, in order to insert the words "she was not at the time of such complaint unsafe within the meaning of this Act." — (Sir Charles Adderley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. PLIMSOLL said, if the Amendment were made, the Board of Trade would get very little information about unseaworthy ships, for however reasonable complaints might be, this alteration would make those who raised them liable for the costs if the vessel afterwards turned out to be safe.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER urged that no objection had been raised by the hon. Member when the Bill was in Committee. The proposal was to make the same provision when the detention was caused by the seamen as when it occurred by the interference of the Board of Trade.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said he was in favour of retaining the clause as it stood. The Amendment, if adopted, would render the clause nugatory.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the Amendment was not consistent with the general provisions of the Bill. The Board of Trade might very well be made liable for costs which a private person was quite unable to bear, and that therefore a different rule might obtain in the latter case.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, there was no reason for making Clauses 10 and 11 in exact harmony. The clauses had better remain as they were.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was opposed to the Amendment.

MR. HERSCHELL said, that different considerations arose on Clauses 10 and 11, and he objected to the proposed Amendment.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and have both clauses re-considered in "another place."

MR. RATHBONE objected to such a course being adopted.

MR. NORWOOD also objected to the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He could not consent to the Bill leaving the House in an imperfect state and the whole thing changed in "another place." They were bound to make the Bill as complete as they could before it left that House, and he saw no reason why the Amendment should be withdrawn.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, the course proposed by the Government was a most inconvenient one. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was a very proper one, and ought to be dealt with by the House. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to it.

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 122: Majority 54.

MR. E. JENKINS thought the House had every reason to complain of the conduct of the Government in this instance, and said he should divide the House on the Amendment. The President of the Board of Trade having accepted an Amendment, went into the Lobby against it.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I beg leave to say that I did not accept any Amendment. I was willing, with the permission of the House, to withdraw mine in order that the matter might be considered in "another place."

MR. W. E. FORSTER also complained of the course pursued by the Government. The Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman seemed to diminish the chief security in the Bill for life—namely, the power of detention.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER maintained that there was no justification for the complaint that had been made with regard to the course pursued by the Government. The House having declined to let the matter stand over for consideration in "another place," the Government could not have done anything else than support their own Amendment.

Question, "That the words 'she was not at the time of such complaint unsafe within the meaning of this Act,' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. RATHBONE proposed to amend the clause by providing that in cases of urgency the owner of a passenger ship might, instead of appealing, require a Board of Trade surveyor to again make a survey, accompanied by such persons as he might select from the list of assessors, when, if they agreed, their decision would be regarded as if rendered by the Board of Trade itself; and if they differed the matter should be referred to the decision of the Board of Trade in the same manner as if the requisition had not been made.

MR. GREGORY asked for an explanation of the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, who supported it, said it would enable the owner of a passenger steamer, instead of going to a Court of Inquiry, to ask the Board of Trade surveyor to survey the vessel in company with an assessor. If the two agreed it would not be necessary to go to a Court of Inquiry; but if they disagreed, that course would be necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 18 (Stowage of cargo of grain &c.).

MR. PLIMSOLL moved as an Amendment, an addition to the clause, dealing with grain cargoes, which would secure that in the case of vessels loading at the ports which were reached through the Straits of Gibraltar and those which were in the Baltic Sea the grain on the starboard side of the ship should at the least be entirely separated from that on the port side, and that not less than one-third of the grain cargo should be in sacks, bags, or barrels. The hon. Member assured the House that the Amendment he proposed was the minimum provision they could make consistently with the safety of vessels carrying grain cargoes across the Bay of Biscay as a means of preventing the shifting of the cargo from side to side.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 16, after the word "otherwise," to insert the words "in such a manner in the case of vessels loading at the ports which are reached through the Straits of Gibraltar and those which are in the Baltic Sea as that the grain on the right or starboard side of the ship shall at the least be securely and entirely separated from that on the left or port side, and that not less than one-third of the grain cargo shall be in sacks, bags, or barrels."—(Mr. Plimsoll.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought the Amendment much too minute, and that a better security for the purpose in view was given by the general penalty on insecure stowage. Besides the only officers boarding all ships arriving did not stay long enough to ascertain such minute particulars even if it were desirable to enact them.

MR. WILSON hoped the hon. Member for Derby would withdraw the Amendment, concurring in the objections taken to it by the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. A. BARCLAY expressed his opinion that the clause as it stood would be inoperative for the purposes it contemplated, and said he thought the Motion of the hon. Member for Derby should be accepted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT suggested that the Board of Trade should in each case send a surveyor on board to see that grain cargoes were properly stowed.

MR. MACGREGOR thought it impossible the provision just proposed could be carried out. The Custom House officers went on board in search of contraband tobacco and spirits, and having made the search turned off to board the next vessel, but were they to remain on board until the goods were taken out of the hold in order to ascertain how the cargo had been stowed, it would become necessary to employ a far greater number of them than at present, and that would necessitate a Supplementary Vote.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 17, to leave out the word "British," said he did so in order to bring before the House a point of great importance—namely, that as the clause stood it would place the owner of a British ship carrying a grain cargo under a most stringent regulation, while it would place the foreign shipowner under no such restrictions whatever. If the Bill passed in that form, it would tend very much to drive British ships out of the trade.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 17, to leave out the word "British."
(Sir W. Vernon Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'British' stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE thought that, under any circumstances, the Amendment would only apply to foreign ships arriving in our ports laden with grain.

MR. MACGREGOR said, experience showed that foreigners were more careful of themselves and of their stowage of grain cargoes than the English, and he hoped the Government would let the clause stand as it was. The foreigner would either have to conform or he would lose his share of the carrying trade.

MR. PLIMSOLL supported the Amendment, remarking that he was glad to hear that foreigners were more careful than the English showed themselves to be in the matter of grain cargoes. At the present moment we were importing grain in large quantities from the Black Sea in a very unprotected manner.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the Government showed their sense of the gravity of dealing with foreigners in such penal enactments by shrinking from putting clauses with this object into the Bill in the first instance. It was a step which no Government before had attempted to take, and it was only after a strong expression of opinion from the House that they decided to adopt such an extended application in the most cautious, careful, and limited manner, not, as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford seemed to think, in an unlimited and reckless way. He now proposed to them to impose a penalty on a foreign shipowner, agent, or master which would be difficult, if not impossible to carry out. We certainly could not punish foreigners for acts not committed within our jurisdiction. He must oppose the Amendment.

MR. E. JENKINS wished to know whether the Government had not received a very strong representation from Canada with reference to the clause, and whether they had not asked either that all foreign vessels should be placed on the same footing with British, or else that Canadian shipping should be excluded from the operation of the Bill?

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that this was a repetition of the clause which appeared in the Bill of last year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were two distinct questions raised, one was as to the general question of the fairness of the clause as it stood, and its relation to other clauses of the Bill; the other question arose with reference to Canada. The Canadian Government had been watching with considerable interest, and some uneasiness, the course of legislation on this subject. A very intelligent gentleman was over here from Canada who was well acquainted with the subject, and since he had seen the provisions made, he had felt that great part of the discontent of Canada would be modified by the alterations made. The Canadian Government did suggest either that Canadian ships should be excluded altogether from the operation of the Bill, or that British and foreign vessels should be treated on the same footing. As to the idea of putting Canadian ships on a different footing from British ships, he did not think the Canadian Government would, on deliberation, be inclined to favour it. It would be most unfortunate to establish such a distinction between Canadian and British vessels. The object was to place foreign ships as far as could be done in the position not only of Canadian but of all British ships. The Government were not neglecting the matter and would give it their careful consideration. With regard to grain cargoes the clause was practically the clause which had been in operation for the last twelve months, and he did not think that Canadian ships would be subject to any inconvenience from it. It was necessary that some discretion should be allowed with respect to grain cargoes, particularly so far as respected foreign ships.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would not trouble the House to divide on the question.

MR. PLIMSOLL moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 21, the insertion of the words—

“And it shall be the duty of the officer of customs placed on board any ship carrying grain cargo into any port of the United Kingdom to report to the Board of Trade what proportion of the said grain cargo were in bags or sacks, and whether the shifting boards were carried down to the keelson or screw-tunnel of the vessel, and if not, to what depth they were carried down.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 21, after the word “conviction,” to insert the words “and it shall be the duty of the officer of Customs placed on board any ship carrying grain cargo into any port in the United Kingdom to report to the Board of Trade what proportion of the said grain cargo was in bags or sacks, and whether the shifting boards were carried down to the keelson or screw tunnel of the vessel, and if not to what depth they were carried down.”—(Mr. Plimsoll.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment, believing that it would be impracticable to carry out the proposals of the hon. Member.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT considered it desirable that somebody should go on board every grain ship and report whether the cargo was properly stowed, and he trusted the President of the Board of Trade would assent to a provision of that kind. The other day they were all shocked by the Return which had been laid on the Table of the House respecting the loss of life in these grain ships, one of the most appalling documents that had ever been laid before the country. He considered that the hon. Member for Derby was right in proposing the Amendment, and would suggest to him the propriety of his making his provision more general, and directing the Custom House officer to make a Report to the Board of Trade on the subject.

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and negatived.

MR. E. JENKINS moved to add to the clause a Proviso, that nothing contained in the section should affect Canadian vessels not sailing or discharging at ports of the United Kingdom. The Canadian Government were fully alive to their duties, and had already taken the initiative in this matter, but they were the fourth maritime nation in the world, and they had very important interests at stake, which it was desirable to protect.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 21, after the word “conviction,” to insert the words “Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall apply to or affect Canadian vessels not sailing to or discharging at ports of the United Kingdom.”—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was afraid it would require special legislation in order to define what a Canadian vessel was. He objected to the Amendment principally, however, because it would be injudicious to legislate in this Bill exceptionally for Canada and to draw invidious distinctions in her favour.

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and negatived.

Clause 19 (Space occupied by certain deck cargo to be liable to dues).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Amendment made in page 10, line 31, by inserting after “goods,” the words “at the time at which such dues become payable.”

MR. MAC IVER moved the omission of the clause, on the ground that it was useless and unworkable. He believed it had been passed under a misapprehension, and that there had been no intention of exempting vessels engaged in the home trade from the operation of the Bill.

MR. WILSON supported the Amendment. The House was really not aware how it had committed itself by adopting a system of exemption which extended to nine-tenths of the deck cargoes of the home trade.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY did not believe the Committee had passed the clause in such a total misapprehension. The clause had been well considered in Committee, and he hoped the House would not now re-open the question with which it had dealt so decisively.

MR. MACGREGOR hoped the hon. Member for Birkenhead would not press his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question, “That Clause 19, as amended, stand part of the Bill,” put, and agreed to.

Clause 20 (Penalty on ships carrying deck loads of timber in winter).

MR. MACGREGOR, on this clause, which provided that no ship, British or foreign, arriving at any port in the United Kingdom, which had sailed from any port after the 1st of October, &c., should carry deck cargo, moved to substitute the 1st of September, as many of the heaviest gales took place in October.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 5, to leave out the word "October," in order to insert the word "September."—(Mr. Macgregor.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'October' stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY explained that the date was fixed to meet the Canadian law. The proposed alteration would in fact impose a penalty on the Canadian timber trade, in the very enactment meant to induce it, and he could not assent to it.

MR. MACGREGOR said, he would withdraw his proposal; but in doing so would express a hope that an effort would be made to induce the Canadians to alter their law so as to prohibit deck cargoes in the month of October.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Amendment made in page 11, line 6, by leaving out from "carry," to "any timber," in line 9, and inserting "as deck cargo, that is to say, in any uncovered space upon deck, or in any covered space not included in the cubical contents forming the ship's registered tonnage."

MR. PLIMSOLL moved the omission of certain words in the clause with the view of the insertion of the words "deals and battens as deck cargo" after the word "timber;" the object being to prohibit the carrying of such cargo as dangerous, and thus practically the carrying of all deck loads of timber in winter. Between the 1st October last year and the 31st January of the present year as many as 45 vessels sailing from ports in the North of Europe alone were lost in consequence of the practice of carrying deck cargo.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 9, after the word "timber," to leave out all the words to the word "deck," in line 11, inclusive, in order to insert the words "deals or battens."—(Mr. Plimsoll.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would be unwise to impose a penalty upon the regulations of Canada and increase irritation between the two countries in the very act of assimilating the laws of both. At all events, if it were wise to make this further alteration, we had better make the Amendment together, after having first got ourselves on common ground.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT maintained that the Canadians had made no objections on the subject, but the right hon. Gentleman had made the position. The correspondence proved distinctly that the Canadian Parliament had expressed their willingness to concur in any law we might pass provided foreigners were placed on the same footing as themselves.

LORD ESLINGTON declared that some of the leading "Mutual Insurance" associations in the North had for some time past refused to insure vessels carrying deck loads. Deals were one of the most dangerous cargoes that could be carried in the winter months, and therefore he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. SAMUDA said, this was the most important clause of the Bill, and ought not to be disposed of without the fullest consideration. To allow a ship to be piled up on deck with battens and timber would materially interfere with her free working.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the House that the clause dealt with a very delicate question, in that it would refer not only to the condition in which ships reached this country, but that in which they sailed from the ports at which they loaded. In framing the clause an attempt had been made to adopt the Canadian law, so as to have precisely similar regulations at the ports of departure and arrival. The House was now asked to go beyond that law, and he confessed that he had heard no arguments to induce him to believe that it was desirable to pass a law more stringent than the Canadians had done. The representative of the Canadian Government, who was at present in this country, was desirous that the clause should be left as it now stood.

MR. HERSCHELL did not think it followed that because Canada, when tying her own hands, had legislated in a particular manner she would object to a measure in the same direction which only extended to her the provision which it was deemed necessary to apply to other countries.

The House divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 162: Majority 19.

Question, "That the words 'deals or battens' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 12, to leave out the word "is," in order to insert the words "deals or battens be."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'is' stand part of the Bill."

MR. PARNELL moved, on account of the lateness of the hour, that the debate should be adjourned.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second that Motion?

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would do so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER expressed a hope that as the remaining Amendments were mostly of a formal character the Bill might be proceeded with.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'is' stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Other Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Marking of load line).

MR. WILSON moved an Amendment on the clause, with the object of securing that the loading of a ship should be in conformity with the principle of a sufficiency of surplus buoyancy, as customary for the description of the vessel and the circumstances of the voyage.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 8, after the word "mark," to insert the words "in conformity with the principle of a sufficiency of surplus buoyancy as

customary for the description of vessel and the circumstances of the voyage."—(Mr. Charles Wilson.)

MR. SAMUDA said, that an owner might fix an improper load-line, no doubt; but still he did not think that the Amendment now proposed would work well. The object of the hon. Member would be better attained by inserting in the 2nd sub-section words to the effect that the disc line should be placed at such a draught of water as to the best of his judgment was a safe and proper immersion. That would require the owner to fix an honest load-line.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken. He considered the Amendment proposed had no meaning whatever. That a ship should be loaded sufficiently and as was customary was no definition at all.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. PLIMSOLL then proposed the insertion in the clause, after the word "centre," of the words—

"In a position approved as reasonable either by the builder of the ship or some other independent and competent authority."

He made the proposal, he said, by way of Amendment on the owner's line pure and simple, which was admitted by every one who was practically acquainted with the matter to be a delusion and a snare.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 13, after the word "centre," to insert the words "in a position approved as reasonable either by the builder of the ship or some other independent and competent authority."—(Mr. Plimsoll.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY took an entirely different view from that of the hon. Member of the clause as it stood, and said experience had shown, and the Chief Surveyors had reported, that at all the principal ports in the country the disc had been placed in a bond fide way in almost every case. Besides, the opinion of the builder was not likely to be an independent one; it would probably be given so as to please his employer, the owner.

MR. NORWOOD believed the clause had worked very well on the whole, and put the responsibility on the right shoulders.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Clause 24 (Application to foreign ships of provision as to detention).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, the following Amendments were made in the clause:—

Page 13, line 13, leave out "five," and insert "six;"

"(2.) Where a ship has been provisionally detained, the consular officer, on the request of the owner or master of the ship, may require that the person appointed by the Board of Trade to survey the ship shall be accompanied by such person as the consular officer may select, and in such case if the surveyor and such person agree, the Board of Trade shall cause the ship to be detained or released accordingly, but if they differ, the Board of Trade may act as if the requisition had not been made, and the owner and master shall have the appeal to the court of survey touching the report of the surveyor which is before provided by this Act; and

"(3.) Where the owner or master of the ship appeals to the court of survey the consular officer, on the request of such owner or master, may appoint any competent person who shall be assessor in such case in lieu of the assessor who, if the ship were a British ship, would be appointed otherwise than by the Board of Trade.

"In this section the expression 'consular officer' means any consul general, vice consul, consular agent, or other officer recognized by a Secretary of State as a consular officer of a foreign State."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25 (Appointment, duties, and powers of wreck commissioners for investigating shipping casualties).

On Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Amendment made in page 13, line 32, after "Commissioners," insert—

"And in case it shall become necessary to appoint a Wreck Commissioner in Ireland, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland shall have the appointment and the power of removal of such Wreck Commissioner."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Assessors and rule of procedure on formal investigations into shipping casualties).

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 10, to leave out the words "one of."

—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

Question, "That the words 'one of' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 31 (Ships' managing owner or manager to be registered).

On the Motion of Mr. NORWOOD, Amendment made in page 16, line 4, leave out all after "registry," and insert—

"Where there is not a managing owner there shall be so registered the name of the ship's husband or other person to whom the management of the ship is entrusted by or on behalf of the owner; and any person whose name is so registered shall, for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1876, be under the same obligations, and subject to the same liabilities, as if he were the managing owner.

"If default is made in complying with this section the ship may be detained until compliance."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday.

"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending the 31st day of March 1877, the sum of £11,000,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

MR. O'SULLIVAN objected to pass a Vote of such magnitude at a quarter past 1 in the morning, and moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the Vote was merely a formal one, and did not ask the House to vote any money beyond what had been sanctioned in Committee of Supply.

BURIALS IN CHURCHYARDS BILL.

(The Earl Grey.)

(NO. 77.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL GREY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he did not propose to enter into any argument on the general question whether Dissenters had a grievance with respect to churchyards—that question was sufficiently discussed on the Motion recently made by his noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition in that House (Earl Granville), and he did not intend to revive the discussion which had followed that Motion. It was quite unnecessary for him to do so, because it had been distinctly admitted on that occasion, both by the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council on behalf of the Government, and the most rev. Primates on behalf of the Episcopal Bench, that there did exist a real grievance on the part of the Dissenters, which required to be remedied. All he (Earl Grey) now proposed to attempt was to show in what manner this admitted grievance would be redressed by the Bill he had laid on the Table of the House, and that it did not deserve the somewhat severe strictures which had been passed upon it in the late debate, both by the noble Duke opposite and by the most rev. Primate. Not very long ago a Motion was made in the other House of Parliament on this same subject, and every one who read the debate on that Motion must have remarked that the two Ministers who spoke on behalf of Her Majesty's Government took great pains to show that the grievance of the Dissenters was not the only thing that required redress in connection with the churchyards of this country. They both contended that the sanitary condition of many churchyards also called urgently for attention. He believed that to be perfectly true—no doubt, many of our churchyards were in a most unsatisfactory state. Many of them were inadequate, as regarded extent, to the wants of the present population ; and others, while not too small, were so badly arranged as to be injurious to the health of the living. Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Cross had ample grounds for their assertions on that matter ; and he presumed the inference they intended to draw from the facts they stated was that, any measure for amending the law with respect to churchyards ought to provide for protecting the public health from the dangers to which it was now exposed, as well as for the relief of a large number of our fellow-subjects from a hardship of which they complained. He presumed that must have been the inference they meant to draw from what they stated as to the defective condition of churchyards, since otherwise the statement would have had no bearing whatever on the subject that was under discussion. Assuming that he was right in his understanding of the conclusion they sought to establish, he had to express his entire concurrence in it, and the Bill now before their Lordships was an attempt to give effect to that view of the subject. If provision was to be made for the sanitary improvement of churchyards it seemed clearly necessary that local authorities should be created for that purpose. Whatever was required, whether it were the enlargement or any other improvement of a churchyard, must cost money, and he did not know how that was to be obtained except from a rate paid by the parishioners; and if the ratepayers were to provide the money for such purposes, it followed that the ratepayers must have the control of the churchyards for which they were called upon to pay. Accordingly in his Bill he provided for the creation of Burial Boards in parishes. He was aware of the great objection that would be raised to the creation of Burial Boards for this purpose—namely, that this course would be unjustifiable because the freehold of the churchyard was vested in the clergyman. Technically it was quite true that the freehold of the churchyard was vested in the clergyman; but it was shown by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Coleridge) in the recent debate that the freehold in the incumbent was qualified by the rights of the parishioners, and had in it very little of the nature of property; that, in fact, the position of the parish clergyman in relation to the churchyard was much better described by the term “trustee” for the benefit of the parishioners than by that of “freeholder.” If that were so, no injustice, or hardship, or injury of any kind, would be inflicted on the clergy by transferring to other hands the management of the churchyards. He also ventured to say that in the proposal he made there was nothing of a novel or strange character; for it would be merely a return in principle to what up, to a few years ago, had from time out of mind been the actual state of things in this country. Up to the time of the abolition of church rates the law required the cost of maintaining the churchyards to be provided for out of these rates by the authority of the Vestry. The Vestry was composed either of all the ratepayers of the parish, or of a number of them chosen to represent the general body of the ratepayers. Thus, the ratepayers, either personally or by their representatives, provided the funds for keeping up the churchyards, and, as in other cases, the power of the purse carried with it the control of the service for which the money was provided, so that in fact, in the management of the churchyard the clergyman had to consider what were the wishes of the parishioners. What the Bill proposed was a mere return in principle to this ancient arrangement only substituting a Burial Board composed of a small number of members for the more cumbrous Vestry, which formerly controlled the mode of keeping up of the churchyard. In this manner provision would be made for effecting improvements in churchyards where such improvements were required, without obliging the Board to incur any expense when nothing was required to be done. The appointment of Burial Boards would also afford great facilities for removing the grievance so loudly complained of by Dissenters. In resisting the demand of the Dissenters to be allowed to have their funerals performed in churchyards by their own ministers one of the main topics insisted upon had been the risk that abuses might arise from their having this right conceded to them. There was, in his opinion, but little ground for this apprehension; at the same time he admitted that it would not be right or proper to open the churchyards to Dissenters entirely without check or restriction. For instance, it would be impossible to allow Dissenters to select for the interment of a relative or friend any spot in a churchyard which they might think fit to choose. At present the clergyman had the power of deciding as to where the grave was to be placed: he could object either on sanitary grounds or from a regard to the just claims of others to any particular selection made by the friends of the person to be interred. If Dissenters were admitted to the churchyards, it would be manifestly inconvenient that the clergy should have the task of making such decisions in their case. He had no doubt that in the great majority of cases the good feeling and good sense of the clergy and of the friends of the deceased would prevent any unseemly altercation from arising; but, unfortunately there had been examples of wrong-headedness in a few both of the clergy and of the Dissenters to warn them of the evils which might occasionally arise unless there existed some authority to check ill-advised proceedings either on the one side or the other. For instance, it would be highly inconvenient, to say the least, that a Church and a Dissenting funeral should be appointed to take place at the same hour in the same churchyard, and perhaps close together, all risk of such difficulties would be averted by giving the control of the churchyard to an independent authority as proposed by the Bill. He trusted that he had now sufficiently explained to their Lordships the principles on which he desired to proceed. As he knew that there was no chance of the Bill passing in the present Session he thought it would be a waste of time if, after having explained its principle, he were to proceed to discuss its provisions at greater length. He wished, however, to defend himself against one or two charges with reference to these provisions which had been brought against him. The most rev. Primate said, on the occasion to which he had already referred, that in bringing forward this measure he had shown a want of due consideration for the feelings of the clergy. He could assure his most rev. Friend that he had not proposed the clauses for which he had censured him in any such spirit, but on the contrary with the strongest desire to provide for the opening of the churchyards to Dissenters in a manner the least calculated to wound the feelings of the clergy and the most likely to promote the success of their ministrations and their own comfort. He had believed, and believed still, that this would be best accomplished by relieving them from all responsibility with reference to the management of the burial grounds. In a great majority of town parishes, cemeteries having been established, the clergy had nothing to do with the management of the burying grounds. They had neither authority nor responsibility with regard to it; they had merely to bury the dead of their own congregation when called upon in graves of which the position had been determined by another and independent authority. He had never heard that the instruction of their flocks by the town clergy had been interfered with, or their usefulness diminished by their being thus relieved from any charge of burying grounds. He was totally at a loss to understand why the result should be different because the burying ground happened to be adjoining the church instead of a distance from it. He could not therefore see how any insult or injury to the clergy would be involved in the change he proposed, but he did see how much they would gain by being relieved from a state of things which at least occasionally had the effect of involving them in angry contentions with some of their parishioners. Similar considerations had led him to believe that it would tend to the comfort of the clergy themselves, and prevent them from being mixed up in harassing altercations, that they should be disqualified from becoming members of Burial Boards, and the same disqualification ought, he thought, to be applied to the ministers of Dissenting congregations in the parish. The question, however, was one which might fairly be left to be determined according to the judgment and the wishes of the clergy. There was one other point to which he thought it right to call attention. Their Lordships were aware that it had often been complained that the clergy were now required by law to perform the funeral service of the Church over the bodies of persons with respect to whom they thought it ought not to be used. It might be doubted, perhaps, whether this objection was altogether a reasonable one, and whether it might not be chiefly founded on an incorrect interpretation of the words of their Service. But, be this as it might, as in point of fact many clergymen had a conscientious objection to performing the usual funeral services in such cases, he could have no doubt that this objection ought to be respected. He had accordingly introduced a provision into the Bill by which clergymen would be relieved from the obligation complained of, with the condition he considered indispensable, that when the incumbent of a parish declined to perform the funeral service for a deceased parishioner he should have no right to object to its being performed by another clergyman. The cases would probably be exceedingly rare when another clergyman would consent to perform a funeral service refused by an incumbent, but unfortunately they knew that some few cases had arisen—as when a regular service had been refused in the case of a person held to have been insufficiently baptized by a Wesleyan minister—in which the precautionary regulation would be highly necessary and effectual. He had only to add that if an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months should be moved to his Motion for the second reading he would offer no objection to it as he was aware that a person of such little authority as himself could not hope to settle such a question as that of the amendment of the law of burial; still his object would have been answered by laying the Bill before their Lordships with a view to the future consideration of the subject, and he could not sit down without expressing his strong conviction that it was the duty of Parliament and of Her Majesty's Government to take care that another Session should not pass without some measure being brought forward for settling the question in the only manner in which it could be settled—namely, by giving complete relief to the Dissenters from the grievance under which they now suffered.

—(The Earl Grey.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that what their Lordships had heard from the noble Earl who had moved the second reading was only another proof that the settlement of this most serious question should be undertaken by the authority of the Government. His noble Friend the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who introduced the subject the other night did great service by so doing; and the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) gratified the House and the country at large very much by his statement that the Government would undertake the settlement of the question. One word more. He would be presumptuous enough to give a word of advice to the clergy. He counselled them to listen seriously to what the present Government might say to them on this matter; for he very much doubted whether they would ever again have such good friends as they now had on the Ministerial bench.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that the Bill would never receive his assent—the clause which would disqualify the clergy from even a share in the management of the churchyards was especially objectionable. As the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), in his eloquent speech the other night, narrated some telling and amusing anecdotes, he (the Duke of Rutland) would follow the noble Earl's example so far as to illustrate his objection to this Bill by an anecdote relating to one whom he would not name. The person in question was an excellent man and gave good dinners, but he was by no means brilliant in conversation. He wished, however, to give a dinner at which should be assembled a number of the most celebrated wits of the town; but there was this difficulty—that he knew none of them. In his embarrassment he applied to a noble Lord, who said—“I will manage it; I will ask the company, which ought not to consist of more than twelve.” Well, after a few days the noble Lord presented his friend with a list of the names of those whom he had asked. His friend, on running through the names, remarked, “These will do well; but you have made one omission which is easily rectified; you have left myself out.” The noble Lord replied—“Oh, that is impossible; you would spoil all.” “That is a hard case,” observed his friend. “Not at all; don't you see you will have all the credit of entertaining those wits to dinner, and of paying for the dinner besides?” Such was the comfort given to the host, and similar comfort was offered to the clergy by the Bill now before their Lordships—everyone was to have an opinion in his own churchyard except the unfortunate clergyman. He would ask the noble Earl (Earl Granville) whether the churchyards of England belonged to the Church of England or not? He believed they did:—if so, where was the difference between the Church and the churchyard—the only difference he could see was that one had a roof over it and the other was open to the air. The common law gave to Dissenters the right to enter the churchyard, and to hear the services and receive the ministrations of the Church of England; and the same common law gave them the right of interment in the churchyards, but it was on the same conditions, that the churchyards were open to the members of the Church of England. He was glad, however, that the Government proposed to consider the whole subject; and he trusted that in any measures they might introduce they would be careful to keep inviolate the churchyards of the country. He believed that the Dissenters suffered under no grievance—some hardships there might be; but the Dissenters were well able to provide graveyards for themselves. He believed that the great mass of them were not sensible of any hardship, and that this agitation was got up by a small band of persons, some of whom were of no religion, partly with a view of vexing the members of the Church, and some with the view of overthrowing it altogether. Therefore he hoped that neither Her Majesty's Government nor the Episcopal Bench would yield to these demands.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD thought that the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who had now left the House, had spoken to the clergy in a somewhat minatory tone—he had told them solemnly to receive the counsel of the Government, lest they should never have a similar favourable chance. He (the Bishop of Oxford) hoped the clergy would receive good counsel coming from any Government, and should be sorry to think them incapable of accepting good counsel on this long-vexed subject; and he thought they had shown a decided disposition to entertain the subject of the law of burial, to which great prominence had been given in the present Session of Parliament. But he appealed to their Lordships to say whether the clergy had had fair play in this matter. Had any really practical plan ever been proposed for their adoption? Sometimes the clergy were spoken of as if they had stolen a march upon the English people, and had somehow obtained, to their prejudice, possession of the churchyards. But this was certainly contrary to the fact. It should be remembered that neither Parliament nor the State had ever provided churchyards in any parish in England. This Bill, for the first time in the history of England, would enact that a parish should be obliged to provide its own burial ground. At this moment, if, for example, a burial ground on the coast were swept away by the encroachments of the sea, there was no law to compel the people of the parish to provide another burial ground. Rights of interment were freely spoken of; but Englishmen as such had no right to a place of interment. Churchyards had been provided ages ago by pious laymen—usually the lords of manors—under the advice of the clergy, and therefore it was unfair to charge the clergy with having gained possession of the churchyards to the exclusion of others who had an equal right to them. He trusted that when the clergy had any proposal put before them they would listen to it—not because it was made by the Government, but because their own feelings would teach them to show kindness to their neighbours and manifest the large and generous charity of the Church towards all mankind.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would not have spoken had not the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) made a direct appeal to him on the points of law, whether the churchyards belonged to the Church of England. In answer, he would first of all ask the noble Duke whether the Church of England as a whole was, by law, the owner of any property at all? He believed not. Next, he believed the fee of the churchyard was vested in the clergyman of the parish, to hold in trust for the whole parish, under conditions prescribed by the common and ecclesiastical law.

LORD HOUGHTON was strongly in favour of a settlement of the question. It was one on which the Dissenters felt strongly; and Churchmen could not be surprised at this, remembering that burial services and interments in particular places had given rise to much warm feeling in this and other countries on the part of Churchmen and Roman Catholics, as well as Dissenters. The fear that the churchyards were likely to be “desecrated” ought to be removed by the consideration that in all our large cemeteries, where the greater part of the dead were now interred the burial service was performed by Dissenting ministers of all denominations; yet he was not aware of a single complaint of indecency or indecorum; and this afforded a strong presumption that they might be trusted to perform the service in country churchyards. In the course of his literary life it had happened to him to deliver two funeral addresses over the graves of literary men; and he trusted that nothing unbecoming or unsuitable to the solemnity of the occasion had been said either by himself or others at such times — on the contrary, he thought, they had promoted good and amiable feelings. With these analogies the present question might be decided in a simple manner, and in no spirit of antagonism to any body of Dissenters whatever.

LORD DYNEVOR: As an incumbent of nearly 50 years' standing, may I be allowed to make a few remarks? I was early led to act in a friendly manner towards Dissenters. Two persons from whom I received the greatest respect when I first went to the parish which I still hold, were two venerable Dissenting ministers. I remember walking at the head of a corpse with one of them, when he said, "I have been 40 years in the wilderness," meaning he had been a minister there for 40 years. About the same time I became acquainted with several members of the Society of Friends, whom I much esteemed. About seven years ago I went down to live part of the year in South Wales, and there I found the benefit of having been always on good terms with the Dissenters, for almost all the people about me were Dissenters; quite eight out of 10 in the rural parts. I cannot indeed say that I approve of the noble Earl's Bill. I should not like to be left out in the cold, and I believe that the clergyman might still remain in his present position with regard to the churchyards, and yet that Dissenting ministers might be allowed to bury their own people in our churchyards without anything irreverent or unbecoming occurring. There are four bodies of Dissenters in my own parish in Gloucestershire; two have burial-grounds, two have not. I should have no objection to allow the ministers of those denominations to perform funeral rites over their own people. I know them, and have confidence in them all that there would be nothing unbecoming the solemnity of the occasion. I think it is a matter for grave consideration that the refusal to allow Dissenting ministers to officiate implies that they are not fit to be trusted. I believe it is this which stirs them so deeply at the present time. Thousands of them are officiating every Sunday in their own chapels; they preach, they perform funeral services in their own graveyards and in cemeteries, and yet they cannot be trusted to do so in our churchyards. The question has now assumed graver proportions, and the Wesleyans, who have always been most friendly to the Church of England, are being alienated from her. I will not now say what has been the cause of this, but it is the fact. About three years ago, I asked a Wesleyan minister what he thought of the Burial question. "Oh," he said, "we do not move in it; we are quite satisfied with things as they are." And it is the case that in Wales there are hardly any burial-grounds attached to their chapels, because they were content with the Church of England service, but it is not so now. A case occurred the other day in Forest of Dean, when the circuit minister asked permission to officiate at the funeral of a Wesleyan. It was refused, and the vicar had not legal power to grant permission. But what the Wesleyans complain of is, that the curate allowed an official of the Order of Foresters to read a kind of service at the grave. I would mention one or two cases to show how persons feel on this subject. A man asked the clergyman of my parish in Wales to be allowed to be buried in a particular spot. It was represented to him that the part was very full. "Oh," he said, "I hope you will allow it, for my family have been buried there for 300 years." Again, an old firm Churchman was asked to sign a petition against the Burial Bill. He said, "I cannot now, for I wish to do as I would be done by, and I should like to be buried near my own people. Besides," he said, "I am getting old, and I should like to draw nearer to the Dissenters before I die." What I desire is, that concessions should be made to Dissenters without injury to the Church of England. We cannot ignore the Nonconformists. Look at their missionary operations. The Wesleyans collect near £180,000—more than the Propagation Society does. The London Missionary Society collects above £100,000; the Baptist, above £58,000; and the Primitive Methodist, £12,000. Ought men who are doing all this to be disregarded when, having baptized their people, administered the Holy Communion to them, attended them on their sick-bed, they asked to be allowed to offer a prayer or give an address at their graves? The Church of England will never suffer from pursuing a conciliatory course, and conceding what may be called a just claim. I am glad to hear Her Majesty's Government intend to take the subject into consideration. It cannot be advanced by private Members. It is an open sore injurious to the Church and religion in this country, and the sooner it is stayed the better. I think also our burial laws require revision, and that the clergy ought not to be compelled to use our present service over persons of whom no charitable hope can be entertained. I have myself had the pain of reading the Burial Service over a person who did not believe in a future state. We know what scandal occurred at Cowley, where the people broke into the Church, and what a painful scene occurred at the funeral of Baron Pigott.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he would not detain their Lordships, as in the former debate on this subject he had offered some remarks on what he considered was the purport of the Bill. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) now stated that he did not anticipate there would be any desire to proceed with the Bill; and, in accordance with the hint thrown out by the noble Earl, he would content himself by simply asking their Lordships to read the Bill a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months").

On Question that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this day six months.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—BRAKES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS said, that two years ago, on the Motion of a noble Earl (Earl de la Warr), a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the causes of railway accidents, and perhaps, considering the magnitude of the inquiry, we must not be astonished that the Commission had not yet reported. It appeared, however, very desirable that the Commissioners should, with as little delay as possible, give the public the benefit of their opinions on the subject of continuous brakes. In the month of June last several of the leading railway companies, at great expense and inconvenience, conducted for the Commission a series of experiments which extended over a week. On that occasion 10 or 11 forms of brakes were submitted to the tests that were applied; but, up to this time, not a single word had been published by the Railway Accidents Commission as to the results of the experiments. No doubt a continuous brake was a valuable appliance for the prevention of railway accidents, and some companies had adopted it to a certain extent; but it could hardly be expected that pending the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission the companies would go to the very considerable expense of applying continuous brakes to all their rolling-stock. The Great Northern Railway Company were trying Smith's vacuum brake; but the application of it cost £50 in the case of an engine and £15 for every vehicle, and, therefore, the adoption of the brake for every engine and carriage would involve a very serious outlay. He was under the impression that it would be very desirable that a uniform brake should be adopted by all railway companies in the United Kingdom. Every day "through" carriages were run from London to Inverness and Aberdeen, passing over the systems of four or five different companies, and if one adopted Smith's vacuum brake, another Westinghouse's, and a third the chain brake, great confusion would arise in the management of through trains. He thought he had stated enough to justify him in putting the Question of which he had given Notice; and he would, therefore, ask the noble Earl sitting behind him (the Earl of Aberdeen), as the present Chairman of the Railway Commission, Whether, with reference to the experiments upon various descriptions of continuous brakes provided for them by a number of the leading railway companies in June, 1875, the Royal Commissioners upon railway accidents intend to recommend any particular brake for adoption by the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom?

LORD HOUGHTON desired to ask the noble Chairman of the Royal Commission, Whether there was any prospect of the conclusion of the important labours of the Commission, by which the railway interest might be seriously affected? Before the appointment of the Commission many serious accidents had occurred, and it was hoped that the Commission might be able to make suggestions by which a recurrence of such accidents might be prevented. The public and the railway world had anxiously waited for such counsel and advice as the Commission might be able to give; but two years had elapsed without the satisfaction of that anxiety. Doubts were expressed at the time as to the utility of appointing a Commission at all, and whether any practical good would come of it, and those doubts seemed to derive some confirmation from the long delay which had occurred in the making of a Report; which delay suggested that the Commission had had great difficulty in coming to any conclusion, and that, after all, the question of preventing railway accidents must remain much as it stood before the appointment of the Commission.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: I should have been glad to give an answer to the Question of the noble Lord near me, were it not for the obvious consideration that since it is the business of a Royal Commission to present the results of their investigations in the form of a humble Report to the Queen, it would be not only premature, but irregular, if any statement were made in your Lordships' House for the purpose of disclosing any portion of the probable contents of that Report. As to the experiments to which my noble Friend has referred, they were of an extensive character, the necessary materials and appliances being provided by an association of the leading railway companies in a very liberal and complete manner. The Commissioners, on their part, were enabled to secure the valuable services of two eminent engineers, assisted by a detachment of Sappers, under the command of officers of the Royal Engineers; so that everything had been conducted in the most accurate and reliable manner. The trials were public, they were witnessed by a very large number of gentlemen professionally connected with railways, and the general experiments were witnessed by the representatives of the Press, and appeared at the time in the newspapers. I am not aware that any statement or intimation was made by the Commissioners to the effect that those experiments were made for the purpose of enabling them to pronounce an opinion as to which of the various brakes was per se the best. In answer to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Houghton), I may add that, though every effort will be made to complete the Report, it is impossible to fix the exact date when it will be presented; the magnitude of the subject to which both the noble Lords have alluded making it necessary that the whole matter should be gone into with completeness.

EARL COWPER said, the remarks of noble Lords impressed him with the advantage of leaving, as much as possible, the adoption of inventions and appliances for the prevention of railway accidents to the Railway Companies themselves. He thought if it had not been for the appointment of the Commission, it appeared probable that some effective form of brake would have been adopted before this by the Railway Companies. As it was, they were waiting for the Commission, fearful lest they should incur great expense and then find that they had all to do over again. He felt strongly that the great thing was to make railway directors feel that they were responsible for the safety of the public, and to leave them to adopt the best plans for preventing accidents. A great stimulus to railway directors to provide for the safety of passengers lay in the fact that they were liable to very heavy damages in the event of an accident.

EARL DE LA WARR desired to say, in answer to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Houghton), that some excuse must be made for the non-production of the Report of the Commission, for when it had almost come to the close of its labours in the taking of evidence, and was about to prepare the Report, the noble Chairman (the Duke of Buckingham) was appointed to a high office in India, and this led to very considerable delay; for the noble Chairman, in order to complete as far as possible the draft Report, took it with him to Port Saïd; and not only took the Report, but also took the Secretary, so that the Commission was for two or three months not only without its Report, but also without its Secretary.

DOVER HARBOUR.

PETITION. QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to present the Petition of Inhabitants of Dover of which he had given Notice. It was a Petition from the owners of property in Dover, numerous signed—indeed, no Petition could more completely represent all classes and all political parties in that town. It urged on the Government the pressing necessity of meeting the rapidly increasing traffic between Dover and the Continent; it gave a correct history of the last attempts at legislation, and prayed their Lordships' House to express such an opinion as would induce Her Majesty's Government to obtain powers to construct at an early date such an extended harbour at Dover as would provide for the naval and military requirements of the country, and afford ample accommodation for the rapidly increasing traffic between Dover and the Continent. Their Lordships might look with some suspicion on representations which might be biased by local interests; he would therefore add a few words to show that the Imperial grounds which they alleged, both for times of peace and for war, were not to be doubted. He would not enter into antiquarian or historical details, or ask why hundreds of years ago Dover was called "Clavis Regni;" or why £80,000 was spent on it by Henry VIII., and further large sums by Queen Elizabeth. James I., in his charter to the town, spoke of it as "for many ages a most noted and famous port and harbour," the ruin of which "would be the greatest damage and loss to this kingdom." Charles II. ascribed his successes at sea to his ships using Dover harbour to refit and revictual. Sir Walter Raleigh, in his Memorial of Queen Elizabeth, said:—

"No promontory, town, or haven in Christendom is so placed by nature and situation, both to gratify friends and to annoy enemies, as this town of Dover; no place is so settled to receive and deliver intelligence for all matters and actions in Europe from time to time; nor is there in the whole circuit of this famous island any port either in respect of security or defence, or of traffic or intercourse, more convenient, needful, or rather of necessity to be regarded, than this of Dover, situated on a promontory next fronting a puissant foreign King, and in the very straight passage, and intercourse of almost all the shipping in Christendom. And if that our renowned King, your Majesty's father Henry VIII., found how necessary it was to make a haven at Dover (when Sandwich, Rye, Camber, and others were good havens, and Calais also was then in his possession), and yet spared not to bestow of his treasure so great a mass in building that pier, which then secured a probable means to perform the same, how much more is the same now needful; or rather of necessity (those good havens being extremely decayed), no safe harbour being left in all the coast almost between Portsmouth and Yarmouth. Seeing, then, it hath pleased God to give unto this realm such a situation for a port and town, as all Christendom hath not the like, and endowed the same with all commodities both by land and sea that can be wished, methinks there remaineth no other deliberation in this case, but how most sufficiently, and, with greatest perfection possible, most speedily the same may be accomplished."

He believed that every line of that was as true at the present moment as when it was originally written—only Dover had become the more important from the invention and improvements of steam. The subject had been inquired into at various times, from 1836 downwards, by Committees and Commissions. In 1840 the Commission appointed to survey the South-Eastern Harbours reported—

"The situation which appears to us to be of the greatest importance, and at the same time offers the most eligible position for a deep water harbour, is Dover Bay. Independently of its proximity to the Continent, this bay possesses considerable advantages."

The Commissioners of 1844 in their Report said—

"Dover, situated at a distance of only four and a half miles from the Goodwin Sands, and standing out favourably to protect the navigation of the narrow seas, is naturally the situation for a squadron of ships of war. Its value, in a military point of view, is undoubted; but the construction of a harbour of refuge there is, in our opinion, indispensable to give to Dover that efficiency as a naval station which is necessary in order to provide for the security of this part of the coast and the protection of trade. The Commission cannot close their Report without expressing in the strongest terms their unanimous opinion and entire conviction that measures are indispensably necessary to give to the south-eastern frontier of the kingdom means and facilities which it does not now possess for powerful naval protection. Without any except tidal harbours along the whole coast between Portsmouth and the Thames, and none accessible to large steamers, there is now, when steam points to such great changes in maritime affairs, an imperative necessity for supplying by artificial means the want of harbours throughout the narrow part of the Channel."

There were few of their Lordships who were not aware of the miserable accommodation which now existed for the important traffic between Dover and the Continent. During the last seven years the Harbour Board had made several attempts, in addition to those proposed by others, to remedy this great deficiency. In July, 1872, the Board made an agreement with the two railway companies to construct a water station for Continental traffic at a cost of £200,000. In the autumn he (Earl Granville) learnt that their Bill would be objected to by the Government Departments on the same grounds as on former occasions—namely, that it might interfere with the larger plans which were supposed to be under consideration. He brought the matter before his Colleagues, and represented that the position of the Government was untenable—that it could not continue indefinitely this dog-in-the-manger policy, obstructing all proposed improvements, without moving one step in proposing a plan of its own. The result was that a Committee of the Cabinet was formed, consisting of the President of the Board of Trade, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and himself, who most carefully investigated the subject. They commissioned Sir Andrew Clarke, R.E., of the Admiralty, and Sir John Hawkshaw to report on a larger harbour. After considerable negotiation with the Harbour Board and the Railway Companies this scheme was adopted, the Harbour Board dropped their Bill and obtained a vote of £10,000 towards the preliminary expenses of the works. In November, 1873, the Harbour Board gave the necessary notices. A change of Government occurred, and their successors very reasonably requested the Harbour Board to drop their Bill, as they had not had time to consider the question. By this time the Harbour Board was nearly £1,500 out of pocket. In 1875, after 12 months' consideration, the Government themselves promoted a Bill to carry out the same plans. The Bill was opposed by Mr. Rylands and others. Some on the ground of economy, but by more on account of the plan not being sufficiently matured. The second reading was carried, and the Bill was referred to a Select Committee. What was the evidence given before that Committee? The Duke of Cambridge said—

"I do not know of any other part of the Channel so important as regards defence as Dover. The plan commends itself as an advisable mode of enlarging the harbour accommodation of Dover. The position of Dover, being, as it is, in the narrowest part of the Channel, I look upon as of the greatest possible importance. There is no harbour of any importance between Portsmouth and quite the North of England, with the exception of Sheerness, and you can hardly call that a harbour, but rather the mouth of the Thames; but with that exception there is no other harbour on the coast of any magnitude excepting Dover. The Duke of Wellington always considered Dover of the greatest importance. The military works at Dover are very important and extensive. I look upon it that there is no scheme so important as the one before the Committee. Quite irrespective of any commercial question, it would be desirable to carry out the works at Dover now. But if I were asked if it is an important point of communication on general principles between this country and the Continent, I conceive, on that ground alone, there would be great importance attached to it, quite independent of any strategical ground. There is another great advantage at Dover, that there will be no outlay of public money required for the protection of the proposed harbour. A harbour without works would be valueless. The two best stations we have in the country are Portland and this new harbour at Dover. I consider the advantage of Dover very great, from the great facility of concentrating troops by railway from any part of England."

"It is geographically the most important point in Great Britain for having a military harbour. The fortifications at Dover would command the whole of the harbour."

In a confidential Report of the Duke of Wellington in 1843 the Duke particularly recommended Dover as a spot for a harbour of refuge, and as a salient military spot in connection therewith. Major-General Collinson, R.E., commanding for several years the South-Eastern District, gave this evidence—

"Dover is an eminently advantageous point for the embarkation of troops and stores. . . . Very extensive accommodation for this purpose is wanted beyond that which now exists. . . . Dover is the most important strategical point for naval and military operations in the kingdom. . . . I think it is really absolutely necessary for strategic purposes and for military operations."

Sir Alexander Milne, First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, gave this evidence—

"I consider the position of Dover a very important one connected with naval affairs. In case of any operations of a warlike nature, it will become a necessity to have coal in some position in the neighbourhood of Dover. There is no place better suited for it than a harbour at Dover. I attach importance to it as a position for the embarkation of troops. There is no position more central or better adapted for the embarkation of troops than at the end of two railways connected with the interior of England. It is an absolute necessity that this country should have a harbour in that position, that our fleet may have the means of coaling, and that small vessels that are not able to keep the sea in the Downs in very heavy weather should have a place where they can be concentrated."

The evidence of Captain Evans, Hydrographer to the Admiralty, agreed with that of Sir Alexander Milne. Colonel Pasley, R.E., Director of Works at the Admiralty, said—

"I consider it of the utmost importance to the country that the harbour should be provided at Dover. Between Portsmouth and Sheerness there is at present no place where the fleet can coal, and there ought to be a place where the fleet can coal, and Dover being in the narrowest part of the Channel, and at the same time close both to the German Ocean and to the English Channel, is a most important point for the fleet to rendezvous if there be any danger of invasion, and in order that the Fleet may rendezvous there and be there, it is absolutely necessary that a place of coaling should exist. This is a necessity of modern growth. Now, as the Navy consists almost exclusively of steamships, it has become a primary necessity that facilities for coaling should exist. The importance of Dover has accordingly grown very greatly as compared with what it was in those times. If a harbour were to be made anywhere in the neighbourhood, you would have to start afresh and construct fortifications, which at Dover you have already done. At present there is no place where a large force could be embarked in a short time—absolutely none."

Sir John Hawkshaw gave strong evidence as to the feasibility of the plan, of his confidence in the moderate character of the estimates, and of the almost certainty of the estimated increase of traffic. With regard to the last point, he said that engineers had made mistakes as to the cost of their works—an error which, probably, it did not require Sir John's high authority to convince their Lordships — but that he had never known an instance when, with reference to the probable growth of traffic, they had been large enough in their estimates. Mr. Druce, another eminent Civil Engineer, with special experience, corroborated Sir John Hawkshaw's evidence. Mr. W. H.

Earl Granville

Smith, Secretary of the Treasury, said—

"We inherited the scheme from our predecessors. We found it in the form of a Bill last year, and it was delayed in order that the present Government might give it a more full consideration before they committed themselves to it. . . . The Treasury would not have assented to the scheme—I am speaking of the present Treasury—unless it had felt that there were public grounds, grounds of national interest, which justified the scheme as a whole."

After hearing this evidence, what did the Committee report?—

"The evidence adduced before them leaves no room to doubt that, in the case of this country being obliged to engage in warlike operations, the proposed harbour would be of the greatest value and importance, both in a naval and military point of view. At the present moment, it may be said that there is no place between Sheerness and Portsmouth at which vessels of Her Majesty's Navy can obtain a supply of coal if required. The Downs are, no doubt, an admirable naval station, both in point of security and convenience of position, but coaling there would have to be carried on from sea-going vessels or floating depôts, which in time of war would be exposed to attack by the enemy, unless protected by works which at present do not exist. If the proposed harbour is successfully constructed, iron-clads of the largest class can be moored alongside the existing Admiralty Pier, or the Eastern Pier, if modified with that view; coals from any part of England or Wales may be brought by railway in trucks direct to the side of vessels, and shipped with facility, safety, and despatch. In a military point of view, the advantages of the proposed harbour in time of war are not less apparent. Hitherto no proper facilities have been provided either at Woolwich, Chatham, or Sheerness for the embarkation of troops, while at Portsmouth the length of wharf in the dockyard is quite insufficient, and in time of war would probably be required by the Admiralty for naval purposes. On the other hand, Dover is in communication by two railways with the military stations of Canterbury, Maidstone, Sheerness, Chatham, Woolwich, London, Aldershot, Portsmouth, and Shorncliffe; and, as the lines of rail come down to the pier, alongside of which the transports would be lying, a very short time would suffice for the embarkation of a large force. To these considerations must be added the important fact that the proposed harbour will be under protection of great military works, which it would be necessary to provide in any other position where a harbour for naval and military purposes could be constructed. With regard to its capabilities as a harbour of refuge, the Committee, while of opinion that some advantage is likely to be derived by the commercial marine in this respect, yet do not wish to lay too much stress upon this advantage, and were that the only object in view would not feel justified in recommending its construction. Lastly, with regard to the advantage of the proposed harbour, with regard to Channel communication, there is no doubt that the convenience of embarking and disembarking in any weather in the smooth water of a sheltered harbour is of great public importance. That this is fully appreciated by the great companies which carry the postal and passenger traffic from the port of Dover to the Continent, is sufficiently evidenced by the proposals which have in past years been made by them for the construction of a smaller harbour specially designed for that purpose. In conclusion, the Committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the evidence which has been submitted to them, and by which they have been much impressed, to the effect that a considerably increased extent of deep water space might be secured by a slight modification of the present designs, at an increased cost of moderate amount. It appears, however, to the Committee that it would be beyond their functions to recommend such an increase of expenditure, and they therefore content themselves with bringing the evidence referred to specially to the notice of the House."

The Bill was dropped, and in answer to a Question from him, the Duke of Richmond said—

"With regard to the intention of the Government in the matter, he might state that they, after reading the Report of the Committee to the effect that larger works were advisable, and finding that these larger works would cost more money than the tolls would readily cover, thought it better to withdraw the Bill for the present Session in order that they might in the autumn thoroughly sift and digest the evidence, and prepare a plan to submit to Parliament next Session. In making this statement he did not pledge the Government to any particular scheme, but wished to show their Lordships that the Bill was not withdrawn with any view of shelving the matter in any way whatever." — [3 Hansard, ccxxv. 1367.]

Believing the Government intended to proceed with the Bill in the next Session the Harbour Board took no action prior to November, 1875; when on the 10th of that month a letter was received from the Board of Trade stating that the Government had decided not to proceed with the Bill next—that was, this — Session. The delay of the Government in communicating their intention prevented the Board taking any step in the matter. He was sure it was not an intentional want of courtesy, but the inconvenience was not the less. After all that had passed, it would seem as if it was a money difficulty, and increased taxation showed how pressing that money difficulty was. He was the last person to undervalue economy; he belonged to a Government which was supposed to have pushed that virtue too far, and yet, after full deliberation, they resolved that the enlargement of Dover Harbour was a necessity in peace and in war. He was certain that Her Majesty's present Government would not raise the objection of economy in any case where State necessity justified expenditure. The expenditure on the shares of the Suez Canal was justified solely on the necessity of securing the shortest of three routes to India for our commerce and our troops. But surely if that were a necessity—and it was generally admitted to be an advantage—it was, at least, an equal necessity to improve our means of communication with the Continent of Europe in time of peace, and to do that which all the naval and military authorities said was essential, not only for sending out our troops from home, but for the purpose of defence from invasion, and no one would, he presumed, say that the chance of a due pecuniary return was less for the improvement of Dover Harbour than for the purchase of the shares. He sincerely hoped Her Majesty's Government would be able to give some explicit assurance on this question.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, it was very natural that his noble Friend, from his official connection with that part of the country and his position as Chairman of the Harbour Board, should put the Question he had just put, present a Petition, and ask for information on this subject. He could assure his noble Friend that the last thing he would think of would be to decry the Petition which he stated to have been so numerous and respectably signed, or to suggest that the persons who had signed it were not acting in a bond fide way, or that they did not believe the allegations set forth in it. Neither did he rise to undervalue the importance of the harbour of Dover, whether in a strategical, national, or commercial point of view. He accepted the high authorities which his noble Friend had quoted, from His Royal Highness the illustrious Duke the Field-Marshal Commander-in-Chief, down to Sir Walter Raleigh. He was satisfied with the views expressed by the present illustrious Commander-in-Chief and by the late Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, either of whom would have been sufficient for him, and his noble Friend need not have travelled so far back as the worthy Knight of the time of Elizabeth. His noble Friend had left him very little to say—he had with such perfect accuracy described the whole course which the late Government had taken on this subject, the Bill which had been introduced, and the position in which Her Majesty's Government found themselves with respect to that Bill during the last Session. Her Majesty's Government at that time thought it advisable that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee of the other House of Parliament. In consequence of the recommendations of that Committee, and what occurred before it, it was not thought advisable to proceed with the Bill. It was therefore withdrawn, and the Government intended to consider the whole matter during the last autumn. They did consider it; but, as the noble Earl would admit, the subject was one of very high importance, of considerable gravity, and required very great consideration. The Government were not able during the autumn to arrive at a conclusion in time to give the notices which would have been required in accordance with Parliamentary practice. The undertaking also was very large, and one which required a very considerable outlay from the public funds; there was a very important person to be convinced—a person no less important in this Government than in the last, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and the result was that it was not found possible to proceed with so large a scheme during the present Session of Parliament. He was not going to follow his noble Friend into an inquiry whether it was as important from a commercial point of view to improve Dover Harbour as it was to purchase the Suez Canal shares. He would content himself with saying that the Government were perfectly satisfied that Dover Harbour was of very great value from a national point of view. Mr. Smith, indeed, said so in the course of his evidence. The matter was still under the consideration of the Government; but the increased Estimates for the Army and Navy during the present year had rendered it impossible for them to proceed during the present year with a work which must naturally be attended with expense.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he was glad to gather from the answer of the noble Duke that the Government were perfectly alive to the importance of Dover; and, as his opinion had been referred to, he wished to take the opportunity of stating that he adhered to every word of what he had expressed on a previous occasion. It was not that he attached much importance to his own views, but they were the views of the Duke of Wellington and of every military man who had considered the question. Difficulties might, no doubt, have arisen to prevent the works from being pushed on in the present year; but he hoped that, whenever it was possible to do so, these works might be undertaken, for they formed one of the most important military undertakings which could be carried out. We had a position there very capable of defence. A harbour might be formed such as could hardly be formed on any other part of the coast, yet there existed there no satisfactory means of embarking or disembarking troops. We were a great maritime nation; and, as the possibility of such requirements must be provided for, it was of national importance that no time should be lost in making Dover available for military and naval purposes.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that having had charge of the Bill of the late Government on this subject in the other House, he had listened with some anxiety to the answer of the noble Duke. He was glad to hear that the Government had not changed their minds as to the national gravity of this question. The reasons given by the noble Duke for not doing anything in the present year were not convincing, but he hoped that this year's delay would be the last, and that next year they would undertake the completion of this great national work. One peculiarity of the case already mentioned by his noble Friend (Earl Granville) was that a large sum of public money had already been spent at Dover both in the water and on the land. He would not say that this expenditure was wasted; but in the present state of the works it brought in a very inadequate return. A great fortress had been placed there to command and protect the harbour; was it not worth while, then, even at some considerable cost, for the country to complete what it had begun, and make Dover Harbour really safe and adequate for such purposes as the coaling of Her Majesty's ships in time of war, and generally as a naval station, while at the same time they thereby greatly promoted the convenience and safety of the cross-Channel traffic? While at the Board of Trade he had regretted that it was necessary to refuse the assent of the Government, and thus put a stop to plans for the improvement of the Channel intercommunication, because they might stand in the way of the plans of the Government and injure Dover as a naval harbour. He trusted that after the present year the works would be no longer postponed.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, that Dover was, no doubt, an important harbour; but he thought that, in considering the expediency of completing the works there, the Government should not lose sight of the larger question of harbours on the North-East coast. A Royal Commission appointed not many years ago to inquire into this subject reported in favour of Filey Bay as a harbour of refuge, but no action had ever been taken by any Government to carry out this recommendation, although every year a great loss of life occurred on this coast. Nor was there a harbour of defence on the east coast; and before coming to any decision upon the completion of expensive works at any one point of the coast the Government should take into consideration the whole question of harbour refuge and defence upon the east coast.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that Dover stood on a different footing from other harbours. He rose, however, to ask the noble Duke opposite for a more precise answer to his Question. The noble Duke said that the Government were alive to the importance of this subject. So had other Governments been, but nothing had been done. As Chairman of the Harbour Board at Dover, he wished to know what the Government proposed to do. As the noble Duke knew, this Board had powers to raise £500,000 for improving and enlarging the harbour, but they could not act without the permission of the Government.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had admitted the gravity of the question, and the great importance of Dover Harbour. The Government also had shown their desire to do something by taking up the Bill brought forward by their Predecessors. That Bill, it was true, had been withdrawn, but from no desire to stop the further progress of the works. He was not now, however, in a position to pledge the Government as to the exact course they would take next year on this subject.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—OFFICERS OF THE "PANDORA."—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Naval Officers who are about to sail in the "Pandora" with Captain Allan Young, will be allowed to count the time they are afloat?

MR. HUNT: Under the peculiar circumstances of the case they will be allowed to count such time; and they will be placed on the books of one of Her Majesty's ships and be entitled to full pay.

GAS COMPANIES ACT—GAS REFEREES. QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the President of the Board of Trade, What steps were taken by the Board of Trade when they were informed that Mr. R. H. Patterson, one of the gas referees appointed by them under the Act of 1868, had taken out a patent for improvements in the purification of coal gas on the 9th of March 1872, while he held the office of a gas referee; if he would explain to the House for what reasons Messrs. Patterson and Peirce, two of the referees, were superseded in their office in August 1872, and Dr. Tyndall and Mr. A. G. Vernon Harcourt appointed in their places, the said office of gas referee not being abolished or reconstructed in any way; the powers remaining the same as heretofore, but the emolument only being diminished; and, whether he is aware that in the recent action "Patterson v. The Gaslight and Coke Company," the Lords Justices of Appeal condemned in strong terms the withholding of the Gas Referees' Report, dated 31st January 1872, but which the Board of Trade did not receive till the 26th March 1872, between which dates Mr. R. H. Patterson obtained his patent of the 9th March 1872, for the system of purification recommended and suggested in that report and, as stated in evidence, with the sanction and approval of the other two referees; and, if so, what steps he has taken to ascertain the truth of this statement?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The Board of Trade first saw in The Journal of Gaslighting of March 26, 1872, notice of a patent taken out by Mr. Patterson, one of the Gas Referees. On the 23rd of April the Board wrote to Mr. Patterson inquiring whether he was the person referred to in the notice, and, if so, what was the nature of his patent. Mr. Patterson explained that it was not his intention to make any substantial charge for his patent to the companies with which he was officially concerned. The Board of Trade said it was questionable whether a public officer ought to make use of knowledge and experience acquired by him in the discharge of his public duties to establish a claim to a patent. When the patent, if successful, was one which could or might be purchased by manufacturers whom it was the duty of the officer to control, to be used by them for the purposes of a process which he was appointed to regulate, there could be no doubt that the holding of such a patent by such an officer was inconsistent with his public duties. Messrs. Patterson and Peirce were informed on the 23rd of April, 1872, that they would not be re-appointed after the expiration of their annual appointment, in August, 1872; but the circumstances are too long to be stated in answer to a Question. I am aware of the language of the Lords Justices of Appeal in the recent case of "Patterson v. the Gaslight and Coke Company," but as the referees referred to ceased to be the servants of the Board of Trade in 1872, I do not find it necessary to take any further steps in the matter. If the hon. Gentleman will move for the Correspondence on this subject, it shall be laid on the Table.

EGYPT—BOARD OF FINANCE—MR.
RIVERS WILSON.—QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the leave of absence given to Mr. Rivers Wilson on leaving this Country expires; whether any extension thereof has been asked for and whether Her Majesty's Government, as at present advised, see any reason for entertaining such request, if made or about to be made, with the view of enabling Mr. Rivers Wilson to continue his services to the Khedive; and, if he can now state when he expects to lay upon the Table of the House the promised additional Correspondence relating to Egypt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The leave of absence given to Mr. Rivers Wilson was not limited to any particular date, but the time during which he was expected to be absent is now about expiring. A few days ago we received a telegraphic communication from Mr. Rivers Wilson to the effect that the Khedive had asked him whether he would accept an appointment in connection with the Egyptian financial administration, and Mr. Rivers Wilson intimated that he would not be unwilling to accept such an appointment for a period of, say, a year, if he could have an extension of leave for that purpose. To that a reply was given that Her Majesty's Government considered that it would be inconvenient that Mr. Wilson should take any service or should remain in Egypt unless he entirely disconnected himself from the Civil Service of this country. I therefore presume Mr. Rivers Wilson will not accept that appointment, although we have not received any positive communication from him since that intimation was given. I think we shall be able in a very few days to lay the Correspondence upon the Table.

SPAIN—SEIZURE OF THE "OCTAVIA."
QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Cubans who were taken out of the "Octavia," and detained at Porto Rico, have been released; if not, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any steps to procure their release, seeing that the "Octavia" was a British vessel, and that at the time she was seized by a Spanish vessel of war she was on the high seas, and that the Cubans, in common with all on board, were under the protection of the British flag?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Cubans had not been released; but Her Majesty's Government had received an assurance from the Spanish Government that nothing would be done to them or to the vessel until an arrangement had been come to between the two Governments. An instruction to Mr. Layard on the subject was being drawn up.

UNITED STATES—THE WINSLOW EX-TRADITION CASE.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Home Secretary, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, before the final release of the prisoner Winslow, he will afford this House an opportunity of considering the correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, relating to his extradition?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the prisoner Winslow had been further remanded on the application of the Government until the 31st instant pending further communications between the two Governments. As a rule, it was not the practice—and it would be generally inconvenient—to lay Papers upon the Table before the Correspondence had been concluded; but as in this case a partial publication had been made at Washington, the Government would lay the Papers on the Table as far as they had gone.

AT SALONICA.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether Her Majesty's Consul at Salonica has made any report on the circumstances which led to and accompanied the recent massacre at Salonica; and, whether he has any objection to state its purport?

MR. BOURKE: Some Papers have been received within the last few days. They relate to the whole subject, and it would be inconvenient to lay a part of the Correspondence on the Table before the rest. In answer to the first Question, I have to state that Mr. Consul Blunt, the Consul at Salonica, has made a Report to Her Majesty's Government upon the lamentable occurrence which took place there the other day, and that the purport of that Report is to this effect: A Bulgarian girl of a village in the district of Salonica, having embraced Mahomedanism, had to come to Salonica to make before the Grand Council a declaration to that effect, a formality required by the local law in regard to Mahomedan converts. On her arrival at the railway station, some Greeks, who, it appears, expected her, seized her and tore off her ferijah and yashmak. The Turks who accompanied her interfered, a scuffle ensued, and the police on duty at the station separated the disputants, and succeeded in taking charge of her. While they were conducting the girl to the Konak they were assailed by a crowd of Greeks, who got possession of her and put her in the carriage of the American Vice Consul, which was driving by at the time, and she was conveyed to the American Consulate. The next day, about 11 A.M., some Mahomedans called on the Pasha and insisted that the girl should be brought to the Konak. The Pasha thereupon sent a message to the American Consulate requiring the immediate presence of the girl at the Grand Council. In the absence of the American Vice Consul, his brother is stated to have declared to the bearer of the Pasha's message that the girl had left the Consulate. The Turks became impatient at the non-appearance of the girl, and warned the Pasha that if he had not the power to deliver her from the Franks they would attack the American Consulate, and from the Konak they proceeded to a mosque in the vicinity where other Mahomedans had assembled. About this time M. Moulin, the French Consul, and Mr. Henry Abbott, the German Consul, went in the vicinity of the mosque, where they were surrounded by the Mahomedans and forced to enter. The mob became furious, notice was sent to the Pasha, who proceeded to the spot with some of the principal Turks, some Beys, and a few officers of police. The crowd refused to disperse. The Consuls promised to have the girl brought to the Konak, and wrote to the brother of the German Consul to give her up. On learning the danger his colleagues were in, Consul Blunt started at once for the Konak; he was met by several unarmed Turks, with some of whom he endeavoured to get to the mosque. The French Chancellor begged him not to try, as the crowd would let no European approach. At the earnest request of the French Consular Cavass and several Turks, who represented the state of affairs as most critical, he ran to the Konak and wrote a hurried note to the American Consulate, insisting that the girl should be given up. The girl was not there, but she was discovered in the house of M. Ayverinos and given up to the British Consular Cavass, who took her at once to the Konak, but too late to save the French and German Consuls, for they were already murdered. These were the facts of the case. The whole of the Papers bearing on the subject would be laid on the Table of the House.

CIVIL SERVICE INQUIRY COMMISSION —CUSTOMS OUT-DOOR DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. BOORD asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any scheme, based upon the Third Report of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission, has yet been decided on with regard to the Customs Out-Door Department?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that no scheme based upon the Report referred to had yet been decided upon, but the whole subject was under consideration.

CRIMINAL LAW—MAD DOGS.

QUESTION.

MR. SYKES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a judgment given by Mr. Turner in the County

Mr. Bourke

Court, in which he held that no person was justified in shooting a dog whether mad or not, but that it was the duty of the police to capture the mad dog and bring it before two magistrates, and who, if they were satisfied the dog was rabid, would give an order for its destruction?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to this subject by the Question of the hon. Member, and he could only hope that the law was not in such a state as it was represented to be by the learned Judge; but that he could not answer for. If the law were such as it was stated to be, he should be exceedingly sorry for the police; it would be cruelty to keep the dogs in misery, and he should not like to be the magistrate before whom they were brought. For his own part, he might say that he should give no directions to the Metropolitan Police to act in accordance with the decision referred to.

IRELAND—KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any arrangement has been entered into between the Kingstown Commissioners and the Commissioners of Kingstown Harbour as to the purchase of ground belonging to the Harbour Commissioners; and, if so, the extent and situation of such ground; and, whether, if the plot of ground now used by the Harbour Commissioners is the land proposed to be sold, any, and if so what, arrangements have been made to provide storage and yard accommodation for the Harbour Commissioners?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the plot of ground to be leased by the Commissioners of Kingstown Harbour to the Commissioners of Kingstown Township for the Kingstown Townhall measures about 130 feet by 90 feet. It lies in the centre corner of the Harbour Commissioners' yard. It was occupied by the contractor as storage ground, stables, and offices, but since the completion of the works, now about 15 years since, it has been practically unoccupied and lying waste. There is no reasonable prospect of its being required for any future purpose connected with the harbour.

THE SLAVE TRADE—TREATY WITH THE SULTAN OF ZANZIBAR.
QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact, as stated in the newspapers of yesterday, that a Treaty has been concluded with the Sultan of Zanzibar for the suppression of the Slave Trade within the Sultan's dominions; and if he can give the House any further information on the subject?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that within the last day or two the following telegram had been received at the Foreign Office from the Resident at Aden, dated May 14—

"From Zanzibar Consulate, dated May 6.—Have negotiated with Sultan. Abolition of all slave routes by land, and no caravan to fit out for purchase of slaves or slave hunting in the interior of Africa. All slaves coming to coast to be seized and confiscated, and all land caravans seized. Dealers to be imprisoned."

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (DUBLIN).
QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If any new circumstances have occurred since the Treasury Minute of June 1874 was sanctioned by this House to occasion the suspension of the promotions in the Registry of Deeds, Ireland, in case of vacancies recently occurring, and when will effect be given to the recommendations of the head of that department consequent thereon?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Promotions in the Registry of Deeds (Ireland) have been suspended because, after an inquiry, it has been found desirable to propose an entirely new system of keeping the Registers, for which an Act of Parliament is necessary. A Bill will be introduced in due course.

CITY OF LONDON COMPANIES.
ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

MR. JAMES, in rising to call attention to the present position of the Eighty-nine Companies mentioned in the Second Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales 1837; and to move an Address for a Return setting forth in detail a Statement of the real and personal property vested in such

Companies respectively; also a detailed Statement of the charities payable by such Companies and of the income derived from all sources; and a Statement of expenditure and receipts during the last three years preceding the 1st day of January 1875, said: Mr. Speaker—I am not unaware of the magnitude of this subject, and of the many interests affected by it. Since this Notice of Motion of mine has been placed on the Paper representations have been made to me from sources of various sorts that the influence, power, and wealth of the opposing bodies would be so great that for any private Member to attempt to deal with it would be a Quixotic attempt. Of the power and influence of those forces there is no reason whatever to doubt; but I believe that as the information for which I am about to ask is founded on what is reasonable, equitable, and just, it is what, if not the present, at least some future Government, at no very distant date, will consider it their duty to grant. I regret that very little Parliamentary evidence exists upon which it is possible for me to establish this case, and while I shall have to avail myself, to a certain extent, of such information as is within any private Member's reach, I hope I shall not state anything inaccurate, misleading, or contrary to the fact. These Companies form an integral part of the Corporation of the City of London itself, and that they are themselves municipal Corporations in the strictest sense, I hope to be able to show from high authority stated in this House. For many years, as everyone is aware, the condition of the Corporation of the City of London has remained unaltered and unchanged, and it has always appeared to me that it is not a little singular and strange that this great Corporation which has taken an honourable part in many various and different reforms which we have witnessed during the last 25 or 30 years, as far as itself is concerned, has shown such disinclination to depart from ancient usages and forms, and has hence become more narrow and exclusive as the metropolitan area has spread. It is sometimes alleged that the reason why the City has always brought such fierce resistance to bear against the various proposals made at different times to bring into one central area the different jurisdictions and local authorities which

London at present contains, is that the trustees of the ancient Guilds, to which I am about to call attention, are perfectly well aware that by such a change they will be brought much more closely under the scrutiny of the public eye, and that their funds would be devoted to purposes of a much more catholic and useful kind than they at present profess to have. Although, sooner or later, this question of the municipal reform of London must receive the attention which the subject deserves, I see no reason why the citizens of London, and I may add the people outside—because I do not think this is a parochial question in any sense of the word—should await that change in asking for full information on the subject of the property which these bodies have under their charge. I have been told that this attempt of mine is one of an inquisitorial and unnecessary kind—that it is an attack on private funds—that if the Government granted my demand deprivation and confiscation of property might ensue. An unreasonable comparison has been drawn between these bodies and joint stock companies, private firms, and clubs. I must ask, do clubs elect municipal officers? Do joint stock companies hold land in mortmain, and exercise large trading privileges under Royal and other charters? Do private firms in that capacity exercise Parliamentary franchises? I must enter my humble protest against the idea that these Companies are private bodies, and I think the idea deserves a protest, and has every right to be condemned, that when during the last 25 or 30 years we have instituted inquiries into municipal and ecclesiastical corporations of all kinds, into our Universities and endowed schools, that when not two Sessions ago an inquiry was instituted in this House even in regard to monastic and conventual institutions, so far as their tenure of property in land is concerned, these Companies should remain isolated in their position, should remain entirely uncontrolled, while their duties are so imperfectly discharged, and that a complete ignorance with reference to their property should be obstinately and persistently maintained. It is no exaggeration to say that in consequence of the fierce resistance, I might almost say resistance to the death, on the part of the Civic authorities to disclose in the very smallest degree any information with respect to their property and funds, an idea prevails generally out-of-doors, and is increasing by degrees, that their revenues are applied to purposes very different from those to which they were originally intended to be used, that the charities are very often frittered away and given to those by whom they are least deserved, and that nothing is done to promote the special industries and trades upon which their success and reputation ought in a great measure to depend. There may be those who think this is a question undesirable to stir up, and the maxim Quieta non movere may be very well in many respects; but I, however, maintain that a strong public opinion on this subject already exists. There have been speeches made on many occasions, and frequent articles on the subject have appeared in the daily and weekly metropolitan Press. Perhaps in some of these words and denunciations have been expressed in terms with which I have no sympathy, and which I do not fail to deprecate. But, at all events, they show there is a strong opinion on this subject. Speaking two or three years ago at the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, Sir John Bennett, who is a Citizen and ex-Sheriff of the City of London, and also a Spectacle Maker, said—

“That while they were strong in the City in respect to technical education, because of the Guilds founded for that purpose, yet in many essential respects these Guilds had not fulfilled their duties; a little gentle persuasion would remedy this, because the Guilds had loads of money, and, like the fly in the treacle pot, could not move for wealth.”

I read the other day an article by Mr. Philips—well qualified to speak with authority on these matters—which appeared in The Gentleman's Magazine. He said they were so glutted with money that they did not know what to do with it. It was true that they feasted and feasted and built gorgeous halls. It was difficult, however, to say that they did much more. True it was that many of them feasted under powers conferred in them by having charters, and it was true also that in dealing out their charities they were narrowly watched by the Charity Commissioners. It was also true, however, from the results of recent litigation, that some of them were not above pocketing as their own private property money which was intrusted to them for the relief of the poor and the infirm. Charity exhausted very little of their revenues; and what was done with the surplus the members of the respective Courts only knew. A book has been lately written on Municipal London, by Mr. Firth, which contains a series of important charges which I think it is right the several authorities should have the earliest opportunity of being able publicly to refute, because while uncontradicted they must raise in the public mind an impression of the existence of a great deal of unpleasant truth.

In the absence of information on this subject, it is difficult to know in the first instance where to turn, so little is known, and so much has been concealed. The Report of the Commission was made in 1837, and a Return in 1868 was moved for by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) with reference to the Charities, but no Parliamentary evidence has been brought to light to show that the corporate property is rightly administered or the funds well spent. Before I proceed further, I should like to point out what connection between the Companies and the City precisely exists. I have said they are municipal corporations in the strictest sense. The Parliamentary and municipal franchise in the City is vested in the Livery, in which no person can have a right to vote except by being a member of a Company. By them are elected the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, the City Chamberlain, the Sheriffs, the City Auditors, the Bridge House Estate Trustees. They also possess the unique political right of electing the Members of Parliament who represent the City in this House, so long as they have the residential qualification. This is a power which is liable to very great abuse, and from the Return which I moved for a few days since, I hope when it is brought up we shall see how many persons have by purchase obtained their political rights. As far as the status of these municipal corporations is concerned, I will quote from what took place here 40 years since, when this question was last brought before the House. It was at a time when the Companies were under the investigation of the Municipal Commissioners, and Mr. Attwood, who was himself Master of the Merchant Taylor's

Company, rose in the House to move that the Petition which had been presented to the Committee on Municipal Corporations should be discharged in consequence of the grave charges which it contained against the Merchant Taylor's Company. Speaking on that occasion Lord Althorp, the Minister of the day, said—

“With respect to the view the hon. Member took of the Order to refer the Petition under debate to the Committee on Municipal Corporations, he thought that the hon. Member was not exactly correct. The Committee was to inquire into the defects of the Corporations of England and Wales, and to report thereon. It was to look into and to ascertain those defects, and in order to do so, every Company, and (to use the expression) every subordinate Company connected, as they must be, with Municipal Corporations, should come under the cognizance of the Committee. With respect to the question whether a trading Company was to be considered as connected with the constitution of a Corporation, he thought that it certainly was.”—[3 Hansard, xv. 1119.]

Summing up the debate the Attorney General of that day said—

“One benefit of the present discussion was, they were all at length agreed that, if not now, some distinct inquiry must speedily be made into the state of these trading Corporations, seeing that some of the functions exercised by them were clearly Municipal functions, and therefore make them Municipal Corporations.”—[Ibid. 1124.]

As far, however, as they and the City have been concerned in recent years, their connection has been kept as much as possible in the background, as the best means of resisting projected reforms.

I should like to say a few words on the origin of these ancient Guilds and the terms which their charters contain. They must be considered the legitimate representatives of the early Anglo Saxon and Plantagenet Guilds. The Guild in the first instance seems to have been a sort of territorial division somewhat analogous to our modern ward. Gradually they assumed positions connected with special trades. In the days of the Plantagenets, the power and influence possessed by them was so great that it was a question whether they should not be entirely suppressed. It may be said that municipal government and these mercantile communities and privileges grew up side by side, their object chiefly being the preservation of existing trade monopolies and the creation of new ones, the promotion, as far as possible, of what I may call good and sound commercial morality amongst all persons with whom the trade was identified, and so far as the City of London was concerned the wealth, power, and influence of that City and its surrounding areas. Gradually a large number of these Guilds became incorporated, and about the time of Edward III. and Richard II. in greatest numbers. Nothing could be more simple than the way in which they originated. Take the instance of "the Grocers." They were not then called "grocers" but "pepperers," because pepper was one of the chief commodities they dealt with. It is related that 22 persons carrying on the trade of pepperers met at St. Mary Axe, and they determined to form a Guild. They assembled, dined together—each of them paid 1*d.* as a contribution for a priest to pray for the brotherhood and of all Christian people, and thus the Guild was established by feasting and praying. Formerly many of the Grocers were very great and distinguished persons. Sir John Philpot was one of the earliest members of the Grocer's Company, and he is described by Fuller as—

"the brave merchant who in 1378 fitted out a fleet at his own expense to put down piracy amongst the Scotch," and who for that and among other services was described as—

"the scourge of the Scots, the fright of the French, the delight of the Commons, the darling of the Merchants, and the hatred of some noble Lords."

He may be taken as a good illustration of the character and influence of a London Grocer in Plantagenet times. In the days of the Stuarts Sir Thomas Middleton, one of the principal founders of the East India Company, was a leading Grocer, and a typical instance of a member of that body. These persons had all the interests of their trade thoroughly at heart, and when they died there was a priest to pray for the repose of their souls. Gradually they adopted a distinctive dress to show their power, influence, and wealth; it is supposed that thus the term "Livery" first originated, and although in the present day the wearing of particular dresses to denote a particular profession or business would be resented, yet there is endless information in books and volumes written on the pageant and processions on different occasions in which these gorgeous dresses were made use of, and more particularly on the occasions when the Companies with the Lord Mayor went in procession from Westminster to Guildhall, the abandonment of which custom is perhaps to be regretted. No change whatever has ever taken place in the manner in which the members of these different Companies have been admitted. There were three modes of admission—by patrimony, by purchase, and by servitude. I think I am correct in saying that servitude has fallen almost wholly into disuse, so far at least as it has any practical effect. I am unable to cite any particular case in which parents or guardians have apprenticed a child to a particular trade in any one of these Companies, in order that he might have the particular education it would be natural they should wish him to have:—admission by patrimony is by right of birth, and it is stated that sometimes children are admitted as early as five or six, in order that they may derive substantial benefit in their early youth. Purchase is a privilege obtainable on the payment of certain fees, varying from two to three guineas, to as much, in some cases, as £300 or £400. I am told that no Ironmonger, bond fide—unless he applied for a mandamus, which possibly might succeed—could join the Ironmongers' Company, without paying a sum that would amount to £200. However this may be, it is seldom any of the persons belonging to these Companies are often connected with the trade with which they were originally identified. Many of the members have no City residences, they live in the provinces, and the work of making craftsmen, for promoting which some of them were originated, seems almost wholly to have been neglected. In addition to this, purchase is a violation of municipal rights. It has been decided repeatedly that a person obtaining the freedom of a Corporation, not otherwise entitled to it, by the payment of a sum of money renders such purchase void as being an essential violation of the bye-laws of such Corporation. Much more might it be affirmed—that the system may be held bad practised by many of these bodies established for so important a purpose as the protection of trade, by which the freedom is sold to persons wholly unconnected with the trade they profess to represent. It may be also well to remark that in the Plantagenet and early times no person was admitted to any Company except that Company whose trade he intended to practise; but now the fact, as the Commissioners of 1837 reported, that admission may be obtained to any Company seems conclusive against the supposition that anything in the preliminary proceedings of a Company tends to secure that the person admitted will obtain a knowledge of the trade which the Company professes to represent. As the forms of admission still remain the same, so it is also with the system of government. It appears to have undergone no change whatever, or, at all events, a very slight change. There have been Masters, a Court of Assistants, and Wardens, the chief of whose duties appears to be the management of their gigantic properties. The larger the Company, the greater is the mystery with which it is managed. It is sometimes said that if a person is troublesome in connection with the Livery the way in which he is kept quiet may be well imagined. There are no properly appointed auditors; no balance sheets are presented to the Company's members; few of them have any properly constituted Courts. They are nearly all self-elected. If admission is by seniority, there is always the ballot box by which the electors are protected. There is no guarantee that leases may not be given at nominal rent to the various members or Court officials, or that instead of the funds benefiting the Company they are chiefly utilized in the interests of the relations of those by whom the business of the Court is managed. After members are entered, they have certain privileges. Sometimes, according to the Report of the Commissioners, they have the right of enjoying pensions — a system, as the Commissioners reported, open to the greatest possible objections—by which pecuniary advantages are attached to those who discharge the duties of Trustees, which should never be annexed to such obligations. There is little doubt that the members of these Courts receive frequent opportunities of attending and inviting their friends to sumptuous dinners; they receive almost sinecure salaries for discharging not very onerous duties; they may be paid for attending sub-committee meetings. They are able to confer gratuitous education on their children and relations, and for their poorer connections they have alms, doles, and charities. Notwithstanding all these privileges, few maintain their duties: they in no way keep up the purposes for which they were originally organized.

At first they appear to have acted as a sort of constant inspectors of adulterated articles. I have spoken of the Grocers, whose object was to render good and sound every article which the members of the trade dealt with. In 1456 one John Ashfield was fined 6s. 8d. by the Grocers because he had mixed "untrue cinnamon, pepper, and ginger;" but now, in 1876, a grocer may mix iron filings with his tea and sand his sugar, supply any amount of adulterated food, perfectly free from the danger of any proceedings being taken against him by the Grocers or any other Company. Similar provisions for the protection of their trades existed in many of the Companies—the Skinners, the Dyers, the Pewterers, the Merchant Taylors, and many others. Very peculiar rights appear to have been exercised by the Company of Stationers. They were not so much censors of the Press, for in those days the Press did not exist, but they were the custodians of the national mind. In the reign of Queen Mary, in order to protect the Church and State, a charter was granted to the Stationers, by which they had power to search in the shops of the different booksellers and destroy works which might tend to promote sedition or heresies. For discharging this duty they seem to have been allowed the right of publishing almanacks, and in these they exercised the functions of soothsayers and astrologers. They were not particularly successful in their vaticinations. Success to Charles I., Charles II., and to Commonwealth was alike predicted, and many of the expeditions proved disastrous which their prophets favoured with propitious omens. Old Moore and poor Richard's almanack are still published under their auspices: issued with the imprimatur of the Archbishop of Canterbury they were long considered the best publications produced in England. It has been difficult to find, it is said by some authorities, in so small a compass such a quantity of ignorance, profligacy, and imposture as is still condensed in these publications. They preserved this exclusive right to issue almanacks until a very recent period. At the end of the last century a printer named Carnan brought an action on the subject against the Stationer's Company; but through their wealth and influence—notwithstanding the legal decision theoretically abolished the monopoly in 1775—they were able to buy up all rival publications, and it was not until 1828, when the Society for the diffusion of Useful Knowledge was first started, that the power of issuing almanacks opened the channels of free trade, and distributed this monopoly among other bodies. There are still certain Companies which exercise their trade privileges. The Goldsmiths have the right of assaying metals, and the Gunsmiths of proving gun barrels. The Fishmongers have the right of destroying putrid fish, and the Apothecaries of destroying unsaleable drugs, and in this respect no doubt they render valuable services. Generally speaking, however, the Companies do very little, indeed nothing, to promote that technical education and instruction which is so much needed, and instead of these mysteries being lawfully trained, regulated, and governed in order, as the ancient Charters express it, that no bad or false workmanship may be admitted, everything in regard to the education and improvement of taste in technical or scientific knowledge is left to Sir Henry Cole, Mr. Buckmaster, and the teachers of the large Establishment of the Government at the South Kensington Museum, and the inadequate efforts of a few philanthropic and benevolent persons who may initiate some private enterprize. I should be sorry, however, were I not to recognize the few services which some of the Companies have, to a certain extent, rendered. I am aware that something has lately been done by the Clockmakers and Coachmakers providing a small technical library and exhibitions of models and of drawings. Others are well and honourably known in connection with the schools in aid of which they may have given generous contributions. Something has been done by the Grocers and Clothworkers to promote the delegacy of unattached students at Oxford. We have heard something, too, of what has been done by the Turners; but their efforts only serve to show how they should be imitated and emulated by the larger Companies. Nothing, it appears to me, could be more judicious than the scheme of examination and the character of prizes awarded by the Company of Turners—it is well known they are of small and comparatively limited resources. Why are not commensurate efforts made by the others?

It is not long since that the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), in an address to his constituents in the autumn, at Greenwich, supplemented by a paper in Evening Hours, pointed out how much might be done in the interests of the working classes by efforts to improve education in the interests of art and science, were their efforts properly directed. In the course of his remarks he said that it was much to be regretted that such great attempts had to be made by Government instead of agencies less centralized. The only power strong enough in that direction, he said, appeared to be in the London Companies, they were great institutions—probably unparalleled. It was sometimes remarked, however, he continued, by the timid that in this country there were few fortifications; there was one, however, far away without a rival, and that was the City of London. If the foundations of that great deep were ever to be broken up, it was to be hoped that the leading adjuncts of its high functions would be re-adjusted in accordance with the spirit of the age, if it was to maintain its position as the centre of the commerce of the world.

It is sometimes alleged that the City has a monopoly of these privileges: I will quote from various charters to prove that these benefits were bestowed not merely on the City but on the surrounding areas. A Charter given by William and Mary to the Grocers provided that all persons carrying on the business of confectioners or refiners within the City, or within three miles thereof, should be of the Commonalty of Grocers. The Charter of the Draper provides that no man shall be admitted to the Drapers' Company unless he has duly practised the trade of a draper. The Goldsmiths' Charter includes all those instructed in the trade within the City and three miles. The Merchant Taylors' Charter requires that members shall be engaged in the making of apparel in the City or suburbs. It is the same with the Clothworkers, and similar conditions are contained in the Charters of the Dyers, Brewers, Leather-sellers, Carpenters, Cordwainers, Cutlers, and Carriers, and many others. It may be now asked, what right have suburban tradespeople to participate in their rights and privileges? It was said by Lord Macaulay that London was to the Londoner what Athens was to the Athenians in the days of Pericles, and Florence to the Florentine in the 16th century: the Citizen was proud of the grandeur of his City, punctilious of her claims to respect, conscious of her privileges, and jealous of her franchises. Unfortunately, however, instead of extending its advantages for the good of the many, it has confined them, in the present day, for the advantage of a very few. Instead of opening its arms and embracing the surrounding areas, it has confined itself to its own immediate precincts and narrowed its borders.

I have shown clearly and distinctly from the documents I have quoted that those Companies cannot be looked upon as voluntary societies, but that they are public bodies, of which not only Courts of Assistants but all the members have full right to be beneficiaries. It has been frequently decided that they are not, as in the case of other corporations, members by prescriptive usage, but that membership ought to be confined to persons possessing certain qualifications—namely, those who are really working members and have a complete knowledge of their respective trades, well acquainted with the working of the said mysteries, and having the power to compel other persons to become members. Their original object appears to have been to connect themselves with those by whom the interests of their trade might be promoted. They were inspectors of adulterated articles, and were to interest themselves in all such proceedings by which their fellow-workers might become benefited. I would ask, are they now fulfilling those duties? or are their funds being devoted to other objects and different purposes? A Charter was given to the Drapers' Company as far back as the reign of Edward III., continued by Richard II., wherein it was stated, that because strangers had entered London and interfered and meddled with the trade in such a manner so that the price of drapery enhanced and its quality deteriorated, in future no person should carry on the trade of a draper in the City of London, or the suburbs, unless he had been initiated and admitted as a member of the Drapers. The Government have urged, as a reason for not giving any particulars with reference even to the government of these bodies, that some of them have disappeared or been obliterated in consequence of the decay of the trade with which they were originally identified: there is nothing, however, to prevent those which are moribund from being resuscitated. Comparing the Report of the Commissioners with the City Directory, which professes to give a complete list of the various Companies, I find that the latter takes no notice of the Pavours, the Comb-makers, the Silk-throwers, the Silkmen, the Pinmakers, the Gardeners, the Soap-makers, the Ribband-makers, the Tobacco Pipe-makers, the Long Bowstring-makers, the Woodmongers, the Fishermen, &c.; though they were not large or important bodies, it may be fairly asked what has become of them and of their funds and properties, if such ever existed. From the fact that many of these Charters are still unrepealed, it is quite competent for these bodies to reassert their trade privileges if they dared. It is not likely they would venture to do so with the present popular views on the subject of Free Trade; but, to a certain extent, it must be regarded as a perversion of public funds that these vast sums should be given to wealthy, and from the fact of being wealthy, often obscure, City men, and that nothing should be done for the working classes of Clerkenwell, Hackney, and Bethnal Green. While I have pointed out that under their charters the City and suburban trade have to discharge certain grave and important responsibilities, the advantages conferred upon them by holding these charters can with difficulty be estimated. Under them the right of holding land in perpetual succession, contrary to the Statute of Mortmain, has been granted. The whole question of revenues in mortmain may be variously debated. Everyone is aware that large estates are held by this tenure both by the Universities and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and, as was shown by the Commission which recently reported on University Revenues, nothing could be more satisfactory than the management of their property by the Oxford and Cambridge Colleges. Why, I ask, should not the same amount of information be given about these City Companies? It may be asked why it is, if the metropolitan tradespeople are really interested in these matters, that their rights have not been re-asserted? Well, I believe that, to a large extent, they are ignorant of their privileges, and that that ignorance has been studiously and carefully fostered by the darkness and mystery by which the Courts of Assistants have been determined that their management should be surrounded.

In order that the dignity and grandeur of the City might be promoted, power is given to the Guilds under these charters to purchase lands for the benefit of the aged, the weak, and decayed persons. I might well ask, for reasons which shall presently be stated, if the property so obtained by the Merchant Taylors and the Wax Chandlers has been always so devoted. The Goldsmiths, by a charter given to them in the reign of Edward III., confirmed by Richard II., were entitled to purchase land to the value of £20 a-year for the sustentation of weak and aged decayed Goldsmiths; because it was found in the practice of their trade that the smoke of the quicksilver injured their eyes, and tended to make these persons prematurely weak, decayed, and infirm. In process of time, by mechanical improvements, these dangers have been removed, but how is that money now disposed of? What is the present value of the land? Is it given to the interests of the poor? It is greatly to be regretted that in regard to the tenure of property in land by these Companies so much ignorance prevails. No reliance can be placed on the Domesday Return Book, and, as far as the City is concerned, there is no Return. These bodies pay no succession duty, and they never sell, and yet many of them are those who scarcely lift a finger of their hands to do anything for the promotion of that technical instruction for the want of which our public buildings are monuments of want of taste, and our shops are filled with cheap and nasty stuff, instead of anything which is of real and substantial worth. It should be remembered that of all the places in this country in which land is chiefly covetable it is so in the City of London. The evil to which I have alluded has increased, and is increasing, with our vast growth of population, and, if continued unchecked, it will soon be said that there will be scarcely an inch of land to stand upon. There is another wide question in reference to these bodies which I will briefly touch upon—I mean their ecclesiastical preferments. I possess particulars with reference to the manner of distribution and patronage of livings in the hands of some of the accredited representatives of the Companies, and without entering into particulars, I will merely remark that it is, in my judgment, a question how far they are proper bodies to whom such grave functions should be intrusted. Having now spoken of their different duties and privileges, we may form some estimate of what is the magnitude of their revenues. The property possessed by them is variously estimated. I have heard it said that they possess an annual income of £300,000 or £500,000. This is sometimes thought exaggerated. However, I have lately examined the City Rate Books, and I find that in the City of London alone, as appears by the Valuation Books in the 80 City parishes, the gross estimated rental possessed by these Bodies amounts to £500,416. That is exclusive of their property in other parts of the metropolis as well as in different parts of the country, their Irish estates, and their personal property. Mr. Gilbert, author of Contrasts, some two years ago published in that work some interesting particulars in reference to these revenues. The facts given by Mr. Gilbert have never been contradicted. He stated that from the City Rate Book he had abstracted the estimated rental of seven of the large Halls, and to the amount of rental he added an equal sum for rates, insurances, and household expenses. This is the result of the estimate of these various "household management" expenses. The Clothworkers, £10,000; the Drapers, £16,000; the Fishmongers, £7,000; the Goldsmiths, £11,000; the Merchant Taylors, £6,000; the Salters, £6,000; the Grocers, £8,000. In the Report of the Commissioners full information is given in reference to the revenues possessed by the Drapers. They are put down at £24,000. Since then, their large Hall in Throgmorton Street has been erected, at a cost of £7,000—£5,000.

is spent on payments to salaried officers, £4,000 on entertainments, and £4,000 on alms and charities. From information I have received from private sources the property of the Drapers has of late considerably increased from the falling in of leases. The ground rent of a recent garden in the City is now annually worth £16,000.

I spoke, in the earlier part of my remarks, of the privileges accorded to the Drapers. I might ask, how far have the Drapers of London now any participation in the distribution of those large revenues? I have already said that they present no balance sheet; that they have no properly constituted system of audit; and that they give no information in reference to the administration of their properties; that any attempt at reformation and improvement is resisted; that it is always looked on with deep-rooted objection is not astonishing. All reform within the City is intolerable; it is illustrated by a mere recapitulation of what took place in 1856 in the Court of Aldermen, when Sir George Grey brought forward a Bill for improved municipal government in London—described as a very mild measure—and when it was then stated by these gentlemen, that they were surprised to find a great statesman applying the idea of meum and tuum to a great Corporation in a way different from what he would apply it to a private individual.

It is sometimes alleged, that as regards their trust property, the Companies are under the Charity Commissioners. This is perfectly true as regards this trust property; but in respect to the corporate property they are wholly unrestricted. Jobbery has not been unfrequent in municipal bodies. The best guarantee for good management is a system of public accounts, with properly appointed and responsible auditors: but close self-elected Courts, are open to the gravest possible abuses. To my mind a very narrow line divides the two classes of property in all reformed, and in all unreformed corporations, those used for external objects—not affecting the inner life of the municipality—such as doles, alms, and charities, and of those affecting the management for internal purposes, such as the support of town clerks, halls, and offices. It was decided, at the time of the passing of the Act of 1835, that in the case of all corporations scheduled in that Act, both were to be applied for public interests and public uses; and I should like to know whether any distinction can be drawn between the two classes of property which are possessed by reformed bodies mentioned in the Act, and those which were omitted. I think the charge might be made against the London Companies that, perhaps through their apathy, the education of the metropolis has been neglected. The expenditure of the London School Board has made quite a flutter amongst the metropolitan Vestries. I have by me a list of all the resolutions which have been passed by the different Vestries on this subject: on all sides there has been what I may call a howl of indignation from the London ratepayers; but this would never have been put forward had there been a greater desire on the part of the City Companies to educate independent traders, instead of squandering their own revenues for private purposes. It is not an expression to which I am particularly devoted—but what Mr. Mill called the unearned increment of these bodies has been disproportionately given to private objects, whilst public objects have lain by and been neglected. It would be waste of time to show how enormously their property has increased in particular instances. I will illustrate it, however, from two cases, in respect of property belonging to the Mercers, and ex uno disce omnes. They hold property under trust from Sir Thomas Gresham, and from Lady Joan Bradbury. Both these estates are mentioned in the Return obtained by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu). I find that property was left by Lady Joan Bradbury, according to the Return, amounting to £1 10s. a year, to be given to educational purposes. I have obtained particulars from the Charity Commissioners, and find that 10 years ago the value of that property was estimated at £8,709 by the assistant of the Commissioners. Sir Thomas Gresham left £340 for educational purposes, and the moiety of the value of that estate in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange now amounts to £12,240. I think that, in any inquiry into these Companies, it would be well to ascertain how the Courts interpret decayed members—whether they are decayed in business, failed by their own rash and foolish speculations, or whether they are honest tradesmen, whose health may have broken down and families become ruined in the attempts to earn an honest livelihood. There is no doubt that large sums of money were left to the Companies distinctly for what may be called "jollification purposes;" and in any inquiry into their revenues there is no reason to suppose that these would be interfered with. £20,000 was given to the Clothworkers "for making themselves comfortable." There can be no doubt that the money is industriously employed; but is that always the case where property has been bequeathed for the interests of the poor? Two cases I might mention, well known to lawyers—ignored, perhaps, by other persons—where money given for charitable objects was for many years diverted for private uses. I allude to the cases of Donkyn's bequest to the Merchant Taylors, and Kendall's to the Wax Chandlers—in both these cases it was held by the Master of the Rolls, and afterwards by the Court of Appeal, on the clearest possible issues that property given for the specific objects had been devoted to corporate purposes. When they sometimes accomplish charitable objects they do so at enormous expense. In 1812 a set of almshouses was built by the Goldsmiths at a cost of £600 for each inmate accommodated, and in one case lately, when an apprentice fee of £10 was to be charged, the Court made it an excuse for a dinner which cost £100. Once a person was asked if he could account for the longevity of some of the members of the Company: he replied—"The dinners have done it;" and though there may be ample evidence to show record of copious feasting in the early days of these bodies, there is nothing to show how much was given for the corporate funds of the society, and how much by the individual entertainers. I must now point out that in no respect can these bodies be regarded as independent autonomies, but that they are responsible both to the City and to the Crown for the discharge of their different duties. Time fails me to recount the different cases in which members of different Courts applied to the Court of Aldermen for incorporating charters; and fines were imposed on refractory members. I will not take the earlier cases, but quote only later instances. In 1752 five liverymen of the Merchant Taylors applied to the Court for a copy of the Company's by-laws; it was only granted apprehensively, when an application was threatened to the Court of Aldermen, calling on them to produce the withheld information. Subsequently the Lord Mayor and Aldermen passed a resolution to the effect that the several Companies were under the government of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. In 1853 the Court of Common Council had before them three ordinances of the Clothworkers, when two were accepted and one rejected. In 1774 the Common Council enacted that no person should be allowed to be a butcher in a particular district unless he was free of the Butchers Company; and by a second enactment of 1770, no person was allowed to carry on the trade of a poulterer unless he was free of the Poulterers. The Court of Aldermen refused to grant a livery to the Clockmakers until 1766; and only last year we had before us in this House the case of the Needlemakers, upon which the Court of Aldermen gave them permission to increase their livery by 100 members. The power of the Crown over these bodies has been from time to time vigorously questioned. In the reign of Richard II., under pain of forfeiture, the Companies were required to deliver to the Sovereign copies of their origin, foundations, statutes, liberties, privileges, rules, and ordinances, together with a statement of their property, and the income derived from it—ever since that time, up to the reign of William III., that right was continuously asserted. In aid of the various sovereigns they gave enormous subventions—Henry VIII., Charles I., and Charles II. all extorted from them vast contributions. In the reign of Charles II., in 1684, that Monarch declared all their charters forfeited, and granted them new ones, by which the right of perpetual succession was secured, but the officers of the Companies were made responsible to the Crown; and the whole body of the freemen and livery to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. I have, perhaps, dwelt too much on this subject, and on what may be called its historical and legal bearings; but it is really necessary, in order to show the House the position of these bodies. In the reign of William III., to gain the good-will of the companies, that monarch repealed all the new charters, and granted in their full validity the old ones, on the plea that they had been tyrannically extorted, instead, as was actually the case, that they had been voluntarily ceded. In 1837 they fiercely resisted the inquiries of the Municipal Commissioners; but Parliament having then declared them to be municipal corporations, any information now refused as to their status by Parliament would be distinctly retrogressive. Ever since then they have slept and slumbered, and have remained practically unmolested. It is not true wisdom, on the part of any public body possessed of large powers and endowed with large revenues, to resist Parliamentary control and inquiry. It is 40 years since this question was first brought forward in this House, and then Parliamentary government may be said to have been upon its trial, while now it is in the fulness of its power. On the Continent, as well as in this country, public bodies are under the control of various Departments of the State. When I have shown to the satisfaction of the House that these Companies, who possess large properties, do little else than spend large sums in conventional almsgiving and gorgeous entertainments, it will not be long before there arises an ardent desire for reform. We have a strong love in this country for ancient institutions—a wholesome dread of centralization; and there may be a wish sometimes to see public duties performed by bodies of irresponsible and unofficial men; but if there exists a feeling that something is kept back from the public eye, it will not be long before there arises a strong feeling of misgiving, and the members of these bodies will perceive that there is a limit to the indulgence and forbearance of their fellow-countrymen.

Sir, I am aware that this Motion will be opposed—it will be with anxiety that I listen to the grounds. The strength of the opposition I very well know. In former days the Companies have supported the Corporation—and I suppose the Corporation will now support the Companies. I hope that, in anything I have said, no one will assume that I wish that they should be obliterated and swept away: I only wish that they should be more fully alive to the altered circumstances and necessities of the present day. No doubt they have at times been the means of doing good. I dare say whoever answers me will reveal some long catalogue of the public benefits they have conferred. Still, at the same time, I say that such arguments are worthless, unless they also reveal the opportunities they have. No doubt they have done great things; but I cannot conceal the fact that sometimes great things have been done even by profligate and worthless men. I have no doubt that my Motion will be opposed on both sides: the opposition on the other I can easily understand; but I hope on this, at least, that before voting hon. Members will pause and ask themselves whether they are acting consistently with the principles which they have on previous occasions steadfastly and religiously upheld. I am aware of the difficulties in which many are involved. If there were no other considerations than great dinners it is unpleasant, for many of them, that they should be brought, I will not say into collision, but opposition with those with whom they have long been connected. I ask them, however, not to let their gratitude for past kindnesses blind them to the existence of present abuses. If their management is so excellent, why should it be concealed? It can only lead to the supposition of the existence of abuses in which the members of the different Companies can hardly be supposed anxious that it should be believed that they should abound. As far as confiscation is concerned, they need scarcely be afraid; and I therefore ask them, in a spirit consistent with the age, to give the information which has been so long and so studiously withheld. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for the Address.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, in seconding the Motion, said, he regretted that he was physically unable to make a speech in its favour. His hon. Friend had shown that the City Companies were public bodies, and, moreover, that they were public bodies possessed of great endowments. Now, such bodies could not in those days exist except in the light. He hoped that the Representatives of the City and of the City Companies would show that they did not prefer darkness to light, but would support the Motion, and that it would also receive the support of the Government. Hon. Members on this side of the House would be only acting consistently with the principles the Liberal Party had advocated during past Parliaments in joining in the demand for inquiry made by his hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Return setting forth in detail a Statement of the real and personal property vested in the City of London Companies respectively; also a detailed Statement of the charities payable by such Companies and of the income derived from all sources; and Statement of expenditure and receipts during the last three years preceding the 1st day of January 1875."—(Mr. James.)

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman Cotton) said, he could have wished that the defence of the Guilds of the City of London would have been undertaken by a more competent man; but knowing, as he did, the important work which those Guilds had done from time immemorial, he should earnestly raise his voice to enlist the sympathies of the House against the Resolution which had been proposed by the hon. Member for Gateshead, and which he considered to be entirely unnecessary and inexpedient. The City Guilds had been established by a time-honoured class, who associated themselves together for the purpose of protecting their trades and interests against the all-powerful influence of the Barons and the King. As time went on their wealth increased, and as it did the cupidity of the ruling powers for the time being was aroused, and it was in consideration of the wealth they handed over to the Monarch that they obtained sundry charters to protect their rights. Now, if a man bought an article it was only a thoroughly English feeling that he should possess, and, if he wished, retain it. Well, the City Companies and Guilds bought all the rights which they possessed. They never received a penny of the public money or of the money of the ratepayers. The whole of the money they possessed was their own. They did what every public body had a right to do. They did what they thought was wise and proper and right to strengthen their own position; and with that view they had obtained the charters from the Monarchs who were willing to sell them. The hon. Member for Gateshead had given very scanty praise to the works of the City Companies and the Guilds. He would ask the House to separate the case of the Corporation of London, which had its own battles to fight, from that of the Guilds, which stood on their own grounds. If hon. Members made themselves acquainted with the history of the City Guilds, they would know what was due to them for the education, the liberties, and the privileges which the country now enjoyed. He knew of no body of men, no body of trustees, who through a long course of four or five centuries had so honestly, so honourably, or so carefully cultivated the various trusts which different persons had committed to their care. It was important to know that when the Charity Commission was created about 25 years ago, and when they went to the City Halls and examined the deeds which were submitted to them no serious charge was brought against the 89 Companies. At that time accounts were rendered to the Charity Commissioners, and every trust which they possessed was now in the hands of those Commissioners, entirely out of their own supervision. No new scheme could be promoted without their consent, and their annual accounts were most faithfully reported to the body. The City Companies submitted cheerfully to the demands made upon them, and rendered a faithful account of their stewardship. Notwithstanding the way in which the Companies had managed their affairs various mixed trusts had been created which had been accepted and acted upon with perfect unanimity. By this means some expense had been put upon the Companies in the shape of payments for clerks and other officers for the duties which they had to perform. They looked to the other part of their property as private property; but before entering upon that point he would mention the amount which had been placed under the supervision of the Charity Commissioners. Their total gross income was, in 1865-6, £99,000 a-year. The Government were in a position to lay the subsequent accounts upon the Table of the House. Of that sum, they expended upon education £19,000; on apprenticeship, £5,600; for endowment of clergymen, £900; for almshouses, £53,900; in sundries, £1,660; and under the head of parishes, schools, &c., £17,900 per annum. Now, that was a very large sum to have been brought down through the dark ages and placed in the hands of Commissioners appointed by Parliament, and they felt that any interference with the property of the Guilds would be a direct attack upon private property. Their property was as much private property as that of any individual in that House. Why did that attack arise? What could be its object? They had no knowledge of what was the object, what alterations were proposed, or who had urged on the hon. Member to bring forward this Motion. He would remind the House that it was the easiest thing in the world, and one of the most pleasurable, to endeavour to become great by putting one's hand in other people's pockets, and if one could by any accident obtain a notoriety which under no other circumstances could be got, there was nothing like attacking bodies where there was supposed to be a very large amount of money. There was one remark of the hon. Member for Gateshead which showed that he did not understand the question with which he was dealing—namely, when he spoke of City Guilds pocketing the funds over which they had control. [Mr. JAMES said, the remark in question was a quotation and referred to a particular case.] Then all he could say was that the quotation was a very unfortunate one, for the City Guilds never did that. They were, he could assure him and the House, composed of men of men of honour, integrity, and respectability who had not the slightest desire to take anything to which they were not fairly entitled, and the whole of the property under their control was watched over most carefully and sedulously and appropriated to some good work or another in the way of technical education, charities, or any other object which might happen to come before them. It was only the other day, for instance, that the Grocer's Company had built at its own cost a very noble wing to the London Hospital, providing it with beds and all other necessary appliances. He could assure the House that the Guilds were all anxious to promote acts of charity, and that they were actuated by no selfish or avaricious motives. He should like, with the permission of the House, to read the opinion which had been formed of them by a man who lived nearly 100 years ago, and who in terse, old-fashioned, and truthful language, spoke of their charters as "the great bonds of the City, conferring liberty and security." They had been the cause, he added, of "the wonderful extension of the commerce of Britain which stood unrivalled," while "they did not militate against the general good or favour monopoly." Further on the same writer said—

"However great the privileges of the citizens of London may be, those rights have been the effects of purchase on their parts rather than of the munificence of Monarchs."

At elections he described them as possessing "integrity and honour," and as being free from all sordid motives, adding, that if they did not always send Members to the House of Commons from their own body who were equal in point of oratory to some other Members of the British Senate, they, at all events, returned as their Representatives men who were actuated by an honest desire to serve their country. The writer further observed that the citizens of London were industrious, persevering, honest, and the first traders in the world. ["Name!"] He was quoting from the work of the compiler of the charters of the Corporation of the City, and was it right, he would now ask, that these citizens should be attacked because they had grown wealthy, like the whole country around them? Had not these Guilds concentrated around them the commerce and the wealth that had made the City so great? Had they not always been the pioneers of education? Had they not increased the value of their own property? And was this not an attack on the rights of property which that House would reject by a triumphant majority? If the House did so, as he believed it would, it would only be doing an act of justice to the long past career of these institutions, and would be affirming their corporate rights, and in that way help to advance the cause of charity, the well-being of their fellow-citizens, and the general good of the country.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER must say that he had never heard a weaker case than that which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) in support of a Motion which was, he believed, unprecedented in the annals of the House. He gave an interesting, antiquarian, and historical account of those Guilds, but what had he made out? Did he show that there was any gross abuse requiring the interference of Parliament, or anything wrong in the management of the property which the ordinary Courts were not in a position to reach? Did he mean to say that the Guilds were not as able now as in former times to perform their functions? Of course, the Grocers did not exercise their jurisdiction over peppers and sugars, or the Stationers over the character of the books on sale; but to charge them with not doing such things was simply to say that what was useful in the days of the Plantagenets was not useful now. The property of these Companies was in no respect different from private property. If a private person held property subject to certain duties, then he was amenable to the law for the performance of those duties; but if he possessed property without any specific duties attached to it, that property could be dealt with as he pleased. It was just the same in point of law with corporations. The hon. Member had moved for an Address to the Crown calling for a Return of the property of the charities forming the subject-matter of his Motion. This was not only proposing an inquisitorial proceeding, but it was calling upon the Crown to do an unconstitutional act. There had been quo warranto Commissions to inquire into the affairs of public bodies; but they were always considered a great invasion of the liberties of the subject, and of the rights of property. But suppose such a Commission was issued, what power was there to enforce it? The Companies would refuse any information, and they would be right in their refusal; for if they did not stand on their legitimate rights and resist an unconstitutional excess of the Prerogative of the Crown, whether advised by this House or not, they would be false to their duty as Englishmen, they would betray the rights of the people, and would be establishing a precedent which might be most injurious to the public liberty. In the second part of the Motion the hon. Gentleman asked for a Return of the charities payable by the Companies. This, again, was an illegal demand, as put in the Motion, because all the charities were under the control of the Charity Commissioners, who alone had the right to make any inquiries on the subject. On the whole, therefore, he hoped the Motion would be rejected by a large majority.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not propose to detain the House for any length upon this occasion. It appears to me that my hon. Friend has made a Motion by which he has sown a seed of which I hope he will live to reap the harvest at a future day. The hon. Baronet who has just sat down says he never heard a weaker case. I have sat a good deal longer in Parliament than he has, and I doubt if I ever heard a stronger one. But, however that may be, I think my hon. Friend has himself recognized the fact that the circumstances under which he makes his Motion are not altogether propitious for its obtaining a favourable judgment. There is, I must say, another point which occurs to me, which renders it difficult for the House to adopt a Motion in this form. My hon. Friend prays for an Address to the Crown to obtain certain information from the London Companies. Now, the Crown, I apprehend, has no power to obtain that information, and I own that I [for one agree on that point with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, for I have been myself a party to the issue of Royal Commissions where the Crown had no power to enforce the rendering of the information sought to be obtained. But that has always been in cases where the bodies to whom Commissions were addressed—namely, the governing bodies of public schools and Universities—were known from previous inquiries to be willing that that method of procedure should be adopted. I think there would be great inconvenience in asking the Crown, even if the Crown were willing, to issue a Commission in invitum, which, according to my idea, it has no power to enforce, either by the use of the Prerogative, which has nothing to do with the matter, or by any other means. As regards the substance of the Motion of my hon. Friend, I confess it is to me a matter of very great regret that there should be the reluctance declared by the Lord Mayor on the part of the Companies to deal with this subject. I believe with the Lord Mayor that these Companies are composed of men, as he has assured us eight or ten times over—and really it appeared to me to indicate a doubt on the part of the Lord Mayor that he thought it necessary to reiterate that so many times, and from so many sources of assurance—are composed of honest, honourable, and respectable men. Now, he seems to think that that is a matter of so much dispute that it requires a great number of assertions on his part to make good his ground. For my part, on a single assertion on the part of the Lord Mayor, or without a single assertion, I should fully accede to that proposition. I fully believe in their honesty and honour, and in their doing many things which are useful. On the other hand, the doctrine that these corporations hold property which is to be regarded as private property in respect to its rights and immunities, is a doctrine which I thought pretty well disposed of by Parliament and by the judgments of statesmen and Representatives of the people for not less than the last 30 or 40 years. That doctrine has been revived upon the present occasion, and I must own in a form—and we must distinguish the form from the substance—which I think it would be very difficult to press. We must distinguish what I conceive to be the true as against the untrue. It is not necessary, I think, to hold that the gentlemen composing these Companies are in any way disentitled to the character of honourable men; nor is it necessary to hold that all their actions are bad, and that all their property is wasted. What my hon. Friend has shown is, that these are bodies possessing a public character, holding vast masses of property, and not only so, but that in the particular case of the London Companies they are not able to set up those very shadowy claims to exemption from Parliamentary jurisdiction which might perhaps be set up in the case of other corporations, because these London Companies exercise a most direct and commanding influence over the whole constitution of the municipality of London, and these principles and powers, public in the highest sense, are exercised by these bodies for whom the right hon. Gentleman asks us to recognize the rights to private property. Now I believe, in principle, that they are open to the exercise of Parliamentary jurisdiction and authority. I likewise believe that, although many things are done by them that are good and desirable, although sometimes the world is delighted, and perhaps a little astonished, by a splendid example of judicious munificence, something like that of the building of the new wing of the London Hospital by the Grocers' Company—which the Lord Mayor appropriately and wisely quoted—yet I, for one, am under a very strong impression that much of the revenue of these Companies is positively and utterly wasted, and very imperfectly and doubtfully bestowed. I put it boldly to the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters—not in support of this Motion, because I do not think the Crown ought to be invited to undertake a function which it is not constitutionally empowered to carry through—that I do think it a matter for the deepest regret that this reserve should be maintained. The public character of these Companies it is altogether too late to dispute. The right hon. Gentleman (the Lord Mayor) was compelled to begin by asking us to do that which no person, I think, in endeavouring to argue this case could dream of doing—namely, to separate completely between the character of the Companies as holders of vast masses of property, and the characters of the Companies as invested with the most important powers and powerful privileges in regard to the government of the City of London. The right hon. Gentleman found it essential to his case that he should entirely put out of view that the Companies command in a great degree the government, and even the representation in Parliament, of the City of London. In the very highest sense these are public bodies. Depend upon it, it is for their interests that they should not wait to be forced, that they should not wait to be pressed. It is all very well in the present state of things, in the present state of public sentiment, and in the present balance of parties in this House, for the right hon. Gentleman to hold the language that he has held to-day. It is perfectly possible there may be a majority, and perhaps a large majority, ready to back him in the use of that language; but can he guarantee the permanence of that balance of parties? Can he guarantee that that state of public opinion will endure? Because, unless he can, depend upon it it will be dangerous if, when that balance is changed, and when that state of public opinion is changed, it is recollected that an obstinate, an unflinching, and what may then be called, probably, an unreasonable resistance was offered—not to unjust or violent legislation, not even to proposals of a questionable character, but to the simple publication of the facts of the case with regard to the disposal of this vast mass of property. Now, Sir, I agree with my hon. Friend, I think, in almost everything that fell from him, but especially in the broad declaration he made that he had no desire to get rid of these Companies. On the contrary, my desire, and my anxious desire, is, that these Companies should be brought to the highest state of efficiency, and that their vast property should be disposed in the manner most likely to produce the greatest public advantage—but to produce that greatest public advantage through their machinery and by their hands. That is what, I think, my hon. Friend desires, and that is what I believe the House almost unanimously desires. If this policy of unequivocal and uncompromising resistance, even to the disclosure of information, be pursued too far, the time may come when possibly reforms may advance, not only with a bolder front, but with very different objects, and when the very great inconvenience of applying these large funds for the benefit of the City of London otherwise than through the machinery of the Companies—instead of being as it now is, an idle and remote speculation—may become a real danger. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman, and those who think with him and act with him, will do nothing to provoke that danger. I cannot expect that any address that I may make to him or to others will at all tend to produce a more communicative disposition on the part of the Guilds; but, notwithstanding, I think it is a public duty on our part to lay down the doctrine that a declaration of their affairs—they being, as we believe, perfectly honest and honourable in the administration of these funds—can be nothing but beneficial to them, while the refusal of the information can be nothing but injurious. I know not what Her Majesty's Government may intend or propose to do in respect to the Motion that is now before the House; but I shall certainly be very much disappointed even if Her Majesty's Government—little as I agree with them in the views they take in many points upon public affairs—do not go so far at least in the same path as my hon. Friend

as to express a disposition favourable to the free and voluntary production of this information. The information sooner or later must be had. Now is the time when, if it is given, it will be given as an act of grace. I entreat those who are concerned to consider whether to pursue the course that is now recommended, and to grant that information by their own voluntary concession will not be the wisest and most politic course for themselves with reference to the interests of which they are stewards and guardians.

MR. GOLDNEY altogether differed from the notion of the right hon. Gentleman that these Companies were public bodies. The Corporations Commission of 1837 had showed that the City Companies had no control either as regarded municipal institutions or Parliamentary representation. Their duty was merely ministerial—that of admitting to their body freemen who were entitled to claim admission. The gentlemen by whom their affairs were administered were of the highest possible character, and there was a feeling of strong anxiety that they should be left alone.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE was struck by the fact that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had pronounced a glowing eulogy upon the gentlemen who had managed and directed those Guilds. As for the Lord Mayor's speech, that brought to his recollection the character which was given to George Barnwell, who was modest, tender, regular, pious, and devout. The character of the gentlemen belonging to the Guilds had never been called in question. It simply confused the issue to represent for a moment that the supporters of the Motion threw any doubt whatever upon their characters. He himself knew many of these gentlemen, and he could testify that they were men against whose character not one word could be uttered. Nay more, he was willing to admit that in many cases they had made a good use of their funds. The Lord Mayor contended that one reason why they should be exempt from inquiry by the House was that £90,000 or £100,000 a-year was brought by them under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. But the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) had shown that their property in the City alone amounted to £500,000 a-year, and there would therefore be £400,000 a-year, even if they had no other property, which they devoted to some use not explained. The Lord Mayor in his statement with regard to these Companies did not once allude to the item of hospitality. The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had urged the hon. Member not to press his Motion, because the House had no power to compel these Companies to give the information asked for, and had said that during all the time he was in office he had never been a party to issuing a Commission in invitoe—

MR. GLADSTONE: I distinctly said I had been a party to issuing certain Commissions; but no Commission of the Crown had been issued in invitoe, and that is a very wide distinction.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, in 1835 a large number of municipal corporations refused to give information to the Commissioners of Inquiry, but that fact did not prevent the House from proceeding to deal with those corporations after an inquiry had been held. It should be borne in mind that the Motion did not propose legislation, but merely asked for information. The Lord Mayor stated that the City Companies had bought their privileges from the Crown; but it was clear to all who read the charters which they had obtained that they had reference to the performance of public duties by those to whom they were granted. The performance of those duties had confessedly fallen into disuse, and what they now contended was that the House ought to know the growth of the vast revenues which were held for public uses. There was now a great outcry for technical education, and it was most desirable that a portion of the income of these Companies, which amounted to between £500,000 and £1,000,000, should be applied to the promotion of technical and general education. It had always been held on that side of the House, and was now held by many Members on the Conservative side, that public bodies could not hold land except for public purposes, and on several occasions the present Home Secretary had used language which went far to support that view. For his own part, he should be prepared to go further, and contend that even as regarded property for general corporate purposes, and regarded charitable purposes, ~~the~~ these were charities within the very wide definition of the Act of Elizabeth. That Act, he believed, intended to include property of this kind, although he believed the Charity Commissioners took a narrower view.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was not his intention to trouble the House at any length, especially after the turn which the debate had taken. No one had a higher respect than he had for the great Corporation of the City of London, and for all the great advantages which the country had derived from it through past generations in respect to liberty and freedom. No one had a higher idea than he had of the important position which the City would, he hoped, long fill in this country, going on in the same path as it had hitherto done, flourishing and to flourish for the benefit of the community. He was bound to say, in considering any matter relating to the City of London, and the Guilds connected with that City, that he did not think sufficient attention was always paid to the magnitude of the body with which they had to deal. Since he had held his present office he had had schemes and plans laid before him by the handful for the reform of the Corporation of the City, not only as to its property, but as to the Corporation itself, for the total remodelling of it from one end to the other, and also for what was called enlarging it; and he was sure that a great many of the persons who had brought forward those schemes had not given the subject the amount of attention which it deserved. He was not now referring to the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), on whose proposals he presumed they would have a discussion this Session, and who had devoted much consideration to the matter, but many of the plans that had been placed before him clearly showed that their authors had not carefully weighed their proposals in the balance. In the first place, if anything was to be done in a matter of this magnitude, it ought, he thought, to be brought forward by the Government of the day. Again, if bodies, whether they had property or not, were fairly carrying out their duties—he did not say so fully as might be wished, but without any very grievous default—they ought not to be disturbed, unless it was intended not only to disturb them, but to go on and do something more. The Government had no such intention at that moment, and he certainly did not think the House ought to grant a fishing inquiry as to the property of bodies of that kind. That subject had been inquired into long ago. In the Report of the Commissioners of 1837 there was a great mass of information relating to all those bodies, though he did not mean to say that information was full; and before the Commission a great number of those bodies tendered not only their charters and their history, but also their accounts. He had listened carefully to the hon. Member who had made the present Motion to learn whether, as regarded the Companies which then produced their accounts, there were any grave charges to be alleged as to the way in which they had administered their property; and he thought before any steps could be taken in such a serious matter it would be necessary to adduce much more elaborate statements than those which fell from the hon. Member, and also to make out a much stronger case than he had submitted to them for the interference of the House. But the main reason why he rose to object to that Motion had been anticipated by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). If the House would look carefully at the Motion, they would see that it was for an Address to the Crown, asking it to do that which it was absolutely impossible for the Crown to do. It might be said that he had taken part in regard to the issue of a Commission for an inquiry into certain other Corporations; but it would be recollected that that other inquiry had reference to bodies with licensing duties, though some other matters were also thrown in. He was sure, then, that it would be the feeling of the vast majority of the House that the hon. Member ought not to press his Motion to a division. He really did not see that any practical good would come from it, neither did he think the matter was one that should be stirred in that way. If, therefore, he might presume to tender advice to the hon. Member for Gateshead, he would recommend him to allow his Motion to be withdrawn.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I am most anxious, since I have proposed inquiries, to state why I cannot think of supporting this Motion. I cannot, because I have seen from the outset of the hon. Member for Gateshead's statement that his Motion is deficient of foundation on any valid public grounds. It has not been shown that the existence of these Companies, holding their property under charter, is contrary to the public welfare or to the public policy of the nation. It has not been shown that there is anything in their position otherwise than consistent with public freedom. It has not been shown that their existence is in any sense illegal. On the contrary, whenever their charters have been in question they have been maintained in the Courts of Law. I wish for one moment to advert to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to proceed upon the assumption that no property ought to be held sacred, the details of the administration of which are not brought under the direct purview of Parliament. Why, Sir, that is a most oppressive doctrine. Are we about to tell the Peers that, because they derive their qualifications from their properties, therefore they are bound to disclose their private administration of those properties, because the possession of these properties constitutes their qualification? And are we about to say, with regard to these public Companies, who have held their properties under charter for centuries—properties which are essentially their own—that they shall be necessarily subject to a rule which you will not apply to Peers? This is a most oppressive doctrine, and it goes to a most dangerous extent. The possession of the property by these Companies constitutes the qualification of their members to vote for the City of London, and I say that Parliament has no right to inquire into the administration of the property which constitutes that qualification unless abuse, and gross abuse, has been proved. I say that a qualification by property is in itself no abuse, and that these qualifications lie at the very foundation of the greatness of the Corporation of the City of London. It appears to me that if this system of universal inquiry and publicity is necessitated, it comes to this—that no property shall be held safe except such as may be administered under the direct supervision of Parliament. This would constitute a most egregious invasion of private rights; and in this particular case it would be a direct invasion of the foundation of self-government. These grave considerations appear to me to have been totally overlooked in this debate; but they ought to be overcome before this, as one of the two Houses of Parliament is asked to proceed by an Address, with which, as now proposed, the Crown could only comply by threatening the revocation of all these charters, and thus at once to invade the rights of private property, which the Crown itself has created. I hope the House will excuse my having in these few words expressed my opinion that this Motion, as well as some others which have recently been made in this House, lacks those public grounds—proofs of necessity for the public good—without which inquiry, as it is called, becomes an invasion of property and an act of tyranny.

MR. PEASE recommended the withdrawal of the Motion, but intimated that if the Government refused to deal with the question, private Members who were interested in it would have no alternative but to bring it forward again and press it at some future time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EAST INDIA (CHIEF JUSTICES OF HIGH COURTS) BILL—[BILL 98.]

(Sir George Campbell, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Kinnaird.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that although it might appear to be a small measure in itself, it was one which largely affected the interests of the great mass of the people of India, inasmuch as it might materially modify the whole character of the Judicial Service. The existing Act, which established the High Courts of Justice in that country in 1862, contained a clause providing that the Judges should be chosen from three classes of persons who had qualifications—namely, the Civil Servants of the East India Company, barristers, and persons of other qualifications; but that the Chief Justice must be taken from one class only—namely, barristers. The present Bill sought to amend that clause by providing that the office of Chief Justice should be open to all the Judges, so that the man who showed himself the best man might be promoted, even if he were not a barrister.

EMPLOYERS LIABILITY FOR INJURY BILL.—[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Macdonald, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Bass.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MACDONALD said, that in moving that this Bill be now read the second time, he would endeavour to prove that the law on this subject as it now stood was unjust to the great body of the people and unequal in its operation towards workmen, and therefore that it was calculated to produce not an active diligence on the part of the employers in obtaining the best skilled men in carrying on their works, but the reverse. The principle of liability was an old one and manifestly just; it was this—That if one individual injured another, the person injured had a right to claim damages for the injury which had been done to him; and it was also this—That if a person employed another person to do a certain work which he ought to do himself, and the employed person was injured, the employer was responsible for the injury done to that person who had become his alter ego. That used to be law. Now, however, according to recent decisions, managers might be employed by masters to superintend works of a very extensive kind, and though injuries might be suffered by some of the employés the employers were not responsible, it having been held that every person employed by a master was a fellow-servant, and that, therefore, liability in regard to civil injuries was out of the question. But that law was a recent interpretation: it was not, he contended, founded upon any statute, but was to be found in the accumulated opinions of Judges—or it was, in other words, Judge-made law. It was first heard of in 1837, in the case of “Priestley v. Fowler.” The plaintiff was a servant of the defendant, and while in his service he was injured. He brought an action to recover damages—but Lord Abinger held it to be the law that for an injury sustained through the fault of a fellow-servant the employer was not responsible. It then appeared for the first time that risk was a portion of the workman’s contract. The country had not long to wait before other cases cropped up of a similar character, and as these decisions went each took a wider range than those which had gone before—that, indeed, and the doctrine took equal hold of the English and the American Bench. Now, up to the year 1856 the law of Scotland was that an employer was liable for the action of one servant towards another—and no doubt during the debate they would be told so authoritatively. There were numberless cases recorded of that description: one case in particular, to which he wished to refer in justification of his Bill, was that of Read and M’Guire against the Bartonhill Colliery Company, in the county of Lanark. Read and M’Guire were two pitmen, and there was an engineman named Lindsay. The duty of the engineman was to lift the workmen up and down. On one occasion he failed to stop the engine when he should. The men were carried over the head-gear; the men fell down the shaft and were killed. The widows brought an action against the company for damages. Up to that time damages were granted in all such cases in Scotland, and in the case of both men damages were awarded by the jury at the Court of Session. Afterwards the matter went to the Inner Division of the Court of Session, and then an appeal was made from their judgment to the House of Lords. In 1857 the case came before Parliament, when the House of Lords reversed the ordinary law of Scotland, for it was found that Lindsay was a fellow-workman of the two men, that Read and M’Guire had entered into a common employment, and that that common employment was a common risk. That decision startled the entire population of Scotland, who took an interest in the question. If Read and M’Guire had desired to injure Lindsay, they could only have done so by entering the engine-house. Undoubtedly there was a community of employment, but there was certainly no community of risk. Then there was the case of Wilson v. Merry & Cuninghame, wherein the defendants were ironworkers and coal masters, carrying on business in three Scotch counties and in Ireland. One of their works was known as the Woodhall Colliery. There worked at them a young man named Wilson. The supposed manager was a person named Neach, who said to Wilson—“I am the manager of another colliery; if you go there you will find better and more profitable employment.” Before Wilson entered upon his work, before he even went to the place, Neach had directed that a scaffold should be laid across the shaft. To a certain extent that was done; but a portion of the scaffolding was left open, through which the ventilation came up. When the young man was going down the fire damp came up; there was an explosion, the young man fell to the bottom, and was killed. The mother believed that she was entitled to compensation for the loss of her son. An action was brought against the company at the quarter sessions. The case went before a jury, and a verdict was found after three days' trial, with £300 damages. The case went a second time before a jury, and again there was a verdict. Then there was an appeal to the House of Lords. The case was considered on the 20th May 1868, when the House found that Neach was simply a fellow-workman, and that Robson, a partner of the firm, was the manager of the colliery. He did not see the Lord Advocate in his place. The right hon. Gentleman acted as counsel for the poor widow on that occasion, and he (Mr. Macdonald) could appeal to the Lord Advocate in regard to the facts of the case. That case quite disposed of the principle of liability—one man might be appointed to be the manager of mines in three counties, he might be appointed manager of all the mines in England, and being regarded as a fellow-workman with all the men employed in all these mines, all security for life and limb would be at an end, and the workmen would have no legal claim against their employers for negligence committed by the nominal manager. It was against these decisions that the workmen of this country so strongly complained, and the Bill he now asked the House to read a second time was intended to meet this injustice. The Home Secretary had stated on another occasion that this Bill was not well drafted; but it should be recollected that the Bill dealt only with a principle—it was not the duty of those who supported it to lay down what exceptions there should be from it. If that had been attempted some would have said that the exceptions did not go far enough, while others would have said that they went too far. Therefore, the Bill avoided all exceptions, but if any hon. Member thought that any class ought to be excepted, he could come forward and argue the question in Committee. The Bill, he ventured to say, was in its present shape unassailable. It had been before some of the most eminent jurists of the country, and they had declared that it was adequate to amend the law, and was, in fact, what the present state of the law demanded. He had intended to keep clear in his argument from allusion to any particular class of persons; but he was compelled to alter his course in this respect, in consequence of what had occurred last week on occasion of a deputation to the Home Secretary, who made a statement to the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill struck at one interest and one class of persons—the impression sought to be conveyed being that it would place the mine-owning interests in a position of danger, forasmuch as that the disasters in mines were owing not to the carelessness or mismanagement of the owners, but to the recklessness of the workmen. He challenged the mine-owners to substantiate that assertion; and he would meet it by the declaration that if the law were properly carried out, if the mines were properly ventilated, there would be no explosive gases to ignite, and consequently it would be impossible for the most reckless workman to bring about an explosion. While these conditions were neglected every explosion was a crime, and those who permitted a state of things to exist which made an explosion possible were morally guilty of a crime. Then why should not employers be held liable for the default of their managers and those left in charge of their works? Works in this country were not carried on upon the ground of philanthropy, but for gain; and he contended that the argument that if this Bill should be passed it would prevent capital being embarked in various trades and works had no foundation in fact. This was the first time that the question had come before the House of Commons in the shape of a Bill, and therefore the first time that hon. Members had been called upon to vote on it. He had no doubt that the power and weight of the Government would be brought to bear against the Bill, and it was likely that that majority which was in their hands would throw it out, but he reminded the House that though they could reject the measure, yet the question was one which must sooner or later be settled; and now was the best time to settle it. Every village depopulated and every railway accident caused more petitions to be sent to that House against the present state of the law; and, therefore, he trusted that it would be amended. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill, and to thank the House for the courtesy which had been shown to him.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Macdonald.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought it right to intervene thus early in the debate, because it appeared to him that the question before the House being essentially a legal one, it would facilitate the discussion on the Bill if he were to state what the actual state of the law on the subject was. The hon. Member (Mr. Macdonald), perhaps naturally, had spoken rather warmly on the subject of his Bill—no one would blame him for that; but he had, at the same time, indulged in many arguments in support of his measure which were, perhaps, not quite germane to the question. The hon. Member had with perfect accuracy said that the owners of mines were bound to keep their mines free from explosive gases, and that if the mines were altogether free from such gases no explosion could occur. He quite acquiesced in the remark; the mine-owners were, under the present law, under the obligation to take the necessary precautions to secure the absence of gases, and if they failed to obey the law in that respect they would be liable; but he could not see that there was anything in the hon. Member's Bill which would impose upon them any additional liability in that direction. The question which the House had to consider was, whether it would be expedient to make the very sweeping changes in the law which the hon. Member proposed to introduce. Let them consider what was the law with respect to masters and employers of labour at the present time. As the law now stood, employers of labour were liable to the utmost farthing of their fortune in damages for accidents which might happen in consequence of the negligence of their servants, whilst those servants were in course of carrying out the ordinary duties of their employment—that was to say, in regard to those who were not in the same employment—and a very onerous and severe obligation this imposed upon masters. He would take as an instance the case of a greengrocer who happened to have a horse and cart in which he sent out the vegetables. Suppose his servant, whilst out with the cart, negligently ran over some one in the street, who was seriously injured.

The damages that resulted might be very heavy. This would be a very serious thing, but he did not complain of it, for it might be right and just that masters should pay to the utmost farthing for damages occasioned by their servants. But the matter stood on a different footing when they came to the question of liability of masters for damages occasioned to servants by the negligence of fellow-servants. But it would be an erroneous conclusion were the House to assume that the servants of employers were altogether without protection. A master was in the first place bound to see that the machinery employed in the business in which his servants were engaged was suitable for the purpose. If the machinery was defective, or rotten, or unfenced where it ought to be fenced, he would be liable for all the consequences of his neglect. He was bound to take every reasonable care to insure that proper and fit servants were engaged as his workmen. If he failed in these matters he would be held liable without the aid of this Bill. The question was, whether the liability of the master should be carried still further. What the Bill proposed was simply this—that whenever an accident happened to a person in the employ of a master in consequence—not of any neglect on the part of a master to obey the requirements of an Act of Parliament or to insure the engagement of competent servants, but in consequence of the negligence of a fellow-servant, the master should be liable for the damages that ensued. Was that a reasonable or just proposition? Take the case of a mine. Assume that the master had done all in his power to insure that the machinery was fit, that intelligent and careful servants were engaged, and that he had obeyed all the injunctions of the Act of Parliament. In consequence of excavations that were going on in the mine some reservoir of gas was laid bare; some workman reckless of his own life and of the lives of those associated with him in the mine took a light to the place where the work was going on; an explosion occurred, and 20, 30, 40, or 50 people met with their death. According to this Bill the master would be responsible for the damages that ensued. Assume that 50 colliers were killed, and that they had been employed at good wages—£2 a-week, or, perhaps, much more:—there would be, perhaps, 50 families to provide for. It was difficult to know on what principle juries assessed compensation to the families of the deceased in such cases. Perhaps they did not act on any principle. If a man earned £2 a-week, it would not be outrageous to say that he spent £1 upon his family and kept £1 for himself. If the man was 30 or a little above 30 he might, but for the explosion, have gone on working 10, 20, or 30 years. Perhaps the jury multiplied the earnings that the family would have received by the number of years that the man would probably have been able to work. In each of the 50 cases of death which he (the Attorney General) had assumed, putting it at a moderate figure, the jury would assess the compensation at £500, and the master would be saddled with a liability altogether of £25,000. The law at present said it was not just to do that; and it said so for this reason—when a workman entered into an employment he knew what the risks of that employment were, and he knew that the risk would probably arise from the negligence of those associated with him in that employment. Those risks, and his knowledge with regard to them, formed part of the elements and bases of his contract. There were many dangers connected with mines, and miners got much higher wages than other operatives did. We had heard of miners who enjoyed all the luxuries of life, and whose favourite daily beverage was champagne. Miners got higher wages than the bulk of other operatives, perhaps because their work was very fatiguing and arduous, or perhaps because it was not a pleasant thing to labour in the bowels of the earth, or perhaps because their occupation was exceedingly dangerous and they were liable to suffer through the negligence of those with whom they worked. The law only prevented a servant from recovering against his master for injury in his employment when the injury arose through the negligence of a fellow-servant, and the reason of that prohibition was that the servant who had been injured was in a common employment with the servant through whose negligence the injury happened. As far as he (the Attorney General) could discover, the only way in which the law operated with severity upon the servant was this—that it was very difficult for the Courts to define what was a common employment. Servants were often prevented, as the law now stood, from obtaining compensation for an accident which happened through the default of a man who could not be regarded as being in the position of a fellow-servant. For example, an accident might happen through the negligence of an overlooker or a manager, who was practically in the position of the master himself. As the law now stood, a servant in such a case might be unable to obtain compensation, because the overlooker or manager might be regarded as being in the position of a fellow-servant. He did not say that the matter was clear, because he knew there were dicta the other way; but there had been decisions in this country and in Scotland also which would go to that extent. Now, that to his mind was a hardship, and it would be well if that hardship were removed. But that was not the hardship dealt with by this Bill:—what the hon. Member proposed was to impose unheard-of liability upon the master, who was to be made responsible for every act of his servant. The design of the Bill was to introduce a most sweeping alteration in the law, which to his mind would work gross injustice. He was not sure whether it would not be right to have some inquiry into the subject—he was not speaking on behalf of the Government—but as the Bill would establish a mischievous principle he hoped the House would not allow it to be read a second time. It might be said that workmen desired such a measure as this. As far as he knew, they were not clamorous for it. He had the honour of representing a very large borough (Preston), where there were a great number of workmen engaged in almost every kind of perilous employment that could be conceived, and whenever they had a complaint, real or imaginary, which they thought should be remedied by an alteration of the law they generally appealed to him; but no appeal had been made to him on this matter. He thought some alteration in the direction he had mentioned might be made in the existing law so as to render it more just to the workman; but he did not think it would be right to give a second reading to the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, that there were cases in which the principle of “common employment," as laid down in "Priestly v. Fowler," had been lost sight of. The rationale was that a man in common employment with another should not have a remedy against the master in the event of an accident, because he had the fullest opportunity of judging of the capacity and character of his fellow workmen, and of considering what were the risks to which his employment exposed him. The present position of the law was well illustrated in a recent case of an accident on a railway. In the case of "Waller v. the South-Eastern Railway Company" it appeared that a train was thrown off the line through a defect at a particular point in the permanent way, and the guard was killed. The representatives of the guard sued the company for compensation; and it was held that the guard and the platelayer or foreman who had charge of the permanent way were in a common employment, and therefore that the guard had no claim to compensation. It appeared to him that in such a case the rationale of common employment altogether broke down. There was no more community between the guard and the platelayer than there was between the engineer who drove a train along a line and a clerk at a station who sold tickets to passengers. Unless by special means the guard could have had no knowledge of the capacity or conduct of the platelayer, and consequently could not guard himself against the risks of common employment. He thought a guard might in such circumstances be regarded as being in the position of a passenger, and have his remedy. He agreed with the Bill in this respect, that common employment as now interpreted should not be allowed as a defence against a claim upon a master for injury received by a servant in his employment. Considering the novelty of the subject and the advantage of its being thoroughly considered and discussed in the House, he was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill. If the House hesitated to go into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Bill, that was no reason for rejecting it on the second reading. Let the Bill be read a second time, and if the House was not prepared in its present state of information to discuss it in Committee of the Whole House, let it be referred to a Select Committee, and when the Report came from that Committee let the matter be discussed in the present or a future Session.

MR. FORSYTH said, the law was perfectly clear on the subject, although, in his opinion, the reason on which the decisions of Courts of Law proceeded was not altogether satisfactory. That reason was that the employment rested on contract. Now a contract was either express or implied. There certainly was no express contract, and it could only be implied on the ground that it was the general understanding that a person employed undertook to run the risk of injury from the negligence of a fellow-servant without seeking to make the master liable, or, in other words, that such was the law. The law imposed upon a master these liabilities. He must employ proper servants and proper material, and must do all in his power to render the employment of his servant safe and free from peril. The present law was in a most anomalous condition. If a man entered a shop and injured himself by stumbling over a bale of goods, or by falling into a hole, improperly left there by a servant of the shopkeeper he had a right of action; but if at a dinner party a basin of soup were thrown over his coat, or, still worse, over the dress of his wife, by a servant, he had no right of action against his host. If a dog worried a sheep the dog's master was liable, but if the dog worried a human being the master was not liable. Was it, however, reasonable to ask the master to do more than employ proper people and proper material for the purpose of effecting his object? How could he know when one of his servants would, in a moment of carelessness, commit an incautious act? If this Bill passed every employer who engaged a number of labourers would contract himself out of the Act, for he would before taking them make them sign a paper stating that they would not proceed against him in consequence of injuries sustained by them owing to the negligence of a fellow-servant. While he could not vote for the Bill he should like to see an inquiry into the whole subject.

DR. CAMERON, in supporting the second reading, said, he had heard it objected that the Bill was a measure of an extreme and almost revolutionary character, and one calculated to impose a most unfair and dangerous responsibility upon employers. To meet this objection he would show that it merely proposed to substitute for the present law of fellow-servant, a legal presumption based on equity consistent with the national policy regarding other species of contract, and which the experience of Scotland proved to work well and satisfactorily. For what this Bill proposed to do was simply to place the contract between employers and employed on the basis on which, in Scotland at least, it stood until so late a period as 1858. Down to that period there could not be the slightest question that the law of Scotland, as universally interpreted by Scottish Judges, as to employers' liability for injuries, was precisely what the law of the United Kingdom would be if this Bill were to pass. Down to 1850, this was never disputed; but about that time the law as to the non-liability of employers for injuries sustained by one employé at the hands of his fellow having been prominently set forward in various judicial decisions in England, several cases were brought before the Scotch Courts, in which, founding upon these English decisions, it was attempted to upset what had, up to that time, been regarded as an incontrovertible principle of Scottish law. In the case of Dixon v. Rankin in 1852 an employer attempted to escape liability for the death of a man in his employ through the carelessness of his fellow-workman by pleading the English judgments on the subject, and arguing that they should govern the decision of the Court of Session. But Lord Cockburn said—

"The plea that the master is not liable rests solely on the authority of two or three very recent decisions of the English Courts. . . . If this be the law of England, I speak of it with all due respect, but it is most certainly not the law of Scotland. I defy any industry to produce a single decision or dictum or institutional indication or any trace of any authority to this effect, or of this tendency within the whole range of our law."

Another Judge pointed out that the difference arose entirely from the fiction which had become engrafted upon the English law of labour contracts, to the effect that every man who engaged in any employment contracted to undergo all the risks which the carelessness or incapacity of his fellow-workers might expose him to without recourse against his employer. What the law of Scotland was the Lord Justice Clerk explained thus—

"The law of Scotland as to the contract of service in regard to such matters is perfectly fixed, and admits of no doubt whatever. The master's primary obligation in every contract of service in which his workmen are employed in a hazardous and dangerous occupation, for his interest and profit is to provide for and attend to the safety of the men. That is his first and binding obligation, I should say paramount even to that of paying for their labour. In this obligation is equally included, as he cannot do everything himself, the duty to have all acts by others whom he employs done properly and carefully in order to avoid risk. The obligation to provide for the safety of the lives of his servants by fit machinery is not greater or more inherent in the contract than the obligation to provide for their safety from the acts done by others whom he also employs. . . . The recklessness of danger on the part of the men (said the Lord Justice Clerk) is a result of the trade in which the master employs them, and he is bound in all such cases to have such superintendence as will exclude all preventible risks."

Now this was very much the nature of the responsibility which the law imposed upon railway-companies when they contracted for a service in which the public might be exposed to danger. The law considered this responsibility necessary in the interests of public safety, and guarded it with such jealousy that it refused to allow a railway to contract itself out of it. Then as to the justice of the change proposed by this Bill. Here, again, he would quote the words of Lord Cockburn in the same case. He said—

"I have rarely come upon any principle that seems more irreconcilable than the English principle to general legal reason. I can conceive some reasons for exempting the employer from liability altogether, but not one for exempting him only when those who act for him injure one of themselves. It rather seems to me that these are the very persons who have the strongest claim upon him for reparation, because they incur damage on his account."

He thought that these strongly-expressed opinions of eminent Scottish Judges as to the superiority of what was then declared to be the law of Scotland—of what the Bill before the House proposed should become the law of the United Kingdom over that artificial exceptional legal presumption which had been imported into the English law of labour contracts—ought to carry great weight with the House. The law as declared in Scotland was, however, changed, or, more strictly speaking, declared to be different from what Scotch jurists and Judges had ever conceived it to be, by the decision in the House of Lords in the case of the Bartonhill Coal Company v. Read—a case in which their Lordships' judgment concluded with this significant passage—

"The House would say nothing about costs, as the judgment of the Court below seemed to be fully warranted by the previous decisions in Scotland."

The case of mines had been especially relied upon as proving the injustice of this Bill. He (Dr. Cameron), however, maintained that it was in the case of mines that the greatest benefit would result from its adoption. There was not one mine accident in ten but could be avoided by proper precautions and vigilance. Government inspection could at best be but fitful and remittent: let, however, the mine-owner once understand that his responsibility for injuries to his workmen was put on the same footing as that of a railway towards its passengers, and the result would be to secure a more thorough and effective inspection of mines than would result from the expenditure from the National Exchequer of ten times the amount at present expended on mine inspection.

MR. HERMON, as an employer of labour, disclaimed any desire on the part of manufacturers to shirk any responsibility which fairly attached to them; and he could not recollect any case in which a master had repudiated his responsibility for the act of his overseer or manager. This Bill, however, in its present shape, was of the most sweeping character; and he hoped to hear in the course of the debate such expressions as would induce the hon. Member to leave the matter in the hands of the Government. There was nothing more injurious to trade and manufactures than piecemeal alteration of the law, and he suggested that a Royal Commission or a Committee of the House should be appointed to inquire into the subject, with a view to a general amendment of the law in those points in which it should appear to require amendment. He would illustrate the unlimited scope of the Bill as it stood by showing that it might be applied to domestic service, so that if through one maid-servant in a house carelessly leaving a pail on the stairs her fellow-servant fell over it and broke her leg, the employer of both would be made responsible. Much as he desired to see the law improved, he must oppose that measure in its present form; but he hoped the present discussion would prepare the way for a satisfactory solution of the question.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, the Bill would make a very sweeping change in the existing law—a change which he was sure the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) never contemplated. Its effect would be this—If the chambermaid of the hon. Member were to put a fellow-servant into a damp bed, and the latter were thus to contract rheumatic fever, the hon. Member would be liable for the negligence of his servant. At the same time he admitted that the present state of the law was not satisfactory, and he was prepared to support the second reading in the hope that if the Bill went into Committee its provisions would be considerably limited. The doctrine of common employment had been pushed too far. There was a class of cases in which workmen were bound to obey the orders of the representative of the master—a representative who might be a competent person, but still might be negligent, and refuse to carry on the work in a proper manner—and, in such cases, though the workmen might suffer from the failings or negligence or refusal of such a man to provide what was necessary for carrying on the work, yet they had no remedy in the way of compensation for injuries so sustained, because they were in a common employ. That, surely, was not a proper state for the law to be in. It was a state of things which was not consonant with our common instincts and views of justice. The Lord Chief Justice of England had expressed himself strongly on the subject of the injustice of the existing state of the law in regard to cases of a similar character. In one case it was held that a clerk in the employ of a company, being sent by train on an errand of the Company had suffered from a collision, could not recover compensation because he and the engine-driver were in common employment. Other learned Judges had given similar judgments. Surely, it was the duty of the House to endeavour as far as possible to meet the just claims of a class of persons who were so much exposed to accidents. The Bill ought to meet that class of cases—extending the liability of masters to cases of negligence on the part of persons representing them, and establishing some limitation of the doctrine of common employment. Though the Bill was faulty as it stood, he trusted that it might be allowed to go to a second reading, with the object of amending it in Committee;—particularly so as to limit it to cases in which it should appear that legislation was really necessary.

MR. KNOWLES said, he would support any measure the object of which was the moral and social welfare of the working classes, having been connected with them for many years; but he thought the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford would prove mischievous and do great injury to them. The hon. Member for Stafford professed to speak as a practical man; all he (Mr. Knowles) could say was, that if his remarks were intended to illustrate his practical knowledge he knew very little. The cases quoted by the hon. Member occurred before the passing of the Mines Regulation Act. From his practical knowledge the hon. Member declared that where there was no gas there could be no explosion; but in a mine which was as free of gas as that House and with regard to which every care that human ingenuity could suggest was taken, the first stroke of the pick might liberate a great deal of gas. Did the hon. Member tell the House that when that gas showed itself the men ceased working? The men were the first to observe danger, and they knew where to find it. He could teach the hon. Member in 10 minutes how to know when a mine had become dangerous. (A laugh.) The hon. Member laughed, but was his practical knowledge sufficient to enable him to say whether the statement was right or wrong? Only a practical man could find out where the danger was. As to the question of responsibility, take the case of two men engaged in reparing a shaft. Every care was taken to provide good material and proper arrangements for the work; but, after all, one of the men fell off the scaffolding. Was the master responsible for that? Surely the master was not to stand there while they were doing the work. Again, as to accidents in coal mines. If six men were working, one being engaged in bringing the coal down and the others engaged in front of it, and the one brought the coal down without giving the others notice, and injured them, was the master responsible? There always would be accidents—they could not obviate them altogether. The last Mines Bill was very stringent; so stringent as to be almost mischievous. He had an accident in one of his collieries, which showed what gas would do and how it would act. He knew it was a fiery mine, and he worked it as such; he provided five times the ventilation required by the Act, and had taken every possible precaution that experience could suggest; yet an explosion occurred, and nearly every man in the mine was killed. The manager of the mine had been down only 10 minutes before the explosion, the ventilation was perfect, and everything seemed to be correct; and no one to this day could so much as guess the cause of the accident. That accident cost him, besides £100,000, the lives of probably the best men he ever employed—in fact, he would never be able to replace them. They were of the old stamp of colliers, not the new stamp, who could not do half the work of the old class of men. He had lived long enough to know that those masters were most successful who took the greatest care of their men. He would go so far as to say that men ought to have good wages, they ought to be well fed, well clothed, and well housed; for how could the collier or the ironworker, for instance, work well if he were not well fed and well rested? Would this Bill do that? No; it would encourage nothing but carelessness and idleness. They had many societies in operation in the North of England to redress the sufferings occasioned by accidents and in other ways. Did they find the hon. Member encouraging these provisions? The societies to which he referred devoted their money to good objects and did not allow it to be frittered away in encouraging strikes and paid agitators. Some of these societies had been very successful. One, after meeting every claim for compensation, had a balance of £28,000. By the contribution of merely 3d. per week by the men in the mining districts of the North, compensation was provided for injuries, the masters subscribing 20 per cent; and if there were added to this what they had to pay in poor-rate very ample provision indeed would be made. While, however, the societies were successful in Lancashire, Northumberland, and Durham, a society in North Staffordshire had not been successful, for after being in operation for six years the number of members did not reach 1,000. What influences had been at work in North Staffordshire he could not say; but it was time the colliers should judge and act for themselves. Instead of introducing Bills of this kind, he thought the hon. Member for Stafford would do better to give the workmen good advice—advise them that they were thinking and responsible beings—that they were best capable of discovering danger, and could prevent it far sooner than their employers, and that they should rather form societies to make provision for themselves in case of accident, than rely upon legislation of this kind, which treated them as children and slaves more than as persons capable of taking care of themselves.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford dealt with a most important subject, and though it went rather beyond the necessities of the case yet it was deserving the attention of the House, and for his part he should give it a cordial support. He had taken the opinion of those interested in this question, and he did not believe that they desired to go the full length of the Bill. On the contrary, he believed when the law was explained to them they were quite prepared to acquiesce in a measure rather short of that before them. What was wanted was first, that employers should be held responsible for the ordinary safe conduct of their business, and for the substantial character of their plant and machinery; and, second, that the doctrine of common employment should not be carried too far—that was, so as to cover occupations which were independent of one another. It was certain that practically, by recent decisions, the responsibility of large employers had been destroyed, and it had been proved impossible for workmen to make the owners responsible for injuries they might receive in their employ. As had already been stated by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) until recently the Scotch Law was more liberal than the English law. He might further point out Lord Ardmillan held in the Court of Session that the doctrine of common employment ought not to be carried so far as the English Judges had done. Soon afterwards—in the year following, in fact—the law of Scotland was reconciled to the law of England by a decision of the House of Lords. He had listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Stafford, who had introduced the Bill, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman wished to go the full length of his own measure. He believed if the Bill were restricted to the two rules to which he had referred, it would give great satisfaction to the country, and he would support its second reading. They had already dealt partially with the same question in the Merchant Shipping Bill, and they had there made the shipowner responsible to his seamen for the seaworthiness of the vessel. He thought the same principle should be extended to other trades. He hoped that the House would read the Bill a second time.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT expressed a hope that the Bill would be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee. There could be no doubt that the Bill in its present form went further than was desirable, but it was equally certain that the existing law was in a most unsatisfactory state, and that a clear case had been made out for amending legislation.

MR. PEASE said, that whatever might be the result of the discussion, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) might be well satisfied with having brought that important subject before the House. The debate had, however, run a good deal off the actual lines of the Bill, and had turned a good deal on the doctrine of “common employment.” Now, if he was asked whether the doctrine of common employment was clearly defined, or was in a satisfactory state, he should say that it was not in a satisfactory state, because it was not clearly defined. If the hon. Member for Stafford said that those who voted for the second reading must be understood as supporting the Bill in its entirety and as a whole, then he could not vote for it; but if, on the other hand, the hon. Member said that he admitted the Bill went too far, and all that he wanted was that the doctrine of common employment should be better defined, then he (Mr. Pease) would vote for the second reading. The hon. Member for Stafford terms to the scenes the catastrophes which he described. Now, his own experience was less than that of the hon. Member; but no one who had seen any of these catastrophes, and who had the heart of man, could feel otherwise than strongly about them, or would not desire to do all he could to alleviate the suffering they occasioned. But then he denied that the Bill would obviate these catastrophes. The great and worthy, and to a certain extent the successful, object of the hon. Member's course, had been the adoption of measures for the saving of life, and he had obtained the passage of measures valuable not only to the men, but to their employers, but he feared this Bill would tend to increase very materially the risk to human life. Let him illustrate this by cases that had been referred to in the course of the discussion. Take the case, for instance, of the engine-man drawing the other men over the pulley. If the engine-man knew that the men he was drawing up hour by hour and day by day would be compensated by the masters if any accident happened to them by his negligence, or if the men who were working side by side knew that if the negligence of one of them occasioned injury to the others, and that these others would be compensated in like manner by the masters, would this, he would ask, tend to make either the one or the other more or less careful? It certainly seemed to him that it would tend to make them less careful. Therefore, the tendency of the Bill, so far from promoting the object to which the hon. Member had devoted his life, would constitute a retrograde march on his own line. Now, with regard to the guards on railways, no doubt a railway guard got increased pay because he ran an increased risk. He travelled a certain number of miles, and he was paid considerably higher wages than he would be if he never travelled at all. The Bill would lessen his wages if he was otherwise compensated for this risk. In like manner it would lessen the wages of the miner, because at present the wages of the miner were in like manner a compensation for the risk he ran. If the employer had to pay more for the risk of accidents, it was clear that that would increase the expense of labour production. He could not, therefore, to pay so much for wages, would have to be taken into account in settling their amount in arbitration or in any other way. Neither, indeed, would it be fair that a man should have quite the same wages if he did as if he did not run the same risk. Then take the case of skilled labour, which he might illustrate by an instance which lately came under his notice. He saw the other day a contract with a diver from Liverpool, who was to be employed under water on some work. He undertook to go into the water, and to undertake a certain risk. If the risk was incurred, and he was killed, his representatives were to receive a certain sum on his death; so that here was the risk of death provided for by a direct contract. It seemed to him that in other employments the same thing was done indirectly by adding to the wages, in order that the man might undertake the risk himself. They must always recollect that it was careless men they had to deal with. That was an important consideration. Now, if this Bill were carried out, it would, bearing that fact in mind, be seen to be likely to lead to interminable disputes between masters and men. The litigation would go before a British jury, and what chance then would a master of large reputed wealth have against a poor pitman killed in his employment, or in his mine? He had the return of a hospital in his hand, one of several which he had procured, and he would ask anyone who looked through these papers impartially, whether it was not most probable that several of these men had not in a great measure contributed to the accidents by their own carelessness. The first half-dozen were entered as suffering from falls of stones from the roof, the most deadly cause of mine accidents in existence, and a far worse source of danger than fire-damp, or anything of that kind. Now, under this Bill, all these men would be compensated by the master, unless he could be proved to have contributed by his own negligence to the accident, and this would, in his opinion, hardly ever clearly be done. Then there was another case of an accident, which consisted in the breaking of a wire rope, by which a man's leg was broken—where was the fault; was the rope in fault, or was the man going too near it when the accident took place? But he need not go through the list. He had said sufficient to show that it must lead to a great increase of that litigation which they must all be very anxious to avoid. He would now turn to the instances given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. There was the case of accidents arising from the shunting of railway goods trains at warehouses. Now, the railway companies had made the most stringent regulations on this subject; but under the Bill they would be liable to pay compensation for accidents which they had done their best to avoid and prevent. He could not find any proof that the Bill was sought by the country. There was only 34,000 signatures, representing all trades, in the Petitions which had been presented. From his own district he could only find the names of 276 men, out of one of the largest mining constituencies in the Kingdom, and while he mentioned that, he might also mention that there were 55,000 subscribers to the Northumberland and Durham Provident Society for Pitmen. Now, seeing how wonderfully organized all these trades were all over the country, he must say that he thought the desire of the country for the passage of the Bill had been very much exaggerated in the statements made to the House. He must also take notice that there were two very awkward Government notes appended to two of the Petitions which had been presented. To a Petition presented by the hon. Member for Stafford was appended a note to the effect that out of 900 of the signatures many were by the same hand; and a similar note was, he saw, affixed to a Petition presented by the right hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam). Therefore, looking to these facts, he must say that he saw no great indication that the Bill was required or asked for by the country. He thought, indeed, that he might say why it was not required. The hon. Member for Wigan had referred to the Northumberland and Durham Miners' Provident Institution. On the society's books there were 55,000 men, and also 10,000 boys, and it had an income of £40,000. It was now paying annuities to 280 widows and 550 children by way of compensation. There was a great number of small accidents, all of which were provided for out of its funds, and there had been subscribed to the funds of that institution by the owners no less a sum than £16,000 within the last few years. How could they, he would ask, work the compulsory system of compensation suggested by the Bill alongside such a voluntary system as that? If the employer of labour was to be responsible for the accidents in the wholesale manner provided by the Bill, these voluntary societies would fall to the ground. The men would not subscribe, because they would know that the master would compensate them in case of accidents, as no man was designedly careless; and the employers would not take both the legal and the voluntary responsibility. Then there was another thing to which he would call attention, that was to the fact that they had in Northumberland and Durham—and, he believed, the same was the case in other districts—what was known as the payment of "smart money"—that was, the payment to men who met with accident while following their employment of 6s. a-week, however the accident might be occasioned. That would no longer be paid if the Bill passed. The extra risk run by the men being compensated in the way he had shown, the question of legal liability would not come under discussion. Morally, if not legally, the liability was acknowledged by the masters in their contributions to these institutions. What he complained of in the difference between the voluntary system and the Bill was that the voluntary system took up all accidents, whether occasioned by negligence or not, while the Bill would only take up accidents described as occurring through no negligence of the men themselves, and would leave the others to go to and to be provided for by the parish. To this fund in Northumberland and Durham 300 colliers had subscribed. They would do so no longer if the Bill passed, as the Bill would apply to both railway and mining interests. He would now say a word with respect to the former in the same way as he had done with respect to the miners. He had in his hand a letter from Mr. Oakley, the manager of the Great Northern Company, who stated that they had on that line a sick club, which was managed free of expense to the Company. They had on the list now 100 widows, and also servants of the Company, and also a large number of children. The fund was provided by subscriptions, and to it the Company subscribed. In addition to this was the Railway Provident Society, which had prospered so well that at the present moment they had £70,000 in hand, so that the annuities to the widows would be not only paid, but fully secured. Then he might inform the House that every leading railway company in the country had special funds of the same kind, to which the companies themselves contributed in a very liberal and generous manner. That was the case, he might state, either from his own knowledge or from information before him, with respect to the Great Eastern, the South-Western, the Great Western, the Midland, the London, Brighton, and South Coast, the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and also the London and North-Western. He would venture to put it strongly to the hon. Member for Stafford, who had charge of the Bill now before them, whether he thought that if he could carry the Bill that voluntary system which he had described could go on working alongside a compulsory system, making every one accountable for accidents happening in his service through the negligence of another workman. The Bill, he said again, would only touch those special cases where the circumstances were such as to bring them under the clauses conferring or exacting compensation from the masters under the circumstances which satisfied the legal rule as to the conditions under which such compensation might be exacted on the one hand; on the other hand, the principle laid down in the miners' and railway associations was that when a man had met with an accident, whether by his own negligence or not, he would receive compensation if injured, or, if he was killed, his widow would receive an annuity. That would come to an end if the Bill passed, and in this case the Bill, instead of benefiting, would, in his opinion, do an inconceivable injury to the working classes, whom the hon. Member for Stafford was anxious to serve.

MR. RODWELL said, all seemed to admit the unsatisfactory state of the existing law on this subject, but all seemed equally agreed that the Bill of hon. Member for Stafford went too far. His own opinion was that if the Bill passed in its present state it would prove unworkable and would lead to great hardship and oppression. The proper tribunal to deal with this question was the same tribunal that had dealt with the Labour Laws and he hoped the Government would see their way to an inquiry into this subject by a Royal Commission. Such an inquiry would be better conducted by a Commission than by a Select Committee; and, meanwhile, he should move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. He did not undervalue the importance of the subject. On the contrary, it was the very gravity of the question which led him to make this proposal. The Bill would revolutionize our law; it would alter many social and domestic relations. For example, the farmers would be exposed to great liabilities, owing to the introduction of new implements worked by steam; and before such changes were made the whole subject should undergo inquiry.

MR. HARDCASTLE seconded the Amendment, and said if the House declared against the existing principle of law that workmen should accept the ordinary risks of their employment, it would take a course fraught with danger. In his view it was the duty of every man to provide against the contingencies which happened to him in life. The Bill did not profess to avert such risks—it merely provided for compensation afterwards. The whole question, therefore was one of money, and he thought the better arrangement was the relief now afforded by subscriptions, and by the men's own contributions through the voluntary associations which had been mentioned. He thought that a Royal Commission formed too cumbersome a machinery for dealing with the subject; and that if the whole subject—not the Bill—were referred to a Select Committee, it would be the most satisfactory result.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Rodwell.)

MR. M. T. BASS said, he thought some legislation on the subject was absolutely required. He denied that the great mass of the working classes were indifferent on this subject. For his own part he would willingly accept an assurance from the Government that they would legislate respecting it without unnecessary delay.

Mr. TENNANT thought that while the state of the law was unsatisfactory the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford went much further than was necessary. The grievance of which the working men complained arose less from the principle of law than from the interpretation put upon it by the Judges; for example, by holding that a foreman of works exercising authority over the men was in law a fellow workman, for whose acts the employer was not responsible. He should be satisfied to accept either a Commission or a Committee; but hoped the Government would in any case, do something to remove what the workmen thought a great grievance, without imposing an intolerable burden upon employers.

Mr. BURT said, he must defend the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) from imputations of his never having done anything to induce working men to make provision against accident and death, inasmuch as that had been one of the leading objects of his hon. Friend's life. Whatever might be the result of that debate, the hon. Member might congratulate himself on having raised a useful and valuable discussion. It was important to know to what extent employers should be liable for risk to those in their employment, and he was glad to know that the almost unanimous opinion of the House was that the law in its present state was not satisfactory. He could easily conceive cases in which it would be most unjust to employers to be made responsible for the recklessness of all those in their employment. He did not think the Bill went to that extent; if it did, he could not support it. But the Bill was valuable in this way, that in cases of community of employment it prevented the employer from raising an unjust defence. He did not think the Attorney General had satisfactorily shown that a master should not be liable for the neglect or incapacity of his managers and officials. With respect to the statements of the wages earned by miners within the last few years and the claptrap that had been sent about the country alleging that they lived extravagantly and drank champagne, he pointed out that, when wages were at their highest, miners did not, even in the best paid districts of the country, average more than £2 10s. per week. If it was said they might save 30s. out of that sum, he might say that, though he did not drink champagne, he had found it a very stiff undertaking to maintain a family on £1 a week. The coal trade at present was very bad, and great numbers of miners were working but half time, and earning only 3s. to 3s. 6d. per day, notwithstanding all the risks to which they were exposed. He agreed with the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) as to the advantages of voluntary associations. As to the system of giving smart money which had been alluded to, it prevailed only in the North of England, and not throughout the country generally. He was well satisfied with the spirit in which the debate had been conducted; and seeing that it had been admitted that the law was unsatisfactory, if the Government would give a pledge that they would bring in a Bill of their own or refer the Bill before the House to a Select Committee or a Royal Commission, he would recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw the measure.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, after the course which the debate had taken, one thing, at all events, must be put aside—that there should be on this question any legislation of class against class. At the present moment he had no hesitation in saying that he believed the law to be wrong; but he had no hesitation, also, in saying that if this Bill as it stood were to become law he believed the law would then be wrong. Now, two wrongs did not make a right. He was so anxious that there should not go out to the country any notion of class legislation on one side or the other that he hoped he would be able to induce his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) to withdraw his Amendment and the hon. Member for Stafford to withdraw the Bill. The case had been so clearly stated by the Attorney General that it would not be necessary for him to go into it at any length. With regard to the question of accidents caused by the negligence of a fellow-workman—construing the term in no narrow sense, but taking it as including persons engaged in the same work as the man or manager—Government, with the matter in the hands of a Committee of this House, competent to fr-

if the hon. Member, instead of bringing this Bill before the House, had put the question in the shape of a Resolution to the effect that this matter required investigation he would have granted an inquiry without a word. He must say, however, that he had listened to one part of the debate with pain. A great many hon. Members, chiefly on the other side, had said—not that they would oppose the second reading because the Bill was wrong in principle, but that they would vote for it for the purpose of pulling it to pieces in Committee. His notion was that when a Bill was wrong it was better to say so at once. He could not, therefore, consent to the second reading. After what he had said he hoped both his hon. and learned Friend behind him and the hon. Member for Stafford would withdraw their Motions, that they might have at once an inquiry into the matter to which he had referred.

MR. W. E. FORSTER recommended the hon. Member for Stafford to accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman. He was glad the Government had assented to a Select Committee rather than a Commission.

MR. MELDON having put his name on the back of the Bill was glad of the proposal made by the Government, and advised his hon. Friend (Mr. Macdonald) to accept it.

MR. MACDONALD expressed his willingness to accept the offer of the Home Secretary.

CRIMINAL LAW (EVIDENCE) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 61.]

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. George Clive.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that he took for his motto on this occasion the words of Bentham—"Innocence claims the right of speaking, as guilt invokes the privilege of silence." Although, no doubt, the effect of the change in the law of evidence which he asked the House to make would be to secure more certain conviction of the guilty, it was not on that ground that he based his appeal, but on the right that every innocent person had to state his own case and tell his own story under all the sanctions which law and custom made necessary, if the Court and jury were to pay proper attention to the statements—namely, under oath and subject to cross-examination. There were four classes of persons now excluded from the witness-box:—1. Prisoners on their own behalf. 2. Wives or husbands of such. 3. Co-prisoners. 4. Wives or husbands of such co-prisoners. The Bill which he asked the House to read a second time would make all these persons competent witnesses if they chose to offer themselves, on the same footing as any other witnesses, but there was no provision to compel any prisoner to give evidence. As to the history of the present law, he would only say that no express authority could be found either in text books or the statutes for the proposition that it was illegal to examine a prisoner. The modern practice was not older than the Revolution. Between the time of the abolition of the Star Chamber and the year 1680 such men as Scroggs and Jeffrey had disgraced the bench, and by their infamous brow-beating of prisoners had brought about a system of protection to the accused, which was secured by enforcing his silence. Also, during the 18th century, the private litigation theory had gained ground, and the rules of evidence had been crystallized into a technical form, one element of which was that interested as well as tainted evidence was worthless. Hence, criminals and those who had to gain anything by the verdict were excluded from the witness box. In 1843 an Act was passed to remedy this, and after saying in the Preamble that the inquiry after truth in Courts of Justice was often obstructed by incapacities created by the law, it enacted that—

"No person hereafter shall be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime or interest in any proceeding civil or criminal."

But it proceeded to except the parties themselves. In 1851 an Act was passed repealing the above exception, but repeating the exception as to criminal cases and adultery. So timorous were the steps which marked any advance in such matters in England! But the results of those amendments in the law had been most beneficial, and the only source of wonder now was how, under the old system, the truth could ever have been elicited. Lord Brougham, in 1858, 1859, 1860, three times ineffectually tried to pass Bills to admit the evidence of prisoners; but although hitherto direct and general legislation had been refused, indirectly and by special exceptions, great inroads had been made upon the existing system. He (Mr. Ashley) would only cite to the House the Master and Servant Act (1867), the Naval Courts Martial Act, the Merchant Shipping Acts, both this year and last, the Licensing Act, 1872, the Conspiracy Act, 1875, in all of which the parties charged with offences under these several Acts were to be competent witnesses in their own behalf. In Bankruptcy the person charged was not only competent, but in some cases compellable to answer. In the Divorce Court respondents and co-respondents were now admitted, and these proceedings were of a quasi-penal character. Then, to go out of England. The Indian New Code and Evidence Act, 1872, admitted the examination of prisoners; the New Zealand statute of 1875 had admitted prisoners to the witness-box in summary proceedings, and in some of the United States of America, where the English Common Law prevailed, the system been adopted with complete suc-

Mr. Evelyn Ashley

He would read to the House some of the answers which he had received from the judicial officers of places in America where it was in force, and the House would hear how satisfied they were with the working of the new law of evidence in criminal cases. There were many cases where the prisoner or his wife were the only persons who could tell the true story. How hard was the position of a man who was in bed at the time of the commission of the crime imputed to him, and yet could not call his wife to prove an alibi. What he might call the "leading case" on this branch of the subject was that of the Rev. Mr. Hatch, who was convicted of an indecent assault on a girl, and when in penal servitude prosecuted the girl for perjury. Being able to call his wife as a witness on this prosecution he proved his innocence. So in cases of assault and embezzlement, the prisoner was often the only person who could state the circumstances. He must not omit to say that there were two Amendments to the Bill which he should propose if it went into Committee—first, that neither the prosecutor nor the Court should make any remarks upon the absence of the prisoner from the box, if he declined to avail himself of his right. This provision he found in the American statutes, and it was certainly a fair and just enactment. Secondly, that no prisoner should be cross-examined as to any previous convictions, or as to his previous character. If this was not provided it might bear hardly upon a prisoner, and also an innocent man might be deterred from offering himself as a witness because of some former fault of which he had been guilty.

And it being now a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the further Proceeding on Second Reading was adjourned till To-morrow.

LOCAL TAXATION.—QUESTION.

Mr. RATHBONE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is right to suppose that the amount of loans as outstanding in Parliamentary No. 410, of Session 1875, and at £84,194,956, represents the amount of local indebtedness on 1st January 1874; and what further amount of loans to local authorities authorized by Government, and for what of England and Wales in June, 1874, June being the end of the local year. The large increase shown by the Return which I laid on the Table is probably due in part to the very imperfect record of indebtedness which previously existed. A further account is now being prepared, which will show the loans authorized by Government Departments since June, 1874. I am unable to say what that amount is at the present moment; but I have every reason to hope that either my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the President of the Local Government Board will very shortly make a statement on the subject.

NAVY—SUB-LIEUTENANTS.QUESTION.

Mr. COGAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the hardship suffered by several sub-Lieutenants in the Navy, many of whom, after having been on active service for many years without having any opportunities of efficient study, have been dismissed the service in consequence of failing to pass the examination for the rank of Lieutenant, in consequence of the present rule being that if the officer fail to pass in the first instance, he is only allowed an interval of about six weeks before he has to go up for a second examination, which is final; whether it is a fact that at the examination in December last eleven officers were examined, the result being that six were dismissed the service; and, whether he sees any objection to allow an interval of four or six months to elapse after the first examination before the second and final examination takes place?

Mr. HUNT: The subject referred to in the Question of the right hon. Gentleman has engaged my serious attention, and I have had the advantage of consulting, not only the President of the Royal Naval College, but his predecessor, and they agree in the views they have put before me. I demur to the statement that these officers have failed to pass their examination in consequence of the rule referred to in the Question. I have gone through the case of every young officer who has failed to pass, and in every instance I trace the failure, not to the rule, but to the idleness of the

If he has seen by the report of the Coroner's Inquest on the dynamite explosion at Maesteg, South Wales, that there was at least one hundred and fifty pounds of dynamite in a man-hole of the tunnel where the explosion took place on the 21st of April; if he has observed by the report that naked lights were used where the parties in charge were handling the dynamite; if he has had it brought under his notice that the charges for exploding with were all made in the man-hole where the dynamite was stored; whether he will, if it is not already provided for by the Act of Parliament, bring in a Bill to prevent the use of naked lights where dynamite is stored underground; and, whether he will make provisions in it against the storing of such large quantities of dynamite, and make provision that it must not be prepared for use where it is stored?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, reminded the hon. Member that he had already stated that he had thought the matter so important that he had directed the Inspector to make a special inquiry, quite independently of the Coroner's inquest, into the facts of the case, under the 66th section of the Explosives Act of last Session. That inquiry had been held, but the Inspector had not yet made his Report. As soon as he did so the Report would, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, be laid upon the Table of the House, when such action would be taken upon it as the Government might think right. The work in the tunnel where the explosion took place had been carried on with an unexpired licence under the old Act. The new Act required that the place where dynamite was stored should not be used for any other purpose. He had no doubt that that Act would be quite sufficient to meet the exigencies of the case to which the hon. Member had referred.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL—POOR EDUCATIONAL DISTRICTS.

QUESTIONS.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he has, before the drawing and consideration of his Education Bill, prepared a Return (from the blue-book 'Parishes,' No. 114, of 1868, or from other sources) of all the civil parishes or school districts where a rate of three pence in the pound will not produce six shillings per head of one-sixth of the population of the parish, showing the number of schools in such parish, and distinguishing the schools as "Church of England," "Non-conformist," "Roman Catholic," and "Board schools;" and, whether he will endeavour to send such a Return out to the Members of the House previous to the Second Reading of his Bill?

VISCOUNT SANDON: We carefully inquired into the effect of our proposals respecting poor districts before we laid the Bill upon the Table of the House, and the valuable Returns which the noble Lord obtained in 1868 were of considerable service to us in considering this matter. We have not, however, the complete Return of the whole of the parishes and districts to which he alludes, nor have we considered the character of the schools in each parish, distinguishing them as Church of England, Nonconformist, Roman Catholic, or board schools. This part of the question we did not enter into at all, as we treated the matter of extra assistance to the poor districts as one which was needed to remedy a general injustice to the poor districts, both in town and country, whether under school boards or not; and we have not made any inquiry as to the respective numbers of board schools, Roman Catholic, Nonconformist, and Church of England, in these poor districts. I shall be happy to do my best to get printed a Return as to the first part of the noble Lord's Question before the second reading of the Bill. With regard to the other part, respecting the character of the schools to be affected, it would be a most laborious Return, and would take a long time and much tact to prepare, and there would be no chance of having it ready for the discussions on this Bill. I am sorry, therefore, I cannot comply with the second part of the noble Lord's request.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU gave Notice that he would move for the Returns referred to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER inquired whether the noble Lord would have any objection to furnish a Return of the number of poor districts in boroughs?

VISCOUNT SANDON replied that a Return could be furnished of the number of poor districts, but not of the number of schools in those districts.

Mr. Macdonald

Clause 6 of the Elementary Education Act, that Boards of Guardians, if they pass bye-laws on the requisition of the ratepayers of a parish, should have identically the same powers as school boards now possess of compelling the attendance of children at public elementary schools, whether denominational or not; and it is just as carefully provided in the Bill of this Session, as in the Act of 1870, that no compulsion should be used unless there is within reach of the child a public elementary school—that is to say, an efficient school, with the ample Conscience Clause of the Education Act, 1870. It is also true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac) mentions in his Question, that it is in the power of school boards, where they have any bye-laws for compulsion and where no denominational schools exist, to compel the attendance of children of the Church of England, the Church of Rome, and of children professing the Jewish religion, at board schools where the teaching of the Catechism and other religious formularies of such children is prohibited. I must remind the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon that the only alternative modes of treatment of this question are to leave the neglected children alone, untaught and untrained in all the numerous places where there are only denominational public elementary schools, or to destroy all such denominational schools, after having spent some £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 of money upon them from voluntary sources, and throw them upon the rates. I leave the hon. Gentleman to judge whether such proposals are likely to rally the country to the somewhat strange coalition of parties at which his proposal points.

MR. SANDFORD: I rise to Order. I have no objection to the noble Lord making any statement he likes in answer to the Question; but I do not think he ought to be allowed to enter into an argument.

MR. SPEAKER: I certainly agree with the hon. Member for Maldon that the noble Lord is rather travelling into an argument than answering a Question.

CRIMINAL LAW—PUBLIC PROSECUTOR. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the evidence given before the Committee on Foreign Loans, and the numerous miscarriages of justice in criminal cases, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make proposals for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: This is a Question which has for a long time engaged the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and I am quite prepared on their behalf to submit a scheme for the consideration of this House whenever a proper and convenient opportunity is afforded for its discussion. But I must warn the House that whenever any scheme to be effective for the purpose is brought forward, they must not expect it to be one which will not cost money. Beyond the expenditure incurred on behalf of salaries, the cost of prosecutions will, I have not the slightest doubt, be very enormously increased.

MERCANTILE MARINE—SHIPWRECKED VESSELS.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the debate in the Legislative Assembly of Melbourne on the propriety of Her Majesty's ships calling at the islands between the Cape of Good Hope and Australia to relieve those shipwrecked upon them; and, if so, what steps he has taken or proposes to take in the matter?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had not seen any report of the debate to which the hon. Member referred; but the Admiralty had received a communication from Lloyd's Committee on the subject, and in the Correspondence which had ensued Her Majesty's Governments had expressed their views and intentions on the matter. As the story was too long to give in an Answer to a Question it would be more convenient if the hon. Member would move for a copy of the Correspondence, in order that those views and intentions might be put before the House.

EXPLOSIVES SUBSTANCES ACT, 1875— DYNAMITE EXPLOSION IN SOUTH WALES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, officers in question. I am assured that any officer of ordinary ability and application could easily prepare himself for the examination within the limit of time, and that if a longer period were allowed, there would only be the greater opportunity for idleness. Under these circumstances, I am not prepared to assent to the proposal contained in the Question. With regard to the number of officers who failed in December last, the number stated in the Question is correct; but it appears that the case was exceptional, and that a similar case is not likely to happen again. The last examination has produced much more favourable results.

JUDICATURE ACTS—THE ASSIZES.

QUESTION.

Mr. COLE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he concurs in the opinion of the Judges, as stated to the House by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the 18th instant—

"That Courts of Assize of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery, being parts of the High Court of Justice, are subject to the same rules, and that, as the Trinity Sittings end on the 8th of August, it would not be proper for the Judges to sit upon circuit after that day;"

whether he is of opinion that causes cannot be legally tried, or gaols delivered at assizes continuing after the 8th of August; and, if so, whether he is prepared to advise Her Majesty's Government to take steps to remedy the great hindrance to the administration of justice that will necessarily be caused thereby; and, whether the arrangements made by Her Majesty's Judges for holding the ensuing circuits will have the effect of adding eight or ten days at least to the Long Vacation as it has hitherto existed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: In my view, the Courts of Assize of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery are certainly parts of the High Court of Justice, and may be made subject to rules framed under the Judicature Acts. With respect to whether as the Trinity sittings end on the 8th of August, it would not be proper for the Judges to sit upon circuit after that day, I do not quite understand the proposition. If it is intended to ask me whether it would be illegal for the Judges to sit on circuit after that day, I should answer that I do not think it would be; but if it is wished that should express an opinion whether, having regard to the requirements of public business and other circumstances, it would be proper, suitable, and convenient that the circuits should not continue beyond the date in question, I must answer that upon this point the Judges are far better able to form an opinion than I am. With respect to the second part of the Question, I have already said that I do not think it will be illegal to try causes or prisoners after the 8th of August, and, therefore, it will not be necessary for me to give any advice to the Government on the subject. As to the remaining portion of my hon. and learned Friend's Question, I may remark that the Long Vacation has been considered to begin on the 10th of August and to last to the 24th of October. If, then, the arrangements contemplated are carried out, the Long Vacation will practically remain the same as before, but gentlemen practising on circuits where the business has generally lasted till late in August will get a longer holiday than usual.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870— CLAUSE 6.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. SANDFORD asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, under Clause 6 of the Elementary Education Act, giving compulsory powers to Boards of Guardians, it is intended, in parishes having no school but Church of England schools, to give the Boards of Guardians power to compel the attendance of the children of Non-Conformists and Roman Catholics at such Church of England schools?

Mr. ISAAC also asked Whether, under the seventy-fourth section of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, giving compulsory powers to School Boards it is in the power of such School Boards where no denominational school exists, to compel the attendance of children of the Church of England, the Church of Rome, or of children professing the Jewish religion at such Board Schools, where the teaching of the Catholicism or other religious formulæ of such children is prohibited?

Vice-President: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for ... (Mr. Sandford) I will at once say that it is intended that I should have ... was obvious.

Clause 6 of the Elementary Education Act, that Boards of Guardians, if they pass bye-laws on the requisition of the ratepayers of a parish, should have identically the same powers as school boards now possess of compelling the attendance of children at public elementary schools, whether denominational or not; and it is just as carefully provided in the Bill of this Session, as in the Act of 1870, that no compulsion should be used unless there is within reach of the child a public elementary school—that is to say, an efficient school, with the ample Conscience Clause of the Education Act, 1870. It is also true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac) mentions in his Question, that it is in the power of school boards, where they have any bye-laws for compulsion and where no denominational schools exist, to compel the attendance of children of the Church of England, the Church of Rome, and of children professing the Jewish religion, at board schools where the teaching of the Catechism and other religious formularies of such children is prohibited. I must remind the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon that the only alternative modes of treatment of this question are to leave the neglected children alone, untaught and untrained in all the numerous places where there are only denominational public elementary schools, or to destroy all such denominational schools, after having spent some £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 of money upon them from voluntary sources, and throw them upon the rates. I leave the hon. Gentleman to judge whether such proposals are likely to rally the country to the somewhat strange coalition of parties at which his proposal points.

Mr. SANDFORD: I rise to Order. I have no objection to the noble Lord making any statement he likes in answer to the Question; but I do not think he ought to be allowed to enter into an argument.

Mr. SPEAKER: I certainly agree with the hon. Member for Maldon that the noble Lord is rather travelling into argument than answering a Question.

AW—PUBLIC PROSECUTOR. QUESTION.

MR. RUSSELL asked the
the for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the evidence given before the Committee on Foreign Loans, and the numerous miscarriages of justice in criminal cases, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make proposals for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: This is a Question which has for a long time engaged the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and I am quite prepared on their behalf to submit a scheme for the consideration of this House whenever a proper and convenient opportunity is afforded for its discussion. But I must warn the House that whenever any scheme to be effective for the purpose is brought forward, they must not expect it to be one which will not cost money. Beyond the expenditure incurred on behalf of salaries, the cost of prosecutions will, I have not the slightest doubt, be very enormously increased.

MERCANTILE MARINE—SHIPWRECKED VESSELS.—QUESTION.

Mr. RATHBONE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the debate in the Legislative Assembly of Melbourne on the propriety of Her Majesty's ships calling at the islands between the Cape of Good Hope and Australia to relieve those shipwrecked upon them; and, if so, what steps he has taken or proposes to take in the matter?

Mr. HUNT, in reply, said, he had not seen any report of the debate to which the hon. Member referred; but the Admiralty had received a communication from Lloyd's Committee on the subject, and in the Correspondence which had ensued Her Majesty's Government had expressed their views and intentions on the matter. EXPLOSIVES SUBSTANCES ACT, 1875— DYNAMITE EXPLOSION IN SOUTH WALES.—QUESTION.

Mr. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

If he has seen by the report of the Coroner's Inquest on the dynamite explosion at Maesteg, South Wales, that there was at least one hundred and fifty pounds of dynamite in a man-hole of the tunnel where the explosion took place on the 21st of April; if he has observed by the report that naked lights were used where the parties in charge were handling the dynamite; if he has had it brought under his notice that the charges for exploding with were all made in the man-hole where the dynamite was stored; whether he will, if it is not already provided for by the Act of Parliament, bring in a Bill to prevent the use of naked lights where dynamite is stored underground; and, whether he will make provisions in it against the storing of such large quantities of dynamite, and make provision that it must not be prepared for use where it is stored?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, reminded the hon. Member that he had already stated that he had thought the matter so important that he had directed the Inspector to make a special inquiry, quite independently of the Coroner's inquest, into the facts of the case, under the 66th section of the Explosives Act of last Session. That inquiry had been held, but the Inspector had not yet made his Report. As soon as he did so the Report would, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, be laid upon the Table of the House, when such action would be taken upon it as the Government might think right. The work in the tunnel where the explosion took place had been carried on with an unexpired licence under the old Act. The new Act required that the place where dynamite was stored should not be used for any other purpose. He had no doubt that that Act would be quite sufficient to meet the exigencies of the case to which the hon. Member had referred.

QUESTIONS.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he has, before the drawing and consideration of his Education Bill, prepared a Return (from the blue-book "Parishes," No. 114, of 1868, or from other sources) of all the civil parishes or school districts where a rate of three pence in the pound will not produce six shillings per head of one-sixth of the population of the parish, showing the number of schools in such parish, and distinguishing the schools as "Church of England," "Non-conformist," "Roman Catholic," and "Board schools;" and, whether he will endeavour to send such a Return out to the Members of the House previous to the Second Reading of his Bill?

VISCOUNT SANDON: We carefully inquired into the effect of our proposals respecting poor districts before we laid the Bill upon the Table of the House, and the valuable Returns which the noble Lord obtained in 1868 were of considerable service to us in considering this matter. We have not, however, the complete Return of the whole of the parishes and districts to which he alludes, nor have we considered the character of the schools in each parish, distinguishing them as Church of England, Nonconformist, Roman Catholic, or board schools. This part of the question we did not enter into at all, as we treated the matter of extra assistance to the poor districts as one which was needed to remedy a general injustice to the poor districts, both in town and country, whether under school boards or not; and we have not made any inquiry as to the respective numbers of board schools, Roman Catholic, Nonconformist, and Church of England, in these poor districts. I shall be happy to do my best to get printed a Return as to the first part of the noble Lord's Question before the second reading of the Bill. With regard to the other part, respecting the character of the schools to be affected, it would be a most laborious Return, and would take a long time and much tact to prepare, and there would be no chance of having it ready for the discussions on this Bill. I am sorry, therefore, I cannot comply with the second part of the noble Lord's request.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU gave Notice that he would move for the Returns referred to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER inquired whether the noble Lord would have any objection to furnish a Return of the number of poor districts in boroughs?

VISCOUNT SANDON replied that a Return could be furnished of the number of poor districts, but not of the number of schools in those districts.

Mr. Macdonald

NAVY—COMMITTEE ON ROYAL NAVAL ENGINEERS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to an extract in the "Western Morning News," purporting to be taken from the Report of the Committee on Royal Naval Engineers and Engine-room Artificers; and, whether this extract is substantially correct; and if he is now prepared to lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had not seen the extract referred to by the hon. Member, and therefore he was unable to say whether it was correct. He had given no authority for any part of the Report of the Committee to be communicated to any newspapers. The Report would not be laid upon the Table of the House until some decision had been arrived at with regard to it.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is true that the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland have issued an Order declaring—

"That on any ex-officio governor and director of a district lunatic asylum ceasing to hold the office by virtue of which he acts as such, he shall cease to be a governor and director, and his successor in the office aforesaid shall not be entitled to act as an ex-officio governor and director of a district lunatic asylum ;"

whether said Order is intended to apply to all lunatic asylums in Ireland; and, if he would explain to the House why such Order has been issued?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Such an Order was issued by the Irish Privy Council on the 26th of January last. Technically, it applies to all lunatic asylums; practically, only to eight, for in that number only does it appear that ex-officio governors exist. These ex-officio governors consist of High Sheriffs, Members of Parliament for counties and boroughs, dignitaries of the disestablished Church, and, in some cases, the mayor of the city or borough where the lunatic asylum is situated. It appeared from inquiries made in connection with the subject that the legality of these appointments was very doubtful; and, as difficulties were likely to arise from this, the Privy Council considered it advisable, while confirming all existing appointments, to direct that no gentleman should in future hold the appointment of governor solely in virtue of the office or position which he might temporarily occupy.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If a contract for raising Her Majesty's Ship "Vanguard" has been concluded; and, if so, about what time is it proposed to commence the operations?

MR. HUNT: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that no contract has been entered into for raising the Vanguard. Negotiations for the purpose have been going on for some time; but they have not, as yet, come to any conclusion.

NAVY—COLLISION OF THE "ALBERTA" AND THE "MISTLETOE"—CAPTAIN WELCH.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON, asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, since the discussion on the "Mistletoe" disaster, the Admiralty have had any communication with Captain Welch with reference to the discrepancy between his letter, saying that he had requested a court martial, and the statement of the First Lord that no such request had been made or it would have been granted; and, whether he can now explain that discrepancy, and if he is willing still to grant such court martial if requested by Captain Welch?

MR. HUNT: I have to state, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's Question, that no communications have passed between the Admiralty and Captain Welch since the period to which he refers. I can only repeat now what I have stated before—that no application for a court martial has been received by the Admiralty from Captain Welch. With respect to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, the matter stands on a wholly different footing after the length of time that has elapsed since the unfortunate occurrence; and I am not prepared to say what would be the result of an application that has not yet been made.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—
SCOTCH BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. LEITH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, with reference to the frequent postponements of Scotch Government business in the House, the Government will be pleased to fix a time for moving the Second Reading of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Bill, considering its great importance to the people of Scotland; and also to make arrangements so as to secure the discussion during the present Session of the other Government Scotch Bills appearing in the Order Book of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am afraid Scotland is not alone in this matter. She is in very good company—namely, that of England and Ireland. With regard to the Sheriffs Courts (Scotland) Bill, which is a matter of great importance, I hope there is a prospect, and a reasonable one, of its being taken on Thursday. The Poor Law (Scotland) Bill stands for Monday, but I cannot say whether it can come on on that day or not. I think the two other Scotch Bills must be postponed until after Whitsuntide. But I will give hon. Members notice, as far as I can, as to when the Bills will be taken.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.
OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It would be convenient to the House if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would be good enough to state after what hour it is not proposed to go on with the Commons Bill this evening, and also whether, in any circumstances, it is intended to proceed with the third reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill to-night? The right hon. Gentleman, of course, will not be prepared to answer the question immediately; but it would be convenient, I think, that the House should know shortly what are the intentions of the Government with regard to the Oxford University Bill. I therefore give Notice that I will to-morrow ask whether he can name any day for proceeding with that Bill.

MR. DISRAELI: We do not intend to take the Commons Bill to-night after half-past 10, or, perhaps, 11 o'clock, nor to proceed with it to an unreasonable hour to-night. I do not see that I shall be able to-morrow to give the noble Lord a more satisfactory answer with regard to the Oxford University Bill than I can to-night, and therefore I may as well answer his Question at once. It is quite clear that we cannot proceed with that Bill at present. It must be taken after the holidays, and then I shall be able to give a more satisfactory answer to the noble Lord. The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill must be proceeded with before the Oxford University Bill can be taken.

MR. FAWCETT said, that the answer given by the Prime Minister to the Question of the noble Lord was so unusual that he must, most reluctantly, take the course of moving the adjournment of the House. The other night the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he could not tell whether the Commons Bill would be brought on at 10 o'clock or at half-past 10, and, therefore, Members did not know whether it would be brought on at 10 or at half-past 10. And now the First Minister said it might be brought on at 11 o'clock. That was not a reasonable hour for bringing on that very important Bill, and, if it were brought on at 11 o'clock, he (Mr. Fawcett) would move an adjournment. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the adjournment of the House.

Moved, "That the House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government attached great importance to the Commons Bill, as was manifest by the mention of it in the Queen's Speech. They were perfectly aware that the Bill when it came on at the next stage must give rise to a good deal of debate, and they had no wish to bring it on at a time inconvenient to the House. But it was very inconvenient to be asked questions with regard to precise hours and half hours, especially when such questions might lead to discussions which might, perhaps, take up a quarter or half-an-hour. The object of the Government was to get on with business and to bring forward their measures at a proper time. The Commons Bill had originally been put down as the first business of the day; but it was quite obvious that no time should be lost in proceeding with the financial measure of the Government, and therefore the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was put down for progress in Committee as the First Order of the Day. He hoped the House would get through that Bill at a time which would enable them to proceed with the discussion on the Commons Bill. If the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill should occupy the House till a time when it would be too late to proceed with the Commons Bill, of course the Government would not wish to press it against the wish of the House. But suppose the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill should be disposed of at 10 or half-past 10, he did not think they ought to be precluded from proceeding with the Commons Bill by anything that was said in the beginning of the evening. With regard to the Question of the noble Lord as to the Merchant Shipping Bill, that Bill stood for a third reading. He did not know whether it was likely that there would be much discussion on the third reading; but if it were not reached by half-past 11 it would not be proceeded with to-night, unless there was a general desire on the part of the House that it should be read a third time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL—[BILL 124.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

PART I.

Customs and Excise.

Clause 2 (Grant of Customs duties on tea.)

MR. RYLANDS protested against the clause because it continued the duty on tea. His objection to this was on the ground that it limited the consumption of tea, which was a necessary of life, and raised the price of it to the consumer to an amount larger than that of the duty itself. The effect a reduction of the duty produced upon the consumption was shown by the fact that while in 1840, when the duty was at a high rate, the quantity consumed per head of the population was 1.22 lb., now it was

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought that before the tea duty was further reduced there were other small duties which might with advantage be swept away—the duty, for example, on marine insurances, which, he contended, had a tendency to drive business out of the country. He would remind the hon. Member for Burnley that the general increase of wages in the country no doubt had much to do with the increased consumption of tea.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted the right of the hon. Member for Burnley to call attention to the tea duty on a proposal to re-impose it without alteration; but he thought the hon. Baronet was hardly in Order in introducing on a clause relating to the tea duty the question of marine insurance; and it would be very inconvenient to discuss the whole question of our taxation with the relative incidence of direct and indirect taxation upon that clause. They were not now in a position to deal with this subject; but he might remind the hon. Member for Burnley that the present Government, since they had been in office, although they had not reduced the tea duty, had taken off the whole of a very cognate tax—the sugar duty—a measure which had a considerable effect in stimulating the consumption of tea.

Clause 3 (Customs duty on cocoa paste and chocolate.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the omission of the clause, which had been originally introduced to regulate the duty on chocolate and cocoa paste after the repeal of the sugar duties. Inquiries had shown that a large proportion of these substances did not contain sugar, and the Government had come to the conclusion that they would by this clause create a great inequality on one side by attempting to remedy one on the other.

Motion agreed to.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Clause 4 (As to bottling spirits in a Customs or Excise warehouse for export-) tation only); and Clause 5 (Restriction of term "male servant," in s. 19 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14) agreed to.

PART II.

Income Tax.

Clause 6 (Grant of duties of income tax.)

MR. KIRKMAN HODGSON rose to move an Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, in page 2, line 38, to leave out "three pence" and insert "two pence-halfpenny." He had perfect confidence in the Estimates laid before the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he would take them as the basis of his observations. The right hon. Gentleman estimated the Expenditure of the current year at £78,044,000, and the Revenue at £77,270,000, leaving a deficiency of £774,000. To meet that deficiency the right hon. Gentleman proposed to add 1s. to the Income Tax, from which he expected to realize this year £1,168,000, leaving a surplus of £394,000, or, including the loss of the duty on boys occasionally employed, £368,000. If his (Mr. Hodgson's) proposal of a half-penny addition to the Income Tax were adopted, he calculated that it would give this year £857,000, which would meet the deficit of £774,000, and leave a balance of £83,000. If, however, he adopted the exemption of all incomes under £150, that would cost the Exchequer £135,000, and thus leave a trifling deficiency of £78,000—a deficiency which, looking at the extreme prudence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's calculations, he did not think at all serious. He could only hope to succeed in his Amendment if he could touch the heart of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and induce him to give to all payers of Income Tax the boon which the right hon. Gentleman offered to only a certain portion of them. Even if the extra remissions which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give to the possessors of the smaller incomes were taken away, an equivalent advantage would be conferred upon them by this Amendment in the form of a reduction of the extra 1s. to a half-penny. His calculations might appear very close, but it was to be remembered that he should have no Supplementary Estimates—at least, he hoped

so. As to the question of exemptions, he would only remind the House that the Government proposals had been pronounced to be a step towards graduated taxation, which had always been the dream of the Communists and revolutionists. His own view was that they ought to strike off from incomes a uniform sum of £150 or say £200—in fact, the price of subsistence. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, to leave out the words "three pence," in order to insert the words "two pence halfpenny,"—(Mr. Kirkman Hodgson,)—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he fully recognized that no one had a better right to address the House on this question than his hon. Friend, and no one could have brought forward his Amendment more moderately, but his proposal was not one which the Government could safely accept. Even assuming that the exemptions were retained at their present level, the hon. Member's scheme would not leave the finance of the country in a satisfactory position at the end of the year. The arrangements proposed by the Government had been decided upon after very careful and anxious consideration. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) claimed no credit for himself in that matter; but he could say that the heads of the responsible revenue branches of the country had been in constant communication with him for months before the Budget was settled, and that up to the last moment their calculations were revised and re-revised, and turned in every possible way. Therefore, what he had laid before the House as a prospective estimate of our finances was one by which he was prepared to stand in every particular. There was nothing in the progress of the Revenue during the last six or seven weeks to induce him to change his estimate in any respect. There had been some slight falling off in one thing and some slight improvement in another, but taking all things together he was prepared to stand by his original estimate. According to his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) proposal the sum of £5,218,000 would be received for Income Tax in 1876-7; if the figure proposed by the hon. Member were adopted it would yield £4,792,000, or £476,000 less than was estimated by the Government. This would leave them a deficit of £108,000, and if they added to that, as the hon. Member suggested, the exemption of all incomes under £150, the whole deficit would be something like £250,000. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought the House would agree with him that it was a very dangerous thing, under any circumstances, to commence the year with a deficit, and without making any allowance for Supplementary Estimates. His hon. Friend hoped no Supplementary Estimates would be needed; but he could never be secure against accidents which might diminish the productiveness of the Revenue. The Government had made cautious estimates, and he felt bound to say that the sanguine anticipations of his hon. Friend were not such as could safely be shared in by a Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could not take upon himself the responsibility to advise that they should commence the year with a deficit such as the hon. Member proposed; therefore, in any case it would be his duty to resist this proposal, whatever might be the view the House would take upon the question as to exemptions. He preferred to discuss the question of the substitution of a halfpenny for a penny irrespective of the question as to exemptions; and therefore, in opposing the reduction, he at present abstained from entering into the discussion of exemptions.

MR. DODSON said, it appeared to him the right hon. Gentleman had not satisfactorily disposed of the figures which had been propounded by his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol. His hon. Friend contended that the halfpenny, calculated at the rate adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, would produce sufficient to meet the deficit and very nearly enough to meet the exemptions up to £150. The right hon. Gentleman had apparently challenged that calculation by allusions to the amount of Income Tax collected within the year. He was at a loss to understand why the Chancellor of the Exchequer should estimate the third penny to produce less than either of the two other pennies. The right hon. Gentleman estimated, in his Budget speech, the first and second pennies to produce this year, as last year, respectively

£2,054,000, but he estimated the third penny to produce only £1,800,000. No explanation had been given of this, and he should certainly assume that the third penny would produce as much as each of the two first pennies; and he was fortified in that by the Budgets of 1868 and of 1871, when the Income Tax was raised from 4*d.* to 6*d.*, and in each case the additional pennies were estimated to yield as much as the original pennies. The right hon. Gentleman now said the third penny would only produce £1,800,000, and that the exemptions would reduce the product of that penny to £1,400,000. The right hon. Gentleman in his Budget speech further reckoned that one-sixth of that amount would not be collected within the year. That appeared to be a large sum to strike off for non-collection within the year. But on the 7th April the right hon. Gentleman said he would throw off one-fifth for the sum that would not be collected within the year, and according to that calculation his surplus would be not £368,000, but £318,000. Now, whether the amount thrown off was one-sixth or one-fifth, it was a very large amount. In 1871, when the tax was raised from 4*d.* to 6*d.*, the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the amount of non-collection for the year at one-tenth, and the result justified that calculation. If one-tenth was thrown off for the present year the proposition of the hon. Member for Bristol would produce £924,000, against the right hon. Gentleman's deficit of £774,000. This would practically leave the Chancellor of the Exchequer margin enough to remit the duty upon servant boys, and to exempt incomes under £150 from Income Tax. No doubt there might be Supplementary Estimates, and it should not be forgotten that the Supplementary Estimates last year amounted to £1,400,000, whilst in the preceding year the amount was £1,600,000. If such Supplementary Estimates were to be produced this year, neither the proposition of the hon. Member for Bristol nor that of the right hon. Gentleman himself would be sufficient to cover them. The fact was that no increase of taxation would be needed this year but for the sinking fund which the right hon. Gentleman established last year. The payment it now involved of £570,000 turned the scale against the right hon. Gentle-mode in which the Income Tax operated upon the lower classes of incomes; subsequently, some years afterwards, the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) introduced into his Budget a proposal to further extend this relief by raising the amount from which deduction was to be made to £300, and the amount of deduction from £60 to £80; and the ground on which he made the proposal was that there was no class of taxpayers who felt the pressure of taxation so severely as persons whose incomes were under or about that amount. He did not find fault with these right hon. Gentlemen for proposing to make these remissions; they were assented to by Parliament without anyone breathing a word about socialism; and he was bound to say that since that time public opinion had not been stimulated in that direction. Well, if he chose to follow in the wake of the other side, he might say there was a precedent for the course he had adopted. But he begged to assure the Committee that his proposals had been made upon wholly different grounds. He had never in his arguments admitted the principle that his desire was to show any particular favour or mercy to the particular class of the community with which he proposed to deal. He had carefully abstained from anything of the kind. The Government were not so soft-hearted as to try and conciliate one class at the expense of another. He had simply started upon the assumption that the total remission of Income Tax should be carried from £100 to £150 a-year. That alteration he proposed upon purely practical grounds, because there was very great difficulty, and in some cases an almost impossibility, of levying the tax from persons whose incomes were below a certain amount. Well, that point having been reached, the next question to be considered was merely one of an arithmetical character. Exemptions being granted up to £150, the question arose, what was to be done with incomes immediately above that amount? Were they to be subjected to full taxation? This was the principle acted upon originally by Sir Robert Peel; but it made the tax fall heavily on incomes just above the amount of exemption. With a limit of £150 it meant, for incomes just over that, 150 and odd pence for every penny of tax, or more than 450 pence with a 3d. tax. This was too sudden a jerk, and it was objectionable on the ground that it exposed men to the temptation of endeavouring to keep under the margin by offering so large a bonus. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) suggested that £150 should be deducted from all incomes; but that was open to the objection that incomes just above £150 would have to be taxed upon one or two or a few pounds, which would be impracticable, for it would not be worth while to collect the tax upon the first £10; and it was open to the further objection that it would be absurd and involve an unnecessary waste of revenue and a great deal of unnecessary trouble to deduct it from incomes of thousands a-year, the possessors of which would not feel it. There remained the third alternative—to adopt the system at present adopted, make £150 the total limit of exemption, and above that amount deduct such an amount as would make the first payer of Income Tax pay upon something like a sensible proportion of his income. With the deduction of £80 from £100, the first payer paid upon £20, which at 3d. was 60d. more than the man who paid nothing. With the deduction of £80 from £150, that income would pay three times 70d., or 210d. more than the income that did not pay at all. It appeared to them that was too great a difference, and that by raising the deduction to £120 the income of £150 would pay upon £30, or, at 3d., 90d. At present the first who paid would, at 3d., pay 60d.; at the £150 limit he would pay 210d.; but by raising the deduction as proposed to £120, he would pay 90d. These were the reasons why it was considered the raising of the limit of exemption ought to carry with it the alteration of the limit of deduction and the amount of deduction. At present the man of £300 paid on £80 more than the man below him; this was a difference of about 26½ per cent. If he paid on £120 more the difference would be 40 per cent, which would be too great a jump; but by carrying the limit of deduction up to £400 the difference, which was now 26½ per cent, was only raised to 30 per cent. These were the calculations on which they proceeded in fixing the limit of deduction at £400. The result might be arrived at in another way—they raised the limit of exemption from £100 to £150, or 50 per cent; raised the amount to be deducted by 50 per cent, or from £80 to £120; and might have raised the limit of deduction by 50 per cent, which would have brought it to £450. That did not seem to be a reasonable amount to propose; it lay between £400 and £500, and they gave the benefit of the doubt, in the anti-communistic sense, by putting it at £400. Until the matter came to be discussed in the House, he did not think the feeling or interest of any particular class was ever mentioned. For a considerable time past the matter had been discussed outside the House, and various suggestions had been made in favour of some extension of exemption and deduction in respect of small incomes; and he believed it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to have resisted altogether some Motion in that direction. He, therefore, believed the Government had acted wisely, if only with the view of settling the question, in making proposals of a moderate character, analogous to the existing arrangements, and containing no elements of danger. It was said, without much reflection, that they were doing a dangerous thing in not calling upon a large number of persons to bear some of the burdens of the country. That objection might possibly be taken with regard to those who were exempted altogether; but it must be remembered that persons with incomes between £150 and £400 were not exempted altogether, but only to a certain extent relieved. He had now told the simple history of this proposal, and he really did not think there was anything in it which should call forth the alarm which had been expressed. He fully agreed that if it were proposed to tax the poor more lightly than the rich it might lead in a dangerous direction at some future time, but that was not the principle on which they proceeded. The principle on which they proceeded would be rather a safeguard against such a proposal, and the power of maintaining an equal balance between direct and indirect taxation would be strengthened.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he hoped the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had removed the doubts which had arisen in the minds of hon. Members who sat on the benches behind him in regard to this proposal; but he must say he had puzzled many Members on both sides of the House by his arithmetical calculations. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have some difficulty in explaining his arithmetical puzzle to himself. The result of the proposal, however, was that they were to lose a large tax-paying power between incomes of £300 and £400, and exemptions were to be extended when a considerable body of taxpayers were called upon to bear additional burdens. The right hon. Gentleman had said that his right hon. Friends the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) had in their exemptions placed the argument on sentimental grounds while he placed it on arithmetical grounds; but why did he not adduce that argument on introducing his Budget? He then spoke of the struggling tradesman, the widow and the orphan.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no such statement in his Budget speech. When he made that statement it was in reply to a Question which had been put to him.

MR. GOSCHEN accepted the explanation. The right hon. Gentleman had himself resorted to the sentimental argument, and his arithmetical puzzle was only produced when hon. Members opposite seemed to think the subject had been sufficiently discussed. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had been guilty of a little mystification; and if his scale meant anything it meant graduation of the Income Tax. He (Mr. Goschen) thought it was deeply to be regretted that such exemptions were to be granted at a time when the majority of the ratepayers were to have fresh burdens imposed on them. There were many who, with incomes above £150, would actually be paying less with a 3*d.* tax than they did before. It showed how dangerous it was to advance from step to step and point to point. They should look at the matter broadly and clearly, and ask if it was right to raise a new class of exemptions from £300 to £400. That was the real issue. The only excuse which the right hon. Gentleman had to offer for his policy was that the Liberal Party had set him the example, but that was really no excuse at all. He hoped the Committee would not be carried away by the arithmetical calculations of the right hon. Gentleman. He should support the Amendment of his right hon. Colleague.

MR. GREGORY regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer declined to give way on this point. For his part, he had a very strong objection to these exemptions. He thought that they had carried too far the principle of exemptions. It was one not to be justified, and he hoped it would not be extended.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, that the speeches made on the opposite side ignored the most important element in the case, and that was indirect taxation. They had now two systems of taxation, the direct and the indirect, between which, as had been shown, there was this diversity, that under direct taxation a man paid in proportion to his means, while under indirect taxation he paid in the inverse ratio; the tax falling heaviest on the smallest means. He did not think it came well from perhaps the richest Assembly that ever met in the world to say to the necessitous classes of their countrymen that if they gave up all the little luxuries of life they might exempt themselves from taxation altogether. Taxation upon tea, which was now in almost universal use, might be regarded in the light of a tax. Tables had been elaborately made out which showed that the poor man with £50 or £60 a-year paid in indirect taxes 8, 10, or 15 per cent on his income, while the loudest complaints were made in that House over a three-penny income tax, which amounted of course to 1½ per cent only. It was idle, therefore, to talk of the introduction of socialism by means of exemptions, when those who were exempted had to pay 10 or 15 per cent on the articles they consumed. He did think that as there was to be an increase of taxation the Government had chosen the right mode of laying on the increase and of extending the exemptions.

Amendment negatived.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE moved, in page 3, line 26, to leave out "is less than," and insert "does not exceed," on the ground that it had been found that, wherever the former words were used, they led to numerous evasions.

Mr. Goschen

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was reluctant to change the words as they stood, though he did not think whichever set of words were used it would make any material difference.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 9 (Certain offices to continue chargeable under Schedule E, and other offices transferred to Schedule D).

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, it was proposed in this clause to do away with an easy, cheap, and simple mode of collecting the tax, in order to substitute a most expensive, offensive, and objectionable mode of collection. The Income Tax paid by clerks in the Bank of England and in the Departments of the Civil Service, by officers of the Army and Navy, and by persons in the employ of joint-stock firms, was now collected by the authorities or by the respective firms under Schedule E, and handed over in lump sums to the Income Tax Commissioners. It was now proposed by Clause 9 to abolish that system in the case of joint-stock firms, and to bring the clerks in these cases under Schedule D, when they would have the benefit of being allowed to be taxed on the average of their previous three years' income, instead of being taxed upon that of the single year. Thus the clerks in the Bank of England would be treated differently from the clerks in the London and Westminster Bank; but if it were an advantage to them to have the three years' average, why should not the Bank of England clerks enjoy it as well as those in the London and Westminster and in other Banks? In his opinion, the system of a three years' average of income was meant for persons in trade, who suffered from the vicissitudes of trade, and might have profits amounting to £1,000 in one year and no profits at all in the year following. The system was not meant to apply to clerks whose salaries were either fixed or were subject to an annual increment; but if the system were an advantage to clerks it was unjust to make it exceptional. Another objection to the clause was that it would greatly increase the labour of collection, for in the City of London alone 18,000 persons would be separately assessed under Schedule D who were now returned by the heads of 50 or 60 establishments in which they were employed. He should propose to leave out the whole of Clause 9.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this was a matter which had been suggested to him by the Board of Inland Revenue. There appeared to be considerable inequality in the manner in which clerks and other persons employed by private firms were treated, as compared with such persons when they were in the service of joint-stock companies. The absurdity had frequently occurred that when a private firm became converted into a limited company, the clerks employed by it were immediately transferred from Schedule D to Schedule E, and so lost the advantage which they had previously enjoyed of having their incomes calculated upon an average of years instead of upon a single year. It was not a matter of very great importance as affecting the receipt of revenue; but he was told by the authorities of the Inland Revenue, who must be the best judges of the matter, that the proposal in this clause would greatly simplify the working of the Act, and that the balance of advantage was in favour of making the change, which would, no doubt, operate more in the City of London than in any other place. Nobody would be the worse for the proposal, and it would meet a certain number of cases. He had referred the matter to the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. GOSCHEN said, they ought, no doubt, to accept with great respect the opinion of the Inland Revenue authorities; but, at the same time, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not met the arguments adduced by his hon. Friend (Mr. Hankey). Indeed, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had thoroughly mastered those arguments. If the change would benefit one class of clerks, surely it ought to be extended to all clerks. His hon. Friend had had such great experience in this matter in his official capacity as a Commissioner of Income Tax that his opinion might be fairly set against that of the authorities of the Inland Revenue. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would re-consider the matter.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD thought the proposed change was greatly to be deprecated. It would be injurious to the tax and unjust to the taxpayer, and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that this was really a matter of a technical character, and as he was quite prepared to admit that the hon. Member for Peterborough had a very large experience in the collection of the tax in the metropolis, where the change would operate most forcibly, he attached great weight to what his hon. Friend said. Although he found that the officers of the Inland Revenue were not satisfied with the arguments which had been adduced, and although they thought the loss of advantage on the one side was more than counterbalanced by the gain on the other, yet the arguments were so fairly balanced that the Government would not be doing an ungraceful thing by accepting, at least for this year, the advice of his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough, as the matter was one of comparatively little importance.

Clause negatived.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, in page 2, after Clause 4, to insert the following Clause:—

“(Alteration of duties on licences to retail wine for consumption on the premises.—Section 14 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, repealed as respects wine licences.—Alteration of scale of abatement to meet alteration of duties.)

“(4a.) In lieu of the Duties at several rates now payable under the Acts of the sixth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter eighty-one, and of the third and fourth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter seventeen on licences to retailers of foreign wine, and under the Act of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter twenty-seven, and the Act of the same years, chapter one hundred and seven, on every licence to any licensed keeper of a refreshment house to sell therein by retail foreign wine to be consumed on the premises, there shall be paid for each such licence the uniform duty of £2 4s. 1d.

“So far as regards any such licence as aforesaid to be granted under the said Act of the sixth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter eighty-one, the provisions contained in the fourteenth section of the said Act are hereby repealed.

“In lieu of the scale of abatement contained in section nine of the Act of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter ninety-one, the following scale shall be substituted, and the said section shall be read as if the said scale therein contained had been as follows (that is to say):—

“Where the house and premises in respect of which such licences shall be granted shall in England be under the rent and value, or in Ireland under the value, of thirty pounds	£	s.	d.

a-year, an abatement of	0	7	4
" And where the same shall be of the rent or value of thirty pounds or upwards, an abatement of	0	17	10 "

The right hon. Gentleman said, that the object of this clause was to substitute a uniform system of taxation for the privilege of retailing wine, and to place it at £2 4s. 1d. There were two scales of wine licences at present. If a licence to sell spirits was taken out, then the wine licence was £2 4s. 1d., but if there was no wine licence then there was another duty. It appeared that, in point of fact, there were very few cases in which the distinction applied, but it told rather hardly on some classes of persons. The loss to the Revenue would be less than £5,000; but the abolition of the distinction he considered to be necessary. The duty of £2 4s. 1d. would apply to all houses retailing wine.

MR. BRISTOWE asked, was the object of the clause to abolish the distinction which existed in the licences paid by the owners of houses rated under and over £50, £5 5s. in the one case, and £3 3s. in the other? He should like to have some further explanation of the proposed provision. Was the object to abolish this distinction, and make all pay £2 4s. 1d.?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was the object.

MR. BRISTOWE thought they should have an explanation why the higher rate was to be abolished and £2 4s. 1d. substituted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry the Home Secretary was not in his place at the present moment. The fact was the Board of Revenue had suggested this clause to him, and he had referred to the Home Secretary for the purpose of ascertaining his opinion, whether it would in any degree affect the principle of the licensing law, because he was aware it was the intention of the Revenue authorities to make no distinction in that respect, and he understood from the Home Secretary that he saw nothing in it which would create any difficulty as to the rating of the houses. As to the third class of licences to which incidental allusion had been made, he should make inquiry on the subject to see in what manner they would be effected by the alteration of licence duty, and mention the matter on the Report.

MR. FORSYTH said, that wine retailers in houses under £50 a-year paid for a £3 3s. licence, and those over £50 for a £5 5s. one, whereas licensed victuallers paid for a £2 4s. 1d. one. The object was to place wine retailers and licensed victuallers on the same footing, but the beerhouses had nothing to do with the matter. The clause was a just and equitable one, and he hoped it would be agreed to.

MR. WHITWELL thought the clause did not go far enough. Something ought to be done to make the licences more equal.

Clause read a second time.

On Motion "That the Clause be added to the Bill,"

MR. DODSON expressed a hope that the words of the clause would be made more clear than they at present appeared to be.

Clause agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved the following clause:—

(Gun licences, exemption for farmers.)

"Guns used by farmers or persons employed by them exclusively for the protection of their crops, shall be exempted from Licence Duty."

The hon. Member said, that the depredations committed on farms in Scotland, and no doubt in England, every winter and summer by wild birds were so extensive that it was necessary to have some one employed with a gun for their protection. Owing to the protection which had been afforded to wild birds by the Legislature, their number had enormously increased and they had become a source of irritation to the farmer, as often as he saw the damage which they did to his crops. It was quite true that the farmer had power under the Act of Parliament to use a gun with his own hands; but it was specially provided that he should only use it for the purpose of killing vermin or of scaring birds away. If the farmer shot a bird, and did not possess a licence, he was subject to a penalty. There was great difficulty felt by farmers in Scotland in getting boys to scare away the birds from the farms, and the farmers considered that they had a grievance. He appealed to the Vice President of the Council, who was opposed to the employment of young children, whether farmers, in the existing state of things, should not at least be allowed to use firearms, either themselves or by some one they might employ, for the purpose of protecting their crops. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told him last year that he did not consider that it was a grievance to the farmers that they should have to pay this 10s.—that it was a matter of little consequence. But the right hon. Gentleman had dealt with a much smaller grievance in the matter of the Income Tax, for the 10s. licence on a gun was equal to the income tax on an income of £160. The grievance the farmers experienced was keenly felt because the tax was an unjust one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might count upon the patience with which farmers bore this taxation, and the other grievances to which they were subjected; but he would venture to warn the right hon. Gentleman that to this patience there was a limit, and he had no doubt that by-and-by, when the farmers found that they could not get redress, they would give effect to their views. He did not propose the total abolition of the licences, because on former occasions he had not been supported by the Representatives of boroughs, although it was a matter which concerned such hon. Members to a considerable extent; but irrespective of other interests concerned, he based his clause for exemptions on the grounds that it was necessary in the interests of the farmers. There was no reason why a farmer should be prevented from using a gun, either himself or through his agent, in the terms of the clause, exclusively for protecting his crops, unless the licence was intended to be an additional Game Act. He had no doubt that in many instances it had that effect, and hon. Members opposite no doubt knew that it had considerable effect in the protection of game.

New Clause—(Mr. James Barclay,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR reiterated his often repeated statement that he would be glad to see the gun tax abolished, and supported the clause. He had frequently advocated the transfer of these taxes and others of a like character from the Imperial Exchequer to the localities, and he reiterated this advocacy. He thought if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not see his way to a remission of the tax, both the gun tax and the dog tax might be collected and used for local purposes, and in diminution of the grant now so unwisely made from the Consolidated Fund in aid of, or rather, it might be said, as an encouragement to local extravagance in outlays. This, he thought, would be a financial benefit, inasmuch as the taxes would be made to realize larger returns than at present, for with the assistance of local knowledge it would be easy to graduate the rates of the two taxes, so as to levy high rates on those who kept useless or pet dogs, and those who kept and used guns for luxurious or enjoyable objects, in contradistinction to low rates on guns and dogs now obliged to be kept by parties for useful purposes. These changes would prevent evasions of the tax, and remove much of the dissatisfaction that existed among farmers with regard to both.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the Committee that every person who carried a gun was liable to a small tax, with certain exceptions, and among them this—that gun licences need not be taken out by the occupier of any lands for the using or carrying a gun for the purposes of scaring birds or killing vermin upon such lands, or for any person so using the gun upon any lands the occupier of which should have a licence for killing game. The object was to tax the farmer who required the gun for other purposes than these. He thought that the law provided sufficiently for the protection of crops, and any person who required a gun for other purposes should pay the tax. The Amendment would not limit the use of the gun to the particular lands, nor to the scaring of birds or to the killing of vermin. Under the Amendment a farmer might invite any number of friends, saying he employed them, to have a day's rabbit shooting for the protection of his crops. This would break down the whole principle of the Bill, and therefore he could not assent to the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had always looked upon the gun licence as a game-law in disguise, and the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed him in that opinion. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) complained of the want of support from the borough Members; but he (Sir George Campbell) willingly supported any proposal directed against the gun tax, and wished that his hon. Friend as a county Member, had extended his exemption to boroughs, and not restricted it to his agricultural constituents.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the tax operated unjustly upon small farmers, who were prevented by it from using means to protect their crops. He took exception to the use of the word "persons," believing that this might indirectly encourage poaching by affording an excuse for that class to carry guns under the pretence of protecting their crops. He suggested that "farm servants" should be used instead of "persons."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 106: Majority 62.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

COMMONS BILL—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, this Bill does not give adequate protection to the interests of the rural labourers, and does not provide proper securities against the inclosure of those Commons which it is desirable to preserve in their uninclosed condition for the use and enjoyment of the people."

complained that no adequate opportunity for discussion had been afforded upon the second reading of the Bill, and that it had been kept upon the Paper night after night, all that could be got from the Government being simply that it should not be brought on at an unreasonable hour. The matter had been most carefully considered, and after that consideration, he contended that there were five cardinal objections against the Bill. In the first place, it gave no security against inclosures being illegally made, and without the sanction of Parliament; secondly, the provisions which the Bill contained for the regulation, as distinguished from the inclosure, of commons were most unsatisfactory, and would prove inoperative; thirdly, the Bill contained no adequate security that when an inclosure was sanctioned the interests of the public, and especially of the poor, would be adequately cared for; fourthly, the Bill left an indefinite discretion to the Inclosure Commissioners, gentlemen who had hitherto always pursued the policy of doing everything in their power to favour the inclosure of commons; and, fifthly, on a subject as to which the law ought to be made clear and simple, the law must become confused and unintelligible, because that Bill was based on the Preamble of the Act of 1845, which declared that it was expedient to facilitate the inclosure of commons. How had the Government met those objections to the Bill? The Government had pursued an unusual course, and one which was not calculated to promote good legislation. The Home Secretary assured the House, when he was moving the second reading of the Bill, that he would be the last man in the world to "steal the common from the goose." The intentions of the Home Secretary or of the Government were never doubted; but it was not with intentions or wishes that the House had to deal. The intentions of the Government, however good they might be, were beside the question if, as he contended, the Bill would operate in exactly the opposite way to that in which the Home Secretary wished it to be regarded. It would be little satisfaction to the hard-working artizans and the dwellers in large towns, when they found themselves deprived of the enjoyment of their accustomed places of recreation in the suburbs or in the country, to be told that that injury had been inflicted upon them contrary to the intentions of the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman had accused him, on the last occasion when that subject was under discussion, of having made a personal attack on absent men, because he had commented on the conduct of the Inclosure Commissioners. Now, he would assume that the Commissioners had faithfully carried out their instructions. They might say that they had been appointed to administer an Act of Parliament which told them in its Preamble that it was desirable to facilitate the inclosure of commons; but if that line of argument was adopted, what became of all those professions made by the Government in regard to preserving the use of those commons for the hard-working dwellers in towns, when the Preamble which constituted the instructions of the Commissioners in the past, and which was put forward as the justification of their inclosure policy, was to continue in full operation in the future? The Commissioners must be guided by what was embodied in the Act of Parliament, not by the speeches which had been made about it. The spirit of encroachment was abroad, and there was nothing more difficult to resist. Take, for example, the beautiful commons around this metropolis, every one of which had been in imminent peril of being sacrificed to this spirit of encroachment by the lords of the manors. Plumstead Common was saved by the energy of the junior Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid). Wimbledon Common was saved by the public spirit of the hon. Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Henry Peek). Berkhamstead Common, by the interference of the late Mr. Augustus Smith, and Epping Forest had been saved by the Corporation of London, at an expense of £20,000, from the accidental circumstance of their purchasing a burial ground which gave them the right of common. Encroachment was an illegal act. Why, then, should it be impossible to resist encroachment, unless a commoner happened to have sufficient wealth and public spirit to involve himself in a lawsuit for the protection of public right? The remedy for that state of things was to a certain extent contained in the Bill itself. According to Clause 22, an encroachment on a village green was to be deemed a public nuisance, and he believed it was open to any person to proceed against a person who committed an offence of that description. Consequently, if the principle of Clause 22 were applied to all commons, it would not be necessary, as it was under the present law, that encroachment should be resisted only by commoners. So far the Bill went in the right direction. It was proposed also that cases should be tried, in the first instance, in the County Court. No doubt that provision would be of some utility, but it was defective in certain vital points. In the first place, it did not give an ordinary person the locus standi of a commoner for the institution of proceedings against an encroacher; and, secondly, it allowed an appeal to be made to a higher Court. With respect to the latter point, it was perfectly certain that if a poor commoner attempted to resist an inclosure, he would be threatened with an appeal, and thus practically reduced to silence. The Home Secretary had declared that the object of the measure was to retard the inclosure and promote the regulation of commons, but these intentions were not clearly expressed in the Bill. According to the Bill it would be found that in order to obtain a Provisional Order it was necessary in the first instance that application should be made by one of those who were legally interested in the commons, and that when the Provisional Order had been framed it was necessary that it should obtain the consent of two-thirds of those who were legally interested before it could be put in operation, and also of the lord of the manor. Now, it was evident that the lord of the manor would not be pecuniarily interested in the regulation of a common, but would be pecuniarily interested in its inclosure, and the public interest would consequently suffer. When a scheme of regulation was brought forward the lord of the manor would probably withhold his consent to it, and then the Commissioners, seeing no chance of regulating the common in question, would come to the House and say it was in a very unsatisfactory condition and that the only way of improving it was to have it inclosed. What chance would independent Members then have of successfully opposing the recommendations of the Commissioners? Another objection to the Bill was that in cases where inclosures were sanctioned it did not sufficiently provide for the protection of the interests of the public, and especially of the rural labourers. Again and again inclosures had been made in which no provision had been made for the public wants. Not many years ago the Commissioners proposed to inclose 7,000 acres of land, and six acres only were reserved for the poor and three for the public. Was it necessary to say more to show that great caution ought to be exercised in dealing with this subject? Every one of these Bills for the inclosure of commons, it was said, would be referred to a Standing Committee of that House. He did not think that would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the case; for, although a Standing Committee might very well decide whether or not an inclosure should take place, it would be cumbrous and difficult for such a Committee to determine what should be the exact amount of common reserved for the public and the poor. A great amount of public feeling existed on this question out-of-doors. A spectacle altogether without a parallel had lately been witnessed in that House. The conduct of the Government on a certain matter was called in question. How did the Government think they could best maintain their position? They knew they would have an overwhelming majority, but they thought a great additional strength would be given to their position if a great number of Petitions were presented in their favour. The entire country was ransacked from one end to the other; every Conservative Association from Land's End to John o'Groat's was brought in aid by the active exertions of St. Stephen's Club. But the result of all these efforts was that they got from the entire country only about the same number of Petitions declaring confidence in the Government that were presented from the rural labourers against the present Bill and the injustice of giving them so little protection under it. The labourers knew, and the House knew, that if they had had 50 Representatives there this measure would not have been treated in the manner it had been treated. No Prime Minister would have come forward to say that a reasonable time for discussing such a Bill as this was an hour before the House broke up. It should be borne in mind that when a common was once gone the labourers, as a class, lost for ever valuable rights of property. Some years ago, in many of the rural villages, most of the labourers kept a cow, some poultry, and pigs. Throughout those villages now a single labourer could not be found who had a cow or a pig. He had heard clergymen and others say that one of the most crying wants of the rural districts, one of those from which the poor suffered most severely, was the difficulty of obtaining milk; and that had arisen from the inclosure of commons. Compensation might be given to the present generation, but the next would get nothing, whereas the right of common attached to the locality and could not be bartered or sold. Within about a century no fewer than 5,500,000 acres of common land had been inclosed in this country, and all that the rural poor had got was a beggarly fragment of a few thousand acres. What had become of those 5,500,000? They had gone from the poor and the public, and were added chiefly to the estates of the great proprietary. This policy, of which he complained, was inflicted upon the rural poor as long as 80 years ago. The fourth objection he had stated to the measure was, that it left too much discretion to the Inclosure Commissioners, whose policy in the past had been to facilitate inclosures. They had acted on the principle that inclosures should be made, whatever might be the change of circumstances, whatever the expression of public opinion, whatever the wants of an increasing population. This was no exaggerated description. He would mention a fact that would throw a most instructive light on the conduct of the Inclosure Commissioners. In 1872, when the late Government were in office, an Inclosure Bill was brought before the House. How were those who opposed it met? The Report of the Inclosure Commissioners was brought up against them. What did that Report say? It said they were only going to inclose a few hundred or thousand acres out of 8,000,000 acres, the amount of common land in England, or one-fifth of the entire area of England and Wales. Something occurred to induce the belief that this estimate was wrong, and two years afterwards, in 1874, the Inclosure Commissioners, being pressed for more precise information, said the common land of England was only 2,700,000 acres. How did they obtain this information? From the Tithe Commutation Report. Yet that Report had been open to them when they two years before so egregiously misled the public and the House by their extravagant estimate of 8,000,000 acres. He, therefore, said, after that fact, it would be unsafe to entrust great discretion and power to such a body. But that was not all, for, on reference to a recent official Return, he found that the quantity of common land was only 1,500,000 acres—that was to say, less than a fifth of what it was on the authority of the Inclosure Commissioners only four years since. To show that the Inclosure Commissioners were not in the least degree influenced by expressions of opinion in that House, or by the almost unanimous opinion of the Press of this country of all shades of political opinion, he wished to direct the attention of the House to the Report for the present year of the Inclosure Commissioners. That Report showed that no fewer than 34 commons in different parts of England, containing more than 18,000 acres, were scheduled for inclosure. Some of them were in the heart of the most densely-peopled parts of our manufacturing districts. Others of them presented some of the most beautiful scenery in the country. On reading the Report no one could come to any other conclusion than this, that the Commissioners brought forward every fact and circumstance that could justify inclosure, while—whether by accident or design he would not say—every fact that could induce them not to sanction the inclosure was omitted. Take, for instance, the common of Wisley, containing about 375 acres. The Commissioners said it was “covered with rough grass and heath.” Could the most lively imagination conceive that the common thus described had been conclusively shown before a Select Committee to be one of the most beautiful commons in England, and that if its inclosure were sanctioned, they would deprive for all time to come the millions who lived in London of some of the most beautiful moorland scenery in Surrey? Another common of 31 acres was situated in the heart of the Potteries, in the midst of a population of 40,000, and within two miles of a hard-working closely-confined population of 200,000. That common was also scheduled for inclosure, so insatiate was this greed for land. They would find in the Schedule another common of 3,000 acres, and it was only proposed to reserve four acres for the recreation of the people. He had something still worse to tell. There was a charming heath at the Lizard, and out of 600 acres it was proposed to reserve a strip to allow the public a stand point from which they might view the beautiful scenery around Kynance Cove. There was another common in the neighbourhood of Sheffield of 225 acres, and one of the reasons given for inclosing it was that it was used by people from Sheffield for training for foot races. This might not be a very elevated amusement; but was training for foot races worse than shooting tame pigeons at Hurlingham? There ought to be a little consistency if they persisted in carrying out this crusade against the amusements of the people. Another common, situate in the parish of Wolverhampton, was asked to be inclosed because it was covered with gorse and ling and heather; but he asked why it was that the working classes in these densely-populated districts should not enjoy beautiful heather and gorse as well as other people? But the reservation in that case threw a remarkable light on the policy of the Commissioners. Out of 287 acres of this common in a densely-populated locality four acres were reserved for a recreation ground, not enough for a cricket ground! They made that reservation, they said, because it was sufficient for the people in the immediate locality. They treated people who came from a distance as trespassers. He wished to know how it happened that the Home Secretary exempted the commons scheduled in the Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for this year from the operation of this Bill? If the object of the Home Secretary was to resist inclosures and to promote the regulation of commons, surely these 34 commons ought to be brought within the operation of this Bill. His fifth objection to this Bill was that it would repeal only seven clauses of the Act of 1845, and, consequently, more than 70 clauses of that Act would still continue in operation. This was a question on which legislation should be simple, clear, and precise. It dealt with the rights of the poor and they ought to know how those rights were to be protected. But they would be lost in a mass of hopeless confusion if they attempted to discover what portion of the Act of 1845 had a bearing on this Bill. If, as the Home Secretary said, the House was going to reverse its past policy, and would no longer encourage but retard inclosures, would it not be better to repeal all legislation which was based on an entirely different policy, and to embody in this Bill the new policy which the right hon. Gentleman said he proposed? No one would rejoice more than himself if the interpretation he had put upon the Bill should prove to be incorrect. The Government might and would pass away, and their intentions might be forgotten; but this Bill would, for good or evil, affect the interests of millions yet unborn. When the Conservative Party was led by a great statesman 30 years ago he declared that there was no subject on which it was more important to exercise watchfulness and caution than in sanctioning the inclosure of commons. The blunders of a Government might be repaired, an unjust law might be repealed, an unjust tax might be remitted; but a common once lost was lost for ever. No money could restore it, and no effort would bring it back. Once this Session the Prime Minister taunted some of those who sat on this side of the House with being mere economists; but he (Mr. Fawcett), and others along with him, were determined, resolutely and persistently, to maintain the principle that the worst and most mischievous of all economies was that which, for the sake of aggrandizing the few and making a paltry addition to the productive wealth of the country, would sacrifice those open spaces where the toiling millions could breathe the fresh air of Heaven and behold the beauties of Nature unspoiled by man. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, this Bill does not give adequate protection to the interests of the rural labourers, and does not provide proper securities against the inclosure of those Commons which it is desirable to preserve in their uninclosed condition for the use and enjoyment of the people,"—(Mr. Fawcett,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that no one who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney could doubt his zeal and anxious desire to promote what he believed to be the interests of the people; but he (Mr. Goldney) felt obliged to take a totally contrary view to that of the hon. Member, whose Amendment, if carried, would be injurious to the working poor, and especially to the rural population. The hon. Member assumed that the one person most anxious to encourage the inclosure of commons and to shut out the people was the lord of the manor. Now, he had known a good deal of the public working of the Inclosure Act in large ranges of country, and especially in Wiltshire and Somersetshire, where there were a great number of commons, many of which had been inclosed. In all these cases the interest of the lord of the manor had been infinitesimally small—not exceeding a sixteenth, an eighteenth, or a twentieth part, and the parties who were favourable to the inclosure were the commoners, who thought they had not the enjoyment of the commons to which by right they were entitled. The lord of the manor had the right of sporting and general control over the commons, and, as a rule, he was glad to keep it its former uninclosed state. The hon. Member who had made so touching an appeal to the House ought to divest himself of the idea that it was the lord of the manor who wished for inclosure. Since these obstructions had been raised to inclosures a large number of commons had been inclosed without the necessity of troubling the Inclosure Commissioners at all. Under the general term of commons were included a number of lands that did not answer to the general acceptance of the term. There were a great number of towns where the freemen only were entitled to the exclusive use of pasturage, and that was one of the cases with which this Bill proposed to deal. It enabled the locality to appropriate public funds to the purchase of those interests, and to separate land, appropriating one portion to recreation purposes, and another to the providing of gardens for the poor; and he thought nothing could be more satisfactory than the carrying out of such objects. One of the principal arguments of the hon. Member for Hackney, in which the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) concurred, was that no common at all should be inclosed, and that everything should remain in its present state. If they looked into the Domesday Book they would find that the common land exceeded in some counties one-fourth of the whole area of the county. There were large tracts of common land at the present moment in Cumberland, Westmorland, and the North Riding of Yorkshire, with an exceeding small population, and were they to be told that nothing was ever to be done to bring these tracts of land into cultivation? He could not understand those who professed to represent the interests of the great body of the people contending that tracts of hundreds of thousands of acres were to be left in their present state, except such portions of them as happened to be in the vicinity of large towns; and he hoped it would be long before Parliament would ignore private rights when a Bill was introduced to facilitate the purchase of them for the public advantage. The Commissioners had no interest in the matter, and construed the Act according to the best of their ability, and although they might differ from the views of the hon. Member for Hackney it should be remembered that their proceedings had been endorsed by Parliament when Provisional Orders made by them had been adopted. Now, if the Commissioners had acted for a long series of years in conformity with the views of Parliament was it right to say that they had been pursuing a wrong course? As to the common near Sheffield mentioned in the last Report of the Commissioners, he believed there was a strong feeling in the town in favour of the inclosure of it, and that some of the inhabitants had petitioned for its inclosure. It might be inferred from speeches that had been made in the House adversely to this Bill on its introduction that it mainly affected village greens, which rich men were trying to appropriate; but it was a Bill of a much more comprehensive character. It provided for every interest being heard and even called upon to express its views, and it would not allow anything to be done within six miles of a town of 5,000 inhabitants without the authorities of that town asserting the claims of its population. A valuable provision was that, in the interests of the public and with public funds, the interests of commoners might be brought up; and it was of no use to attempt to ignore private rights, as was done in the case of Leicester Square, until they were affirmed by a Court of Law, when the generosity of a private individual rescued it from its dilapidated condition. Allusion had been made to the great commons in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and a considerable amount of censure had been cast on the lords of the manors. Now, if ever an act of public spirit had been shown in this country it was by the lords of the manors and the holders of land on the great commons of Wimbledon, Blackheath, and Hampstead, where they had given up their rights to the public for nominal considerations ["No, no!"] and it was poor encouragement to others to do likewise if they were to be taunted with having endeavoured to rob the public. A valuable part of the Bill was that it was to be an essential part of every inclosure scheme that full consideration was to be given to allotments for gardens and recreation; and if the parties concerned were content and came to arrangements for their own advantage and that of the public, a Bill to enable them to do so was surely a salutary measure. The rejection of the Bill would sacrifice many advantages which its provisions would secure.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, there were three courses open in dealing with the subject of commons; one of these was the question of inclosure; another was to regulate them, and the third was to leave them alone. Inclosure might be best financially for private parties, regulation best for them and for the public too, and to leave the commons alone best for the public. In former days, when there was a prospect that the produce of the United Kingdom might not be sufficient for the support of the population, there was a great inducement to increase their produce; but now, when so large a portion of the corn and meal consumed in this country was brought across the Atlantic or from the Eastern parts of Europe, there was not that pressing necessity to get as much food as possible out of the soil of the country. What the public desired was not so much that a large portion of food should be produced in this country instead of being imported from abroad, but that they should be able to use the land that would not be profitable in tillage but would suffice for the recreation of the people; and, looking at the interests of the public, he thought that a great portion of waste lands had better remain waste than be converted into private property. People talked as though by stopping inclosures you took away property. This was not the fact; but, on the other hand, by allowing inclosures you substituted private for joint rights, and thereby gave to individuals property of marketable value which otherwise they would not enjoy. The conditions under which commons now existed were far more beneficial to the poor than inclosures could be. It was true that if a common were inclosed the commoners for the time being received some trifling compensation; but their successors received no compensation, and lost all the advantages which they would otherwise have possessed. It was also of great public advantage that open spaces should be left open to all the world for purposes of health and enjoyment. He hoped that the portion of the Bill relating to inclosure would not be proceeded with. Let them try what could be done by a complete system of regulation. The Commissioners might occupy themselves with the regulation of commons. If this failed, it would be time enough to legislate on the question of inclosure. He was confident that all the public objects which were to be derived from inclosure would be obtained by a good system of regulation, leaving the commoners' rights undisturbed, and providing for the proper and satisfactory use of the commons.

MR. SANDFORD said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) in thinking that the Bill did not go far enough, but he asked whether the objects of the hon. Gentleman might not be secured by allowing the Bill to go into Committee? He confessed that the more he had considered the measure the less he liked it. It did not carry out what he was sure was the object of the Home Secretary—to prevent the inclosure of commons. The objections to the existing law were that it gave undue facilities to the lords of manors, because of the expense and uncertainty attending any attempt to resist inclosure. This was the defect which must be remedied by any new legislation; but the Bill was not well framed to accomplish this end. It would have been far better, in his opinion, to repeal preceding Acts on this subject, and to lay down clearly what should henceforth be the law relative to it. At present there were 14 statutes already in existence, and the present Bill, if it passed, would have to be construed with reference to all of them. What would then be the position of the poor commoner? The Bill and the Acts would be a puzzle for the Attorney General himself, and much more so for him. It bore evidence of the conveyancing mind having been applied to it, and the tendency of that mind was to make the law confused and unintelligible. When the hon. Member for Hackney objected to the conduct of the Inclosure Commissioners he scarcely did them justice, because they had only done their duty seeing that the Act of 1845 declared that it was the policy of the Legislature to promote inclosures. The whole advantage of the Bill was, in his opinion, contained in Clause 8, which gave a locus standi and power of purchase to sanitary bodies. The great advantage of that might be seen in the fact that it was owing to the City of London having a locus standi in the case of Epping Forest that rights of the public in that forest had been asserted and maintained. He had himself a few years ago proposed a clause of a similar nature. Notice had been given of an Amendment that for the future no inclosures should be legal which had not Parliamentary sanction. That was going too far, because it would be only reasonable that commons should be inclosed with the consent of the lord of the manor and of the commoners. But what he would suggest was that no inclosure should be made except with the authority of Parliament, or by the lord of the manor going before a properly constituted authority and showing that he had the consent of all persons possessing manorial rights. He held that the need which might formerly have existed for inclosures existed no longer. They might import corn, but they could not import open spaces; and when once commons were inclosed that was taken away which could not be supplied again. It was the duty of the Legislature, and especially of this branch of it, which nominally at least represented popular rights, distinctly to affirm that it would in the future regard with a vigilant and jealous eye all measures for the inclosure of those open spaces which were so valuable for the comfort, the health, and enjoyment of the people.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had no doubt that the Home Secretary was actuated by a highminded and honourable wish to settle a question which the more he considered it the more he must admit to be surrounded with intricacy and difficulty. The law of inclosure was bound up with ancient statutes and customs, and however easy it might be in this House or elsewhere to appeal to the jealousy of large assemblages on the subject, when a responsible Minister of the Crown had to deal with such a question down to its smallest details the difficulty of the task ought to be acknowledged; therefore, though it was his misfortune to differ from the Home Secretary, he felt that the right hon. Gentleman had made an honest, manly, and straightforward attempt to settle the question, and that in the speech in which he introduced the measure he was not open to the charge of making an attempt to mislead the House. He felt bound to add, with regard to the Inclosure Commissioners—although he thought their policy a mistaken one—that they also had been actuated by an honest and sincere desire to do their duty; and when they read the Preamble of the Act of 1845, under which they proceeded, it would be seen how difficult it was for them to take any other course than that they usually followed. He could not consent, therefore, to bolster up a cause which he believed to be good by attacks on a Minister or a Commissioner. But what had happened this evening? It appeared from the speeches of hon. Members that the Bill had got no friends. All, with one exception, had attacked it and said the more they looked at it the less they liked it, the sole and solitary defender of the measure being the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney). His hon. Friend had good reason for his language. His hon. Friend had told the House that inclosures might be made otherwise than by the fiat of the Inclosure Commissioners. He, like his hon. Friend, had the honour of being an inhabitant of the county of Wilts, and not long ago he had been asked for some advice for the protection of the people living in the neighbourhood of a common which once existed, but which existed no longer, against what they believed to be the illegal and arbitrary conduct of the hon. Member for Chippenham. The statement made to him by a man of the highest honour was that if the case could be tried at law, a certain inclosure made by his hon. Friend, or by his advice, would be declared illegal. If an examination was made of all the inclosures which had taken place since 1755, when the rage for inclosure first set in, it would be found that they were almost invariably made at the wish of the lord of the manor. The lord of the manor believed he had certain rights, and in exercising those rights he naturally said to those who opposed him—"If you object to my exercising them the Courts are open to you;" and theoretically the Courts of Law were open to rich and poor alike. The House, however, had to recollect that the commoners, who were generally poor and ignorant, had to go through an expensive, a long and round-about process in order to establish their rights; this required the accumulated toil and learning of experienced lawyers to render it of any use, and they generally declined to adopt any such course. A fence was then run round the common by the lord of the manor, and remaining undisturbed gradually gave him a good title to what was really the property of others. If this Bill, indeed, was to be looked at solely as a measure for regulating inclosures subject to the fiat of the Inclosure Commissioners, it might be commended, but more was required. In proportion as they made inclosures difficult under the Inclosure Commission they would add to the temptations of every lord of a manor to carry out his inclosure himself—to snap his fingers at the Commissioners, to run up his fence, and take his chance in the Courts of Law. That was an undesirable state of affairs, and therefore he had agreed to oppose the Bill. In order, however, to really understand this question in its broader aspect hon. Members must go much further back than the Act of 1845, and the mere claims of the lords of the manor and the commoners—they must look to the ancient statutes which regulated the law of inclosure—the statutes of Merton and Westminster, and of Edward VI. Those statutes marked important eras in the law of landed tenure in this country. The noble Lord then proceeded at considerable length to sketch the history of inclosures in England from the earliest times to the present day, showing that originally the inhabitants of every parish were regarded as having a right in them, that these claims were gradually ousted by the exclusive claims of the lords of the manor and the commoners, but that the idea of the right had never perished from the minds of the people, and that the clauses of the Act of 1845 which enabled the Commissioners to set out allotments and recreation grounds could not be defended on any other supposition, otherwise they could only be regarded as a partial confiscation of the property of the lords and the commoners. He then went on to say he agreed with the hon. Member for Chippenham, that in the long run everything which benefited the landlord was good in the long run for the tenant, and eventually for the labourer. Yet he would appeal to the Report of the Commission on the Employment of Women and Children in Agriculture to show that there probably never was a period when the labouring classes of England were, on the whole, so prosperous as during the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th century, when inclosures were at their minimum; or a period when their condition was so miserable as during the latter part of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th century, and the first part of this century, when inclosures were at their maximum. It was that condition of affairs which led to the insertion in the Act of 1845 of the clauses he had just mentioned. He was now asking that those permissive clauses of that Act should be made compulsory, and that all inclosures, without exception, might be brought under the control of the Commissioners. It was true that no one had done more than the hon. Member for Chippenham for the poor in Wiltshire in the way of setting out allotment grounds; but still a rental was charged for them, and they were not to be compared to the allotments set out on an inclosure. This question had been thrashed out by two or three Committees, and the last accepted a compromise proposed by the Secretary to the Treasury, which was almost exactly the same as the Amendment now on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), providing as a condition of every inclosure that one-tenth of the whole common should be set aside for recreation grounds or gardens. It could not be supposed that any proposal of a Communistic or revolutionary character could come from a distinguished Member of the present Government. Yet this Bill did not make the slightest use of that suggestion. In "another place" a Bill founded on the recommendation of the same Committee was only thrown out on the third reading by a majority of 2. He acknowledged, however, that that Bill contained nothing on the subject of illegal inclosures. He had been very anxious to state his views on this subject. He knew that no rights could vest in the public. He did not suppose that the people of Dover could have rights in a common near Sheffield; but there were rights exercised over commons by the persons residing there, other than the commoners, and these had already been to a certain extent recognized by the Act of 1845. That recognition he desired to carry further, and also to stop illegal inclosures so as to protect the agricultural poor generally, and the consumers also.

MR. KNIGHT said, the noble Lord who had just spoken had, he doubted not inadvertently, completely misrepresented the state of landed property at the time of Edward VI. and the other Tudor Sovereigns. So far from its being a period of inclosures, it was the time when extensive clearances (similar to those which had taken place in Scotland during the last century) were made all over England. Henry VII. abolished the feudal system, and the nobles and large landowners soon found that money and not men would in future be their chief necessity. For the next century and a-half the Statute Book teemed with Acts of Parliament having for their object the prevention of clearances. From the Preambles of some of these Acts they learnt that villages, and even towns and churches were pulled down, and the country devastated, to make place for enormous flocks of sheep belonging to the lords of the soil. One Act especially set a limit to the number of sheep that one individual might possess; another said that for every cottage pulled down another must be built. Numberless were the expedients which were tried and failed. The clearances continued until the much misrepresented Settlement Act of Charles II. put a final stop to them. By that Act a poor family turned out of their home might be carted back to the parish they came from, which was bound to find them in food, lodging, and maintenance. He (Mr. Knight) would not follow the noble Lord into his antiquarian researches. At the time the Domesday Book was made every acre had an owner. There was no land belonging to the public, and it was enough for him that since the Norman Conquest the titles to waste lands had been quite clear. The soil had been the property of the lord of the manor, subject to certain perfectly defined rights of the commoners. He (Mr. Knight) had gone to the root of the matter in several manors, and he could tell the House how the existing state of things had arisen. Every manor had originally been a single property under a grant generally from the Crown to one individual as lord. The lord had from time to time sold or leased off some portion or all of the inclosed lands, granting to the holders of such lands the right of depasturing their cattle, with various other easements, on the lord's waste, as the uninclosed part of the property or manor was called. By the common law, confirmed by several statutes, the surplus of the waste not required to satisfy the rights of the commoners or holders of the land so disposed of, remained the property of the lord. No one, except the lord and the holders of the land possessing such rights, could have any possible claim to the common. Such rights could not from their nature attach to any person, but to certain specified lands and houses only. In 1845, when the Inclosure Bill was brought into the House of Commons, no English Member had any doubts as to the law of commons, or urged any claim on behalf of the public. The opposition to the Bill came from an Irish and a Scotch Member. Now as there never was a manor or anything resembling one in Ireland or Scotland, it was hardly possible that such Members, however well versed in rural matters, could know anything about English manorial law. Mr. Sharman Crawford, the Irishman who moved the rejection of the Bill, said—

“If the pasturage of cows on commons was subject to proper regulation, it would be of great benefit to the poor man.”—[3 Hansard, lxxxii. 15.]

But no man, rich or poor, could turn his cow upon a common, unless he held land that gave him a right to do so. It would doubtless be of great benefit to the poor man if he could turn his cow in Windsor Park, and he had as much right there as on a common. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), had made use of the same argument about the poor man's cow, and had made a similar attempt to raise a feeling in the House about a claim that did not exist. Mr. Sharman Crawford's arguments were not against inclosures, but in favour of them. He thought the commons belonged to nobody, and he wanted them to be divided into infinitesimal plots, and to be given to the poor. Mr. Hume, the Scotchman, who seconded him, evidently knew as little about it as the Irishman—

“In his opinion, and as he interpreted the law, they (the commons) comprised lands never granted to any individuals, but belonging to the Crown, for the benefit of the public. But he had taken the precaution before speaking to consult a legal friend, and he was sorry to have learned from him that commons were all private property.”—[Ibid., 23.]

These speeches were answered, and the law of the case was laid down by Viscount Palmerston, then sitting on the Opposition benches. He said—

“Nothing, he believed, could be more indisputable in point of law than that the common land of the country does not belong to the community at large, but to a certain number of individuals resident in the neighbourhood. There was no question but that all the commons in the country were the property of some one, or of some set of persons. . . . As to this Bill being to the prejudice of the labouring classes, he considered that it was a Bill essentially for the interest of the agricultural labourers. . . . Setting aside the temporary employment that would be afforded before the inclosures could be completed in the draining, the fencing, the ditching the lands, and in the erection of the variety of buildings which would be consequent upon the inclosures, there would be a permanent additional employment to the agricultural labouring classes to the extent of one labourer and his family finding employment for every 50 acres of land. . . . It should be called a Bill for the improvement of the condition of the agricultural labouring classes.”—[Ibid., 26, 27, 28.]

The hon. Mover of the present Amendment (Mr. Fawcett) had repeatedly referred with great approbation to the speech of the hon. Member for Reading on the second reading of this Bill. He (Mr. Knight) could not agree with the arguments of that hon. Member. He advocated the confiscation of the property of one set of men, who were so unfortunate as to have incurred his displeasure, in order to give it without compensation to another class, of whom he constituted himself the champion. The hon. Member knew, however, what he was about, for he told the House that unfortunately both common and statute law declare that commons were private property. This did not please him. He said he thought the law as it stood was “opposed to the spirit of modern legislation.” The House ought to be highly obliged to the hon. Gentleman for having gone on explicitly to state what he meant by that expression. He meant, he told them, “opposed to the spirit of the first French Revolution”—opposed to the spirit of the decrees of the National Convention of 1794—that glorious year of the triumph of murderous and unbridled liberty which he asked the House to emulate. The facts were these—At the beginning of the French Revolution, in 1788, the National Assembly decided upon getting rid of all feudal rights and properties, of which manorial wastes very similar to our commons formed a part, but they decided at the same time that the owners of such property should receive compensation for their loss—the compensation was never paid. In 1794 the National Convention abolished the compensation and gave the commons to the communes. He (Mr. Knight) went far with the National Assembly. If it were necessary for the health of our great wealthy and ever-increasing urban population that certain commons should belong to them, by all means let them have them. But let them make full and fair compensation to their present owners. This was not, however, what the hon. Member for Reading asked them to do, such half measures did not suit him. He asked them to step over the first stage of compensation and jump at once to the decrees of the Convention of 1794. How far did he wish them to follow that body? Their next decree was to confiscate all corporation property; then all Church property; then all the landed property of the nobles; and then they confiscated the heads of the owners of all these properties, lest at some future turn of the wheel they should come back and claim their land again. He (Mr. Knight) could easily show the House that half measures would not suit the hon. Member for Reading. In the Committee of 1865 on Open Spaces near the Metropolis his hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) moved the following Resolution:—

“Your Committee are of opinion that power should be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works to purchase manorial or common rights over commons within 15 miles of the metropolis.”

The Resolution was defeated by a bare majority, and by whom did the House suppose the casting vote was given? Why, by our French revolutionist—by the hon. Member for Reading—and yet the Resolution pointed to the right direction in which legislation ought to move. A clause had been introduced into the Inclosures Act Amendment of 1852 which permitted 50 acres of any common to be sold with the consent of the lord and two-thirds of the commoners. If 50 acres, why not the whole common? Some commons were not 50 acres in extent. Why should not Parliament do its utmost to facilitate the acquisition by purchase of suburban open spaces, by urban authorities, under the superintendence of the Inclosure Commissioners? That was not, however, the view the hon. Member for Reading took of the matter. He was for stepping over the timid counsels of the National Assembly, and boldly proclaiming, with the Convention of 1794, that the oldest and longest established rights of property in these islands, titles which were at least as old as the Anglo-Saxon race, were to give way, without compensation, to claims which he himself allowed were opposed to all common and statute law—claims which he had himself, in great part, invented, were to supersede titles to the ownership of land which had existed for centuries before the tenure in fee-simple by which we now held land was ever thought of. Nothing short of that would satisfy the hon. Member for Reading, and the party who was acting with him. The ownership of a common was nearly allied to corporation property; though the titles were far more ancient. It belonged in certain undivided shares to certain individuals. If their rights were invaded by Parliament in favour of what the hon. Member for Reading called the public, he (Mr. Knight) would ask what corporate property would be safe for a twelve month after such a precedent, if the public wanted it?

He would now read to the House a very curious letter received since the last debate from a neighbour of his, a capital sportsman. He said—

“Dear Mr. Knight,—Having seen in the newspapers that there is a Commons Inclosure Bill before the House of Commons, I wish to bring before your notice a case which happened on my father's common several years ago—viz., that a tourist then staying at Lynton was roaming about our common, and, after sitting down to his lunch, he set fire to the most valuable part of the common for black game and the wild red deer. We found out where he was staying at Lynton, and he gave his name as a Mr. Shaw Lefevre, a son of the Speaker of the House of Commons, or his nephew,” the writer forgot which. His correspondent added that he had to ride about collecting men to beat out the fire, but they did not succeed in extinguishing it before the burning of about 130 acres. [Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: What year?] The letter did not say. Great part of this common was now devoted to the service of the public. It was devoted to the maintenance of the wild red deer. Persons were kept off the common during eight months of the year, and during the other four months the public were free to gallop over it. He (Mr. Knight) did not say that municipalities should be prevented from obtaining commons near great towns, but there should be facilities for inclosing in other places. A Committee of the House of Commons could distinguish perfectly the places where commons should be inclosed and where they should not. He believed that this Bill, if it conferred more assistance upon towns to acquire this kind of property, would be a very good Bill indeed.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE assured the House that he would not detain it at very great length; in the first place, because his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had covered the whole ground, and, in the second place, because he addressed the House at some length on the second reading of the Bill. He was quite prepared to bear most ample testimony to the good intentions of the Home Secretary. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman on various occasions. He had declared that the main object of the Bill was to put a stop to inclosures, and to regulate rather than inclose commons; and he had quoted the well-known lines, which, he believed, were taken from Hudibras, though he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had never been able to find them—

“The law condemns both man and woman
Who steals the geese from off the common,
But does not punish, what's far worse,
Stealing the common from the goose.”

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: The last two lines should run—

“But lets the greater felon loose
Who steals the common from the goose.”

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the Bill did not appear calculated to carry out the intentions of the Home Secretary in three important lines of policy. In the first place, it would not put a stop to illegal and arbitrary inclosures not sanctioned by Parliament. In the next place, the Regulation Clauses would not, as the right hon. Gentleman hoped, be put into operation by the lords of manors and the commoners. He had some experience of regulation schemes for commons. The Metropolitan Commons Act had the advantage that such schemes might be applied for by any single commoner, any six ratepayers, or any local authority, such as the Metropolitan Board, or the vestry of the parish in which the common was situated. But notwithstanding such facilities, very great difficulty had been found in getting any one to apply for a regulation scheme. Under the Regulation Clauses of this Bill it was necessary that one-third of the commoners interested should apply, that two-thirds should consent before the scheme was finally approved by the Commissioners, and the lord of the manor had a veto on the scheme. With all these provisos it would be found absolutely impossible that any regulation scheme should take effect under this Bill. In fact, the Bill, so far from putting a stop to inclosures, was likely to promote them, and it was remarkable that there was not an Amendment on the Paper by any hon. Member who was in favour of the inclosure of commons. They had accepted it as an Inclosure Bill, and they had supported it as such. But the greatest objection to the Bill was that it did nothing to stop inclosures made not under the Inclosure Acts but arbitrarily and illegally. It was true that in the neighbourhood of London attempts of that kind had been resisted with success; but it was at enormous expense. In short, these inclosures could not be abated except at the enormous cost of a Chancery suit. The hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) appeared to look upon him (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) as an incendiary of a double dye. He had accused him, in the first place, of setting fire to a common in Devonshire. Now, all he could say was that he had not been in the neighbourhood of Lynton since he was an Eton boy, and if the circumstance took place he was not aware of it. His second incendiary act was alluding to what took place at the French Revolution. He had merely referred to that as a matter of historical interest, and perhaps a warning to Members like the hon. Gentleman. He reminded them that before the Revolution similar disputes arose between the lords and the people in respect to the commons of France, and that all these disputes were settled by an Act of the French Convention, which handed over all those commons to the communes. Another objection to the Bill was that it was entirely contrary to the recommendations of the Committee of 1871, of which he was Chairman, and which, after much evidence had been taken and full deliberation, recommended that no common should be inclosed without leaving at least one-tenth of the whole free from all charge for the use of the public. All these matters were by this Bill to be left to the discretion of the Inclosure Commissioners. The Home Secretary believed that the Bill would have great effect in promoting regulating schemes instead of inclosure schemes; whereas Gentlemen on the Opposition side believed that as regarded the promotion of those schemes the measure would be practically nugatory. He would, however, suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should confine his Bill at present merely to regulating schemes, and postpone the whole question of inclosure for a certain period. He should suspend the operation of the Inclosure Act for five or 10 years, and during the interval try what would be the effect of his regulating schemes. He thought that that, on the whole, would be the best practical solution of the present difficulty. It could matter very little if inclosures were put off five or 10 years longer; and it was far more important that the regulating schemes under the Bill should have a fair chance. He did not go the length of saying that there should not be any inclosure at all. There might be cases in which it would be beneficial, but it would certainly not be promoted by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that the question of commons had made rapid progress; but possibly its future progress would be still more rapid. He fully admitted that the Bill would be an improvement of the law as it at present stood, but that was not the question the House had to consider. What they had to consider was how to put the matter at rest for ever, whereas by passing this measure they would still leave it open. If the hon. Member for Hackney went to a division he would vote for his Motion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was very glad that they had had that discussion on the Bill, and he had listened to the speech by which the debate had been introduced with great pleasure. As to the suggestion which the last speaker had been kind enough to make—namely, that the Government should confine the Bill to the regulation of commons, and leave the question of inclosures alone, he thought it was better to say at once that that was advice which it certainly would not be possible to accept. The hon. Gentleman had given two conclusive answers to his own suggestion. The hon. Member had first said—"Pray stick to the regulation clauses," and then afterwards observed—"If you do they will be absolutely useless." The hon. Gentleman further suggested the adoption of the regulations under the scheme of the metropolitan commons, because he said they were better than the regulations proposed in the present Bill; but it should be remembered that under that scheme no right could be taken from any man except with his consent, and that although three or six ratepayers might start the scheme, yet it could not be carried out without such consent, or without compensation being given under the Lands Clauses Act. That was a very different scheme from the one now before the House. The hon. Member further said that the inclosure part of the scheme was not proceeded with. But he himself answered that observation by saying that if inclosures under the Inclosure Acts were stopped, lords of the manor would press their power to inclose without coming to Parliament at all. He (Mr. Cross) would only add on that point that no one had studied the subject more deeply than the hon. Member, and that he was only sorry his name could not appear on the back of the Bill. The noble Lord who had addressed the House on this subject (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had complained that he (Mr. Cross) had on a former occasion gone too far back into history; but the noble Lord had himself referred further back still, to the earliest period of English history, while the description he had given did not convey a correct impression of the actual state of things at the period to which he had adverted. It had been contended that unless certain proprietary rights in the commons were possessed by the public, the Act of 1845, in providing recreation grounds, &c., practically sanctioned confiscation. But that was not the way in which Parliament had looked at the matter. What Parliament had said was this—that people would be protected in their existing rights so long as they were content with them, but that if they wanted additional rights they might obtain them on the condition of doing something for the public. A bargain in fact was made by Parliament with the possessors of certain rights. That was the principle of the Act of 1845 and of the present Bill. After hearing all that had been said in the debate, the conclusion to which he had come was, that every hon. Member who had spoken against the Bill did so because the Bill was so good. More than one hon. Member on the other side of the House had said that in so many words. They had said the Bill was so good that it would actually stop inclosures under it. [Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: Who said so?] The hon. Member for Maldon, amongst others, had said so. [Mr. SANDFORD: No.] The principal ground of the objection of hon. Members opposite was that no provisions had been inserted in the Bill to stop what they called illegal inclosures. The first objection of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was that there was no protection in the Bill against illegal inclosures. This was not the first time the question had been before the House. Bills had been brought in by Members of the late Government, and in none of those measures had there been the slightest shadow of an attempt to deal with illegal inclosures. They had dealt simply with the amendment of the Inclosure Acts—what they had professed to deal with—and this Bill was framed in the same spirit. It was objected that the Bill would tend to facilitate inclosures. The existing Acts gave too great facilities for inclosures. The present Bill was intended to put restrictions upon those who applied for inclosure, and to provide safeguards so that no inclosure should take place unless it was one that ought to be permitted. The hon. Member for Hackney asked why they did not prevent the illegal inclosure of commons. No doubt there were illegal inclosures; but there were a great many which were perfectly legal. The lords of the manor and the commoners had certain rights, and there was no power to deprive them of such rights unless compensation was given to them. He hoped no British Parliament would ever consent to a scheme of pure confiscation such as was involved in many of the proposals that had been made. Suppose the case of a manor, with one lord and one commoner only, would anyone justify an attempt to prevent these persons agreeing to an inclosure if they wished to effect it? It had been stated that several commons had been saved for the public by the exercise of power possessed by single individuals, yet it was now sought to deprive such persons of the power which had been exercised to so much advantage. It was most important in dealing with a question of this kind that great care should be taken not to interfere with the undoubted rights of individuals. It had been urged that no question of more importance in reference to this subject could be raised than the prevention of illegal inclosures. But it seemed to be forgotten that the Bill proposed to deal with this very question and also to give power to local sanitary authorities to purchase such manorial and commonal rights as were saleable in order to provide recreation grounds for the people. The hon. Member for Hackney asked why he had not applied the same rule to the commons that he had applied to the village greens. There were two reasons. In the first place, the village green practically belonged to the village; and, in the next place, there could be no possible difficulty in defining the boundaries of the village greens. If they could define all the boundaries of commons there would be little difficulty in dealing with the matter. The whole question as to regulation of commons resolved itself into one of compensation or no compensation, and he could not consent to any proposal which would involve the taking of property without affording proper compensation. Then the hon. Member said—“You will never get anybody to go for regulation; everybody will go for inclosure.” But the hon. Member had overlooked one provision of the Bill. When the lord and commoners came for a scheme, they might either apply for an inclosure or for a regulation scheme. If they applied for an inclosure scheme the Commissioners would require special information, as to the advantages which the applicants anticipated from inclosure as compared with regulation. In other words, the applicants must make out a special case for inclosure as against regulation, and they must also state the reasons why an inclosure was expedient when viewed in relation to “the benefit of the neighbourhood.” These words were interpreted in the Preamble to mean—

“The health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of any cities, towns, villages, or populous places in or near any parish in which the land proposed to be inclosed, or any part thereof, may be situate."

This was probably as strong a provision as could well be enacted for regulation as against inclosure. But then the hon. Member said that if the inclosure was made there was no adequate protection for the neighbouring poor, that the Act of 1845 had worked indifferently, and that though the proposal of a Standing Committee was good as far as it went, it was not satisfactory. Perhaps he might explain what was really proposed. In the case of expiring Turnpike Acts the practice had been to refer all these Acts to a Standing Committee of the House, who year by year reported what was to be done with them. The inclosure schemes would be referred to just such a Committee. At present the schemes passed by the Inclosure Commissioners were placed in the hands of the Secretary of State, who then brought in a Bill backed by the whole strength of the Government. He agreed with the hon. Member that this was an improper proceeding, and that it was high time to put a stop to it. These schemes were brought forward for private advantage, and there was no reason why the Government should interfere for the purpose of passing them into law. He proposed, therefore, that the schemes of the Inclosure Commissioners should be referred to the Standing Committee, who would report what schemes should be placed in the Bill. The evidence which the Committee would have before them would be the same as was required for the information of the Commissioners, and would include the parish or place in which the common was situated, the population of the neighbourhood and the distance of the common from any town, the intention of the applicants in inclosing, the statutory provision as to the benefit of the neighbourhood, any ground other than the common which was available for the recreation of the neighbourhood; and the site and suitableness of the allotments, if any. The Committee were also to inquire whether the application ought to be acceded to, having regard to the benefit of the neighbourhood. Every safeguard was therefore taken that the Committee should have every information before it. The hon. Member for Hackney, in order, as he said, to show how strong was the feeling against the Bill, stated that there were as many

Petitions against it as in its favour. Now he thought very highly of the right of petitioning Parliament, but he was also of opinion that it was very much abused, and if the present system of getting up Petitions went on some check would have to be put upon it, but only for the purpose of giving force to all Petitions from private persons, and that were not got up in the manner to which he referred. All he could say was that if these Petitions were based upon no better foundation than a book published by the Commons' Preservation Society, they were not worth the paper they were written on, because if there ever was a description given of a Bill that was untrue, and which concealed everything in favour of the Bill, it was the pamphlet he held in his hand. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) said that the Bill contained no protection for the labouring poor. He must remind the House that a Committee sat to consider this subject, and they made certain recommendations, every one of which had been put into the Bill. Some of those recommendations were of the greatest possible importance. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had made a complaint of the absence of any statutory limit as to the proportion of every common assigned for recreation. He admitted he had not inserted the statutory limit, but he claimed credit for having taken it away, and he thought it very much better that every case should be judged of by itself and on its own merits. The hon. Member for Hackney said that the Inclosure Commissioners included all these schemes in their annual Report. All this, however, was changed, and under the Bill every scheme would be presented separately with the fullest information in regard to each. The only other objection was that the Bill left too much discretion to the Inclosure Commissioners, who, the hon. Member declared, were always crying "Enclose! Enclose!" His answer was that he had put the strongest possible control over the Commissioners by means of the authority of a Committee of that House. Wherever an Inclosure Act was now applied for the parties concerned had only to agree, and they could come to Parliament and ask for a private Act of their own. The Bill would put a stop to that system. Was it not infinitely better also not to put the persons who objected to an Act to the expense of bringing their witnesses to London, but to let the Commissioners go down and call a meeting on the spot at which every person who had an objection to raise could be heard? He must say he thought the hon. Member for Hackney had been too hard on the Inclosure Commissioners. One of the first Commissioners was Lord Lincoln, who brought in the Act of 1845. He agreed with the hon. Member that a great number of particular schemes ought not to have become law. But when the hon. Member asked him to make these schemes an exception from the Bill it would be necessary for him to see the provisions of these schemes, and to satisfy himself before he confirmed the Provisional Order, whether they ought not to be set down again. The only other objection raised to the Bill by the hon. Member for Hackney was founded on the Preamble. The hon. Member said it was a great pity not to consolidate the whole of the Inclosure Laws. He would have been very glad if that could have been done; but he must add that those Acts had been framed with great care, and he did not think they could be improved. He had also taken care to see that everything unnecessary had been struck out, and there would be no difficulty in dealing with them. The objection to the Preamble appeared to be that it did not state—"whereas it is not expedient to go on inclosing," but the Preamble did say—"whereas it is expedient to bring under the notice of Parliament any circumstances connected with proposed schemes of inclosure having reference to public as well as to private rights, and whereas it is expedient to give further facilities to the Inclosure Commissioners," &c. Such, at all events, were the intentions of the framers of the Bill, and when they came to the Committee if the hon. Member for Hackney had any Amendment to propose in the Preamble he would have the opportunity of bringing it forward. No one on this occasion had found fault with the details of the Bill. The hon. Member for Reading said why not put off inclosures for 10 years, and by that time they would know what the country really wanted. But they knew that already from the speeches of the hon. Members for Hackney and Reading, and the opinions of those who had published the book to which he had referred. Everything they had hitherto asked was granted in this Bill, and what they now wanted was that there should be no inclosures except under this Bill. That being so, they came straight to the question of property, and he was not prepared to come forward and prostrate the interests of those whose rights were affected. He need not detain the House any further. He hoped and believed this Bill would carry out everything he had stated on its introduction. He was much obliged for the good intentions which had been ascribed to him. He valued good intentions only so far as they were embodied in the Bill. He believed the Bill did carry out those intentions; it would be a great safeguard for the future, and he hoped would insure for the people the free use of those commons for a long time to come.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE stated that he was mainly responsible for the Report which had been denounced by the right hon. Gentleman in strong terms. He wrote the greater part of it, and he stood by every word of it. It contained nothing more than he had said in that House on the second reading. ["Order!"]

Mr. SPEAKER informed the hon. Gentleman that, having already addressed the House, he could not make a second speech.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 234; Noes 98: Majority 136.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Preamble be postponed."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not wish to proceed with the Bill in Committee at once. He simply wished to dispose of the Preamble, after which he should be perfectly willing to consent to Progress being reported.

MR. FAWCETT objected even to that, as there would be a most important discussion on the Preamble. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members did not appear to know how much this question would be discussed. Although beaten in the division which had just taken place, they would not be disheartened.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 185: Majority 96.

Question again proposed, "That the Preamble be postponed."

MR. RYLANDS moved that the Chairman leave the Chair. It was said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Opposition was unreasonable in the course they were pursuing; but he must say the supporters of the Bill on the Ministerial side of the House were the party who were unreasonable in trying to press the Bill on at so unreasonable an hour. He assured the supporters of the Bill that it was not by a spirit of factious opposition that he and those with whom he was acting were actuated.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Rylands.)

LORD HENRY SCOTT appealed to the Opposition to allow the Bill to be proceeded with, and also to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Motion.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, though sympathizing with the general object of those who wished to prevent the inclosure of commons, regretted that hon. Gentlemen opposite were making a faction fight, instead of taking this opportunity of legitimately criticizing details in Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON hoped the Government would not ask the Committee at that hour to take any step, however formal, or show a disposition to prevent discussion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, of course the Government had no wish to prevent discussion; but as there had now been two opportunities of discussing the principle of the Bill, which had been affirmed by a very large majority, he trusted the Committee would allow this formal step to be taken.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 165: Majority 86.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not think the principle of the Bill had been fully discussed. Many Members were anxious to speak upon it; but after the Home Secretary had addressed the House they had no chance of doing so.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, it was now very late, and as they were likely to have a very long Sitting to-morrow night in discussing the Irish Land Tenure Bill, he moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Captain Nolan.)

EARL PERCY hoped the Government would not yield to what he could not characterize otherwise than as a factious opposition.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT denied that the noble Lord had any right to impute factious motives to the Members on the Opposition side of the House. He considered his language most unusual.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that to have a discussion on the principle of the Bill on the question that the Preamble be postponed was unusual and contrary to the spirit of the Rules that governed their proceedings. He would not, however, object under the circumstances to Progress being reported.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 105: Majority 25.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, on the ground that it was not usual to have a Bill of that importance discussed in the absence of Cabinet Ministers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they had seen a spectacle that evening which had never before in his experience been witnessed in that House. They had seen Gentlemen who were responsible for the conduct of their Party voting against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Minister who had charge of the Bill. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Colonel Taylor) and the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Dyke) had voted against their leaders. Such a course was inconsistent with the decent conduct of Public Business. If such conduct were persisted in, that House would soon become a bear garden. ["Oh, oh!"] They might cry "Oh," but as soon as the Conservative Party refused to follow its own leaders the conduct of Public Business would become impossible.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had not withdrawn from the House, and was anxious to proceed with the Bill; yet if the hon. Baronet who had moved that the Chairman leave the Chair, would withdraw his Motion, they would then report Progress, and he would proceed with the Bill on Monday.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would withdraw his Motion on the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that Progress would be immediately reported.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS, BRISTOL, &C. (NO. 6) BILL.

Order for Committee read, and discharged :—Bill, so far as it relates to the City of Bristol, committed to a Select Committee, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection, as in the case of a Private Bill.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BOORD, Bill to amend the Law for the Registration of Parliamentary Voters in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BOORD, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, and Mr. GRANTHAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 169.]

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to ask a Question of the Lord President. He believed the progress of Business in that House was satisfactory. Indeed, it was admitted the other day that it compared favourably with the work done in "another place." But still he did not think they were over-burdened with Business, and he rose to ask the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council, What proposition he intended to make with regard to the the Whitsuntide Holidays?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he expected that the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would come up from the other House on Monday and would be read a first time that evening. Should that be so, he should move the suspension of the Standing Orders on Tuesday with the view of having the Bill read a second time, and passed through its remaining stages at the sitting of Tuesday evening. If this should be accomplished he would propose that their Lordships should adjourn from Thursday next until Tuesday, June 13.

ARMY—RESERVE FORCES—YEOMANRY TRUMPETERS.—QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether he will state the reason for withholding the pay for trumpeters in Yeomanry regiments; the saving which it is estimated will be effected; and, whether lieutenant colonels commanding these regiments had been previously communicated with on the subject? He was aware that the Commander-in-Chief had issued a Circular, in which he said that the Yeomanry might draw trumpeters from the Regular Forces; but these Forces could not supply the requisite number. There was an impression in the Yeomanry Cavalry that they had been unfairly dealt with in the matter by the War Office. He anticipated that his noble Friend would reply that what the War Office had done was in accordance with the recommendations of a Committee appointed last year; but of the eleven Members composing that Committee seven were on the Staff of the War Office and only four were Yeomanry officers; so, although it might be said that "the Committee" recommended, the War Office were first responsible for the recommendations. He was afraid the War Office only accepted as much of the recommendations as pleased them.

EARL CADOGAN said, that though the first of his noble Friend's Questions did not state accurately what had been really done, his noble Friend had rightly anticipated what his reply to that Question would be. There were only four Yeomanry officers on the Committee of last year; but he thought that number was sufficient, remembering that on this question of trumpeters the Committee took the evidence of several Yeomanry officers. He would read to their Lordships, answers given by some of those witnesses. These Questions and Answers occurred in the examination of Major David Scotland, Cheshire Yeomanry—

"What work did the trumpet-major himself do in the course of the year?—He had nothing to do; he was employed civilly as a crier in Knutsford Court.

"Then he did hold a civil employment?—Yes, he did.

"(Sir F. FitzWygram).—The trumpet-major, if I understand you rightly, is absolutely unemployed, except for six days, without counting the marching out and marching in days. Do you not think that £36 is rather a useless expenditure on a man for those six days?—Yes, I do.

"And that some other arrangement might be better?—Yes; I think that a trumpeter might be detached from a Cavalry regiment for the purpose, just for three weeks or a month, because with us our trumpeters are assembled about a fortnight or three weeks before permanent duty —they have four days' absolute instruction under the trumpet-major, and those four days and the permanent duty are all that the trumpet-major does in the year. He is the best paid man in the regiment for what he does."

In the examination of Viscount Malden, Lieutenant Colonel of the Hertfordshire Yeomanry, there was this passage:—

"What does the trumpet-major do during the year generally?—The present one is armourer sergeant at St. Albans; he keeps a private shop, and is gunmaker.

"He does nothing for the Government all the year round, except the eight days on which he is out?—Nothing."

Coming to the evidence of Lord Cork, Lieutenant Colonel of the North Somerset Yeomanry, he found these Questions and Answers:—

"You have one on the permanent staff, have you not?—Yes, he is trumpeter on the permanent staff.

"What does he do?—Nothing, except during the training week and during the troop drills."

In the Report of the Committee there was this passage:—

"We have considered the position and duties of trumpeters on the permanent Staff, and find from the evidence that their services are only required in that capacity during the period of permanent duty. We cannot, therefore, recommend the continuance of such a permanent appointment, but in lieu thereof we suggest the employment of a qualified Yeoman during the permanent duty, and an extra allowance of, say 3s. a-day might, we think, with propriety, be granted him while so employed; or a qualified trumpeter might be furnished from the Regular Army during the permanent duty."

The War Office had acted on that recommendation. The saving was £1,400 a-year. With regard to the last of the Questions of his noble Friend, he had to say that it was not, he believed, customary to consult the lieutenant-colonels on all occasions of proposed changes in matters connected with the Yeomanry generally, but only in respect of matters concerning their own regiments.

THE EARL OF CORK thought that one trumpeter for each troop, instead of one for the whole corps, ought to be allowed during permanent duty. As it was, by the present arrangements the expense of the troop trumpeters fell upon the captains, instead of upon the Contingent Fund as formerly. In his regiment it had been the custom to summon the men of each troop by sound of trumpet, but you could not summon men by sound of trumpet if you had no trumpet.

The Duke of St. Albans

NAVY—PROMOTION TO FLAG RANK.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the Government, When it is intended by the Admiralty to make an alteration in the system of promotion from the rank of Captain to that of Flag Officer? The noble Earl said that when he brought the subject under the notice of the House last Session, a noble Friend of his who was not now present (the Earl of Malmesbury) concurred with him that recourse must be had to selection in the case of those Officers, and in consequence of that expression of opinion he (the Earl of Camperdown) had expected that something would have been done before now. The number of Flag Officers on the establishment was to be about 50, and that of Captains 150. With a promotion by seniority of one out of three, he did not see how the best men were to be had. Where the opportunity of selection was so limited, the Admiralty must be hampered in selecting the best men.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, he had some difficulty in understanding the nature of the noble Earl's Question. He was not aware that the Admiralty were disposed to make any alteration in the system of promotion from the rank of Captain to that of Flag Officer. The matter had been discussed, but no decision had been arrived at; it was a question which required to be approached with very great caution. He had looked into the Report of the Committee of 1863, and in that Report it was laid down that it was the undoubted Prerogative of Her Majesty to promote by selection any Captain whom she might be advised to promote. By an Order in Council, even in time of peace a promotion might be so made. But, in point of fact, selection governed all the promotions at present, not only in the lower ranks, but also in the higher. One of the most responsible tasks the Admiralty had to perform was that of deciding as to what Captains should be allowed to qualify for the rank of Flag Officer. To qualify, a Captain must serve six years afloat, and in the course of that service fill two, possibly three separate appointments. If, in the course of fulfilling his service, a Captain showed that he was the right man for the rank of Flag Officer, he might depend upon finding no difficulty in obtaining further employment, and so qualifying for the Active Flag List. If he did not, the Admiralty took care not to do so. He became an Admiral in time, but an Admiral on the Retired List. The truth was that the Admirals on the Active List were the selected of the selected—the crème de la crème. He was aware that in the French Navy the Flag Officers were taken by selection from the Captains on the Active List, and that was also the system in England, but it was given up in 1747; the noble Duke opposite, who himself had filled the post of First Lord of the Admiralty (the Duke of Somerset), told the Committee that he was aware that French naval officers complained of that system. Suppose a case in which a Captain was promoted over the head of 20 seniors, every one of these 20 others would contend that he was the man who ought to have been selected, and his Friends in both Houses of Parliament would advocate his cause. The result of such a system would be to flood both Houses with remonstrances. He did not think it would be popular with the Service at large, and he hoped it never would be adopted. There were 175 Captains on the Active List, and not 150, as had been stated by his noble Friend. Under the scheme introduced while his noble Friend was at the Admiralty, and which was known as the Childers' scheme, there were only three promotions from the rank of Captain to that of Flag Officer in 1873, and only four in 1874. This was under Mr. Childers' administration. Under Mr. Ward Hunt's there were seven in 1875, and seven would be the number each year; while the number of promotions from the rank of Commander to that of Captain would be from 12 to 15 a-year, and the number of promotions from the rank of Lieutenant to that of Commander 25. By that means, he thought, a constant flow of promotion would be maintained.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN referred to Hansard to show that he was correct in what he had represented to be the statement made by Lord Malmesbury last Session. He regretted to find from his noble Friend that there was no intention to adopt the system of promotion by selection in its entirety—especially after the debate of last year, when it was admitted that its adoption was necessary.

TRADE UNION ACT (1871) AMENDMENT
BILL—(No. 73.)

(The Lord Aberdare.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD ABERDARE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the Bill, which had come up from the Commons, was to secure the due administration of the funds of trade union societies. Beside some minor provisions there were two clauses which were most important. One of these was designed to facilitate the appointment of new trustees in case of bankruptcy, or other disqualification. At present it was almost impossible for trustees to divest themselves of their authority, and it was now proposed that when it was desirable to appoint a new trustee the registrar should be authorized, on application in writing from the secretary or three members of the union or branch, and on proof satisfactory to him, to direct the transfer of any stock such trustees might hold in the Bank of England or Ireland on behalf of the society into the names of other persons as trustees. Again, as the law at present stood, if a fraud were practised upon a trade union, the proceedings in summary jurisdiction must be taken in the place where the registered office of the trade union was situated. For instance, if the society belonged to Manchester, the prosecution must be instituted there. The 4th clause proposed to put an end to this anomaly, and enacted that the jurisdiction might be exercised either in the Court of that place, or in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction of the place where the offence was committed. There were certain Amendments which it was thought desirable to introduce in the Bill as it now stood, and, with the view of having those printed, he would move on a future day that the Bill be committed pro forma.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Aberdare.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON approved the principles of the Bill, and thought the course proposed by the noble Lord would be a convenient one.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

EDUCATION — REPORTS FOR THE YEAR 1875.—QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked the Lord President, When the Report of the Committee of Council on Education (England and Wales) for 1875, the Report of the Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) for the same year, and the Report by the Accountant to the Board of Education (Scotland) for the same year, will be laid on the Table of the House?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in reply, said, that the Report for England and Wales would be placed in the hands of noble Lords during the Recess. The Irish Report, which would be up to the 31st of March last, would be ready in the middle of next month. The Scotch Report was made up to Whitsuntide in each year; but had subsequently to be placed in the hands of a public officer of accounts, whose examination of it required some months.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) ACT.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

EARL DE LA WARR moved for a Return of Landowners of 500 acres and upwards in each county in England and Wales, showing those who have contracted themselves out of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act up to the 1st of June, 1876. The noble Earl said, that when the Bill was passing through Parliament, it created much interest in that House and in the country. The Act was of a peculiar kind, as it contained a permissive clause which would render it harmless whenever its operation was not desired by landlords. It seemed to him that some information should be obtained for the purpose of showing in what manner the measure had been received by landowners; especially as it was commonly stated and believed that a very large proportion of the principal landowners in the country, including some of those who were promoters and supporters of the measure, had contracted themselves out of its operation. He was not aware that there could be any objection to, or difficulty in the system enacted by the Act he was perfectly willing to give them the benefit of it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was satisfactory to be acknowledged as a prophet. He had not referred to the report of his speech of last Session, but he believed what he said was in substance this—that the Act would prove useless, because it would not be called for in the case of good landlords like his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), and because landlords who were unwilling that their tenants should have the protection of the Act would contract themselves out of it.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he did not think this Return could be called inquisitorial—at all events by comparison with the yearly Returns asked for by the Board of Trade from persons engaged in agriculture, who were invited to answer no fewer than 38 questions connected with their stock and crops. Moreover, it could not be very inquisitorial, because when a landlord contracted himself out of the Act all his tenants must know it, and consequently all the world also. At the same time, he would not press his Motion.

On Question? Resolved in the negative.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS.—QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HOUGHTON, in asking the Minister for Foreign Affairs to lay on the Table of the House any correspondence that might have taken place between the Government and the Representatives of Foreign Powers on the question of the conferring of decorations on British subjects not in the service of the Crown, said, that the noble Earl's answer might throw some light upon an erroneous public opinion as to the interference of the State with the wearing of Orders when conferred by foreign Governments upon English subjects. In 1873, previous to the Great International Exhibition at Vienna, he called the attention of the noble Earl the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) to the subject, and the noble Earl, in a less conclusive reply than he generally made to Questions addressed to him, failed to bring forward any Statute, Proclamation, Order in Council, or Public Act which could place any private Englishman under restrictions in this matter. He wished that the object of his Question should not be misunderstood. He did not desire to interfere with the right of any Department, military or civil, to inhibit any person in that Department from receiving any marks of distinction from a foreign country except with the consent of the Sovereign. What he wanted to know was whether it was in the power of any Department of the State to inhibit any private Englishman from receiving any Order or decoration from a foreign Government unless he had the express permission of the Crown? The noble Earl's (Earl Granville's) reply to his Question two years ago was so inconclusive that it did not prevent the Austrian Government from giving decorations to the Commissioners, the jurors, and others interested in the Vienna Exhibition. Similar decorations were also given and accepted on the occasion of the great French Exhibition—in fact, no notice whatever was taken of the noble Earl's views on the Continent, and decorations had been given just as freely as if it never existed—it was in the prospect of similar Exhibitions in future that he asked the Question. Philosophers, no doubt, might say that the whole question of Orders and decorations was extremely frivolous; but as their Lordships were themselves the most decorated portion of the British public, it was not from them that such an objection should come. No doubt, these decorations were principally important to persons engaged in commerce who were brought into intercourse with foreign Governments—such as scientific discoverers, English mechanics, chemists, &c. There were, however, foreign Orders and marks of favour bestowed upon men of letters and men of science, such as the Prussian Order Pour la Mérite, which comprised the most powerful intellects of the civilized world, and had been conferred upon Lord Macaulay, Mr. Carlyle, Professor Owen, Sir Henry Rawlinson, and other Englishmen. Yet he believed that the bestowal of even that Order had been objected to by a public Department that could have nothing to do with the matter. Their Lordships must recollect an interesting debate raised by the late Lord Stanhope on the subject of decorating Englishmen eminent in science and letters. It was then stated that there was nothing in the present regulations which would prevent the Order of the Bath from being bestowed on men of eminence in science and letters, and it had been stated that the offer of the G.C.B. had been made by the present Prime Minister to Mr. Carlyle. He considered that it ought to be made clear whether there was any right on the part of the Foreign Office to prevent these Orders and decorations from being accepted and worn in this country. Upon the present occasion, however, he would confine himself to asking whether and to what extent the State could interfere with a mark of favour bestowed by a foreign Power upon a private Englishman?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that his noble Friend had asked a Question which was not included or even necessarily involved in the Notice he had put on the Paper. That Notice had really been to ask for Papers, and as there were no Papers bearing on the general question of the conditions under which British subjects were entitled to receive and wear foreign Orders, he had been prepared to give his noble Friend that reply. There had, no doubt, been some correspondence with regard to individual cases, but it had turned upon the single point whether the particular case under discussion was or was not included in the Regulations laid down by the Foreign Office in 1870. He did not mean that there were no Regulations of an earlier date, but that was the last occasion on which they were revised. He did not think it necessary to go into the general question of the policy to which his noble Friend had adverted. This question was raised by the noble Lord three years ago; the noble Earl who preceded him in office (Earl Granville) made a reply, in which he stated the general policy of the Regulations in a clear and satisfactory manner, and with the general purport of that reply he entirely concurred. The question of policy was not now raised by the noble Lord; what he said was he would not rest until he had ascertained what were the rights of any Department of the State as to the acceptance by a British subject of Orders or decorations from a foreign Government given for scientific or other services. That, however, was not the Question he had put upon the Paper, and if he had desired an answer to it it would have been simpler to have given Notice of a Question on the point to which his observations had been addressed. He could only answer the noble Lord off-hand; but he was ready to say this much—he apprehended the interference of the State with the acceptance of foreign decorations by private persons rested wholly upon the Regulations issued upon the authority of the then Secretary of State three years ago, which were only a repetition of former Regulations dated February, 1870. The first Regulation was to the effect that no subject of Her Majesty should wear such a decoration without having previously obtained Her Majesty's permission under the Royal sign manual. Subsequent Regulations stated certain exceptions to the general scope of the first. As to the question, What was the authority upon which the Regulations rest?—it was clear that they were laid down upon the authority of the Crown, and that any person in the service of the Crown would be fairly punishable for breaking through a rule which it was his official duty to observe. If his noble Friend asked what legal penalty any person not being in the service of the Crown rendered himself liable to if he chose to contravene the regulations and to wear a foreign Order, he could only say he believed that if the noble Lord or any one else chose to wear such an Order, he might do it without any fear of the consequences, for he did not believe the Regulation rested upon any Act of Parliament, and he did not believe it could be enforced by any legal process. If a man wore an Order of this kind—even if he wore a decoration purporting to be a decoration from his own Government which he was not entitled to wear—he much doubted if such a proceeding was in any way punishable at law. The Regulation meant simply that the Crown did not authorize or recognize the acceptance of such marks of honour from a foreign Government except under certain conditions which were laid down. It was intended that, in all but the excepted cases, these foreign Orders and decorations should not be worn at Court, and any person holding a public situation and wearing one of these Orders when in the performance of a public duty would be guilty of a gross breach of public decorum. He did not think the Regulations were, or were ever meant to be, legally enforceable, and that seemed to be the point on which the noble Lord desired information.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that what he wished to have decided was what were the legitimate powers of the Foreign Office, whether the Regulations issued applied to any other persons than those who were in the service of the Crown, and what power there was to apply these Regulations generally to the subjects of Her Majesty. He contended that the word "subjects" did not and could not mean private persons, who were not under the administrative authority of the Secretary of State; and he now inferred from what the noble Earl had stated that there was no legal authority to prevent the assumption and wearing of these Orders in this country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was a great distinction between those who were in the service of the Crown and the general public. The noble Lord (Lord Houghton), having taken three years to reply to his speech, had forgotten some things he had said, and had misquoted what he (Earl Granville) said about the opinions of two Sovereigns. It had never been historically accepted that Elizabeth said she "would mark her own sheep;" that remark was attributed to George III. What Elizabeth said, with somewhat of despotic coarseness, was—"I will not allow my dogs to wear any collars but my own." As he was not in office now he did not feel it incumbent on him to add anything to what the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had said, but he agreed in what had fallen from him. He felt regret that it was necessary to maintain the Regulations, because he knew many individuals who would like to wear foreign decorations. There was one argument the noble Lord did not use in support of the views of those who wished to wear them. When some one applied to Lord Melbourne for an Order, he expressed a doubt whether the applicant had established any claim to it; and the answer was—"The fact is, he is a very dressy man, and would show it off exceedingly well." In his own case, before he had the Order which he was proud of wearing, he had the offer of several European Orders, not for any merit of his own, but because he held certain offices of State; but under the Regulations he had refused them. He knew no one who was so likely as the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) to receive Orders from many countries, for he was well known on the Continent and beyond the Atlantic; and he was quite sure that honours would be most cheerfully given to him, and that they would become him very much. The only thing was, they would make him too cosmopolitan, for he already called the noble Earl the Secretary of State the "Minister" for Foreign Affairs; in his speech he had quoted French, and he was not quite sure he did not detect some Gallicisms. However, the occasion was not now so opportune for a discussion as it was the last time the question was raised. That was just before the opening of the Austrian Exhibition, when it was anticipated that Austria would desire to offer decorations in connection with that event. It was true there was now a great Exhibition across the Atlantic; but the Government of the United States as resolutely refused to allow foreign decorations to be worn by its citizens as it absolutely refused to dispense such decorations on its own account.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE reminded their Lordships that last year he had brought the subject of the assumption of foreign titles before the House. This was more important than the wearing of foreign Orders, for if a British subject had gone to the recent Royal reception at the Guildhall covered with foreign decorations he would only have rendered himself ridiculous; but if a British subject claiming to hold a foreign title had been invited by that title, and had been accorded precedence in virtue of that foreign title, that would have been an acceptance and endorsement of it of considerable importance. An eminent individual in this country (Cardinal Manning) bore a title giving a precedence above an English Duke, conferred on him, a British subject, by a foreign Sovereign, and in virtue of that title he claimed the right to exercise what was formerly considered to be the absolute prerogative of the Crown, the granting of charters to Universities: he thought that if a restriction were put on British subjects as to their receiving foreign Orders some regulation ought to be made with regard to their acceptance of foreign titles. To make a rule applying only to decorations and to leave out titles appeared to him to be straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

LORD HOUGHTON was understood to say that persons in the service of the United States could not receive or wear such Orders; but there was nothing to prevent persons in the service of other States going to America from wearing them.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—THE COURT OF APPEAL.—QUESTION.

LORD SELBORNE said it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, when explaining to the House the arrangements connected with the Court of Appeal, stated that the heads of the other Courts, including the Master of the Rolls, might be relied on during a considerable part of the year without the inconvenient interruption of the other business of the Courts. Accordingly, he had seen in the present year that the Judges, including the Master of the Rolls, had been sitting in the Court of Appeal—but from some statements which had been made in public there appeared to be an impression that the result was likely to be an inconvenient interruption of the business of the Rolls Court by withdrawing the Master of the Rolls from it in a manner hitherto unusual. He had reason to believe that this impression was founded on some misconception, and therefore he wished to ask his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, Whether the time devoted by the Master of the Rolls to the business of the Court of Appeal during the present sittings will have the effect of preventing his Lordship from sitting for as many days as has been usual in the Rolls Court?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad his noble and learned Friend had put this Question, because it enabled him to correct what he believed to be a misconception with regard to the constitution of the Appeal Court, so far as the Master of the Rolls was concerned. It was the fact that the Master of the Rolls had given a considerable portion of his time to the business of the Appeal Court in Westminster, with great advantage to the public interests; but as to the effect that would have on the ordinary sittings of the Rolls Court, he would place before their Lordships a few figures with reference to the sittings of that Court before the Judicature Act and the present position of matters. Before the Judicature Act passed the average sittings every year of the Rolls Court extended over 28 weeks; with six days in each week that gave 168 days, supposing the Court sat every day while the sittings continued. Accordingly he found that during the 12 years Lord Romilly was Master of the Rolls' up to 1872, allowing for the casualties that would happen every year, he sat on an average during each of those 12 years 156 days. In 1872-3, during part of which Lord Romilly was assisted by the late Lord Chancellor, the sittings at the Rolls numbered 168 days. In 1873-4 the present Master of the Rolls sat 175 days, and in 1874-5 170 days. That was the state of things up to the passing of the Judicature Act—the maximum of the sittings ranged from 168 to 175. By the Judicature Act the sittings of the Court of Chancery had been very much extended. Instead of 28 weeks they had now become 34 weeks—an addition of six weeks—so that instead of sittings on 168 days they had now no less than 204 days—36 days more—for the sittings of that Court. The Master of the Rolls, he found, had sat in the Court of Appeal for 21 days, and he proposed to sit there in all 25 days; which being deducted from the 204 days, gave 11 days in excess of what the sittings ever were before in the Rolls Court. But that was not really the whole history of the case. Their Lordships were probably aware that the Master of the Rolls was a most efficient and diligent Judge, and notwithstanding his sittings in the Appeal Court, the number of causes he had already disposed of was so great that the Chambers were completely occupied, and it would not be desirable to increase the sittings at the Rolls beyond the present amount. The Master of the Rolls had three Chief Clerks and a staff of subordinate clerks, between whom the Chamber business was divided. The staff in Chambers was absolutely unable to keep pace with what was done in Court, much less could they do more than keep pace with it. He therefore had no hesitation in saying that the sittings of the Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal would not only be a great advantage to the public, but would not in any way interfere with the normal business of the Rolls Court.

CRIMINAL LAW — THE CONVICT ORTON.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to his refusal to grant relaxation of rules relating to interviews with convicts in the case of Castro alias Orton alias Tichborne, Whether he has seen in the public journals a letter from the cousin of the convict, Mr. Anthony Biddulph, stating that on a recent visit he found him "more than ever like the youth he had known him in former days, the Roger of the Chilian photograph;" and, whether, on this and other grounds, he will grant permission for an interview to those who on the trial expressed opinions as to his identity formed upon his appearance at that period, and who may now desire to reconsider their evidence on that point?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed it was one of the Rules of the House that Questions should not be argumentative. The hon. Member had not strictly adhered to that Rule, for it was certainly open to argument whether Mr. Biddulph was a cousin of the convict. He had not seen Mr. Biddulph's letter in the public prints, and could not therefore, on that ground, grant permission for interviews with the convict by other persons. He knew of no other grounds on which to permit interviews with the convict.

SPAIN — DETENTION OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the following telegram from Cadiz in the "Times" newspaper of 25th May:—

"A sad perversion of justice is occurring. A British subject, Henry Pratt, has served eleven years' penal servitude. His time expired two years ago, and five successive Spanish Ministers have declared him free, but have neglected to sign his papers, and he has just been moved from Melilla to Ceuta, still a prisoner, having served two years beyond his allotted term;"

and, whether the above report is true; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken for his release?

MR. BOURKE: I am glad my hon. Friend has called attention to this case, although the facts are not at all what the Question would suggest. It appears that Pratt, a British subject, was sentenced about 11 years ago to imprisonment for life for the crime of homicide, so that his time cannot be said to have expired. About two years ago he petitioned for his release, and his petition was sent to Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid as well as to the Minister of Justice in Spain. Mr. Layard considered that it was not a case in which he could interfere officially; however, he spoke privately to Senor Sagasta, who was then Minister of Foreign Affairs, and who inquired into the prisoner's conduct and character, and subsequently told Mr. Layard that the account he had received was so very good that he should immediately recommend him for a full pardon. Her Majesty's Representative repeatedly received similar assurances from Senores Ulloa and Castro and Count Casa Valencia, who were successively Ministers for Foreign Affairs. In November last Senor Calderon Collantes, the present Minister for Foreign Affairs, who was acquainted with the case of Pratt, because he had been Minister of Grace and Justice, on a further representation being made, assured Mr. Layard that he was entitled to his liberty, as, although the punishment of imprisonment for life was inflicted by the Spanish Code, practically imprisonment was never extended beyond the term of 10 years, and Pratt should be pardoned at once. As, however, no steps appear to have been taken by the Spanish authorities to carry out the assurances given to Mr. Layard, he was instructed a short time ago to bring the matter officially before the Spanish Government. Sufficient time has not elapsed to enable a reply to be received to this representation.

The Lord Chancellor

METROPOLIS—TRAFFIC AT HYDE PARK CORNER.—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is now in his power to propose a plan for relieving the traffic at Hyde Park Corner and opening a communication between Piccadilly and Belgravia, which has so long been desired for the convenience of the public?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I am happy, Sir, to say that, after long, minute, and anxious consideration, I have approved a plan for the relief of the traffic at Hyde Park Corner by making a road across the Green Park, from opposite Hamilton Place into Grosvenor Place. This road will follow nearly the same track as that of the unfortunate one upon which I staked my reputation last summer, and which was shown on the model which was exhibited in the Conference Room last Session, and which met generally with the approval of hon. Members. The entrance of the road in Piccadilly will be very wide, and so shaped as to enable the traffic coming from the east and north-east of London to make use of this road on its way to Victoria Station and its neighbourhood, without clashing with the carriages coming down Hamilton Place. The engineering difficulties which led to the abandonment of my former scheme will be avoided in this instance by crossing Constitution Hill on the level. At the same time, I may say that arrangements will be made, by means of a gatekeeper, to prevent any inconvenience arising from the traffic to members of the Royal Family, to equestrians, and to those Members of both Houses of Parliament who have a right to use Constitution Hill. I may add that the head of the police force, to whom is entrusted the regulation of the traffic at Hyde Park Corner, is of opinion that the proposed road will afford an immense relief to the block which now causes so much inconvenience at that portion of Piccadilly.

MR. MUNTZ inquired whether he correctly understood the noble Lord to say that Members of Parliament had a right to the use of Constitution Hill?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had intended to refer only to those Members of Parliament who had the right.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the honourable Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire, Whether he is prepared to withdraw the Notice of Motion that stands in his name in reference to the third reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill, on the grounds that the subject had already been twice fully discussed, and also that the powers of the Board of Trade under the existing Act were ample to secure the object which the hon. Baronet had in view?

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, in reply, said, that desiring not to delay the course of Public Business or to prevent the passing of the measure, he begged, in compliance with the request of the Government, to withdraw his Notice.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in consequence of the reply of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire, wished to ask the hon. Member for Birkenhead, Whether he intends to proceed to-night with the Notice that stands on the Paper in his name in reference to that measure?

MR. MAC IVER said, he would rather not answer the question, as much must depend on the course of Public Business. He would, however, not do anything to delay the progress of the Bill, which he believed to be in the main a good one.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GEORGE CLIVE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will fix an early date for the resumption of the debate on the second reading of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick's Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the hon. Member had sent word privately to the Prime Minister of his intention to put the Question that evening, and his right hon. Friend, unfortunately, not being able to be present, had asked him to give the answer that he would be prepared to find a Government night for the resumption of the discussion on the Bill as soon as the state of Public Business would permit; but that, at the present moment, it was impossible to fix any special day for that purpose.

MR. GEORGE CLIVE gave Notice that immediately after that day, whatever it might be, he should proceed with the Resolution which stood upon the Paper in his name.

PUBLIC HOUSES (IRELAND)—SUNDAY CLOSING.—QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH, in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, begged, to ask him, Whether, as the Government appeared to have time at their disposal, they would afford him facilities for carrying a Bill founded upon the Resolution of the House passed on the 13th instant and relating to the Sunday Liquor Traffic in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had given reasons the other day why Her Majesty's Government could not undertake to introduce a measure on the subject referred to, and the same reasons would render it impossible for them to make the promise the hon. Member asked for.

THE DERBY DAY.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make the usual Motion for the adjournment of the House over Derby Day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER assented.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON wished to know, Whether Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer could state the order of Public Business for Monday, and also what will be the probable Business for Thursday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the First Order on the Paper for Monday would be the third reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, which it was important should pass through the House of Lords before the Recess. It was not anticipated that any further discussion would arise on that Bill. Immediately after that Bill the Commons Bill would be taken, and it was proposed to proceed with the latter measure on Thursday. The right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Prisons Bill hoped to be able to take it on Thursday. The substantial business for Monday and Thursday, therefore, would be the Commons Bill.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY reminded the right hon. Gentleman that on the third reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill there would be a very important discussion in reference to a matter of which he had more than once given Notice.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had forgotten that Notice, being under the impression that the hon. Gentleman did not intend to bring forward the Motion.

SUPPLY. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER AND THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) ACT.—RESOLUTION.

DR. C. CAMERON, in rising to call attention to the fact that a circular has been addressed to the tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster, by the Chancellor of the Duchy, excluding them from the benefits of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act of last Session by giving them formal notice that their contracts of tenancy shall remain unaffected by that Act, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable that the benefits intended by Parliament to accrue to any class of Her Majesty's subjects from the passing of any statute should be neutralised by the official action of a member of the Administration responsible for the enactment of that statute,"

—said: Sir, some time ago, in reply to a Question which I put to him in this House, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster admitted that he had issued a circular attributed to him in The Mark Lane Express, contracting the tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster out of the benefits of the Agricultural Holdings Act of last Session. Now, the 46th clause of the Act expressly enacts that the Act shall extend and apply to the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster. Comparing the expression here made use of with the manner in which the same words are applied in other parts of the statute, it appears to me a matter quite open to argument that the Act, so far as the Duchy of Lancaster is concerned, is not of a permissive, but of a compulsory character. I do not, however, intend to enter into the point, for it seems to me of comparatively little moment whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has, in issuing the circular, acted within his powers or exceeded them. What I contend is, that it is evident from the 46th clause that the Act was intended by Parliament to apply to the Duchy of Lancaster. This clause was not only sanctioned by Parliament, but the consents of Her Majesty and of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in respect of it were expressly given before the Bill came down to this House. Moreover, as a Member of the Ministry which introduced the Bill, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster must have had every opportunity of urging any special reason which might exist for the exclusion of the lands of the Duchy from the operation of the Act, and as a Member of the Ministry responsible for the Act he must be regarded as especially responsible for the 46th clause which regulates its application to the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster. In admitting that he had issued the circular attributed to him by The Mark Lane Express the right hon. and gallant Gentleman attempted to excuse his action, and as I wish to do the right hon. and gallant Gentleman every justice, I shall quote his own words—

“On the advice,” he said, “of the recognized and responsible officials of the Duchy, having consulted several of the Council, I did that which was considered best for Her Majesty’s estates.

. . . The difficulties intended to be met by the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act have never occurred between the Duchy and its tenants. The tenants are scarcely ever changed, and, as a matter of course almost, the farms pass from father to son, and the improvements, as a rule, are always made by the Duchy at a stated rate of interest.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxvii. 1796.]

Now, admitting for a moment the validity of these excuses for the action of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, I must say that it appears to me his proper time to have thought of these exceptional circumstances was when the Bill was before Parliament, and his proper course was to have struck out the special provision for the case of the Duchy in the measure—instead of dangling it before the eyes of the country as if to give the lie to any suspicion that any Department of Her Majesty’s Government intended the measure to be a sham, or brought it forward otherwise than in the best of faith. But, Sir, I shall show that the excuses of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, when closely looked into, really afford no excuse whatever for his conduct in the matter. It is only in the cases of tenancies from year to year, or at will, that under Section 57 of the Act notice is required to be given to debar the occupier from reaping the benefits of the Act. It is not required in the case of existing leases, for the Act specially excepts them. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman tells us that the Duchy is in the habit of advancing money for improvements at a stated rate of interest, as if in so doing it was in the habit of doing everything contemplated under the Act. I maintain that this is so far from being the case, that the question of these advances has practically nothing to do with the operation of the Act. These advances apply solely to improvements coming under Class I of the Agricultural Holdings Act. This class of improvements—permanent improvements—are every one of them improvements which are more properly executed by the landlord than by the tenant, and although the Act of last Session very properly made provision that in the case of limited owners, or when from any cause the landlord did not care to expend his capital, the tenant might make the improvement and receive compensation, it expressly stipulated that such compensation could only be claimed when the permanent improvement was executed with the previous consent in writing of the landlord. Now, from everything I hear the Duchy is not particularly lavish in its expenditure on improvements. With its income of £35,000, it last year only expended in drainage and other improvements chargeable to capital £731 6s. 9d., and that sum was doubtless laid out to good advantage and at good interest. But whether it was great or small, and whether the tenants paid for it in the shape of increased rents or not has nothing to do with the question. If the Chancellor of the Duchy wishes to retain all works of permanent improvement in his own hand, he has simply to refuse his written consent to the tenants proposing to execute them, and if they persist in carrying them out, they do so at their own risk. If, on the other hand, the Duchy executes them, there is not a shadow of a pretence for saying that under the Act of last Session any compensation could be claimed. But, Sir, some really important advantages could have been claimed by the tenant, and were specially intended by Parliament to accrue to the yearly tenantry of the Duchy of Lancaster under the Agricultural Holdings Act, and they were these—They could under it have claimed compensation for improvements of the 2nd and 3rd class—for boning, chalking, clay-burning, claying, liming, and marling, and for unexhausted manure. More important still, they could have claimed compensation under Section 53 for engines, machinery, and fixtures erected at their expense in accordance with the provisions of the section; and still more important, in the case of a yearly tenant, they could, under Section 51, have claimed twelve months' notice instead of six, in case of any disagreement with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, his Successors, or their subordinates. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman attempts to argue that practically the tenants will suffer little hardship from their exclusion from the operation of the Agricultural Holdings Act, because they are very seldom disturbed, and holdings often descend for generations together from father to son. That is very possible, but it has nothing to do with the question, and is no justification whatever for the action of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. On the contrary, it simply shows for what a very small gain to the funds of the Duchy he has gone out of his way to defeat the intentions of Parliament. Compensation are not paid under the Act, except on the termination of tenancies; and, if cases of change are rare, cases of compensation would be few. But what I maintain is, that whether such cases of termination of tenancy are numerous or few, Parliament intended—with the concurrence, we all thought, of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—that on their occurrence the out-going tenant should be entitled, under certain conditions, to compensation for certain improvements, and this intention the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has proceeded in the most wanton manner to frustrate. I say, in the most wanton manner, because, according to his own statement, the changes on tenancy on the Duchy estates are very few, and the inducement for the course he has taken, consequently, wholly inadequate. And now let us see with what intention Parliament passed the Agricultural Holdings Act. It did so for the express purpose of securing for the tenant an equitable compensation for any real improvements he might effect on his holding, and so encouraging high-class farming and increasing the food-producing capacity of the country. The yearly tenants on the estate of the Duchy of Lancaster may know that under former Administrations they have remained undisturbed in their holdings, but when they see the present Chancellor passing an Act one Session, and repudiating it the next, how can they help regarding him as the embodiment of fickleness and caprice, and with what confidence can they be expected to invest capital in improving their farms. From statements which I have seen in the agricultural papers, and which have reached me since I put my Notice upon the Paper, the tenants of at least some of the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster are by no means satisfied with their treatment, and would decidedly benefit if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would allow them to undertake permanent improvements, as well as improvements of Classes II. and III. of the Act of last year, under the security which that Act affords. But, Sir, I have not brought forward this matter in the interests of the tenantry of the Duchy of Lancaster. My concern is for the effect which the action of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman will produce on the country at large. I have no hesitation in saying that it will have a most disastrous and a most demoralizing effect. When the landlords of England hear of a Gentleman so nearly responsible for the Agricultural Holdings Act—a Chancellor and the head of an important Court—at the cost at once of his own consistency and of the reputation of the Ministry of which he is a Member, declaring that the adoption of the Act would be so prejudicial to the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster, that steps must at once be taken to exclude them from the operation of its provisions, what must they think of its probable effect upon their own interests? Will they not naturally ask themselves whether there must not be something very bad indeed in the Act, when even the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster makes such haste to escape from it? Now, Sir, various Members of the Ministry on different occasions, and notably the Prime Minister at the last Ministerial banquet at the Mansion House, have spoken of the Act as a most important and a most beneficial one, and I entirely concur in their description of it. It may not go so far as many of us would have wished; but I have no hesitation in expressing my own opinion that it is an Act which only requires to be generally adopted to prove a very great boon indeed to the country. And I believe that under ordinary circumstances it would be generally adopted, for its provisions are calculated to benefit the landlord, and to lead to the improvement and development of his property, while giving an equitable security to the tenant. But, Sir, I can conceive of nothing more likely to produce a scare among landlords—to make them once and for all resolve to have nothing to do with the Agricultural Holdings Act—to deprive the country of a great gain, and to render nugatory all the labour which Parliament last year bestowed on this measure, than the action which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has thought fit to adopt. It is for this reason, Sir, that I have deemed it my duty to call attention to the subject and to move the Resolution I now submit to the House.

MR. MELDON, in seconding the Motion, observed that the assent of the Queen and of the Prince of Wales was obtained to the introduction of the measure. It was promoted by the Government, and it seemed extraordinary that when it became an Act the Chancellor of the Duchy should render it of no avail with regard to property of the Queen and the Prince of Wales. The conduct of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had induced a large number of persons to defeat the intention of Parliament in passing the Act.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable that the benefits intended by Parliament to accrue to any class of Her Majesty's subjects from the passing of any statute should be neutralized by the official action of a Member of the Administration responsible for the enactment of that statute,"—(Dr. Cameron,)—instead thereof.

COLONEL TAYLOR said, he thought he would be able in a very few words to show that the hon. Member for Glasgow had not made out any case to justify the House in interfering with the management of the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster. The hon. Member said that he (Colonel Taylor), as Chancellor of the Duchy had contracted certain of its tenants out of the operation of the Agricultural Holdings Act. Now, the estates of the Duchy comprised in round numbers 37,000 acres of land in different parts of the country. Of that 30,000 acres were under lease, and were altogether outside of the Agricultural Holdings Act; so that there were only about 7,000 acres liable to be affected by the Act. They might be classified thus—At Needwood there were 23 tenants and 2,143 acres; at Scalby and Pickering, 12 tenants and 1,319 acres; at Pontefract, nine tenants and 380 acres. Those 44 tenants, occupying 3,873 acres, he had ascertained were satisfied with matters as they were before the passing of the Act, and not one of them had expressed a desire for any change. There remained 15 tenants at Methwold, in Norfolk, holding 3,063 acres. This was the soft part of the estate, and he thought it would be attempted to be shown that these tenants had complained of not being brought under the operation of the Act. In fact, that estate was in a state of transition. Great improvements had been made in it, and further improvements were contemplated. Some years since a former Chancellor of the Duchy sanctioned the expenditure of £2,687 in the purchase of a steam engine, which had been working ever since, and £3,600 in drainage, and for an embankment to keep out the river Wissey. This had worked excellently, and in the late wet season that estate was the only part of the neighbourhood that was not covered by water. Besides that, within the last five years, £3,730 had been spent, and all without any charge to the tenants. The average rental of that estate was 7s. 4d. an acre, and the average outlay 2s. 6d. an acre, leaving the net rental below 5s. an acre. Notwithstanding that, a memorial was addressed to him last spring asking for a reduction of rent, which he had felt constrained to refuse. Hence to some extent the complaints which had appeared in the shape of letters in The Mark Lane Express, and which contained statements in the main inaccurate. He would not, however, enter further into that part of the question except to say that, instead of a great number, as asserted, only a single notice had been returned to him unsigned from that estate. He contended that Methwold, being in the transition state that he had described in view of the further contemplated improvements, all to be effected at the expense of the Duchy, he was justified in issuing, and almost obliged to issue, the notice which he did, so that difficulties and delay might not be raised in carrying out those improvements. It must be remembered that the Act was optional; and, although he was a Member of the Government, he was also manager of the estates of Her Majesty, and was bound to do the best he could for the interests of the Crown. Some of the most experienced members of the Duchy Council were of opinion that the notice should be issued, and he acted accordingly. With all respect to the Agricultural Holdings Act, it seemed to him that it was calculated in the main to meet cases where estates were badly managed, and where there was not a good understanding between landlord and tenant. That, he was glad to say, was not the case with the Duchy; and he was convinced that the Methwold tenantry had been in no way damnified by the action taken there. He thought it unnecessary to say anything more in justification of the course he had taken.

DR. C. CAMERON explained that he had never asserted that the tenants were damnified.

MR. CHILDERS thought it would be a curious and interesting Return—if it could be obtained—that would show the number of noble Lords and Members of Parliament who had been in favour of the Agricultural Holdings Act while it was being passed, but who had since carefully contracted themselves out of its operation. That, however, was no concern of his, nor was it his duty to defend the Government's action. But referring to one of the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Taylor) was quite accurate in saying it had been in a most unsatisfactory state, and three years ago it became necessary to make a searching inquiry into its condition. One of the most experienced land agents was employed for that purpose, and a large sum of money, between £3,000 and £4,000, had been or was in course of being expended on the estate. Pending the re-adjustment of the tenancies on that estate, he was bound to give it as his opinion that it would not be prudent on the part of the Government to bring it under the operation of the Act. All the other estates of the Duchy were under lease, and the Act would not apply to them.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY thought the farmers, especially those in Scotland, were much indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) for bringing this question forward. Last year they spent considerable time in discussing the Agricultural Holdings Act, and he (Mr. Barclay) then said that unless some of the provisions were made compulsory, it would be of no practical use. What they had heard that evening verified his prediction. They were now to have soon under discussion a Bill of a similar character for Scotland, and from the year's experience which they had now had of the English Act, they might judge whether the Scotch Bill, shortly to be introduced into the House, would be really of any value, and whether it would be of any use even to try to make a good measure of it, on the basis of the English Bill. Two questions had been raised in the debate; one was as to the management of the estates of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the other why the tenants had not had the benefit of the Agricultural Holdings Act, which he believed it was the desire of that House that they should have. That it was necessary for them to benefit by its provisions was proved by the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy, who had told them that a considerable portion of the estate was let at 7s. 4d. per acre, the charges upon it amounting to 2s. 6d. per acre. That that should be the case after the estate had been for so many years under the same holding was the strongest condemnation of its management. He understood that the portion of the estate referred to was of a very poor quality of land, in which tenants ought to place a large amount of capital, and they would, in consequence, require some certainty of tenure. At present they had neither certainty of tenure nor any guarantee of compensation of the nature contemplated by the Agricultural Holdings Act. The reason given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman for not applying the Act to these estates was that the tenants were quite satisfied, and that they had not expressed any dissatisfaction at being excluded. Well, he (Mr. Barclay) knew something about the position of tenants at will, who made complaints to their landlord. His belief was that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had very little to do with the matter. The complaints would not be made to him personally, but to some agent or land factor, who, if a tenant was, as he thought, troublesome and found fault, always found some means of getting rid of him. It was all very well to say the tenants were satisfied, and probably they might be content to go on as long as they could at a low rental, but it must be remembered that one of the strongest arguments used in support of the Agricultural Holdings Act last year was that by giving certainty of tenure, or certainty of compensation, the tenants would be induced to invest their capital and apply their energies to the cultivation of the land so as to make it worth a great deal more than it was at present. This was a matter in which the public were concerned as well as the landlord and tenant. It was said that the number of tenants at will on the Duchy estate was very small, but the result of this exclusion of them from the Agricultural Holding Act was objectionable because it set a bad example to other landlords throughout the country, especially when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman gave as his reason that it was the best thing he could do in the interests of the estate. The contention of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow was that if the Act were applied to the estate it would render the land far more valuable to the Crown, and place the tenants in a more advantageous position, whilst the public would benefit by the increased productivity which would certainly result. Until certainty of tenure and certainty of compensation were granted to the tenants, it could not be said that the estates were managed to the full advantage either of the Crown itself, the tenants, or the public.

MR. ASSHETON pointed out that the Agricultural Holdings Act, however beneficial it might prove in certain places, was not applicable everywhere. He himself had notified to his tenants his intention of contracting himself out of it, and he had not received a single word of complaint from them on the subject. In fact, if the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had not contracted himself out of the Act, he would have laid himself open to the suspicion that he was not managing his estates properly.

COLONEL BRISE said, that the Agricultural Holdings Act was a valuable piece of legislation, not only for its direct, but for its indirect effect in leading to the adoption of leases or other suitable agreements by landlords and tenants.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE believed the tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster were perfectly well satisfied with their landlord, and if asked whether they would prefer the custom of the country or the Agricultural Holdings Act, they would choose the old system. He wished to bear testimony as an independent Member to the fact that the farms under the management of the Duchy of Lancaster exhibited as great progress in agricultural improvement as those in any part of the country. The whole of the estates were under the direction of a most excellent surveyor general. The farms which were contracted out of the provisions of the Act were placed under as favourable conditions as they could.

have been under it, considering how the custom of the country already gave tenant right to farmers leaving their farms, and in those portions of the Duchy which were under long leases, he believed that as those leases fell in the same liberal and enlightened policy would be pursued. He believed that the lands thus held under the Crown might fairly compare with any in the country as to cultivation and produce, and that change of tenants was most rare.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he did not mean to add anything to the vindication of the conduct of the Chancellor of the Duchy, which was already complete; he only rose to refer to a matter which his right hon. and gallant Friend had omitted to notice, and which he had asked him (Mr. Plunket) to bring before the House. In March last a circular was issued to the tenants of the estate which had been more particularly referred to in which there was a paragraph explaining exactly what the Chancellor was doing. The paragraph was to this effect—

“The Chancellor will shortly have under consideration a plan for the re-construction of the Severals farms. The necessary engineering work for the drainage of the land has now nearly been brought to completion; it remains that by a proper expenditure of capital by the landlord, and of energy on the part of the tenants, under the guarantee of leases for terms of years, this estate should be brought into a proper state of cultivation, for the benefit alike of landlord and tenant.”

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had done well to call attention to the operation, or rather the want of operation, of the Agricultural Holdings Act in the Duchy of Lancaster. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied, and would not take the sense of the House on the Resolution, which might appear to convey censure on the management of the estates by the Chancellor. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had no knowledge of the management of the Duchy of Lancaster estates, but from what had fallen in the debate he had no reason to think that any fault was to be found with the general management of the estates, and certainly there was no fault to be found with the Chancellor for contracting his tenants out of the Agricultural Holdings Act, because he had acted perfectly properly, and had followed the example of a great many—indeed, the large majority of the landlords of this country, some of them the best landlords in England. Having said that, he thought the decision of the Chancellor a rather curious commentary on the Agricultural Holdings Act as passed by the Government. He ventured in some observations which he made on the second reading of the Bill to express an opinion that the provisions of the Bill would not be found generally acceptable either by the landlord or the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister—whose unavoidable absence he (the Marquess of Hartington) regretted—contested that assertion, and quoted him, not very accurately, as saying that “there was not the least doubt that every landlord would contract himself out of it.” What he had said was, “that he had reason to suppose that a great number of the landlords would take that course.” The Prime Minister went on to say—

“The noble Lord must have an extensive acquaintance with landlords to authorize him in giving so general and sweeping an account to the House. My experience is of a contrary description; but if the noble Lord is correct in the latter part of his speech, that one of the great features of the Bill is that it changes the presumption of the law, and changes it in favour of the tenant, it is not very probable that the landlords would find their tenants so ready to contract themselves out of the Bill.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxv. 524.]

He thought it was shown, from the speeches made that evening, that he had been able to form a better opinion of the probable effect of the Agricultural Holdings Bill than the Prime Minister, who was responsible to the House for the measure. It had been said, by the hon. and gallant Member for East Essex (Colonel Brise), that although the Act had not been operating to any great extent, it had done a great deal of good, as it had led generally to the granting of leases or suitable agreements. That was no great claim to make for the Act. Precisely the same might be done, however bad the provisions of the Act; in fact, the worse the Act was the more it would lead to these agreements. The provisions of the Act had been found, not in one part or in one set of cases only, but all over England, almost universally, to be totally inapplicable to the cases it was intended to meet. It seemed to him a dangerous principle to pass legislation which was not to be obeyed, and then to congratulate themselves on having passed an Act from which landlords and tenants would be obliged to fly. He believed still more this Session than last that the Act was not intended to have any practical operation. He believed it was intended to meet a certain amount of agitation which had arisen in various parts of the country, and that it was intended to stop the mouths of those who were described by the right hon. Gentleman as "philosophers and economists." He did not believe that the Government thought it would have any general application, and if that was not their intention they were not disappointed.

MR. HUNT said, the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) had just made some general observations upon the policy of the Government in introducing the Agricultural Holdings Act, and he laid it down that it was not a bond fide policy—that it was not intended to benefit agriculture, but to stop the mouths of agitators. He thought, considering the pains that were taken as to the details of the measure, the noble Lord might have held a more charitable view of it. He ventured to say the Act had not been so inoperative as the noble Lord said. What was the principle of the Act? It was that where a tenant had not the security of a lease, he should, on finishing his holding, obtain compensation for unexhausted improvements. It was stated by the supporters of the Bill that on many estates it would not be required—for instance, on large estates where leases prevailed, and where proper agreements already existed, and where the principle of the measure was generally recognized, and where the tenants had security for their improvements. But it was also contended that such a measure was required in the case of estates where there were no proper agreements, and where the tenants had not the security of leases. It was on such estates that the Act was intended to be operative, and it was specially required in the case of glebe lands and rectorial farms, where the rector had not the power to give compensation. Now the noble Lord and others who preceded him stated that the Act had not been generally adopted throughout the country, and that he believed was true; but it was not so, for this reason that, as regarded the great majority of landed estates in England the principle of the Act had already been adopted, the equitable provisions of the Act already existing in the agreements which subsisted between the landlords and their tenants. In those cases it was not to be expected, when the particular character of the holding was considered, that special provision to meet the requirements of the Act would be made, and that the parties interested would not contract themselves out of its operation. In respect of other estates where no such agreements had been entered into, or where the existing agreements did not provide security for the tenant, the principle laid down by the Act had, he believed, been very generally adopted—that principle being incorporated in new and substituted agreements. He therefore ventured to think that the Act had been and was a great advantage to the tenant and to the country at large, and that the indictment which had been preferred against the Bill and its authors could not be sustained. The more the provisions of the Act became known the more widely, he believed, would they be made available, and although, in the first instance, a great many proprietors and tenants had been a little shy in coming under the special provisions of the Act, yet he could not but think that in a few years the Act would be adopted in extenso, and that many capitalists would in consequence be induced to embark their money in the cultivation of land to the great and material benefit of the country.

INDIA—THE MALAY PENINSULA— MURDER OF MR. BIRCH.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ERNEST NOEL, in rising to call attention to the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Birch, late British Resident at Perak, and to the intervention by the authorities of the Straits Settlements in the affairs of the Malay Peninsula, said, he thought that the importance of the subject warranted the House in asking the Government to inform the country and the House what their policy with regard to the Malay Peninsula was. It was not only that an official of the British Government had been cruelly murdered, because that might be a mere accident, and he thought he should be able to show that that was not a preconceived plan. But what he thought demanded some official explanation was the policy the Government were pursuing with regard to the Malay Peninsula. He would commence by premising that when the Malay Peninsula was under the control of the East India Company, and subsequently of the India Office, the action of both those authorities was guided by the principle of non-intervention in the Malay States. Owing, however, to the growth of our commerce and other causes, Lord Kimberley was subsequently induced to invite our Governor at Singapore—the Governor of the Straits Settlements—to inform him whether it would be possible to station a Resident at the different Malay ports; and Sir Andrew Clarke, following up that invitation, decided that it would be the best policy to adopt considering the state of anarchy which prevailed in the Peninsula. At that time there were two disturbing elements at work producing that anarchy and confusion. In one of the provinces, there being rich tin mines, a large number of Chinese, as many as 40,000, were working. Their migrations were governed by secret societies, and it happened that a great subject of contention had arisen, which divided them into two equal parties, between whom constant quarrels occurred, which had developed themselves into something like war. To such an extent did these quarrels spread that, on one occasion, no less than 3,000 Chinese were killed, and it was brought to the notice of the Governor that if these riots were to continue much longer, and if the Malays were allowed to remain in the state of anarchy in which they were, at least one-half of those quarrels would have to be fought out on British soil. That anarchy, he might add, was increased by the disputes as to who should be Sultan. The Sultan of the Malays had died just before, and the next heir, the Rajah Abdullah, long refused to attend to the Royal obsequies, and, the presence of the new Sultan being indispensable, the chiefs elected another in his stead—the Rajah Ismail. But this did not receive the acquiescence of Abdullah, who, being naturally incensed, publicly announced his intention to fight for his rights, so that the quarrel became something like those between the Highland Chiefs in times gone by, there being in the Province of Perak only about 25,000 Malays, with several Rajahs at their head. That being the state of affairs, Sir Andrew Clarke called the Chiefs together with the view of putting an end, as far as possible, to the anarchy which existed. The Sultan Ismail would not attend the conference, but a large number of other Chiefs were present, and a Treaty or engagement was entered into, at Pangore, by which Ismail was dethroned and Abdullah chosen in his place; and also, with the consent of the greater number of Chiefs, it was agreed that Residents should be appointed. By the 6th section of this Treaty it was provided that the Sultan should receive and provide a suitable residence for a British officer, who was to be called a Resident; who should be duly accredited to the Court of the Sultan, and—

By its 7th section the Treaty further provided that the collection, control, and general regulation of the revenues and the general administration of the country was to be regulated under the advice of the Residents. This engagement was sent home to England, passed under the eye of the Colonial Minister, and was approved by him generally in a despatch, upon which a Proclamation was issued in the name of “Victoria, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen and Empress of India.” Singularly enough, this much debated title was used in a public Proclamation in the Malay Peninsula in 1874! This document stated that Her Majesty would look for “the exact fulfilment of all the pledges now voluntarily given,” and that she “would hold responsible those who broke engagements thus solemnly agreed upon,” which, of course, if it meant anything, meant that if necessary, force would be used in carrying out the terms of the Treaty, and it was under those circumstances that Mr. Birch proceeded to Perak, and he was altogether unable to understand how it could have been supposed by any person that his position was to be merely that of adviser. Very soon, however, Mr. Birch did undertake the duties of a Ruler, and assumed those functions. It was found that Sultan Abdullah was a man of an indolent character and profligate habits, who spent his time in opium-smoking, and was not to be trusted; and the Resident, after giving him the best advice he could, took the real rule of the country into his own hands. The inhabitants of the country, as he had said, were divided in their allegiance. A large section of the people stood by Sultan Abdullah, but a large number supported the pretensions of Ismail, and thus a considerable division had occurred. This state of anarchy continued, and some of the principal Chiefs applied to the Governor, Sir William Jervois, to take some step in advance, upon which he appointed two Commissioners to govern the country in the Queen's name—so that they were no longer Residents to advise, but Commissioners to govern. With regard to the actual circumstances attending the murder of Mr. Birch, it was a mistake to suppose that it arose from the Proclamation issued from the Colonial Office after the execution of the Treaty to which he had referred. At the time when the Proclamation relating to the appointment of the Commissioner arrived, a feeling of great irritation existed among the population, and it was heightened by the religious excitement attendant on a Mahomedan festival held at that season of the year. In pursuance of Mr. Birch's orders, his Malay servant proceeded to post up outside the Residency the Proclamation, which a native, on being told that it was the form in which the British Government took possession of the country, immediately tore down. A scuffle ensuing, Mr. Birch's servant stabbed his opponent to the heart, whereupon a cry was raised and an attack was made upon Mr. Birch, who was at once killed in his bath. He was satisfied from a careful perusal of the documents that had been laid before Parliament that the crime had been committed in the heat of the moment without the slightest premeditation. In his estimation the real question was how far the Colonial Office was justified in allowing a British officer to occupy a responsible position in the Peninsula without giving to him the adequate material support necessary for the carrying out of his duties. Owing to the position in which Mr. Birch had been left, he had been brought into collision with many of the petty Chiefs, and at the same time he had not been granted the means of carrying out the policy which he had been urged to initiate. Either he ought to have been a simple adviser, or he ought to have been surrounded with such a force as would have rendered an attack on the Representative of the Sovereign of England impossible. The Papers showed distinctly that Her Majesty's Government ought to have known that it was impossible that Residents could have held their position properly without some such help, and the Governor would have been justified in asking for such a force. As to the subsequent events, he feared that in the course which we had taken to punish the murder of Mr. Birch we had been actuated too much by a feeling of revenge, or at least that the chastisement inflicted was more severe than it ought to have been. He denied that the principle of Residents had proved successful, and he wished now to ask Her Majesty's Government what policy they intended to pursue in the future with regard to these semi-civilized States? They ought clearly to state that policy in the interests of all concerned, whether Malays, Chinese, or Englishmen. In his opinion, there were only four courses that could be adopted. The first was absolute non-intervention, which he did not think could now be adopted. The second was to have a Resident whose functions should be strictly limited to giving advice. Experience had proved that that was not likely to be most conducive to the honour of this country. The third alternative was to have Residents who would be backed up by the Imperial power, and he should be glad if such a policy could be found possible. The fourth was that of annexation, which he believed an unfortunate solution of the difficulty. But, under the circumstances, opposed as he was to that policy, he was afraid that we had drifted into a position in which it had become an absolute necessity in order to protect our commercial interests, and to develop one of the most beautiful and richest countries in the world. As far as the Chiefs were concerned, they were willing to receive pensions at our hands, and as regarded the Malay people, he thought there were few who knew anything of them who would not say that they would be far happier under British rule than they were under that of their own Sultans. In the present state of things, therefore, it seemed to him that we had nothing but a bold policy to pursue—namely, that of annexation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, from experience gained on the spot, he agreed generally with the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Noel); but he did not go quite so far in believing that annexation was the only possible solution of this matter, although he confessed a great deal could be said in its favour. A solution short of annexation might possibly be found in the re-transfer of our interest in the Malayan Peninsula to the India Office from the Colonial Office. In his opinion, that Department was much better qualified to deal with the difficulties which had arisen than the Colonial Office, or any administration in the country. He had to complain that the official Papers on the subject which had been printed for the use of Members of the House had been so long delayed in their distribution, and that they were in such a jumbled and confused state. They did not contain the conclusion of the Correspondence, nor did they state the views of the Government on a most important point—namely, the policy which was to be pursued in future. So far as he had been able to master them, it seemed that Lord Carnarvon had very strongly censured Sir William Jervois. Lord Carnarvon, in fact, seemed to lay on Sir William Jervois the responsibility for the death of Mr. Birch. He (Sir Charles Dilke) could hardly think that such censure was merited, but he did not wish to go too far in defending Sir William Jervois from the censure of the Government, because no doubt there was some indiscretion in the conduct of that officer in that he had been guilty of publicly advocating a policy of annexation without the authority or support of Her Majesty's Government. We were involved in the Malay Peninsula in many of the difficulties we had experienced on the Gold Coast, where, in the protected States, we gave something like countenance to slavery. From Captain Speedy's Report and a communication forwarded to the Colonial Office by Lord Stanley of Alderley, we could see that there was a large amount of slavery in the Malay territories. Captain Speedy said three-fourths of the population were what he called "debt slaves," but slaves they were in every sense of the word. The course which we had pursued with reference to the coinage and other matters had produced very great discontent among the population, and had no doubt a good deal to do with the circumstances which led to the death of Mr. Birch. All must regret the loss of so able a public servant and a gentleman of such high personal character as he was allowed to be, but nevertheless Mr. Birch was not the right man for the post, and it could not be doubted that his own conduct had contributed in a great measure to that unfortunate event, for he did undoubtedly involve himself in personal action towards the Malays, which led not only his Malayan, but his white friends to warn him.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the Government had treated the House shabbily in staving off discussion on this question until it had become stale, on the plea that they should wait for Papers, and then that morning throwing at the head of hon. Members three Blue Books, in which everything was to be found except what hon. Members wanted to know. The consequence was that the debate was being carried on before empty Benches. He was inclined to fear that the Government had permitted this matter to drift too much. The one point upon which the House desired information was as to the policy which the Government meant to pursue in regard to the Malay Peninsula, but none had been vouchsafed. The simple question was whether, in one form or another, this country should assume the control of the Peninsula. The Malays were not pirates in the sense of committing piracies outside their own territory, but the state of anarchy in the country was so great that this country would be fully justified in interfering if it were expedient that they should do so. The great defect of that country was the want of population. There were pros and cons upon that question of expediency. An hon. Member had said that if the Government adopted a policy of annexation, it could be done without much expense. From that opinion of his hon. Friend he differed. Some persons compared the Malay Peninsula with Java and Ceylon; but there was this great difference—that by far the greater part of the Malayan Peninsula was an absolutely unknown jungle, and in addition to controlling first the Malays and afterwards the Chinese, it would be necessary to introduce a large population to render the country productive, a thing which could not be done without expense. He could therefore quite understand that the Government would hesitate before they decided upon a policy of annexation, and he would express a hope that that would not happen which had happened in other cases, when there was a long bill to pay, handing it over to India for the ryots to pay, instead of paying it ourselves. The result of the transfer about nine years ago from the India Office to the Colonial Office had not been good, and he found fault with that office for not exercising a sufficient control over the policy of the Governors of Crown colonies. When the Settlements were subject to the Government of India, the local authorities were not allowed to have their own way too much; but now these people had been suffered to follow out their own ideas by the Colonial Office. To allow a small knot of local mercantile men, without responsibility, to direct our proceedings and to drag in the British Army and Treasury to back them up, should not be permitted. The Residents in the Straits Settlements were quite right in calling this the Clarke policy. Sir Andrew Clarke established a system of Residents, which amounted to annexation in the Dutch form, as practised in Java, rather than the English form. He found two Chiefs fighting against each other, and said to one of them—"I will back you up and make you Sultan, if you will accept a Resident." That policy might be in some cases, to a certain extent, successful; but it was somewhat dangerous that the Governor should throw himself into the hands of a small knot of people around him, and allow them to guide him in the affairs of the whole Peninsula. It was clear from his addresses to the Legislative Council that Sir Andrew Clarke appealed to the cupidity of the British merchants who were settled there. He called upon the non-official members of the Council, in rather tall talk, to help him in founding a great colony upon the ruins of ancient Empires; but surely people who wished to do so should do so with their own means and money. The policy of Sir Andrew Clarke, practically amounting, as it did, to annexation, ought not to be adopted without the deliberate assent of the Colonial Office; but he feared that the Government at home had, instead, allowed themselves to drift into that policy. A considerable amount of patronage was afforded to the Europeans in the Straits Settlements by Sir Andrew Clarke's policy of annexation, and he strongly objected to some of the appointments of Residents, taken from this limited community. One of the persons so appointed was Mr. Davidson, who had had money dealings with the Native Prince with whom he had been made Resident. It was true that Mr. Davidson had made a formal transfer of the claim; but it was clearly a nominal transfer only; he was still, in fact, the Prince's creditor, and as such was appointed to administer his revenue. The first use which Mr. Davidson made of his position was to prosecute a grand mining company, in which he was the principal partner. Such an appointment was a most improper one, and ought never to have been made. Another appointment was that of Captain Speedy, who might be a fine fellow, but was a sort of free lance such as used to go about in the Middle Ages, placing himself at the disposal of different Princes. Some time ago he had come into contact with this Captain Speedy, who was then enlisting soldiers in the Punjab and was about to proceed with them in a steamer from Calcutta to the Straits. The Indian Government stopped him on that occasion. Captain Speedy had got permission from some Malay Chief to recruit soldiers, and a little later on he did get some together for this service. Next he came to Sir William Jervois, who, he thought, had been rather hardly treated in this matter. Sir Andrew Clarke having practically assumed the administration of these territories, Sir William Jervois went a step further, but it happened that disaster ensued, and instead of meeting with approval he met with a good deal of censure. He sincerely hoped Her Majesty's Government would not let the question of policy be determined by the Governors of Colonies whose speeches he quoted. They were in the habit of delivering very long speeches on the subject. He trusted the Government would tell the House what they proposed to do in regard to the cost already incurred in consequence of the events in the Malayan Peninsula. It was stated that something like £100,000 had been spent in transporting troops backwards and forwards, and he should like to know by whom this expense was to be borne? If not by the Colony then he objected to the large expense of carrying backwards and forwards troops to and from Calcutta. Practically it placed the Army and Navy of Britain at the beck of the Government of a small Settlement. If that was to continue, he wanted to know whether the cost was to be paid out of the revenues of the Settlement or by the Colonial Office, or, in other words, by the British taxpayers? He was strongly of opinion that it ought not to be imposed on the Indian Government.

MR. LAING agreed that great injustice would be perpetrated if any portion of the expense of this Malayan enterprize were thrown on the Indian Exchequer. At the same time annexation to India might have such a value in many respects, as to make it desirable to keep the question open. It might be necessary to carry out a policy of annexation, and in that case it would be well for the English to have the power of transferring what would then be an English colony to the Government of India. At the time when the finances of India were in such distress after the Mutiny, among the measures of retrenchment that were considered was one as to the expense of maintaining the Singapore Settlement. It was then established that India was paying for the support of a dependency with which she had no special connection. If any idea were entertained of handing over to India the whole of the Malay Peninsula, a proceeding which, in his opinion, on a review of the whole of the circumstances, it was expedient to take, an allowance ought to be made to India in respect of the cost of the transfer. If that were not done, at any rate security should be taken that none of the expenses of that transfer should fall on that country. There was only one way in which the Peninsula could be rendered like what the Governors represented—namely, by Chinese immigration. If that were encouraged, it would be of great advantage both to the English and to the Indian Governments. If things were left in their present state we must drift gradually into a policy of annexation.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked that annexation had been practically going on ever since the time when he first served in the Straits of Malacca—indeed ever since the free trade port of Singapore was established in 1819 under the wise selection of Sir Stamford Raffles and Mr. Crawford—in so far that the influence of our power had been gradually year by year extending and our authority recognized and accepted by the various petty Rajahs and Chiefs ruling in the numerous territories into which Malay Land was divided. It was impossible for the British power to continue to hold these free trade settlements in the Straits of Malacca without that supremacy which was the natural result of a great nation acting with fairness and honesty, as our Government had done, over a vast area occupied by Chinese and Malays anxious to live in peace, fully alive to the comparative excellence of our rule, and, above all, appreciating the benefits which our free trade policy gave them. Then, as regarded wars and disturbances in that vast area, they had been repeatedly threatened from the time we bought Penang in the last century, and especially since we had occupied Singapore and Malacca; and they were unavoidable so long as we enforced order, put down piracies, and prevented aggressions against our rule or our people. In his youth he was several times under orders to take the field against the Malays, but he could bear testimony to the anxious desire of the British authorities to abstain from encroaching on the nominally independent rights of the petty Chiefs who unfortunately misgoverned that tract which was beyond our boundaries. There was, however, a great temptation to annex by force, instead of waiting for the natural and unavoidable amalgamation which year by year, as our Settlements prospered, must be effected by the desire of the people in the neighbouring States to fall under the control of a good and peaceable Government. There was, indeed, a great temptation to expedite that union, for the land was full of natural resources, and all who had

Sir George Campbell

Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) and others had contended that the present Secretary of State ought to have known that affairs were drifting into an unsatisfactory or dangerous position; but he (Mr. Lowther) was certain that when hon. Members had more thoroughly perused these Papers and glanced at the despatch of Lord Carnarvon of May 20, they would arrive at the conclusion that until the news was received of the deplorable events which had occurred in that country the Colonial Secretary was not at all aware that there had been any departure from the terms of the Treaty which he had himself sanctioned. But the policy which had been inaugurated by Sir William Jervois and carried into effect by Mr. Birch was a serious departure from the existing state of affairs. He (Mr. Lowther) entertained a very strong opinion that any unnecessary interference by the Home Government with the ordinary routine of the Government of distant Settlements was undesirable, and likely in most cases to be mischievous. Such an interference was calculated to diminish the responsibility of the local Government, and was not likely to promote the interests of the public service. He might add to this far more important question, the energetic action on the spur of the moment necessitated by any sudden outbreak, or matters which could not be contemplated by the Home Government—in all these cases he considered that the action of the Home Government would be most mischievous if it tended in any way to diminish the responsibility of the local administrative Government or any possible interference with its action. But when the question was not one of minor details or sudden emergency necessitating immediate action, and when the position of affairs was an important change of policy extending to an indefinite future, he considered that the conditions he had indicated in no shape or form applied. Under such circumstances as these it was the duty of a Governor to communicate with the Secretary of State before adopting so serious an innovation upon the state of affairs. Sir William Jervois, however, apparently satisfied himself that the status quo should be changed, and he did not communicate with the Home Government before he adopted the idea which was in his own mind. That was a course of proceeding much to be deplored, for in the selection of the new policy conferring the virtual direction of Governments that were nominally independent upon the Residents, a step was taken that was a very serious innovation, and one which had not led to very satisfactory results. Reference had been made to that unfortunate occurrence—the death of Mr. Birch, and with regard to the details of that untoward event, it had been mentioned in the course of the debate that the Secretary of State had called the attention of Sir William Jervois to the fact that the outbreak could not be dissociated from the introduction of the new policy, and this expression of opinion was disapproved by one hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Lowther), however, contended that his noble Friend would not have fulfilled his duty if he had failed to point out that this unfortunate outbreak had followed close upon the introduction of the new policy, but he did not for a moment place upon Sir William Jervois the responsibility for the actual death of Mr. Birch. His noble Friend did not desire to censure, he only stated his views of the conduct of Sir William Jervois, and he concluded by expressing confidence that there would be no difficulty in his adapting himself to the policy that was placed before him. The Colonial Office was not responsible for the transactions that had taken place; in fact, it was a departure from the policy of the Colonial Office that led to these deplorable events. The outbreak was followed up by more serious disturbances, which showed that the condition of the Native population was such as gave reason for considerable alarm. A good many suggestions had been made as to the future policy which should be followed out with regard to these Settlements. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Noel) spoke of the chastisement—that was his expression—inflicted upon the disturbers of the peace, and spoke of it as being excessive. Now, he (Mr. Lowther) thought it would hardly be contended that there had been any great excesses. Of course when war came among any people events unfortunately occurred which those who calmly viewed the circumstances at a distance were unable to do otherwise than regret. But so far as he had been able to make himself master of

had recommended, a large and steady immigration of Chinese, for nothing could be wiser than to encourage the settlement in the Peninsula of that industrious people, who could very easily be brought there. No country was better adapted for being opened out to commerce than the Malay country, but to promote that end it was necessary to prevent the Malay Chiefs, who in general were a cock-fighting and opium-eating set of men, from carrying on their devastating wars and their piratical expeditions.

MR. J. LOWTHER confessed that he could sympathize with the feeling of hon. Members who complained that the voluminous Papers relating to that subject had been delivered to them only that morning. But it could hardly be otherwise, seeing that he had occasion some weeks ago to state that the production of all those Papers was of necessity delayed until the Colonial Office had received from Sir William Jervois an important despatch, which was to contain an explanation of the conduct he had pursued as to the deplorable events in the Straits Settlements. Sir William Jervois had wished, not very unreasonably, that not only should his despatch when received be included among the Papers laid before Parliament, but that the publication of all the other Papers should be delayed until his defence could appear along with them. The Secretary of State could not fairly have returned any other answer than the one he gave—namely, that the publication of further Papers on the subject should be delayed until Sir William Jervois's defence could be included among them. Then, of course, the Secretary of State would not have been justified in allowing Sir William Jervois's despatch to appear without his own reply, and thus the delay in the publication of the Papers was brought down to a very recent period. He regretted that hon. Members had had so short a time in which to master the particulars contained in these voluminous Papers; but they were pressed on at the last moment, so that they might be in the hands of hon. Members when this question was brought forward. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Noel) had recited very plainly the facts of the case, and as he had pointed out, there was considerable property in mines and an extensive commerce in which a considerable amount of British capital was employed in the Straits Settlements and neighbouring territories, and this country was therefore concerned in the maintenance of order and good government there. That caused the British Government to have a practical interest in the administration of the surrounding States. Of course, the question remained to what extent that interest should be carried, and what shape it should assume. It had been already said that our relations with these States had been brought into unfortunate prominence by some riots that had occurred in connection with some emigrant Chinese, who, though a most useful and industrious race, were apt to cause local dissatisfaction where they settled. The disturbance began among the Chinese themselves; but the Malays sided with one or other of the combatants, and necessitated the intervention of some stronger power. In that state of things Sir Andrew Clarke found himself called upon to deal with the disputed succession to the Sultanhip. The choice of the Chiefs fell upon Ismail, but Sir Andrew Clarke thought the interests of this country could be better served by a different choice, and at his instance Abdullah was appointed. Of that personage all he (Mr. Lowther) would say was, that if he was the best that could be chosen, his selection did not reflect great credit on his rivals, and he would at once admit that he did not seem particularly fitted for government. His addiction to the practice of opium-eating now calculated to raise doubts as to his being likely to prove a very energetic ruler. Then followed the Treaty of Panghore—which might be considered the starting point of our difficulties—in which it was clearly laid down that the Residents at the various Courts were to act as advisers. From the fact that the advice of the Residents was to be asked and acted upon, the hon. Member who introduced the discussion concluded that the British Government intended actively to intervene in the affairs of the States in question; but a careful perusal of the language of the Treaty, together with the despatches relating to it, would show that no such understanding existed. The subsequent Proclamation, to which reference had been made, however, upon the face of it involved a serious departure from the terms of the Treaty. The hon.

Mr. J. Lowther

Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) and others had contended that the present Secretary of State ought to have known that affairs were drifting into an unsatisfactory or dangerous position; but he (Mr. Lowther) was certain that when hon. Now, he (Mr. Lowther) thought it would hardly be contended that there had been any great excesses. Of course when war came among any people events unfortunately occurred which those who calmly viewed the circumstances at a distance were unable to do otherwise than regret. But so far as he had been able to make himself master of what really occurred, he could not say that any undue chastisement was inflicted upon those parties who not only murdered a British officer, but inflicted outrages upon other people besides. It was necessary to follow up those fugitive Chiefs into the recesses of the country, a feat which required great gallantry, and in carrying it out as little excess as possible, under the circumstances of the case had been committed, and he thought that few wars, great or small, had been carried on more humanely. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy introduced an important question—who was to pay the bill for the expenses of the war? He was afraid it would fall on the unfortunate British taxpayer. The population, or the want of population, had been referred to, and no doubt there was an absence of an adequate population; and it was said, and he perfectly agreed with it, that this evil could be removed by the introduction of Chinese and East Indians. No doubt the present population was unruly; the Malays had never been remarkable as a very peaceful race; anarchy was their characteristic condition and piracy their favourite pursuit, and the practice of levying blackmail upon unfortunate persons who entered a territory which was more or less governed by these Chieftains, as far as it could be said to be governed by anybody at all, would no doubt have to be guarded against. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said he thought the Governor deferred too much to his Council, which the hon. Member said was composed mainly of merchants who were connected with the trade of the district. The Council consisted of 16 persons; 11 were official members, who could not be in a position to exercise much pressure on the Governor, and five were non-official members, who were nominated by the Governor himself. He should have thought that those who advocated the representation of the people in its most extensive form would hardly have made the complaint which had been made. The Governor of a colony would be placed in a most unenviable position if he could not recur to the advice of any person. A Council composed to some extent of merchants, but mainly of officials who were conversant with the locality, was a Council of which most Governors would very much regret to be deprived. He was not prepared to say how far the Governor might have been misinformed as to their capabilities; but so far as he understood the matter, he believed they had discharged their duties most efficiently. Several suggestions had been made as to the new policy which ought to be pursued. The hon. Member for Dumfries first of all said there was the policy of non-intervention; but the hon. Member, and he (Mr. J. Lowther), thought the House generally were of opinion that that policy, however desirable, was impossible. The British capital invested in these territories, and the unfortunate tendency of the population to marauding and piratical habits, rendered such a policy impossible. The second was the policy of Sir Andrew Clarke—Residents pure and simple, without further duties being entrusted to them. The third was Residents backed by bayonets, with a large military force at their disposal. Finally, the hon. Member indicated the policy of direct annexation. The hon. Member said he was originally opposed to any such policy, but that, after a fuller consideration of the case, he had reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that that was a sound policy. Another course had been suggested by the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke)—the re-transfer of the Government of the Straits from the Colonial to the India Office. Now, after the events which had recently occurred, it could not be supposed that the Colonial Office would be displeased at any suggestion which might relieve them from a difficult duty. But he could not for a moment encourage the House with the idea that that would be the alternative that would be selected by Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government, on account of the events which had recently occurred, would devote their anxious consideration to the question of the future government of these territories. His noble Friend had given his most serious attention to the subject. He (Mr. J. Lowther) was not able to make an announcement to the House of any new policy that was to be adopted. He could only assure them that this most important subject would be fully considered, and that at the earliest possible moment an announcement would be made to Parliament of the course which Her Majesty's Government were prepared to adopt.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES
—CLASS III., VOTE 3.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE OFFICIAL REFEREES.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER in proposing a Vote of £144,025, for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, said: I shall, perhaps, consult the convenience of the Committee if I say a few words on this Vote. When it was last before the Committee an objection was taken to the appointment of one of the Official Referees, and as that objection was taken at the moment when we had very little information on the subject, I thought it would be respectful to the Committee that the Vote should be withdrawn in order that we might communicate with the Lord Chancellor on the appointment. The Lord Chancellor thought the proper course would be to write me a letter which he has requested me to read to the Committee. I ought to explain that the letter was some few days in reaching me because the Lord Chancellor thought it right to show it to the three Chiefs of the Common Law Division, whose names were referred to in it, in order that they might point out any inaccuracy. The Lord Chancellor's letter is as follows:—

"March 14, 1876.

"My Dear Chancellor of the Exchequer,—As some question has been raised as to the Official Referees under the Judicature Act, I think it better to inform you of the circumstances connected with their appointment.

"According to the statute, the number, qualifications, and tenure of offices of the Referees is to be determined by the Presidents of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice with the sanction of the Treasury. The appointments of Referees are to be made by the Lord Chancellor.

"Acting under the Statute, the Presidents of Divisions, with the assent of the Treasury, determined that there should be four Referees; that they should be Barristers or Solicitors of ten years' standing; and that they should hold their offices during good behaviour, subject to removal by the Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the other Presidents of Divisions, or any two of them, for inability or misbehaviour.

"The first of the four Referees appointed by me was Mr. Anderson, Q.C., a gentleman of long standing, high reputation, and considerable practice at the Bar. I found that he had, before I came into office, accepted the post of examiner of the Court of Chancery, on an expectation held out to him that he would be appointed an Official Referee. By this arrangement I was in no way bound, but I considered it so advantageous to the public service that I had no hesitation in confirming it.

"With regard to the other three Referees, I requested the Chiefs of the three Common Law Divisions (inasmuch as I was myself less acquainted than they must be with the qualifications of gentlemen practising at the Common Law Bar) to favour me each with the names of three gentlemen whom they would consider well qualified to fill, and who would be likely to accept, these offices. I have their permission to state what was the result. I did not receive from the Lord Chief Justice of England any recommendation. Lord Coleridge and the Lord Chief Baron were so good as to furnish me each with three names. I selected the first two names upon Lord Coleridge's list. One of them was Mr. Dowdeswell, Q.C., a gentleman whom I did not know personally, but who had been so highly recommended to me on former occasions that about a year since I offered him a County Court Judgeship, which he then refused. The other was Mr. Roupell, who was well known to me at the Bar, and whom I believe to be in every way fit for the office. The fourth Referee whom I appointed, Mr. Verey, stood first on the list of the Lord Chief Baron. He was not known to me personally, but I had in addition to the strong opinion of the Lord Chief Baron very marked concurrent testimony in his favour, and I believe him to be perfectly well qualified for the office.

"I should have been glad if the official Referees could have entered upon their new duties without a public discussion as to their qualifications, which cannot, I fear, have otherwise than a prejudicial effect.

"I have not referred to the details which I have given with any intention of placing the responsibility for the appointments elsewhere than on myself. The responsibility is mine alone, and I am perfectly satisfied that all the gentlemen appointed are fully qualified to discharge the duties of their offices.

"I am, yours faithfully, CARINA.

"The Right Hon. Sir Stafford H.

"Northcote, Bart., M.P."

The communication I have read shows two things—first, that the gentleman to whose appointment objection was taken was appointed by the Lord Chancellor, not from personal favour, because he had no personal knowledge of him, but upon his being recommended to him by the Lord Chief Baron. The other point was that, although the recommendation was made by the Chief of one of the Common Law Courts, the appointment was made by the Lord Chancellor upon his own responsibility. The Lord Chancellor took occasion to make inquiries as to the fitness of this gentleman for the office, and when he was satisfied as to his fitness he made the appointment on his own entire responsibility. The Lord Chancellor feels strongly on this matter as one affecting his personal character. It was his duty to find persons who were both qualified and who were willing to accept the appointment; and, in addition to the recommendation of the Lord Chief Baron, he thought it right to seek out other testimony which satisfied him as to the fitness of Mr. Verey. These are the circumstances, and I do not know that I can add anything more to the matter except to repeat that this appointment was not lightly made, and that it was made with a due sense of responsibility by the distinguished person to whom I have referred. I trust the Committee will now agree to the Vote, and will therefore move it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £144,025, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature, as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. WADDY, in moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,700, said, the Government had no right to be unprepared when the Vote was last before the Committee, and the inquiries which had been made since ought to have been made, and the information gained in answer given on that occasion. On the 15th of February he put a Question to the Home Secretary as to the appointment of Mr. Verey. It was answered in very much the same spirit as the Lord Chancellor's letter, and, instead of giving the House the information he wanted as to Mr. Verey, the other Official Referees were classed together, as if the Question had been asked as to them. He declined to accept that answer, and he gave Notice on the 15th of February that, on the earliest occasion, he should move a Resolution as to this particular appointment. On the 19th of February he wrote to Mr. Verey giving him clear and distinct warning of the complaint which he intended to make respecting his appointment, and intimating that he would move a Resolution on the subject. On the 22nd of February

he received from Mr. Verey a simple acknowledgment of the receipt of the letter. On the 10th of March the Question came before the House, so that the Government was fully warned as to the intended line of opposition to the appointment. He could not help saying that when the Vote came on a little more haste was made in the matter than was necessary. He objected to the Vote when it was brought on, and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General supported it, without answering his (Mr. Waddy's) objections; and the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument was that the party might prove a very good man. That was a rather weak kind of argument. Had the House gone to a vote on the question, he believed that he and those with whom he was acting would have rejected the Vote, for in numbers, at the time, they had a decided majority. There was no disposition to act in any hostile spirit; he (Mr. Waddy) had objected to the appointment solely on public grounds, and because it was considered to be a scandal in the Profession; and he was not misrepresenting the facts when he said he did not think there was a single Member in the House at that time who did not understand that when at the request of the Government he withdrew his Motion that they might withdraw the Vote it was for a purpose which had not been carried out. From that time what had happened? The appointment was distinctly challenged. It was disapproved. Yet, as he was informed, this gentleman had endeavoured to enter on the duties of this office—his right to which was being questioned in that House; and he found, by reference to The Law List, that he had not only entered himself as one of the Official Referees of the Supreme Court, but held himself out for private practice as a member of the South-East Circuit and East and West Kent Sessions. The objection he had stated to the appointment of this gentleman had not been answered, and he believed would not be answered, that evening. He did not say he was not a very amiable person and perhaps a clever young man; but what he said was this—he had been appointed to an office which required, among other things, great practical experience as well as knowledge of the law. He was called upon to exercise the office of a Judge in circumstances of great difficulty. Matters were referred to him on account of their complexity. He had to discharge the functions both of Judge and jury—having to judge both of law and fact, not only in London, but in all parts of the country wherever a local inquiry might be pending—as a private arbitrator, yet with official power. Cases were referred to him compulsorily, and those cases were to be decided not where the decisions would be open to public criticism, but in comparative privacy. Therefore, it was of the greatest possible importance—firstly, that he should have a thorough knowledge of the law; secondly, that he should have great practice in applying it; and, thirdly, it was desirable that the world should know that he had had such experience. Yet, this gentleman had not the slightest experience. He professed to be a member of the Home Circuit and the East and West Kent Sessions. Well, it so happened that the Chairmen of both Sessions were Members of that House, and neither of them rose to say that they knew anything of him. He altogether failed to collect what the Lord Chancellor called “the marked concurrent testimony in his favour.” He believed that some hon. Members of the House had been requested to say what they could on his behalf; but he must repeat the charge he had made before. He challenged the testimony of any hon. Member or of anybody else that this gentleman had ever practically been doing work to any extent in Westminster Hall. The country and the Profession wished to know why a gentleman so unknown in it had been selected for an office of the greatest difficulty and delicacy when there were plenty of other gentlemen ready to accept it; and he was informed that there were men of standing, Queen’s Counsel and others, who had applied for the position—men who had been devoting themselves to the kind of work which had to be performed. Nobody had ever suggested that the Lord Chancellor had simply conferred a personal favour, but it was a fact that the appointment was conferred by him upon the nomination of the same eminent Judge who previously, to the surprise of the Circuit, gave this gentleman a Revising Barristership. If certain letters which had been gathered with immense care were read, he should feel bound to answer the statements made in them, especially with regard to the people who had written them. In conclusion, he would say that it was a very unpleasant task to have to descant upon an appointment of the kind; but, having done so, he felt it his duty to propose the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. RODWELL said, he need not bespeak the indulgence of the Committee while he made a statement on behalf of the gentleman whose name had been so freely brought forward and who could not be present to speak for himself. He rejoiced that the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had not used quite such strong language as he did on a former occasion, nor spoken in the same spirit. The question was one of considerable importance from two points of view—first, with regard to the qualifications and character of Mr. Verey; and, secondly, with regard to the circumstances under which the appointment was made, and also with respect to the power of the House to interfere with an appointment made on the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor. By the 83rd section of the Act the appointment was absolutely in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, and he, with the assistance of one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, had to judge of the qualifications of the persons nominated. Therefore, one of the questions involved was whether the Lord Chancellor had exercised his patronage discreetly. The question which the Committee had to consider was not whether the appointment of Mr. Verey was the best that could have been made—and for his own part he frankly admitted that there were other gentlemen whose appointment might have been more acceptable to the Profession and the public. It was whether the qualifications and antecedents of Mr. Verey were such as entitled him to hold the office, the responsibility of which had not been exaggerated. The hon. and learned Gentleman had talked of Mr. Verey as a young man, so that the House might think he was a briefless barrister of 24 or 25 years of age, who had not had any practice at all. But Mr. Verey was really on the verge of 40, and during the whole of his life since he left Cambridge had been engaged in the law. He did not know what his hon. and learned Friend considered a proper age for an official appointment; but if the ages of all the four Referees were taken they would make a pretty good average, and the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams), who went the same circuit, and who of all men was the most competent judge, said that of all the four appointments he considered that of Mr. Verey the best. If the appointment were unjustifiable, there had been an abuse of patronage; but he should like to know on what evidence or statement of facts the Committee was to determine whether it was an improper appointment. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) the other night used a figure of speech when he represented Mr. Verey as a gentleman who had never held a brief, and never but once appeared on the circuit. [Sir HENRY JAMES: Before getting this appointment.] Not having gone circuit himself recently, his acquaintance with Mr. Verey had been very slight; but he had made inquiries and had become master of the facts. The result was that he had been informed by gentlemen of standing—Queen's Counsel and leaders on the circuit—that Mr. Verey was a gentleman of considerable attainments, although he had not enjoyed the smiles of the attorneys. It did not follow that a man's practice was the only test of his ability, for it often happened that men who had the reputation of being good lawyers and clever men failed to win the smiles of fortune and the patronage of solicitors; and yet they might be and often were good arbitrators, for arbitrations were not usually taken by men who had good practice. And for this very substantial reason—that men in practice had not time to undertake such duties, and they were looked upon as the perquisites of men who, being competent, had not practice. Mr. Verey was a member of Trinity College, Cambridge, and took his degree there with honours, which, though not high, were sufficient to show that he had industrious habits early in life and that he did not go to the College as an idler. Afterwards—and what was of some importance as bearing on this debate—instead of going at once into a pleader's chambers he went for three years into the office of one of the most eminent firms of solicitors in the metropolis—Messrs. Crowder and Maynard—and so had early training as to the very class of cases with which he would have in future to deal. He then went through the ordinary curriculum of a student for the bar, and assisted a gentleman who was now one of the most eminent of the County Court Judges, in preparing a well-known volume of Chitty's Reports. From the age of 18 to that of 40 he had devoted himself industriously to the study of the law. True he had not made patrons of the other branch of the Profession; but it was not suggested that if he had he was not competent to have discharged any duties that might have been entrusted to him. Having been appealed to by Mr. Verey, he could not refrain from making this statement on his behalf. He trusted he had said enough to dispose of the question of want of qualification, and enough to induce the Committee to come to the conclusion that they ought not to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Chancellor, in whose hands the appointment lay. He had been long enough in the House to know that if this question went to a division, it would be decided by a Party vote, and that would not be a proper way to deal with a subject of this sort. If there had been any impropriety in the appointment, it should be challenged elsewhere. The tenure of office was in the hands of him who gave it, and who had justified the appointment by the letter read by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under the circumstances, the Committee would probably think that his hon. and learned Friend had discharged his duty in having called attention to this matter, which might have an effect on other appointments. It was somewhat invidious, however, to single out Mr. Verey for attack, when the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs had stated that Mr. Verey's appointment was the best. He could not see why his hon. and learned Friend should not have challenged the appointment of the four, instead of limiting his attack to one.

Mr. Rodwell

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he could not sympathize with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, because if a man placed himself in a position to have his appointment challenged, he could have no good grounds of complaint if it were done. He denied that this was entirely an affair for the Lord Chancellor's discretion. The House of Commons was the place in which appointments which were public trusts should be judged. It was the function of the House of Commons to watch over the public purse, and to see that salaries were not paid to persons not qualified to discharge the duties of their position. His hon. and learned Friend had referred to this gentleman's University career. But every one knew that "Wooden Spoons" had obtained the highest position at the Bar, and so distinguished a man as Sir William Follett had gone through his University without taking honours at all. When his hon. and learned Friend talked of this gentleman having spent three years in a solicitor's office, he could not have used a more damaging argument, because then Mr. Verey must have got that very introduction for which so many able men sighed, and yet he had lived to the age of 40 and was utterly unknown on the circuit to which he belonged. He did not think that anything had been said in favour of Mr. Verey's qualifications which justified the appointment, although he was willing to admit that the Lord Chancellor had, in making it, done what he thought was right, and that he was appointing a proper person.

MR. FORSYTH confessed that if he had been in the House the other night, when this appointment was challenged and no explanation given, he would have voted with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Waddy). But now he had made himself master of facts which he did not know then, and he felt bound to say there was great misapprehension on the matter, and he thought that the appointment was justified. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had stated that Mr. Verey had made only one appearance on the Home Circuit, and that the Lord Chief Baron had dispossessed a Revising Barrister for the purpose of putting in a favourite of his own. But the facts were that the gentleman who held the office of Revising Barrister was advanced in years, a rich man, and had not attended the Courts for some time, and he had heard Baron Bramwell say that he advised the Lord Chief Baron not to appoint him again. The Lord Chief Baron did not know Mr. Verey at the time, and it was owing to the recommendation of one of the leaders of the circuit and other barristers that Mr. Verey was appointed. It would appear from what had been stated on the other side, as though the Lord Chancellor had appointed this gentleman solely upon the nomination of the Lord Chief Baron. This was not so. It was true that the Lord Chief Baron sent in a list of three names, including that of Mr. Verey; but the Lord Chancellor had additional reasons for appointing him in the strong recommendations of other persons. Mr. Verey had had some practice, though not a large practice. He was strongly recommended by those who knew him, and it was not right or fair to throw discredit upon the Lord Chancellor for making the appointment under these circumstances, or to fix upon Mr. Verey a stigma which he did not deserve.

SIR HENRY JACKSON thought the discussion more appropriate to a Bar mess than the House of Commons. He did not blame his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Waddy) for taking exception to this appointment in the first instance, and for expressing the doubts existing among the Profession respecting it. But after the explanations given that evening the matter stood on a different footing. It now stood in this position—on the one hand, the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple, who said he knew this gentleman neither by reputation nor by sight, assured the House that he was an unfit person to hold this place; and on the other, the Lord Chancellor, who was responsible to the law and the country for the appointment, had written to the Minister of State that, in his judgment, this gentleman was a most fit and proper person to hold the office. Many of the most distinguished holders of judicial office had been unable to satisfy the usual public test of fitness—the existence of a large practice—and yet had fully justified their appointments. That had been the case with one of the most distinguished Judges who now occupied the Bench; and after the discussion that evening he hoped the Committee would accept the personal assurance of the Lord Chancellor that, in his judgment, this was a proper appointment. It was most undesirable that this should drift into a Party question, or that the Committee should be forced to a division.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT quite agreed with the moderate view of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, and remarked that the real question they were asked to decide was, whether the Lord Chancellor was a fit and proper person to dispense the patronage entrusted to him. Many hon. Gentlemen who were not members of the legal Profession had often been surprised at the bestowal of the patronage of the Government, and had thought that better Attorneys General and Solicitors General might have been found than the excessively dull men taken from both Parties who had sometimes inflicted their legal attainments upon the House. While that was the case, such appointments were never openly challenged in that House, the presumption being that, as the recognized authority was responsible for the appointments, the men were the best fitted in the public interest to fill those high posts. In the same way the Committee might rest content with the explanations afforded as to this appointment. Sometimes men's qualifications were not found out till they were tried; and they might wisely leave the responsibility to rest upon the Lord Chancellor, after his statement that this gentleman possessed the requisite qualifications. He was quite sure that the present Lord Chancellor and those who might succeed him would be warned by this discussion to scan most carefully the acquirements of persons to whom they gave appointments in future. It would be most unwise to divide the House upon the question.

MR. BUTT said, he was not quite satisfied with the grounds of the opposition to the appointment. He felt very strongly that the House of Commons departed from its proper functions, and weakened its true rights and privileges, by constituting itself a Court of Review upon official appointments made by the proper authority. He had no means of knowing Mr. Verey's qualifications; but he brought to the consideration of the subject Irish impartiality, and he objected to give his vote upon a question of the kind in accordance with the opinions of any Circuit Bar or Circuit mess, or as the result of any statement here how many briefs this gentleman had held. It was impossible that the Committee could enter into discussions of that kind, and he warned them that, if they introduced the system of canvassing judicial appointments in that House, they would approach the fatal American principle of selecting Judges by the popular vote. No evidence had been given of anything discreditable in the character or conduct of the gentleman which would disqualify him for the office to which he had been appointed, and he could not therefore justify the attempt which had been made to constitute that House a Court of Appeal from the selection of the Lord Chancellor in the exercise of his patronage. He should support the Government if the Motion was pressed to a division, although he hoped it would not be proceeded with further.

MR. HOPWOOD disclaimed all Party feeling in the matter. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick seemed to recognize no right in the House of Commons to discuss such a matter as this; but he (Mr. Hopwood) contended it was the only tribunal that had the right to criticize such an appointment as the one under consideration. He could not help thinking there had been too frequent reference to the eminent character and position of the Lord Chancellor in order to influence the judgment of that House in the matter of this appointment. He felt he should be wanting in his duty if he did not protest against the judgment of any one man, however eminent, being brought forward to control their judgment and influence their reasoning. The Lord Chancellor, in his own letter, told them that before making the appointment in question he appealed to three Chief Judges to supply him with a list of eminent men. Two of them complied with the request, each supplying three names. From the list supplied by Lord Coleridge he selected two gentlemen, and took the gentleman whose name stood first on the list supplied by the Lord Chief Baron, and added that he found "marked concurrent testimony" in that gentleman's favour, but if that were so why did he not supply that concurrent testimony to Parliament? What was the meaning of the term? It amounted to this—according to the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), that "he had not a large practice." In other words, he had not yet proved his qualifications; while others eminently qualified for the office had been overlooked. He thought they were only doing their duty in challenging the appointment, and he could not help admiring the implied sarcasm of the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter Barttelot), when he expressed a hope that it would be a warning for the future. He was sorry the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had dealt with the question as if it were a mere circuit squabble. What he felt was, that they ought to be moved by great public considerations to challenge such an appointment.

MR. GORST said, he was in hopes that the debate was about to terminate; but if it was to be continued, he trusted they would confine themselves to the real question before them. The question was not whether Mr. Verey was not well qualified for his office, but whether the appointment was to be made by the Lord Chancellor; and whether he, or the House of Commons, was to judge of his qualifications, or whether the appointment was to be made by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple and a few other of his hon. and learned Friends. Upon that point he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He altogether disapproved of the sort of professional jealousy which had been exhibited to-night by certain hon. and learned Members. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down said the Lord Chancellor should have placed before the House the confirmatory evidence of which he spoke in his letter, but it must be clear to the House that such a course as that would be inconsistent with the high dignity of his Lordship's office, and would form a dangerous and pernicious precedent. If it could be shown that the appointment was an improper one, and that the gentleman was disqualified for the post, it would be a fair ground for the interference of the House; but as it was a question of confidence or non-confidence in the Lord Chancellor, he should support the Vote.

MR. HERSCHELL deprecated the idea that the criticism of Mr. Verey's appointment was actuated by professional jealousy. No hon. Member, he believed, was influenced by such a motive. He certainly could not be, for he had never seen the gentleman in question, nor had he ever heard of him. Beyond that, he would not change positions with the gentleman appointed if he had the chance. He felt the force of what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, that the House of Commons ought not to constitute itself a Court of Appeal in the case of legal appointments. He, for one, had no desire to Americanize our institutions, or to render appointments made to judicial offices subjects of popular control. It would, however, in his opinion, be dangerous to press that principle too far. That which was most important in the making of an appointment like the present was to keep in view the getting not only of a good man, but of the best man—not only of a fit man, but of the fittest man; and the House of Commons would abnegate one of its functions if when criticism was considered necessary criticism was withheld. It was by discussion in that House that they could best keep those to whom was entrusted official patronage alive to a sense of their responsibility. Every hon. Member of the House who was a professional man, and many lay Members, knew that from time to time men were appointed County Court Judges who not only had no reputation as lawyers, but, worse still, had the reputation of being no lawyers. That had gone on, and it might go on still, unless they stated distinctly what was the true principle on which judicial patronage should be exercised. So long as a feeling of friendship or regard, or a desire to put a particular man forward entered into the matter, instead of the sole object being to secure the best and fittest man, they should not cease to see scandals arising and to hear them commented upon. He quite admitted that of the question of fitness they had not the means of judging, and as far as he was personally concerned he knew nothing of the qualifications of Mr. Verey for the office to which he was appointed; but the question was, whether in the present appointment the proper principles had been kept in view. When he was told that it was a matter of Circuit jealousy and gossip, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to say whether when Westminster Hall raised a universal voice against an appointment it did not afford evidence that it was a bad one? It might be that a man was barely fit for a particular office, but the question was whether he had shown himself to be the fittest man for it? The character, reputation, and fortune of persons depended on the proper discharge of the duties of such an office, and it could not be said that this appointment had been improperly brought before the House and canvassed. He did not rest his objection in the present case upon the point as to want of practice. He was conscious that some of the fittest men in Westminster Hall were men with little or no practice, but then their professional fitness was known—if not to clients, to their brethren at the Bar, who took care to have them appointed to conduct arbitrations; in fact, to discharge the same kind of business as would devolve on this gentleman. Neither did he desire at all to reflect upon the noble and learned Lord who had made the appointment, or upon those who had recommended or suggested it; but he regretted that the Lord Chancellor had not seen his way to saying that he had made it on his own responsibility, without going into explanations. He hoped the result of the discussion would be the selection of the best men for similar appointments in future, and though he admitted the power of the House to take up questions of the kind, he thought it should be very sparingly used. On the whole, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Barnstaple would not think it necessary to divide the Committee on the Motion which he had brought forward, but would be content with the discussion that had ensued. Unless he could succeed in carrying a majority with him, the appointment must stand, and Mr. Verey would enter upon the discharge of his duties with an imputation of unfitness for his position resting upon him. This was to be deprecated on many grounds, and he therefore hoped it would not be thought necessary to proceed on the present occasion beyond a simple discussion of the question involved. Feeling as he did, however, if his hon. and learned Friend pressed the matter, he should have no alternative but to divide with him.

MR. GRANTHAM repudiated in the most emphatic manner that if the Committee went to a division, it would be a Party decision, especially as it had been stated that many of the supporters of the Government were opposed to this appointment. He hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) would have the courage of his opinions, and not be afraid of dividing the House upon the question, if he thought his view was a right one. Not a single reason against the appointment had been brought forward. The hon. and learned Member for Durham had delivered a very interesting speech on the general question of the principle on which judicial appointments ought to be made, but he seemed to ignore the fact that if on every occasion those men only had been chosen who enjoyed the most extensive practice at the Bar, some of the best men who had ever sat on the Judicial Bench would have been lost to the highest grades in the legal Profession. Had not the appointments of the best Judges of the land been canvassed, and had not their subsequent careers falsified the impressions created at the time of their unfitness? One of the most eminent of our Judges, whose name would go down to posterity as one of the most distinguished, and as the Littleton of our day had been appointed by the then Lord Chancellor, although he was little known in the Profession, and there was then raised a similar outcry. The House undoubtedly had the power to question all such appointments, but what were its means of forming a correct judgment as to the capabilities and fitness of any particular person. A great deal too much stress had been laid upon the question of men having large practice on the Circuits before their appointment to the exercise of judicial functions. It was true that some of the Circuits, such as the Northern and the Midland, were the best of possible legal schools, but the rule was by no means universal. Many members of the Home Circuit found in Chambers and in private practice that experience and judicial calmness which fitted them for such offices, whereas on Circuit their names were unknown because there was so little work to be done. The question of Mr. Verey's appointment must be discussed and decided on higher grounds than the mere opinions of individual members of the legal Profession or of the public, and it was idle to say because Mr. Verey was unknown on

Mr. Herschell

Circuit that he could not be a man of professional competence. He admitted that the majority of the Profession thought there were many other gentlemen more competent for the post; but it was the judgment of the Lord Chancellor upon which the Committee had to act, and as a Member of that House, he thought he had no right to set up his own particular view as a member of the Bar in opposition to that of the Lord Chancellor. It had been stated that the appointment had been made by the Lord Chief Baron, but it was afterwards ratified by the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor had, in his letter which had been read to the House, explained the grounds upon which he had appointed Mr. Verey to the office of Official Referee, that his name had stood first on the list of the Lord Chief Baron; that, although he was not known to him personally, he had, in addition to the strong opinion of the Lord Chief Baron, very marked and concurrent testimony in Mr. Verey's favour, and that he believed him to be perfectly qualified for the office. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport had contended for the right of that House to criticize the acts of the Lord Chancellor; but, in his (Mr. Grantham's) opinion, as it was unlikely that gentlemen in the Profession would ever agree as to the proper persons to be appointed to vacant legal offices, it was better to leave the power of appointment unreservedly in the hands of the highest legal authority in the country. One thing was quite clear, and that was that no hon. Member who had spoken knew anything against Mr. Verey, and they could give no reason for believing that he was not properly qualified for the post. For his own part he should decline to come down to that House and vote against the appointment merely because he thought he knew of other gentlemen who might be better fitted for the position. He preferred the responsibility of the highest legal authority to any other, and should, therefore, vote against the Motion.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN claimed to come to the subject with an unprejudiced mind, because until he knew of this appointment he had never heard Mr. Verey's name. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) had justified that gentleman's appointment on three grounds—firstly, that he had taken a degree at Cambridge; secondly, that he was 40 years old; and, thirdly, that he had never had a large practice. Now, he was far from insisting upon a large practice as a necessary qualification for the post. Men of small practice had been promoted to high office before, but they had always been men of great reputation; but, still, it was rather a dangerous thing to select even a good man if he had not had much practice, because that was invaluable to him in the discharge of his judicial duties, and also because the public, as a general rule, did not trust untried men. The House of Commons had the undoubted right to criticize these appointments; and if his hon. and learned Friend went to a division, though he deprecated that course of action, he should support him. He thought, however, hon. Members would be satisfied with the discussion that had occurred in reference to this unfortunate appointment.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that the legal Gentlemen who had spoken placed the laymen in a most pitiable position. They had alleged that these four gentlemen, in general, were not fit for their post, and one in particular, but the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) had told the House that this was usually the case. [Mr. HERSCHELL begged the hon. Member's pardon. He had not said it was usually the case.] The hon. and learned Gentleman had said it was done over and over again—that faults had been found with appointments in the legal Profession. It was with great grief that he (Mr. Neville-Grenville) heard these statements on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but, for his part, he had perfect confidence in the Lord Chancellor who, he trusted, would make a proper selection of gentlemen to fill vacant legal offices.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that when the matter was before the Committee in March last he had spoken rather strongly in reference to it, and he had then stated certain facts which had been brought under his notice by certain members of his Profession. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had then asked for time to inquire into the matter, and the Committee had cheerfully acceded to that request, and the result of that inquiry had been stated to the Committee that evening. It would be for the Committee to say how far the statement he had made had been altered by the results of that inquiry. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had insisted upon regarding the Motion in the light of a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Lord Chancellor. He could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that if he looked upon the Motion in that light, he should be the first to vote against it. The Lord Chancellor, however, had stated the grounds and the information upon which he had acted, and it was open to the Committee to form an opinion for themselves upon the materials so furnished to them. He was sorry to hear the hon. and learned Member for Chatham say that it was a question of professional jealousy.

MR. GORST disclaimed any such statement. What he had said was that there had been an exhibition of professional jealousy in that House.

SIR HENRY JAMES appealed to every Member of the House whether it could be supposed that those who had spoken in what they believed to be the performance of their public duty could have had any jealousy towards such a comparatively young and unknown member of the Profession as Mr. Verey was. He believed the appointment had proceeded upon the grounds of private testimonials. He had had them sent to him since the discussion arose, and found that they were very much in Mr. Verey's favour. Persons in whose judgment he could place confidence had spoken highly of Mr. Verey's attainments and general ability, and if the House was willing to put appointments to judicial offices upon private testimonials there was a strong case made out in Mr. Verey's favour. Was the Committee willing, when appointments to judicial offices the performance of the duties of which would affect property to the extreme extent, to justify such appointments upon the ground of private testimonials? If so, there was an end of the matter. The Lord Chancellor acted upon private testimonials in concurrence with the Lord Chief Baron's recommendation, and the Lord Chief Baron's recommendation was based upon the private recommendation of others. He (Sir Henry James) stated in the last debate that Mr. Verey had never held a brief or actively followed his Profession, and these facts were not denied by the hon. and learned Attorney General at the time. It had been substantially admitted in the progress of this debate that he had not had any practice at the Bar, and therefore the appointment must have been made on the private judgment of personal friends who had not met him at the arena of their Courts but in private conversation. He was willing to admit that it was a difficult thing to question the power and the discretion vested in the head of the legal Profession; but, looking at the practice in these cases, he thought such appointments should not depend upon private testimonials, but upon a well-known and high reputation and a large practice at the Bar. Mr. Verey was written to by a member of the Bar, who stated in his letter what was currently reported concerning him—that he had received an appointment as a Revising Barrister after he had only gone circuit once or twice, and that he was not known to have ever held a brief. To that letter Mr. Verey made no reply; he would not say because he could not represent the facts differently; but if he had refused to hold any communication with the writer of such a letter, he thought he was well justified in so doing. The truth was, however, that they ought not to criticize too minutely whether this gentleman had held a number of briefs or not; what the Committee had to determine was whether it was wise to make these appointments on the strength of private testimonials. The Committee had to determine how far they would like that rule to apply to other Professions. If our Fleets had to be commanded, would they give the command of them to a mere student in navigation, however clever, or would they give the command of our Army to a man on account of the testimonials he produced? Certainly not. If they did not apply that rule to other Professions, was there any reason why they should apply it to the legal Profession? It was said the objectors to this appointment had not proved that Mr. Verey was unfit. How could they prove that he was unfit? Was it any answer to the objection to this appointment to say—"We appointed Mr. Verey as no proof of his unfitness was given; we thought we were justified in appointing any person who was not proved to be unfit?" What they asked for was that they might have some security that the judgment given by these Referees should be right judgments. It had been said that a member of the Bar had been appointed Judge who might be said to have had no practice at the Bar, and that upon the Bench he displayed great ability. That remark referred to that distinguished Judge Mr. Justice Blackburn. But it was a mistake to suppose that he had no practice at the Bar. The Lord Chancellor, who appointed him, had constant experience of his great ability. For years he was counsel to Lloyd's, and for years he was reporter of the Queen's Bench and had had an immense experience. In short, there was no comparison between his case and the one before the Committee. The Lord Chancellor knew that in making him a Judge he was appointing one of the greatest lawyers in Westminster Hall. He (Sir Henry James) hoped the Committee had discussed this question with feelings of consideration towards the gentleman who had received this appointment. The Lord Chancellor had, without doubt, exercised his discretion, and the Committee might consider whether they should not rely on the hope that Mr. Verey might prove fit for this appointment. He could only ask his hon. and learned Friend to consider whether, after what had occurred after the utterance of those words—"This is to be a warning in future against such an appointment," it would not be better to refrain from pressing for a division. If, however, the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple's Motion were pressed to a division, as he hoped it would not be, he should feel bound to vote for it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had told them that when that matter came before the Committee some time ago, a very feeble defence was made on behalf of Mr. Verey. But then the allegations made by that hon. and learned Member, and also by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), were such as took those who sat on the Ministerial bench very much by surprise, because they then heard for the first time that that appointment was an act of the grossest nepotism, and one which was practically made by the Lord Chief Baron through feelings of favouritism alone. It was also alleged that the Lord Chief Baron had such friendship for Mr. Verey that on a previous occasion he removed a gentleman who had held the post of Revising Barrister for a long time, and who deserved to hold it still, for the purpose of substituting Mr. Verey. It had been said, if not in that House, at least outside of it, that the Lord Chief Baron had been actuated by even more unworthy motives—that he had favoured Mr. Verey because that gentleman's father had been his friend and political agent. Now, was it the fact that the Lord Chief Baron did remove from the office of Revising Barrister a gentleman who had long held it for the purpose of bestowing it on Mr. Verey? The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) had commented on that matter; but he (the Attorney General) felt himself at liberty to read a letter which the Lord Chief Baron received from a brother Judge, more intimately acquainted with the particular Revising Barrister in question, and also with the particular Circuit concerned, than the Lord Chief Baron was, before he ventured to remove that gentleman from the post of Revising Barrister. Before the fresh appointment was made, the Lord Chief Baron received that letter from a learned Gentleman who, before he was elevated to the Bench, was the leader, or one of the leaders, of that Circuit. The letter in question was to the effect that the gentleman referred to ought never to have been appointed, as he had never been a member of the Circuit; that he ought to have given up the appointment, as he was a rich man and did not want it; that he had been twice asked to give it up, but had declined to do so, though he had no good reason for keeping it; and that it was not desirable that he should be continued in it. In fact, it concluded by saying that a good deed would be done by refusing him the re-appointment. Yet the Lord Chief Baron had been accused of the grossest nepotism, because after receiving such a letter he had refused to continue that gentleman in his office as Revising Barrister, and had bestowed it on Mr. Verey, who was highly recommended for it. But the question now before the Committee was whether that appointment was a proper one. Now, whether it was a proper appointment or not depended not on whether Mr. Verey had had this or that amount of practice, but on whether he was a fit man for the post; whether he had the requisite qualification. They had had an interesting lecture from the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) on the principle of appointment to all the judicial offices in the State. The hon. and learned Gentleman said they must act on a particular principle—namely, that they were not to bestow an appointment of that character on a man unless he had had a very large practice—[“No”]—or, at all events, a considerable practice, obtained either from attorneys who, of course, gave briefs to those members of the Bar of whom they approved, or from their fellow-barristers who approved of them as arbitrators. It was not every man who, however able, succeeded in eliciting the friendship or patronage of attorneys, or in obtaining the patronage of his fellows at the Bar. There were many men who had not obtained practice either from attorneys or from barristers who were yet admirably fitted for such a post as that in question. It was said that when he spoke on this subject before he had no information on the subject. He had, however, received a letter from one of the most eminent firms of solicitors in the metropolis, and its statements had been confirmed by others to whom he had spoken. It was from Messrs. Clabon and Fearon. They said—

“My Dear Attorney General,—We venture in reference to the threatened attack on Mr. H. W. Verey as Official Referee to make the following statement. We write as an act of justice to Mr. Verey, and without his knowledge. We have known Mr. Verey throughout his professional career. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in Honours. He was articled to Messrs. Crowder and Maynard for three years, and served with them for that period, securing much of their practice. You are aware that they stand in the first class of City solicitors. He afterwards went to the Bar, and we have constantly had the benefit of his services, and have found him to do his work with great ability. He is able and energetic, as well as quiet and clear-minded.”

Perhaps being quiet and clear-minded was the reason he had not had a large practice at the Bar.

“It is impossible to meet him without being impressed with his cleverness and good sense.”

That letter came from an eminent firm of solicitors who had constantly employed Mr. Verey, perhaps not in Court work, but in work which sufficiently tested his ability and proved how fit he was for the office he now held. Since the receipt of that letter he (the Attorney General) had satisfied himself not only that what had been said of the Chief Baron was without foundation, but that no well-founded objection could be urged against the appointment which the Chief Baron had recommended. The Committee ought to have confidence in the opinion of the Lord Chief Baron, especially when coupled with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, who took upon himself the responsibility of the appointment.

The Attorney General

Mr. WADDY, in replying, said, that nobody had ventured to take up the challenge which he had thrown out at the beginning of the debate. It was a sign of weakness, and an attempt to draw them from the real issue, to allege that the Lord Chancellor was on his trial. Such was not the case, for that noble and learned Lord was unassailable. It appeared that the Lord Chief Baron appointed this gentleman a Revising Barrister when he knew nothing at all about him; and all the House knew now was that some gentleman or some lady had recommended this person to the Lord Chief Baron, and on that recommendation this appointment was given. It was said that some one on Mr. Verey's circuit, whose name was not given, had recommended him; but he had the authority of the leaders of that circuit, gentlemen of both sides of politics, and of the junior Bar, to say that until Mr. Verey was appointed he was unknown to them, except socially to one or two. Under the circumstances, as the hon. and learned Member for Chatham had said there had been an exhibition of professional jealousy on the part of those who brought forward this Motion, it would be impossible for him to withdraw it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not say anything more with regard to Mr. Verey, but he felt it necessary after the statement which had just been made to explain correctly the action of the Lord Chancellor. Having three appointments to make, the Lord Chancellor wrote to the Chiefs of the Common Law Courts requesting each of them to send him a list of three names. The Lord Chief Justice sent no names, but Lord Coleridge and the Lord Chief Barons sent three names each. Accordingly, the Lord Chancellor selected two names from Lord Coleridge's list and one from that of the Lord Chief Baron. The Lord Chancellor stated in his letter that he appointed Mr. Verey, not merely on the recommendation of the Lord Chief Baron, but in consequence of inquiries which he himself instituted, and which satisfied him that the appointment was a proper one.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. GREGORY asked for information respecting the fees which, under a Treasury Minute of the 1st of February, 1876, were payable by the suitors to the Referees. They amounted to a guinea an hour for attendance, irrespective of travelling expenses, a payment which he took exception to, and thought ought not to come out of the suitor's pocket. The Act expressly provided for the payment of the Referees by salary, and never contemplated such a tax as it was here proposed to throw upon the parties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL understood that the Referees would be paid by salaries, but that the suitors would have to pay something analogous to a Court fee. During the time a Referee sat, a guinea an hour would be payable, which, however, would go, not to the Referee, but to the Consolidated Fund. As attention had been called to the matter, it should be looked to, with the view of remedying anything that might be unjust.

MR. RAMSAY, with reference to the Commissioners in Lunacy, asked what was the amount of charges for, and the number of visits paid to lunatics; and, whether the charges were or were not paid out of the estates of the unfortunate victims?

MR. W. H. SMITH undertook to supply the information, if possible, on the Report of Supply on Monday.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next;

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.—[BILL 144.]
(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. CHILDERS said, that before the Bill was read a third time it would be well if some Member of the Government would state whether there was any foundation for the suggestion which recently was made by the leading journal—namely, that since the passing of the Dominion Act ships registered in Canada were no longer "British" ship, but only "Colonial" ships, and could not be dealt with by Imperial legislation. He was under the impression that the Dominion Act made no difference in the relations between this country and the North American Provinces, to which responsible government had been given many years before, but only regulated the new relations inter se. A "British ship" was the creation of the British Parliament, and whatever might be the powers respecting them of colonial Parliaments while those ships were in colonial waters, he conceived that nothing had been done by implication to repeal the Act of 1854, which regulated the registry of, and property in British ships. The port of registry was immaterial, as registry might be transferred from one to another British dominion at any time.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, it was extraordinary that any one pretending to criticize this Bill should suppose that the Dominion Act of 1867 excluded Canada from the operation of Imperial Acts or made Canadian ships any other than British ships. The Act of 1867 had two Schedules of subjects of legislation. The first enumerated the subjects with which the Dominion Parliament might deal exclusively of the provincial Legislatures; while the second enumerated the subjects with which the provincial Legislatures might deal, exclusively of the Dominion Parliament. But neither excluded Imperial legislation. The Queen in Council could allow Colonial Acts to repeal Imperial, but Colonial laws inconsistent with Imperial were invalid. These were questions of policies, not of legislation right. Imperial Acts bound Canadian subjects as much as all other British subjects. It was a total mistake to suppose that the Act of 1867 or 1869 in any way altered the relation of Canadian subjects to the Imperial Parliament. A Canadian ship was a British ship registered in Canada, and there was no distinction between the British character of both. He was very glad his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had drawn attention to the mistake that had been made in the criticism to which he had referred. The Bill which the House was now asked to read a third time had distinctly and rightly borne in view the existing state of the law and the relations between Canadian and all other British subjects.

MR. WILSON hoped that when the Bill got into the House of Lords, provision would be made for allowing ships trading from British ports to the Baltic to carry deck-loads of agricultural machinery during the summer months—say from April to October.

LORD ESLINGTON defended the provision of the Bill referred to as it stood.

MR. MACGREGOR thought the case of Canada had been amply considered, and thanked the Government for a good, sound, common-sense measure, which he hoped would pass unanimously.

MR. T. E. SMITH also thanked the Government for the measure, and said that on the whole the Government had succeeded in holding the balance between conflicting interests very fairly. The Government had also succeeded in carrying through the House a measure which would be a great benefit to the shipping interest and to those who wished to carry on their business in an honest, legitimate, safe, and secure manner; and at the same time it would afford to the sailors all the protection which both the House and the public required for them, and which they had a right to expect.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE also offered his congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman at the conclusion of his labours. The Bill as it stood carried out the principle of the responsibility of the shipowners as far as it was practicable to do so. He hoped it would be effective in preventing the evils hitherto complained of in regard to unseaworthy vessels. It must not, however, be expected that all losses at sea would be put an end to. By far the greatest number of losses arose from causes on which neither this Bill nor any other that could be devised would have any effect, from perils of the sea and from the negligence of officers and seamen navigating them. He was not so completely wedded to the principle of this Bill that if it failed to produce a good result, he would not be prepared to go further in the direction aimed at by the hon. Member for Derby; but he, at least, hoped that a fair trial would be given to the measure, and that for a time agitation on the subject would cease. The shipping trade had now for some years been the subject of this agitation, and it was only fair that it should now be left at rest for a time, and that every effort should be made fairly to put the Bill in operation. He believed that if fairly worked, the Bill would prevent the sailing of vessels in an unseaworthy state. He must enter his protest against that part of the Bill which extended the powers of the Board of Trade to foreign vessels, he considered that a dangerous precedent was made thereby. The clause which imposed a penalty on vessels entering our ports and which had loaded according to the laws of their own country appeared to him indefensible, and was equally opposed to International Law and to our treaty engagements. He hoped that the great lawyers in the Upper House would direct their attention to this point. He took this opportunity of saying that he had on this account mainly voted with the Government, and against the Party with whom he acted upon the last Amendment on Report—namely, that which omitted the exception in favour of three feet of deals and battens from the prohibition against deck cargoes. He agreed in principle with what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract as to the right of our Legislature to legislate for Canadian vessels; but he considered it was very inexpedient to bring our legislation into conflict with the Canadian legislation. He also recollected that the timber trade was mainly carried on by foreign and Canadian vessels; in attempting, therefore, to impose regulations upon them, it was expedient to be very careful, however desirable it might appear to make such regulations as regards our own vessels, he thought it was unwise to do so as against foreign and colonial ships without the consent of their Governments. He could not but fear that what we had done would bring us into difficulty both with foreign Governments and with the Canadian Legislature. He hoped, therefore, that this question would be reviewed in the Upper House, and would be discussed with reference to the important international points which it raised.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade was prevented from speaking again, and perhaps it was fortunate for him that he had been spared his blushes. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) therefore begged in the name of his right hon. Friend and the Government, to say how sensible they were of the kindness expressed on the occasion, and of the general kindness with which the Bill had been treated during the long and often animated discussions in Committee. He was sure his right hon. Friend would have reason to congratulate himself in having steered the Bill at last to this point. All he could say was that the Government had done their best honestly to make the Bill a good one, and, if they had been ready to accept suggestions from other quarters, it should be borne in mind that they had done so on their own responsibility; and the responsibility for the measure as it was now about to pass rested with the Government. They hoped there would be a general disposition to give a fair trial to the measure, and to the Board of Trade in working it; and he could assure the House that there would be no want of honesty and zeal in endeavouring to give effect to the Bill in accordance with the views of those who had passed it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time; Verbal Amendment made:—Bill passed.

CLERK OF THE PEACE AND OF THE CROWN (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 119.]
(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET), in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it was proposed, in accordance with the recommendations of different Select Committees who had considered the subject, that the two offices of the Clerk of the Peace and of the Crown should be amalgamated. Accordingly the main provision of the Bill was that upon either of the two offices becoming vacant, the Lord Lieutenant should have power to order the amalgamation of the two offices. If the House would read the Bill a second time he should, in due time propose to commit it pro forma, in order to introduce certain Amendments which might be found necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said that although he assented to the general principle of amalgamating the two offices, he objected that the officer to be appointed to the joint post would be practically a mere Clerk of the Treasury. Unless that and other objectionable provisions were omitted, he should oppose the measure in all its future stages. He would conclude by moving its rejection.

Mr. LAW seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Mr. MELDON, in moving the adjournment of the debate, said, he was of opinion that the Bill ought not to be proceeded with at present, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had "put the cart before the horse." There was another Bill which ought to come first.

Mr. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Meldon.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in assenting to the Motion for Adjournment, said there was no desire to press the Bill at a late hour against the feeling of the House. He must however remark that the measure was an honest attempt to save money to the ratepayers of Ireland by abolishing a useless office.

Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday, 12th June.

BURGHES (DIVISION INTO WARDS)
(SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

[BILL 166.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving, that the Bill be now read a second time, said: By 31 and 32 Vic., cap. 108, and cap. 102, it is lawful to divide burghs in Scotland having a population of 10,000 into wards for voting purposes. It has been for some time represented by the burgh of Wick that the limit of 10,000 is too high, and that it should be reduced to 7,000. I have caused inquiry to be made in all the Scotch burghs having a population above 7,000 and under 10,000, and the replies have been generally in favour of the change proposed by the burgh of Wick. The Acts above mentioned were passed in 1868, the year in which the franchise was lowered, and before the effect on the numbers of the constituency could be ascertained. The increase has now proved to be so considerable as, apart from other considerations, to render it expedient that separate voting places should be established within each burgh. Irrespective of the mere question of convenience of voting, it frequently happens that even in small burghs there exist different districts the owners and occupiers in which have somewhat conflicting interests to those in other districts, and the most effectual way of protecting the interests of all sections is by making it competent to divide the burgh into two or more wards. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 8th June.

LOCAL LIGHT DUES (REDUCTION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SYKES, Bill to authorise the reduction of Local Light Dues, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SYKES, Mr. NORWOOD, and Mr. WILSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 173.]

GUN LICENCE ACT (1870) AMENDMENT
BILL.

On Motion of Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Bill to amend "The Gun Licence Act, 1870," ordered to be brought in by Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Mr. M'LAGAN, and Mr. MARK STEWART.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 174.]

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 91 and 92 be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.—VIVI-SECTION.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, it would be convenient if the Government stated what course they proposed to take with the Cruelty to Animals Bill, which stood for Committee that evening.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he did not intend to ask their Lordships to proceed with the Bill that evening. Within the last few days he had received several communications of an important character in relation to the measure, and had seen several persons who took a great interest in the subject. He had not as yet been able to come to anything like a conclusion on some of the suggestions which had been made to him. Consequently, if their Lordships went into Committee that evening, they would necessarily deal with the Bill in an unsatisfactory and perfunctory manner. Under these circumstances, he thought the best course would be to postpone the Committee until after Whitsuntide, and in the meantime the Government would have an opportunity of considering the bearing of those representations that had been made to them.

Committee on said Bill accordingly put off sine die.

CRIMINAL LAW—THROWING STONES AT RAILWAY TRAINS.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been directed to the report of a case in the Salford Borough Police Court, which case was heard on Thursday, May 18? The case was that of a boy who was convicted of having thrown a stone at a railway train. The station-master, in his evidence, stated that the company to which the train belonged had received continual complaints that stones were thrown at the trains, that the carriage windows had frequently been broken, and passengers injured in some cases as a result of those acts. Officials, he added, had been specially engaged to apprehend the boys, but had not succeeded in capturing any offender until the present case. The detective superintendent stated that the mischievous practice of throwing stones at railway trains had become very common, and that on the London and North Western and the Lancashire and Yorkshire lines injuries to passengers had resulted. Having heard that evidence, the magistrate inflicted a penalty of half-a-crown, which he thought their Lordships would regard as very inadequate to the offence. If this sentence were to remain unnoticed he feared there would be no protection against a repetition of the offence, which might be attended with serious—perhaps fatal—consequences. He trusted Her Majesty's Government would not allow the inadequacy of the penalty to pass unnoticed.

Moved, for Copy of evidence given before the Court.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was sorry he was not able to give a copy of the evidence taken before the magistrate—nor indeed to give his noble Friend any further information than that of which he appeared to be in possession. No doubt the practice of throwing stones at railway trains was attended not only with annoyance, but also with danger. When, however, it was stated that stones were frequently thrown at railway trains it did not follow that the offence had been frequently committed by the boy convicted before the borough magistrate at Salford, and it would have been a hardship to inflict a penalty on that boy for offences committed by others, and out of all proportion to the particulars of his own case. As a rule the magistrates who administered local justice had before them circumstances which influenced them in deciding penalties, but which might not be stated in newspaper reports. Half-a-crown was a small sum, but a fine did not always adequately represent the amount of the punishment, because even such a penalty, in addition to costs, might have been a considerable amount to the parents of the boy. Of course, he could not say that it was; and, now that he knew the point to which his noble Friend wished to direct attention, he would cause inquiries to be made. Should his noble Friend not be satisfied with the result of those inquiries, he might move in the matter again.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) ACT.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, their Lordships would remember that on Friday evening a noble Earl opposite (Earl De La Warr), moved for a Return of landowners of 500 acres and upwards in each county of England and Wales, showing those who had contracted themselves out of the Agricultural Holdings Act up to June in the present year. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) objected to the granting of such a Return on grounds which, he submitted, would not apply to a Return which he now begged to move for. It was a Return of the Public Departments which hold land as Owners or Occupiers in England and Wales, specifying whether they have or have not contracted themselves out of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act up to the 1st of June, 1876.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that on a former occasion he expressed an opinion that to accede to the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord De La Warr) would lead to considerable inconvenience, that Motion having been for a Return which would have involved an inquiry into the arrangements between private owners of land and their tenants under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act. Of course, the same objections did not apply to a Return respecting arrangements made by public bodies. He took it there were three public bodies to which the Motion now before the House could be taken to apply—namely, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Duchy of Lancaster, and the Woods and Forests. As to the first—the Return of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—the information sought for by his noble Friend would be found in Returns already produced in the other House of Parliament, and which could very easily be laid on their Lordships' Table. The following paragraphs from that Return would put their Lordships in possession of the advice given to the Commissioners by their Surveyors with reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act:—

“Under these circumstances we advise that each of the Commissioners' tenants have notice that their tenancies remain unaffected by the Act, but that each notice be accompanied with an intimation that the Commissioners themselves have no objections to the Act, and will be prepared to arrange with each tenant for the addition to his agreement of such portions of the Act as may be deemed expedient.

“We continue of opinion that the Act will prove very advantageous to the interests of the country through the adaptation of its provisions to the circumstances of each tenancy, but it will rarely be in the first instance adopted.”

Next as to the lands held under the

The Earl of Camperdown

Duchy of Lancaster. He found that they were about 37,000 acres in all. Of those, 30,000 were held on lease; so that only 7,000 came under the operation of the Act; and of the tenants of these lands, 44 were perfectly content with existing arrangements. The case was therefore narrowed to about 3,000 acres. These had been put out of the operation of the Act because of the very great improvements being made by the Crown on this portion of the property. And when he told their Lordships that the rental of these 3,000 acres was only 7s. 6d. an acre, their Lordships would very readily understand that they could not be in a very high state of cultivation, or be very valuable as regarded farming interests. More than that—of the rental of 7s. 6d. per acre the Crown had to lay out 2s. 6d. per acre. The third case was that of the Woods and Forests. With regard to this land he had an answer from the Crown Receiver by which it appeared that very nearly the whole of the land managed by that Department was let on leases for terms of years. In the cases where the land was not so let the Agricultural Holdings Act was allowed to operate.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN thought there could not be much good in the Act seeing that the tenants were so very little anxious to take the benefit of it. But there were other public bodies beside those mentioned by the noble Duke which had the management of lands—such as the Duchy of Cornwall and Greenwich Hospital.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had been under the impression that he was giving the noble Earl all the information he asked for; but perhaps the noble Earl would be good enough in an amended notice to enumerate the Departments respecting which he desired information, and he would give it him.

Return of all the Reports made to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by their surveyors relative to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1875: Ordered to be laid before the House.—(The Lord President.)

PARLIAMENT—BOROUGHES OF NORWICH AND BOSTON.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with precedent, to recommend to Parliament legislative action, based upon the Reports of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of Corrupt Practices in the City of Norwich and the Borough of Boston?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was the intention of the Government to act as mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member. In the case of the City of Norwich, they would recommend Parliament to disfranchise the scheduled voters, and to suspend the Writ during the present Parliament, and in the case of the borough of Boston to disfranchise the scheduled voters only.

VOL. CCXXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

INDIA—NIZAM STATE RAILWAY— LOANS TO INDIAN PRINCES.

QUESTION.

MR. LOWE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the shares of a Company formed by the Nizam for the construction of a Railway have been placed on the London market; whether such a proceeding is in contravention of the letter or spirit of the statute 37 Geo. 3, cap. 142, sec. 28, by which it is enacted that no British subject shall be concerned, either by himself or by any other person, in raising or procuring any money for such native prince; and, whether, in case the Act is not sufficient to meet the case, the Government will introduce a Bill to remedy the defect?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, it is true that certain shares were issued last Summer by the promoters of the Nizam's State Railway Company, in pursuance of an agreement entered into between the Government of Lord Mayo and the Nizam. With regard to the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's Question, I must remind him that, according to 37 Geo. III. cap. 147, sec. 28, the consent or approbation of the Secretary of State in Council or of the Indian Government has in such cases to be obtained in writing.

DOVER HARBOUR.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Committee recently stated to have been appointed by the former Administration, consisting of the President of the Board of Trade, Chancellor of the Exchequer, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Secretaries of State for War and Foreign Affairs, to investigate and report on the works at Dover Harbour; and, if he will explain the intentions of Government in respect to spending more money on Dover Harbour works, or on Harbour improvements along the dangerous parts of the coasts?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was not officially in possession of either the Report or the records to which the hon. and gallant Member referred; indeed, he was not aware whether any Report had been made by the Committee named. He presumed, from the hon. and gallant Member's statement, that there had been a sort of Cabinet Council, consisting of certain Heads of Offices, and that they conferred together on the subject; and no doubt the late Government did agree to the introduction of a Bill with reference to Dover Harbour, but he presumed there was no formal record made by any such Committee. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was perfectly aware that a Bill on the subject of the Harbour was prepared before the last Session, and that last Session a similar Bill was submitted to a Select Committee, of which he believed the hon. and gallant Gentleman was himself a Member. In consequence, however, of the great extension given by the recommendations of that Committee, the Bill was laid aside for consideration; and the Government, in reference to works and other matters of expenditure which they had in view, did not find themselves able to bring forward such a Bill during the present year. With regard to the second part of the Question, there were two different considerations to be borne in mind—namely, harbour works for the preservation of shipping which might apply to other places besides Dover, and works for military and naval defence. In reference to the first of these considerations, the policy of the Government was to encourage loans, through the Public Works Loan Commissioners, for the construction of Harbours of Refuge where the local authorities were unable to carry them out themselves. No doubt, the same course would be open to the Dover local authorities. As to military and naval purposes, the Government were not in a position at present to make any statement, but the subject was one which was under their consideration.

ARMY—DESERTION—CASE OF SAMUEL CHAPPELL.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Samuel Chappell, charged with deserting from the 85th Regiment twenty-two years ago (1854) being then only seventeen years of age; whether it was not proved before the justices at Stockport that Chappell had since served many years in the army of and become a naturalized subject of the United States; whether Chappell has not been in prison on this charge from the 24th of April; and, whether he will feel disposed, under the circumstances, considering the lapse of time and the imprisonment already undergone, to advise the use of the Royal Prerogative to release the man?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: On the 18th ultimo, Sir, the clerk to the borough magistrates at Stockport reported to the War Office that Samuel Chappell was charged with desertion from the 85th Regiment in 1854, and that he admitted the charge, but in defence produced a certificate of naturalization as an American citizen, dated the 1st of November, 1867. He was attested on the 14th of June, 1854, declaring his age to be 18 years, and he deserted on the 2nd of February, 1855. The clerk added that the prisoner had been remanded on bail pending the Secretary of State's instructions. In reply, dated the 20th of April, the magistrates were referred to Section 15 of 33 Vict., cap. 45, which enacts that a British subject who becomes an alien—

“Is not thereby discharged from any liability in respect to any acts done before the date of his so becoming an alien.”

The magistrates thereupon committed him as a deserter, and he was removed under escort to Portsmouth, after the necessary inquiries had been made that there was sufficient evidence to try him. He was tried on the 16th of May and found guilty of desertion, but, on account of the state of his health and other circumstances, was not sentenced to undergo any punishment. An order for his discharge from the Army, with a protecting certificate for the future, was sent to Portsmouth on the 26th instant.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS, &c.—ADMISSION OF FOREIGN OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he proposes to take any steps to limit the opportunities now afforded to Foreign Officers of becoming acquainted with all the latest improvements and alterations in the designs of ships building in the Dockyards, and with the results of experiments carried out at great expense to the Country; and whether, if he is unable to put a stop to the present practice of showing everything to Foreign Officers, he will place the same facilities of acquiring information into the hands of our own Officers?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the foreign officers admitted into the Dock-yards in this country were placed under regulations. No special opportunities were afforded to them for becoming acquainted with the results of experiments in this country, except on the condition of reciprocity; and if there were any further limitations, we should be deprived of the advantage of acquiring similar information from foreign countries. All proper facilities for acquiring information were given to such of our own officers as were considered entitled to them by the Admiralty.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to submit any proposal to this House during the present Session for the purpose of placing the condition of the Irish National School Teachers in a satisfactory state as regards their remuneration?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am not at present authorized to give any very definite reply to the hon. Member's Question, but I think it is clear from the very contradictory views expressed by several hon. Members in the debate which he raised on the subject that, in the present state of Public Business, any proposals for an alteration of the law could not be successfully made during the present Session. The question, however, may be dealt with in another way, to which I made some reference in the debate to which I have alluded, and that is still under the consideration of the Government.

LAW APPOINTMENTS (IRELAND)—CASE OF JAMES DEVINE.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Lord Lieutenant has approved of the appointment by the Magistrates of the Petty Sessions district of Borris, in the county of Carlow, of James Devine as Petty Sessions Clerk; and, whether there is not a regulation prohibiting the appointment of a person more than 40 years of age to the office of Clerk of Petty Sessions; and, if so, is it not a fact that James Devine is over that age, and therefore ineligible?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the appointment of James Devine as Petty Sessions Clerk at Borris has not been approved. There is a regulation against the appointment of a person more than 40 years of age to a Petty Sessions clerkship, which has not been altered, and I understand that the person in question is above that age. But it has always been customary to allow exceptions to that limit in the case of persons whose professional qualifications or past experience in the public service might warrant it. I am not at present sure how far the case in question would come under these exceptions; but I should be always anxious to consult the wishes of the local magistrates in matters connected with these appointments, so far as could be done consistently with the interests of the public service.

NEW PUBLIC OFFICES—SITE.

QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked the First Commissioner of Works, If it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with the intimation given at the commencement of the Session, to introduce a Bill for the purpose of appropriating as a site for public offices the land and buildings within Great George Street, King Street, Charles Street Westminster, and St. James's Park?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, the Government had abandoned their intention to introduce a Bill with reference to this site.

METROPOLIS—THE ORNAMENTAL WATERS IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been directed to the offensive effluvia from the ornamental waters in St. James's Park which has prevailed for some time past; and, if so, whether he is prepared to remedy the evil before it is intensified by the heat of summer?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, his attention was called to the matter under notice in consequence of the Question of the hon. Member. The lake in St. James's Park was thoroughly cleaned out in December last. Since then a considerable quantity of water had been pumped into it; but for a short time there had been a dry season, and that supply was lessened. Since then there had been a plentiful supply of water. He thought the hon. Gentleman would agree with him that it would be most unsafe at this time, when the hot weather was approaching, if he were to set to work to have the lake drained off again in order to remove the deposit.

POOR LAW—OUT-DOOR RELIEF—CASE OF CHARLOTTE HAMMOND.

QUESTION.

MR. WATNEY asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the death of Charlotte Hammond in Westminster from starvation, and to the verdict of the jury on the inquest; and, further, to ask if, considering that the Poor Law Amendment Bill is now in Committee, he will not consider the advisability of introducing a Clause which shall give the guardians greater power to deal with such cases in the way of out-door relief?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention was called to the case of Charlotte Hammond by the statements which appeared in the newspapers on Friday last, and I immediately directed a communication to be addressed to the Guardians asking whether they had investigated the circumstances, and, if so, with what result. This morning I have received a deputation from the Guardians asking that an inquiry may be made under the provisions of the Poor Law. To this, of course, there can be no objection if it should appear to be necessary; but, in order to determine on the exact course to be taken, I have applied to the coroner for a copy of the depositions. In reference to the suggestion of my hon. Friend, I have to inform him that no amendment of the law is necessary to enable the Guardians to deal with cases of this kind. There is no order of the Local Government Board prohibiting out-door relief in St. George's Union, and the Guardians have ample powers for dealing with such cases as the one in question. The only condition that applies to such relief being given, is that if given to able-bodied persons they must require work to be done.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—LIGHTHOUSE ON CONINGBEG ROCK.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD POWER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If any steps have been taken to erect a lighthouse on the Coningbeg Rock, outside Waterford Harbour, as recommended by the Board of Irish Lights?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Four years ago, Sir—namely, in March and April, 1872—the Board of Trade and the Trinity House suggested to the Commissioners of Irish Lights that a careful survey of Coningbeg Rock should be made, in order to determine the practicability and probable cost of carrying out the proposal which these Commissioners had made to place a lighthouse on the rock, in lieu of the light-vessel now stationed there; but the Board of Trade have heard nothing further on the subject from the Irish lighthouse authority. At the same time, the Board of Trade authorized the Commissioners of Irish Lights to place a powerful fog signal on board the light-vessel. I may add that in 1843 attempts were made to erect a pile lighthouse on this rock, which were not successful, and were abandoned.

UNITED STATES—THE EMMA MINE. QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the report of the proceedings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives at Washington, and the evidence given in relation to the "Directory of the Emma Mine, so called," and, whether, in view of the grave disclosures made therein as to the alleged fraudulent suppression and misrepresentation of material facts in the prospectus of the Emma Mine by parties resident in Great Britain, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the advisability of instituting criminal proceedings against the parties implicated therein?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have read in the newspapers—in a casual and cursory manner—an account of the proceedings at Washington upon those matters to which the hon. Gentleman's Question refers; but the statement did not appear before me in that authentic and authoritative manner which would justify me in considering whether I should take the grave step to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

MR. CALLAN gave Notice that on the earliest day he could obtain he would move for the appointment of a Select Committee to make certain inquiries relating to the Emma Mine, the Lisbon Steam Tramways Company, and other companies of a like character, which had either been compulsorily or voluntarily wound up.

ARMY—FORAGE TO MOUNTED OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will modify the new rule, which withdraws forage from mounted officers who are unable to certify that they are the bonâ fide owners of the horses they use on military duty, so far as to permit of officers drawing forage for those horses which they use for military duty, and of which they have the exclusive control; and, if he will grant any relaxation of this rule in the case of mounted Militia officers who are called out for twenty-seven days' training?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the rule is not exactly a new one, it is the revival of the old-established practice of the Service, revived after a very full discussion by a Committee, of whom the Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Surveyor General, Accountant General, and others are members. It was revived to remedy certain evils arising out of a relaxation of the rule, and it would not be wise to alter it without further experience. With regard to the Militia, there will be no objection to their drawing forage for horses hired for the period of the training, the duty being of a temporary character.

LOCAL FINANCE—INDEBTEDNESS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he can state approximately the total amount of indebtedness of local authorities on the latest day up to which the accounts are made up?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my hon. Friend is aware that the information he desires is compiled from Returns furnished under statute by the various local authorities of the country, many of whom are not subject to the control of the Government. The Returns for the year ending June, 1875, have been received and are in process of tabulation, and in the course of a week I shall be able to state the result. I think it will be more satisfactory that I should give an accurate statement a week hence rather than an approximate statement at this moment.

TURKEY—TURKISH FINANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. HAMOND asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement so positively made in the "Standard" of the 26th instant, under the head from our own Correspondent at Constantinople of May 19th—

"That the English Ambassador holds and has expressed the view that it would be a lasting dishonour to Turkey and a complete destruction to her credit if the proposed Scheme for the conversion of her debt, &c., be now dropped by the present Government of Turkey," and, if so, seeing that this Scheme is totally unauthorized and entirely disavowed by the English Bondholders—a fact well known to Sir Henry Elliot—whether this alleged statement of the English Ambassador has been made; and, if so, whether it was made by the authority of the Foreign Office, or is merely a personal and unauthorized expression of his own; and, if there is any objection to produce any Correspondence or Communication between the Foreign Office and the English Ambassador upon the subject?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Newcastle, I have to say that so far as Her Majesty's Government are informed there is no truth whatever in the statement to which his Question refers. Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has not been authorized or instructed to use the language attributed to him in the Question of the hon. Member; nor do I believe for a moment, under these circumstances, that it is possible for Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople to have used the language which is attributed to him. I need not add that

I have made is based on Returns which have been placed before this House, and which any hon. Member may consult for himself. Previous to, and until the year 1870 the finance accounts gave in separate tables the Revenue raised in Great Britain and in Ireland; but in that year a change took place in the form of those accounts, and the practice was introduced of lumping together the total Revenue of the United Kingdom, so that it is no longer possible to ascertain the amount contributed by England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. That change in the form of the accounts was made under significant circumstances, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chancellor of the Exchequer. To obtain the requisite information, I applied to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us the means of ascertaining what had been the taxation of Ireland during the past five years, and with his usual courtesy he has allowed the finance accounts to be made up for those five years in the same form as before, and to be laid upon the Table, so that every hon. Member has now the opportunity of knowing what the Revenue is as derived from Great Britain and from Ireland respectively. If hon. Members will look at the Return they will find that from Ireland there has been collected during the last five years £42,000,000 of taxes. That is nearly £8,500,000 a-year, or £1 12s. 2d. for every man, woman, and child in Ireland. Of the £8,500,000 very nearly £6,500,000 are raised by Customs and Excise duties, and are therefore paid by the poorer classes of the people, and that is one of the most serious points in my argument. We pay the Income Tax in Ireland, but we have hitherto been excused the assessed taxes, and various exemptions have been made which affect the upper classes; but the great burden of the taxation, through the Excise and Customs, falls upon the poor. The House will remember, too, that the emigration of 2,500,000—which is a scandal and a shame to this country—is an emigration of the poorest classes. The facts I have stated are very little known to the House of Commons, but they are well known to some hon. and right hon. Members. They are very well known both to the present and to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe),

and the late Chancellor has before this given his answer to them. He says it is not Ireland that is taxed at all, or England, but the people living in Ireland or England. The individual taxpayer in Ireland pays the same as the individual taxpayer in England or Scotland, and the taxation is therefore perfectly equitable. That is a very old theory of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). When the celebrated Committee of Colonel Dunne was appointed, in 1865, by the House of Commons to investigate the financial grievances of Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman used this very argument in the Committee, and he proposed an Amendment to that effect to the Committee's Report. Nobody was found to second his Amendment, however, and it fell to the ground; but as the matter is of importance I will ask leave to read it to the House. Mr. Lowe said—

“As the taxes imposed on England and Ireland are paid, not by those countries, but by the individuals who live in them; as these taxes are imposed either on expenditure or in proportion to income, and very fairly adjusted to the ability of the taxpayer; and as a man taxed in proportion to his ability in a poor country is just as able to bear taxation as a person possessed of the same means or making the same expenditure in a rich one, your Committee attach little value to such proportions as bearing on the question of Irish taxation, or the ability of the individual Irishman to bear it. Your Committee cannot admit that a country in which no tax oppressive to any individual exists is nevertheless injured and oppressed by excessive taxation.”

As a protest to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, the Committee adopted a very different Resolution, which was proposed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I will read to the House the following extract from it:—

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 124.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in rising to move, by way of Amendment, a Resolution with respect to Irish Taxation, said: Mr. Speaker—Sir, before I enter into any explanation in reference to the Notice I have placed on the Paper I wish to state to the House that it was my wish that this discussion should have occurred at an earlier stage of the Budget, but I was forestalled by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), and was therefore unable until now to bring on the Motion. I am quite aware that there is no more unpopular subject in this House than Irish financial grievances, because the House believes that those alleged grievances are of a sentimental and unsubstantial character. All I can say is this, that if I did not know very well, from long and very earnest study of the question, that those grievances are of a very substantial and practical nature, I should not trouble the House on this occasion. I am not now going to enter into debate on a state of things long since past, but my observations will be applicable to the conditions that exist at the present day, being, in fact, practical commentaries on the taxation of Ireland at this moment. I will undertake to show that the finances of Ireland are in such a condition that if this country desires to restore the prosperity of that part of the United Kingdom they must enter on a very different course from that hitherto pursued.

The taxation to be raised by the present Budget is greater than has ever before been raised in this country, either in the time of peace or war. I am aware that loans have been transacted, but I can find no record of anything like a taxation of £78,000,000 in one year. Well, Ireland is greatly interested in this, because her taxation is increased as well as that of England. I know, indeed, that a considerable portion of the taxation will be returned to those who pay it in the shape of subventions for local objects, and that a portion of it also is to be applied to the reduction of Debt. I do not intend, therefore, to make any complaint of extravagant estimates, especially as it is absolutely necessary for a great country like this to maintain its Army and Navy on an effective footing; but if we consider that the Income Tax, which is increased in this country, is also increased in Ireland, the remark may be pardoned in passing that the very success of the Income Tax—the fact that for every penny in the pound you now reap a revenue of very nearly £2,000,000—constitutes one of the strongest arguments against it; for it puts a premium upon slovenly finance. Everything in future will turn on the toss of a penny; because a penny of Income Tax either way means a sum of £2,000,000 for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to play with; and we are told that, now you have exempted small incomes, no one much cares whether the Income Tax stands at 2*d.* or at 3*d.* in the pound. Such a condition of things may well prove fatal to painstaking and careful finance as the country has hitherto understood it. Turning, however, from these general considerations, and coming to the subject with which I am more immediately concerned, I wish to make two statements to the House, to which I beg the attention of hon. Members. I affirm that within the last 23 years the taxation of Ireland has doubled, that Ireland now contributes to the Imperial Exchequer £8,500,000, as against £4,000,000 23 years ago. In that period the taxation per head in Ireland has risen from 9*s.* 6*d.* to £1 12*s.* 2*d.* per head. I would further remind the House that in a little more than the same period the population of Ireland has declined by 2,500,000 persons. Whatever explanation may be given of these circumstances, they are worthy of, and ought to receive, the earnest attention of the House of Commons. I am not going to say how far they stand in the relation of cause and effect, but I will say that no Legislative Assembly in the world could have such facts put before them without at once giving them their serious attention. It may be asked—how are we to know that these statements are accurate? My answer is, that every statement

I have made is based on Returns which have been placed before this House, and which any hon. Member may consult for himself. Previous to, and until the year 1870 the finance accounts gave in separate tables the Revenue raised in Great Britain and in Ireland; but in that year a change took place in the form of those accounts, and the practice was introduced of lumping together the total Revenue of the United Kingdom, so that it is no longer possible to ascertain the amount contributed by England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. That change in the form of the accounts was made under significant circumstances, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chancellor of the Exchequer. To obtain the requisite information, I applied to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us the means of ascertaining what had been the taxation of Ireland during the past five years, and with his usual courtesy he has allowed the finance accounts to be made up for those five years in the same form as before, and to be laid upon the Table, so that every hon. Member has now the opportunity of knowing what the Revenue is as derived from Great Britain and from Ireland respectively. If hon. Members will look at the Return they will find that from Ireland there has been collected during the last five years £42,000,000 of taxes. That is nearly £8,500,000 a-year, or £1 12s. 2d. for every man, woman, and child in Ireland. Of the £8,500,000 very nearly £6,500,000 are raised by Customs and Excise duties, and are therefore paid by the poorer classes of the people, and that is one of the most serious points in my argument. We pay the Income Tax in Ireland, but we have hitherto been excused the assessed taxes, and various exemptions have been made which affect the upper classes; but the great burden of the taxation, through the Excise and Customs, falls upon the poor. The House will remember, too, that the emigration of 2,500,000—which is a scandal and a shame to this country—is an emigration of the poorest classes. The facts I have stated are very little known to the House of Commons, but they are well known to some hon. and right hon. Members. They are very well known both to the present and to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe),

and the late Chancellor has before this given his answer to them. He says it is not Ireland that is taxed at all, or England, but the people living in Ireland or England. The individual taxpayer in Ireland pays the same as the individual taxpayer in England or Scotland, and the taxation is therefore perfectly equitable. That is a very old theory of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). When the celebrated Committee of Colonel Dunne was appointed, in 1865, by the House of Commons to investigate the financial grievances of Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman used this very argument in the Committee, and he proposed an Amendment to that effect to the Committee's Report. Nobody was found to second his Amendment, however, and it fell to the ground; but as the matter is of importance I will ask leave to read it to the House. Mr. Lowe said—

“As the taxes imposed on England and Ireland are paid, not by those countries, but by the individuals who live in them; as these taxes are imposed either on expenditure or in proportion to income, and very fairly adjusted to the ability of the taxpayer; and as a man taxed in proportion to his ability in a poor country is just as able to bear taxation as a person possessed of the same means or making the same expenditure in a rich one, your Committee attach little value to such proportions as bearing on the question of Irish taxation, or the ability of the individual Irishman to bear it. Your Committee cannot admit that a country in which no tax oppressive to any individual exists is nevertheless injured and oppressed by excessive taxation.”

As a protest to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, the Committee adopted a very different Resolution, which was proposed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I will read to the House the following extract from it:—

These were the words indorsed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and anybody can see the fallacy on which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe's) amendment was based. He regarded only the obvious, superficial, and direct effects of taxation. He took no account of all the remote and secondary effects, which must be regarded by anybody who proposes to rule a great country. Let me put a case to the House. If a gentleman has an estate of £5,000 a-year, and he spends the £5,000 upon himself, at the end of 12 months he will have nothing left to expend on the improvement and development of the resources of his estate. If reproached by his tenants for his reckless and improvident expenditure, what answer will it be for him to say—"Oh! I only spend the same amount as my neighbour?" Well; but his neighbour has an income of £10,000 a-year, and therefore, after spending £5,000, he would have at the end of the 12 months £5,000 to lay out in benefiting his estate. Now, that illustrates the case of Ireland as regards taxation. The case of Ireland is that by this heavy taxation you have removed and do remove such an immense proportion of the income of the country, that not only have the people been obliged to fly to happier climes to gain a livelihood, but there is nothing left to develop the resources of the country. The country is borne down by the excessive character of the taxation, and the abject and miserable poverty, the result, in part, of it, is one of the chief causes of discontent in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London would fix on other men's shoulders a burden which he would not bear on his own. The burden of taxation in Ireland is not only equal to that of England, but infinitely and shamefully larger. England pays in proportion to the income of the people an amount of taxation which is a mere trifle compared with the taxation of Ireland, and I will prove it. Every financier from Adam Smith downwards lays down the doctrine that the taxes to which a man is liable ought not to be taken from his gross income, but from his net income, and that principle is recognized by this House in the exemptions which have been sanctioned in the income tax. Let me now apply the same principle in dealing with this subject. It is no use stating how much per head individuals pay, unless we know what their income is; because a tax which is light enough to the rich man falls with heavy weight on the poor man. What is the income of Great Britain? Probably, the best estimate ever formed was made by the late Mr. Dudley Baxter in 1869. Mr. Baxter took the amount assessed to the income tax at £400,000,000; he put the income of the wage-earning class at £325,000,000 more; and another £75,000,000 was derived from other sources; thus making the whole income of Great Britain £800,000,000. That estimate is, I believe, generally accepted as the most correct, and certainly the most moderate, that was ever made. Now, what is the income of Ireland? The income on which income tax is assessed in Ireland amounts to £26,000,000; and if we add to that an estimate on the same basis as the one I have referred to as to the income of the wage-earning class, we shall bring up the total income of Ireland to about £48,000,000, which is rather over-estimating than under-estimating it; because the total wages in Ireland bear a less proportion to the other sources of income, while I have put them in the same ratio as in England. What taxation does Ireland pay out of that £48,000,000? Why she pays £8,000,000, that is, there is contributed to the Imperial Exchequer 3s. 4d. of every pound of her income. But then what does England pay out of her £800,000,000 of income? Why, England paid, at the time Mr. Baxter's calculation was made, exactly £67,000,000, which is only at the rate of 1s. 8d. in the pound instead of 3s. 4d. as paid in Ireland. I challenge contradiction to that from either side of the House or from any Chancellor of the Exchequer, past or present. If anybody should question the statement, I should be quite prepared to submit the matter to, say, the same arbitrators as determined the Alabama question, giving England the benefit of the Lord Chief Justice as its Representative, into the bargain, for I am certain that any body of arbitrators could only give one decision. I have hitherto spoken only of Imperial taxation, but both England and Ireland pay local taxation as well, and in the House of Commons we have all heard the groans of the former country under the infliction imposed upon it in that respect. If we add local taxation as given by Baxter, it results that in 1869 the local taxation of England was £19,000,000, which added to £67,000,000 of Imperial taxation makes a total of £86,000,000 paid by Great Britain. Now the local taxation of Ireland is £3,500,000, which added to £8,500,000, paid to the Imperial Exchequer, makes a total taxation of £12,000,000 out of an income of £48,000,000. That unhappy country, which many hon. Members believe is given only to useless and purposeless complaints, pays to taxation one quarter of its annual income. England pays £86,000,000 out of £800,000,000, which is at the rate of 9½ per cent, or, say, in round numbers, for the purpose of the argument, 10 per cent, against the 25 per cent paid by Ireland. If Great Britain was taxed on the same scale as Ireland, Great Britain would pay £200,000,000 in taxation; while, on the other hand, if Ireland was taxed on the same scale as Great Britain, instead of paying £8,500,000, she would pay less than £5,000,000; which is about the amount at which Ireland ought to be assessed. Now I must go a little further. There is a widespread impression in this House that Ireland is the spoilt child of the Kingdom, and that she has received great favour in the shape of exemptions from taxation. I deny that it is so. Let us look closely at the taxes from which Ireland has been exempted, which are the assessed taxes—the land tax, the railway passenger duty, and for a short period the income tax. These taxes, excluding the income tax, which was speedily imposed on Ireland because a very rich gentleman transferred nearly a million of money from the English to the Irish funds so as to escape the tax, produced altogether in Great Britain about £4,000,000, and if Ireland had been obliged to contribute to all of them in proportion to what she contributes to other taxes, her contribution would have been £326,000. That sum, then, represents the whole of the exemptions which have been given to Ireland, and it is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the excessive sums taken from her in other directions. But there is another thing. It is said that Ireland gets an undue share of contributions directly from the Imperial Exchequer, and that the Government is very liberal in supporting her public institutions. Now, the contributions from the Exchequer to Great Britain are about £3,500,000, under the heads of Police, Poor Law, and Education. The amount contributed to Ireland for similar purposes is £1,768,000; and then there is £150,000 or £200,000 given to Irish institutions, to which there are no corresponding institutions in England. That brings up the total contributions from the Exchequer to about £2,000,000; but of that sum £1,000,000 goes to the support of the Irish Constabulary, a sum which ought, more properly, to appear under the head of Army Estimates. I admire the Irish Constabulary as a body; but I think it ridiculous to say, that among the grants from the Imperial Exchequer to Ireland, there should be one including the cost of an army of occupation, which that force more accurately represents. All that we get then as direct contributions from England is something less than £1,000,000, and against that we have, as I said, the revenue from Ireland amounting to £8,500,000, which is largely raised under the two heads of Excise and Customs, and of which the principal sum is derived from the spirit duties. Those duties, as everybody knows, have been from time to time augmented, first by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and then by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, until they now amount to 10s. per gallon—a point at which they have become oppressive to the Irish people. I, and others, have been accused of desiring to lower the spirit duties, and it has been said that the whole grievance of Ireland is that the Irish have to pay too much for their whiskey. These sneers are unworthy of any hon. Member who reflects at all, and they will not dispose of these discussions. For my part I have never asked for the lowering of the spirit duties, and I do not know that any friend of Ireland would make such a request. But it is quite possible by making a tax too heavy to do harm and injustice in a direction you do not contemplate. The national beverage of England, as we all know, is beer, and the national dish beef; but what makes beer so acceptable to the people of England? Why, it is the alcohol which it contains, for one glass of Bass contains nearly as much alcohol

as two glasses of sherry. It is that which makes it acceptable, as the alcohol in whiskey makes it acceptable to the Irish people. But you do not tax beer anything like so heavily as you tax whiskey. The duty on the alcohol in beer is only 1s. 9d., as compared with 10s. per gallon on whiskey. If the alcohol in beer was taxed at the same rate as the spirits which the Irish consume, there would be raised to the country from this source alone a revenue of £95,000,000 a-year—enough to pay all the taxes and reduce the National Debt besides. Notwithstanding all the facts I have stated many hon. Gentlemen are still under the belief that Ireland is now prosperous and flourishing. Let us bring this to the test of figures. When you talk of the prosperity of Ireland remember that in that country there are only 273 manufacturing establishments, employing between 80,000 and 90,000 people. If you look to the flax trade in Belfast you will find that the cultivation has fallen off to the extent of 100,000 acres, and is now very much less than it was 20 years ago. There are 57 lines of railway in Ireland; but out of that number 40 pay no dividend at all. Again, 20 years ago the fisheries of Ireland gave employment to 111,000 men, and there were 20,000 boats. Now there are only 20,000 men and 7,000 boats. Returns presented to this House show that during 1872 alone 273,000 acres went out of tillage and were either converted to pasture, or, in the case of 50,000, added to the bog and waste of Ireland. Do you call it prosperity that 2,500,000 of the people of the country in 23 years have left her shores? Remember that that emigration has taken place during the time you have been increasing the taxation, and, as I believe, greatly in consequence of it. It is said, on the other hand, that there are £30,000,000 of deposits in the banks of Ireland, but that is a misapprehension. Half of that amount does not consist of real money. It represents advances by bankers to their customers by way of discounting bills, and in other ways, which are called deposits in accordance with a peculiar system of banking which, I believe, originated in Scotland. There are only really about £15,000,000 of deposits. An apparent increase of £5,000,000, arising from the deposits of farmers, is only apparent, and is due, I desire to point out, not to the accumulations which they have made owing to the prosperity of the country, but rather to a change in habits, for small farmers no longer, as formerly, hoard their money in stockings or put it in some hole in the chimney, but deposit it in the banks, which of late years have been established in every small town. I am not at the same time prepared to deny that there are evidences that Ireland is in a better condition than it was some years ago, but how so? It is because you have largely by this excessive taxation driven away the people from the country. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] If the hon. Member who says No can confute any of the statements I have made I shall be glad; but I repeat the people have been driven away, and I will not take a cry of No for an answer to a serious indictment. Hundreds and thousands of acres which a short time ago supported families and reared strong men, now raise nothing but beasts belonging to rich graziers, residing either in this country or in Ireland. Ireland is being rapidly reduced to the condition of New Zealand; it is becoming a great grazing country. The land is in the possession of a few proprietors, who, assisted by the overwhelming taxation, have got rid of the great mass of the population, and you have now in Ireland fields which are still green, but no longer gay with the shouts and the laughter of children. A desolation has been made in many parts, and it is called prosperity. We may be told that the tide of emigration has lessened within the last 12 months. I know it, but what is the reason? Why, it is that there is now even more distress as regards employment in America, to which the emigration chiefly went, than there is in Ireland. Having said thus much, Sir, I appeal to Irish Members on both sides to support this Amendment. To other hon. Members I would also make an appeal. Ireland has been too long the battle-field of parties. Every Irish question has been considered in its political aspect, and truly enough there have been great political grievances in that country. You have, however, redressed many of the grievances in connection with the tenure of land, although the Bill passed by the late Government on that subject is far from perfect. You have also taken away the cause of religious discord, and have removed many great grievances; the chief one now being the refusal to let us manage our own affairs. I appeal to the House to take a broader view of Irish questions in future. We are linked to you by chains which, for my part, I do not wish to see snapped. Let us stand together, and be as one against the whole world; but let us each manage our own local affairs. When we come and ask for remedial measures, do not look at them as you have hitherto done with microscopic eyes or meet them with the arguments of a spurious political economy. I do not ask so much for the removal of taxation as that you should give to Ireland some increased portion of the benefit of that taxation. At present all Government manufacturing establishments are in this country. This money which you take from Ireland you spend in England on your manufacturing and other establishments for purposes of State. You return little or nothing of it to Ireland. You take capital from a poor and struggling country and add it to the capital of Great Britain. I ask you to look in a wise and statesmanlike manner and see if some portion of that amount which you raise in Ireland every year might not be laid out for the benefit of that country as you lay it out now for the benefit of England? The late Lord George Bentinck did initiate a policy of that kind; he devised a scheme for the construction by the State of railways in Ireland, and he laid that scheme before this House; and it is with shame, I confess, that his policy was defeated very much by the votes of Representatives from Ireland. The Ballot, however, has given Ireland, if not a Representation more acceptable to the House of Commons, a Representation more true. You will have no more votes of that kind from the Representatives who now come from Ireland. If the House wishes that in future England should stand firm, and if the cloud now threatening in the East is to grow larger and burst without doing any harm to this country, you must have Ireland with you; and the only way to get her with you is to do her justice, to give her all she reasonably asks, and in short to do to others as you would they should do unto you. It is in order to bring that about, Sir, that I beg to move,

as an Amendment to the Motion now before the House—

“That, in the opinion of this House, no financial arrangements can be satisfactory which are so framed as to make no provision for relieving Ireland from a burden of Taxation beyond her ability to pay as compared with Great Britain.”

THE O’CONOR DON, in seconding the Motion, said, when the Committee to which his hon. Friend had referred, had concluded its inquiries the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a Report in which the following words occurred:—

“It is not surprising that the large increase which your Committee have noticed in the general taxation between 1852 and 1862, and again in local taxation since 1845, should have given rise to complaints; nor is it surprising that louder complaints should have come from Ireland than from other parts of the United Kingdom.”

If that were true in 1862 the Chancellor of the Exchequer must admit that the complaints now made ought not to cause much surprise, for since then both Imperial and local taxation had gone on increasing. One of the great objects of bringing the subject before the House was that a contrary opinion to that which was the true one prevailed in this country with regard to Irish taxation. It was generally believed, and the belief was sedulously fostered by the Press and entertained by a majority of that House, that Ireland was favourably treated in the matter of taxation. It was, however, in fact, the greatest fallacy that ever existed. Ireland was always treated as a particular entity when grants to her were under consideration; but the moment a complaint was made as to Ireland being unfairly taxed they were told—“Ireland is not taxed at all; it is only individuals who are taxed, and, as they pay the same taxes as Englishmen, they have no reason to complain.” He admitted at once that it was only individuals who were taxed, but it was quite possible that some individuals might be more seriously affected than others by taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that indirect taxation pressed more heavily upon the weaker portion of the community than upon the stronger; and if it were admitted that the Irish community as a whole was poorer and less able to bear its burden than the English, it must be admitted that it suffered more severely in this matter of similar taxation, especially as regarded indirect taxation. To prove that similarity of taxes did not necessarily involve equality in the pressure of taxation, he would quote one instance. Suppose Ireland were inhabited by a people like the Chinese, who smoked opium instead of tobacco; and suppose opium were heavily taxed and tobacco were not taxed, surely all would admit that that tax would not press equally on the English and the Irish people. The tax would fall only on the smokers of opium, and in the case which he put would fall entirely on the community occupying a particular part of the United Kingdom. That was to a certain extent the case of Ireland at present. The beverage of the Irish people was more highly taxed than the beverage of the English; and it was from this particular tax that the greatest portion of the Irish revenue was raised. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say that this was equally true of portions of England, and that those who drank whiskey in England would be just as much taxed as the Irishmen who drank it in Ireland. He admitted that, and he would say that if there were any portion of England as distinctly marked off geographically and by legislation as Ireland was, it should also be entitled to the exemption which they claimed for Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the Report which he prepared for the Committee, said—

“The true lesson to be learned from the statements made was that it was important to make every effort for the reduction of Imperial expenditure generally.”

He should like to ask whether his right hon. Friend, since he came into office, had endeavoured to carry out that principle? Whether he had tried or not, the fact was that there had been increased expenditure within the last few years, and, with that, increased taxation. Another object in bringing forward the Motion was to disabuse the English mind of the idea that Ireland received an undue share of the Imperial expenditure. In certain matters she did receive a larger share than England. For instance, his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had alluded to the amount expended on the Royal Irish Constabulary, but he pointed out at the same time that it ought to be regarded rather as an Imperial than a local force. Local taxation in Ireland had largely increased of late, under the operation of various Public Health and Sanitary Acts, and in some parts of the country these accumulating expenses were exciting quite a terror, and in regard to them he thought aid should be given from the Imperial Exchequer. He did not desire to weary the House by entering into long details on the subject, but having taken a considerable interest in it, he did not like the debate to proceed without saying a few words upon it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, no financial arrangements can be satisfactory which are so framed as to make no provision for relieving Ireland from a burden of Taxation beyond her ability to pay as compared with Great Britain,”
—(Mr. Mitchell Henry,)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question had not advanced very much from the point at which it was left last year, when it was discussed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M’Kenna). At the same time, there could be no doubt that the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken that evening were both exceedingly well qualified to discuss the question, and had indeed done so with an amount of ability which entitled them to the respectful consideration of the House. He doubted, however, with regard to it, whether the House would be likely to arrive at any satisfactory conclusions from merely statistical discussions like the present, because the two parties did not meet upon altogether common ground. There was at the command of the Government, got together by gentlemen in their employ, a considerable amount of statistical information to which they might refer, if such a course were at all desirable, in order to show the real relation of the burdens as compared with the wealth of Ireland. Irish Members always alleged, however, that they were Dublin Castle statistics, and ought not to be appealed to. For that reason, he declined to avail himself of them last year, and although he could easily bring forward statistics against those of the hon. Gentleman, he doubted whether he could in that way very much advance his cause. Again, it was easy enough for hon. Members to show from a certain number of Returns that the taxation had increased by so much per head, and that the wealth of the country had not increased in proportion; or that England paid so much per head, while Ireland paid another proportion per head. He doubted whether by discussions of that sort they would get at any great results, because all those debates turned in the end to the conclusions arrived at by both the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House that evening. Hon. Gentlemen either arrived at the conclusion that they ought to make an alteration in the spirit duties, as compared with the duties on malt liquor and on fermented liquors in this country, or else that they ought to spend more money in Ireland than was done at present in proportion to what was spent in England. With regard to the second conclusion, he wished to point out that it was not consistent with the Resolution which the hon. Member had moved. If they were simply to go and raise more money, for the sake of expending a greater amount in aid of local burdens or improvements in Ireland, that would certainly not be reducing the burdens of the country. It was raising a different question as to whether they should deal in a different manner than they did at present with the great subject of local taxation. That was a subject in which Ireland, like all other portions of the United Kingdom, was interested, and it was a fair subject, at the proper time, for discussion. With regard to the question whether they ought to expend more money on public works in Ireland than in England, he might remark that that would be an uneconomical arrangement. The money raised for Imperial purposes ought, as it was at the present, to be expended in that part of the United Kingdom in which it could be spent with most effect. If, for example, a dockyard were removed from England to Ireland, where the cost would be increased, a burden would be imposed on the United Kingdom, including Ireland as well as England. Therefore the conclusion to which

hon. Gentlemen opposite would draw the House, though they might argue it on its own merits, was not appropriate to this question respecting the mode of raising taxation. He was willing enough to discuss the question that Ireland paid too much, but it was useless for them to attempt to meet the question by spending more money in Ireland. Was it true—nay, was it possible—that they could be raising from Ireland a greater amount of taxation than she was able to bear? That taxation was divisible roughly into two great heads. First, there was the direct taxation, which fell upon property, and which was levied in proportion to the value of that property; and, secondly, there was the indirect taxation, which fell upon articles of consumption, and which was self-regulating, inasmuch as people paid the duties on articles of consumption only as far as they were willing to use those articles. In regard to direct taxation, he did not see how it was possible for a taxpayer in Ireland to pay more in proportion to his property than a taxpayer did in England, unless, indeed, there existed a system under which one man was made to pay, say 2*d.* in the pound, while another man had to pay 3*d.* If, however, they laid the same weight of taxation on the property of all men, he did not see how there could possibly be inequality. Was there, then, any mode in which the taxation was levied that was in favour of one country as against the other? If there was such a mode, and there was a difference, no doubt, in the mode of collecting the income tax, it was not against, but in favour of Ireland. Now, what was the proportion of income tax levied as compared with the wealth of the country? Hon. Gentlemen opposite took two different tests for ascertaining the wealth of the two countries. They assumed the basis of property as assessed to the Income Tax, and on this point he would have to say something. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had made a remark on the change effected in 1870 by his Predecessor in office as to the mode in which the finance accounts were presented. He thought some light was thrown on the intention of his Predecessor in making that change by the Report of the Board of Inland Revenue in 1870. The Inland Revenue Commissioners, in their Report of 1870, said—

"A striking instance of the difficulty of drawing correct inferences from statistics of this kind was afforded in a Return printed by the House of Commons in 1868. The Return purports to show the proportion of taxation to the wealth of the country in England and Ireland respectively, and the amount assessed to Income Tax is taken as a measure of wealth in both cases. The result, as deduced from the figures, is, that in England the amount raised by taxation is £17 14s. for every £100 of Income Tax, and in Ireland £29 10s. 7½d. We trust that no one will conclude from this that the burden of taxation borne by Ireland is to that of England as 29 to 17, for a more erroneous conclusion could scarcely be arrived at. The Income Tax is taken as the common measure of wealth. Let us see what the Income Tax really represents in the two countries. We begin with Schedule A. In England the assessments on lands and houses under Schedule A are made upon the full annual value. In Ireland they are made, by special enactment to that effect, upon the valuation to the Poor Law, which we believe is, on the average, at the present time in Ireland, at least 20 per cent below the true value. The same observation applies to Schedule B. On Schedule C, when we come to consider it, still less reliance can be placed as a common measure of value than on the previous Schedule. For Schedule C represents the dividends payable at the Banks of England and Ireland respectively, and the dividends payable in the United Kingdom out of all foreign and Colonial revenues. The amount assessed in England is £32,500,000; in Ireland, £1,150,000. Not only, therefore, are there placed to the account of England alone all the investments of Scotland, Ireland, the Colonies, and foreigners in our own public funds, but also all the investments of the Irish, among others, in such securities as Indian Stock, Colonial Bonds, French Rentes, Danish, Dutch, Russian, Turkish, and other stocks of all foreign Governments. The same kind of remarks apply to Schedule D. London is the great central establishment of banks and public companies of the United Kingdom, and of many which carry on their business in the Colonies and in foreign countries. The investments of the Irish themselves in Irish companies are assessed to Income Tax not unfrequently in London, where the head offices of the companies are situated. Schedule E, again, is as fallacious a guide as the others. Under it are assessed in England £19,000,000 of salaries and pensions of public servants, and of officers of public companies, and £1,000,000 in Ireland, the officers of public companies being charged at the head office of the companies, and nearly the whole of the civil, naval, and military servants of the British Empire being also assessed in London. Even the public servants employed in Ireland are for the most part charged in England. What the truth may be as to the comparative burden from taxation in England and Ireland we are not prepared to say, but certainly the Return referred to does not afford any solution of the question."

The argument, he admitted, might have more bearings than one, but it undoubtedly showed how very fallacious were arguments founded upon statistics of this kind, when compared with the irrefutable argument furnished by the produce of the Income Tax. If the produce of a 3d. Income Tax showed that it was levied upon incomes amounting to £100,000,000, it was difficult to see how it could be argued that that £100,000,000 of income did not exist. But he was told—"Yes, but you yourself have said that with equal taxation the tax will press more heavily upon the poorer than the richer country." He quite agreed with that observation; but it applied not only to Ireland as compared with England, but to the poorer parts of the two countries as against the richer portions of them, and even to poorer individuals as against the richer ones. If that were the state of the case, let them look at what had happened since 1865. Had taxation been increased since that time so as to press more heavily upon the poorer classes in the Kingdom. Taking the present Budget, for instance—was there anything in it that would cause taxation to press more heavily upon the less wealthy classes? The truth was that since 1865 the pressure of taxation had been largely reduced. What the Government were doing at the present moment, and what they were reproached for doing, was to extend the system of exemptions in favour of the poorer classes, and in this respect, at all events, Ireland would receive its fair share of relief. There was nothing, therefore, in the Budget of the present year that was unfavourable to Ireland. Since 1865 many taxes which pressed heavily upon the poorer consumer, such as the sugar duties, had been abolished, while, on the other hand, he defied anyone to show that any single tax had been imposed that touched Ireland peculiarly. The increase in the Revenue from Ireland was due, not to an increase of the taxation, but to its increased productiveness owing to the growing wealth and prosperity of the country. [Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: What about the spirit duties?] Why, they had not been increased since 1865. Reference having been made to the spirit duties, he would remind hon. Members that having a deficit to meet he had to adopt one of two alternatives—namely, either to make an addition to the income tax or to increase the spirit duties, and he had not selected the latter, because he knew that it would press very heavily upon the poorer consumers of Ireland. Did hon. Members really mean to propose what they had hitherto shrunk from doing, that the spirit duties in Ireland should be reduced? No one, he was sure, would get up in that House and contend that, in order to relieve the pressure of taxation in Ireland, the spirit duties should be reduced. But, excepting the spirit duties, taxation had grown very little indeed of late years in Ireland. A Return which had been moved for some two years ago by the hon. Member for Youghal showed the gross Revenue of Ireland derived from taxation in the years 1841, 1851, 1861, and 1871, distinguishing the amounts received from spirits, income tax, and other items of Revenue. The curious result of that Return was, that between 1841 and 1871, if they omitted spirits, there was scarcely any increase whatever in the taxation from Ireland, although they had had the income tax extended to them. That Return showed that the amount of the Revenue was £2,943,000 in 1841, and £3,600,000 in 1871, while the Revenue of England had increased in the same period from £41,900,000 to £48,700,000; and that whereas the rate of taxation in Ireland, exclusive of the spirit duties, was 13s. per head, that in England was £1 17s. Of course, the addition of the sums raised in Ireland by means of the spirit duties made a very considerable difference in the relative amount of the taxation of the two countries. It was quite unnecessary that he should go into minute calculations as to the amount Ireland got in the way of subventions in aid of local and other purposes; but that was a question on which Government had got a very good case. Undoubtedly, Ireland received a much larger sum in that way in proportion to her wealth, her population, and her taxation than either England or Scotland. He must, however, remind hon. Members that the question under discussion was not how much Ireland ought to be assisted in the way of general taxation, but whether the financial arrangements for the present year were or were not fair, and whether they did or did not bear with any undue hardship upon her, and for the reasons he had given he could not see that they did. He did not see how direct taxation fell more heavily upon an income of £100 a-year in Ireland than it did upon a similar income in England, neither did indirect taxation in Ireland fall more heavily on the consumer in Ireland than it did upon the consumer in England or Scotland. The Government were always glad to hear these matters fully discussed, and if they saw that any unfair burden was cast upon Ireland nothing would give them greater pleasure than to release her from it. Ireland had no doubt enjoyed, and continuously enjoyed, these exemptions. The Government did not at all desire to press that there should be equality of taxation. All they said was, that there was no case whatever to show that there was any inequality as against Ireland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that what they had to complain of was this—It appeared from Returns before the House that between 1841 and 1871 the gross Revenue levied in Ireland by taxation had been increased 90 per cent, but during that period the gross Revenue levied in England had been increased scarcely 20 per cent. He admitted that by further applying the principle of a similarity of taxation, £360,000 or £370,000 more might be wrung out of Ireland; but let the House consider how differently Ireland was dealt with from Great Britain with reference to the total taxation as compared to income. Ireland paid 5s. 3d. in the pound taxation in proportion to the whole of her incomes, whereas Great Britain paid only 2s. 6d. and a fraction taxation on the whole of her incomes. If the whole of the increase of Revenue in Ireland had grown out of the spirit duty, could there be more conclusive evidence against the system applied to the taxation on spirits? Why did not the Revenue from other taxed articles increase as in England? Because Ireland was not in a prosperous state. The taxation on spirits in Ireland had increased £2,500,000, from £900,000 to £3,400,000. This increase of taxation was laid on a beverage that he was sorry to say was too much in vogue among his countrymen. But what had been the course pursued with reference to beverages most in use in England? The duty on malt had been reduced, and there had been a reduction in the wine duty. As a defence of the duty on spirits in Ireland, it was said that it was a tax paid by individuals who by refraining from the use of spirits could escape from the tax; but spirits being the beverage of the generality of the people of Ireland, the argument as to the tax being a tax upon individuals did not apply. The people of England were a cheese-eating people, and if a tax were imposed upon cheese in this country, could it be said to be a tax merely upon individuals? The people of England would resist the imposition of such a tax; but, as very little cheese was eaten in Ireland, the people of that country would not care if a tax were imposed upon cheese. The people of Ireland did not complain of the present proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but rather of the whole course of fiscal legislation since 1851, which had relieved England and pressed upon Ireland, and which was justified on the assumption that similarity of impost was equivalent to equality of taxation, which was the fundamental error.

DR. WARD supported the Resolution, maintaining that injury and injustice were done to Ireland as compared with England under the present system of taxation. Whatever arguments might be put forward, the great fact remained that Ireland paid 5s. in the pound as against 2s. 6d. paid by England; and so long as that was the case Ireland would feel unjustly taxed. Beyond that, everything pointed to this conclusion—that, comparatively with England, the individual poverty and the anomalies of poverty in Ireland were enormous.

MR. BUTT said, he had heard no answer to the case made out by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). Ireland contributed to the Imperial taxation—amounting this year to £78,000,000—£8,500,000, and Great Britain £69,500,000. That was not in proportion to the relative ability of the two countries. Allow him just to ask the attention of the House for a moment to the state of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer began the question as to the taxation of Ireland by showing that so far as it was founded on the income tax there must be a very minute difference. Even if there were some little inaccuracy in the manner in which his hon. Friend had calculated the income of Ireland, owing to the different mode of levying the income tax there, that would not materially alter the question at issue. They might increase the income of Ireland from £48,000,000 to £52,000,000 or £53,000,000, and reduce that of England by £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, but the great injustice would remain all the same. He could not think the Resolution was foreign to the Bill before the House. They charged the right hon. Gentleman not with sins of omission, but with sins of commission; and by that Resolution they sought redress. It was idle to say that for commercial purposes Ireland was not in the same community. When they had a community they could not take away money from the community without injuring it. From the time of the Union down to the present day the finance of Ireland had always been dealt with as something belonging to a separate community, and when remissions were made in favour of any class in Ireland they always heard of the boons granted to that country. Suppose Ireland was now obliged to pay to England, as she did before 1817, by taxation of her own, a sum of £8,500,000, would that not be injustice? If they raised the same tax on spirits as they proposed, would they say that no injustice was done to Ireland? The question could not stop where it was; it was not to be met by the answer—"Do you ask us to reduce the duties on spirits?" He knew that they could not ask the Government to upset the whole trade on their taxation, right or wrong. They had arranged that the rest of taxation should be raised, but he called upon them, if they imposed one that did weigh heavily upon Ireland, to remedy the injustice—they did it in the rest of their financial schemes—and frame another tax, and give the relief to Ireland to the same extent as the tax they imposed. It was for them to devise that. But at the same time he must say for himself that he thought there was a great deal said that was not true about the high duty on spirits. He did not believe they suppressed drunkenness in proportion as they raised the price of spirits. Whenever they increased the price of a commodity they more or less diminished the consumption, but it was equally true—and it was one of the elementary principles of political economy—that an increase of price diminished the consumption of articles of first necessity far less than of articles of luxury. Unhappily, to the drunkard strong drink was a prime necessity, and they could not prevent him drinking strong spirits in the proportion as they raised the price. It was a common experience that a man would give up his dinner often and sell his clothes to have strong drink; but he said they were not asking them to reduce the duty on spirits. They were asking to have an injustice now done to Ireland removed. The injustice was not denied; it had been admitted in the course of the debate, and there was no case made out why it should not be remedied. Irish Members would have neglected their duty if they had not entered a mild protest against the continuance of a fiscal injustice; and, if the grievance was not redressed, he believed that another Budget would not be allowed to pass without much stronger opposition.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not want to divide, and would withdraw his Motion; but he might state that he thought the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not meet the case: and, however that might be, he was sure that the financial grievances of Ireland would not be lessened by the contempt with which they had always been treated by the front Opposition bench.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 25th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Question, That the Preamble be postponed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not desire to raise a debate on the general principle of the Bill, he simply rose to make some observations which were of a somewhat personal nature, and had reference to what passed in the course of the discussion on the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill on Thursday last. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department made some remarks upon a pamphlet issued by a certain society with which he (Sir Charles Dilke) was connected—

MR. STAVELEY HILL rose to Order. He wished to ask the Chairman whether it was competent for the hon. Baronet, on the Question that the Preamble be postponed, to enter into a discussion on the general principle of the Bill. He was aware in one or two instances it had been allowed; but he would refer to the authority of Sir Erskine May to show that the reason why the Preamble was generally postponed was that the provisions of a Bill might be made consonant with any Amendments which might be introduced into its clauses in Committee, and that it was not usual on such an occasion to discuss its principle.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER reminded the Committee that on the Question that the Preamble of the Lands Titles Bill be postponed, last Session, he, when about to make some remarks on the general subject, had been called to Order, and that the Chairman ruled it was not competent for him to make those remarks.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had distinctly said that it was not his intention to raise any discussion on the general question at all, but simply to call attention to a statement affecting himself.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE also understood that the hon. Baronet had no intention of entering into a discussion of the general question. He was surprised at the intervention of the hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill).

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire has correctly stated the reason which has led to the Preamble being generally postponed—namely, in order that its provisions may be made consonant with any Amendments made in the clauses of the Bill. That is, no doubt, a reason why the Committee has almost invariably been content to postpone the Preamble without any discussion thereon. The Motion has, I think, been regarded as one of those practical conveniences, enabling a question to be raised as to the proceedings of the Minister or Member in charge of the Bill. On it a Question could be asked and answered; it is analogous to other Motions, such as that the Bill be reported with Amendments, but it is not intended for general discussion. At the same time, I must state to the Committee that on more than one occasion this rule has been departed from. Last year there was a very notable instance of this. A noble Lord, occupying a position of great authority in the House, made a speech upon the general question, upon the Motion that the Preamble be postponed. I entertained great doubt at the time whether it was right that I should allow that course to be taken; but, on referring to precedents. I found that in one instance the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) had entered into a discussion on the principle of a Bill on the Motion that the Preamble be postponed. Therefore, I did not feel myself at liberty to stop the noble Lord, though if my opinion had been asked, I should have stated to the House what I have now stated. The hon. Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) states that on a similar question I prevented him from discussing the principle of a Bill. I have no recollection of the circumstance at this moment; but I am rather inclined to think that some hon. Member having challenged the course taken by the hon. Baronet, I may have expressed my opinion as to the irregularity and inconvenience of the proceeding, and that the hon. Baronet, with that regard which he always has to the practice of the House, had willingly postponed his observations. I did not stop the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), because I understood his observations had no reference to the general object of the Bill, but that he was entering into something which was more in the nature of a personal explanation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that was so. He wished rather to give the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) an opportunity of making a personal explanation. Beyond that he merely desired to offer a few observations to the Committee in answer to the remarks which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Having been for some years Chairman of the Commons Preservation Society, and subsequently an active member of it, he considered himself partly responsible for the statements of the pamphlet. He had read it in proof, and had attended the two meetings at which it was discussed. He thought they had a right to call upon the Home Secretary to point out the passage which he characterized as untrue, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple), the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), Mr. Andrew Johnstone (formerly a Member of that House), and others, were prepared to stand by the statements which it contained. As to the other remark of the Home Secretary, that the pamphlet had formed the foundation of the Petitions against the Bill, a large number of Petitions were sent in before the pamphlet appeared. There had been no sending out Petitions from a central London office, and the Commons Preservation Society had had nothing to do with any organized Petitioning against the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had attempted to throw discredit upon the Petitions which had been presented against the Bill, because they were founded upon the statements in the pamphlet, which he characterized as untrue. There was no foundation for that statement of the right hon. Gentleman, for 228 Petitions out of 240 were presented before the pamphlet appeared, and there had been an entire absence of anything like an attempt to raise up opposition to the Bill amongst the agricultural labourers. With regard to the pamphlet itself, he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had written a certain portion of it, and the remainder was written by Mr. Hunter, who knew more about the subject of commons than any person in this country, and who had been professionally engaged in the great Epping Forest suit, and in all the other recent suits affecting commons. He affirmed that the pamphlet was a true, candid, and fair statement, and that the Home Secretary's extravagant language had no reasonable foundation. The right hon. Gentleman should credit his opponents with good motives, and not launch out into extravagant language about untruthful statements.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was glad there was some such society as a Commons Preservation Society, and no one would be more ready to join it than he, if its objects were practicable. He had always stated that great care should be taken that no common should be inclosed which ought not to be so treated. With regard to the question raised in the Petitions, he was glad to hear what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who had spoken; but he must add that the practice which was growing of central associations in London sending out Petitions over the country to be signed would not enhance their value. With regard to the pamphlet, what he meant to say was, not that its statements were untrue, but that it gave an untrue and unfair description of the Bill. There were a great many things in the Bill which were not to be found in the pamphlet, and when a pamphlet of the kind was put forward on behalf of a society, it would have been wiser to give all that was to be found in the Bill. For example, the pamphlet made no reference to the fact that he had embodied in the Bill the 10 recommendations of the Select Committee of 1869; it drew no distinction between inclosure and regulation; and it omitted all allusion to the fact that he intended to propose a Standing Committee to deal with these inclosure schemes, and to the great feature with respect to the presentation to Parliament of separate Reports, with verbatim copies of the evidence, upon each case that was dealt with by the Commissioners. He would, however, willingly withdraw the word "untrue" and substitute "unfair." His great object was to see that no inclosure should take place which ought not to take place, and which was not approved of by the calm judgment of the House. That he believed the provisions of the Bill would accomplish.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that he was in no manner responsible for the words and terms of the pamphlet, having been absent from the meeting of the Commons Preservation Society at the time it was prepared, owing to illness. He disclaimed all intention on the part of the Commons Preservation Society to prejudice or misrepresent the case of the right hon. Gentleman, but he believed they had not made any misrepresentation as to facts.

MR. FAWCETT explained that the reason why he and his Friends opposed the Motion for the postponement of the Preamble was because they felt that the observations of the Home Secretary in reference to the pamphlet cast undeserved reflections upon them. He could assure the Committee that every line of that pamphlet had been most carefully considered and submitted to Mr. Hunter. He complained that the Preamble of the Act of 1845, which said it was desirable to facilitate the inclosure of commons, was left unrepealed, while, as the Home Secretary had explained, the Preamble of this Bill was to retard inclosure and facilitate regulation. Thus there would be two Preambles of co-existing Acts, such Preambles being quite contradictory. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to repeal the Preamble of the Act of 1845?

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, that what the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fawcett) evidently wanted was a declaration in the Preamble that there should be no inclosure. He had raised precisely the same point in the Committee of 1871-2, when he made a proposition which was supported by no one but himself, the other 11 Members voting against it. In the legislation proposed, the Government were taking a perfectly intelligible course. They were introducing a Bill which professed to give no facilities for inclosures; but, at the same time, they were not prepared to say that there should be no inclosures at all. He deprecated the strong reflections recently cast by the hon. Gentlemen upon the Inclosure Commissioners, who had simply acted in conformity with their instructions and with the spirit of the Act of 1845.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was far from blaming the Inclosure Commissioners, but the defence just offered for them furnished the strongest reason for repealing expressly the Preamble of the Act of 1845, under which the Commissioners had acted.

MR. GOLDNEY thought that the words contained in the Preamble of the Bill, that in future inclosures regard should be had to the benefit of the neighbourhood as well as to private interests, were quite sufficient to show the bearing of the measure.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, admitting that the Bill was a step in advance for a Conservative Government, which was due to the subject having progressed by rapid strides of late years, said, it nevertheless followed too closely a direction in the Act of 1845 which had not worked satisfactorily, and had led to the wholesale inclosure of commons.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he had put on the Paper an Amendment which, if it was accepted, would make clearer the declared intentions of the Government.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, no Preamble had any binding authority, but was simply an interpreting document. There was another matter to be considered besides the Preamble, and that was the title of the Bill. The Act of 1845 was an Act to facilitate the Inclosure and Improvement of Commons. That was entirely an Inclosure Act, and accordingly such open places as came under it ceased, by the very terms of the enactment, to be commons, and were treated as inclosures, whereas the present was, on the contrary, a Bill for facilitating the Regulation and Improvement of Commons, and Amending the Act relating to the Enclosure of commons. By this Bill commons, in coming under its operation, did not cease to be commons, but had that character preserved to them by being "regulated" as such. It was very unfair to infer the policy of the Commissioners, when they should have to administer an Act for preserving commons from that which they had pursued when administering one for the cessation of commons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Bill was really an extension of a regulation Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in 1861, and the only reason for having a Preamble was to draw special attention to its object. When they came to discuss it, he might have no objection to the introduction of words to make it more elastic within certain limits.

MR. FAWCETT again urged that his objection to leaving the Preamble of the Act of 1845 unrepealed was not answered. The Preamble of that Act had been acted upon by the Commissioners, and when the Act itself was quoted as having influenced their conduct, he wanted to know what security there would be, if that Preamble remained unrepealed, that it would not have an influence on them for the future.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, a Preamble could not be repealed. Such a thing had never been done.

MR. GREGORY thought they were fighting a shadow. All the Preamble

did was to recite the operative part of the Act of 1845. It did not recite the Preamble of that Act, nor could any Preamble have effect, so far as it was inconsistent with the subsequent provisions. The present Preamble then went on to say that further provision for the protection of commons was desirable, and the Bill contained those new provisions: so that both the Preamble and the Act of 1845 were entirely overridden, and only so much of the machinery of the latter adopted as would be convenient in carrying out the latter enactment. He regretted the attack made on the Inclosure Commissioners by the hon. Member for Hackney. In his (Mr. Gregory's) opinion they had zealously and usefully performed their duty. In order to show the unfairness of the attack he would take two of the cases which had been referred to. The first was a common of 31 acres in the parish of Wolstanton, no doubt in the immediate neighbourhood of large and populous towns, but what was stated as the reason for its inclosure?

"That the land was wet and marshy; the turf peeled. The fets and open drains receptacles for refuse, and breeding places of fever, ague, and rheumatic complaints, epidemics frequently prevail, and the marsh in its present condition is a nuisance."

The other was a common alleged to be in the vicinity of Sheffield, whereas it was in fact several miles from that town, and never resorted to by the inhabitants of it, who had large tracts of common land almost up to their very doors, but being on the borders of three counties—Notts, Derby, and Yorkshire—it was much resorted to for training, prize and dog fighting, and other illegal purposes, and had become a perfect nuisance to the neighbourhood. The hon. Member for Hackney further said, that the Commissioners had out of 60,000 acres only set apart 7,000 acres for recreation; but the fact was that they had set apart 14,000 acres of the best land for the construction of roads, the erection of schools for recreation, and other purposes, which tended greatly to public advantage.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he had no wish to attack the Inclosure Commissioners, but he thought they had taken a narrow view of their duties, in facilitating every inclosure without taking into consideration the benefits regard to the pamphlet, what he meant to say was, not that its statements were untrue, but that it gave an untrue and unfair description of the Bill. There were a great many things in the Bill which were not to be found in the pamphlet, and when a pamphlet of the kind was put forward on behalf of a society, it would have been wiser to give all that was to be found in the Bill. For example, the pamphlet made no reference to the fact that he had embodied in the Bill the 10 recommendations of the Select Committee of 1869; it drew no distinction between inclosure and regulation; and it omitted all allusion to the fact that he intended to propose a Standing Committee to deal with these inclosure schemes, and to the great feature with respect to the presentation to Parliament of separate Reports, with verbatim copies of the evidence, upon each case that was dealt with by the Commissioners. His great object was to see that no inclosure should take place which ought not to take place, and which was not approved of by the calm judgment of the House. be two Preambles of such Preambles being tory. He wished to know right hon. Gentleman the Preamble of the Act

SIR WALTER BARTON said that what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fawcett) evidently meant by his declaration in the Preamble should be no inclosure. He pointed out precisely the same point in the Preamble of 1871-2, when he had introduced a Bill which was supported by himself, the other 11 Members against it. In the legislation the Government were taking an intelligible course. They were introducing a Bill which provided facilities for inclosures; but at the same time, they were not prepared to say there should be no inclosure. He deprecated the strong reflection cast by the hon. Gentleman on the Inclosure Commissioners. They had simply acted in conformity with the instructions and with the spirit of the Act of 1845.

SIR CHARLES W. DILLON said he was far from blaming the Inclosure Commissioners, but the Government offered for them furnished no reason for repealing the expiring clause of the Act of 1845. He said the Commissioners had acted in conformity with the Act of 1845.

MR. GOLDNEY then moved for words contained in the Preamble of the Bill. that in future inclosures should be made in conformity with the Act of 1845.

satisfactorily, and had led to the wholesale inclosure of commons.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he had put on the Paper an Amendment which, if it was accepted, would make clearer the declared intentions of the Government.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, no Preamble had any binding authority, but was simply an interpreting document. There was another matter to be considered besides the Preamble, and that was the title of the Bill. The Act of 1845 was an Act to facilitate the Inclosure and Improvement of Commons. That was entirely an Inclosure Act, and accordingly such open places as came under it ceased, by the very terms of the enactment, to be commons, and were treated as inclosures, whereas the present was, on the contrary, a Bill for facilitating the Regulation and Improvement of Commons, and Amending the Act relating to the Enclosure of commons. By this Bill commons, in coming under its operation, did not cease to be commons, but had that character preserved to them by being "regulated" as such. It was very unfair to infer the policy of the Commissioners, when they should have to administer an Act for preserving commons from that which they had pursued when administering one for the cessation of commons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Bill was really an extension of a regulation Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in 1861, and the only reason for having a Preamble was to draw special attention to its object. When they came to discuss it, he might have no objection to the introduction of words to make it more elastic within certain limits.

MR. FAWCETT again urged that his objection to leaving the Preamble of the Act of 1845 unrepealed was not answered. The Preamble of that Act had been acted upon by the Commissioners, and when the Act itself was quoted as having influenced their conduct, he wanted to know what security there would be, if that Preamble remained unrepealed, that it would not have an influence on them for the future.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, a Preamble could not be repealed. Such a thing had never been done.

MR. GREGORY thought they were fighting a shadow. All the Preamble

did was to recite the operative part of the Act of 1845. It did not recite the Preamble of that Act, nor could any Preamble have effect, so far as it was inconsistent with the subsequent provisions. The present Preamble then went on to say that further provision for the protection of commons was desirable, and the Bill contained those new provisions: so that both the Preamble and the Act of 1845 were entirely overridden, and only so much of the machinery of the latter adopted as would be convenient in carrying out the latter enactment. He regretted the attack made on the Inclosure Commissioners by the hon. Member for Hackney. In his (Mr. Gregory's) opinion they had zealously and usefully performed their duty. In order to show the unfairness of the attack he would take two of the cases which had been referred to. The first was a common of 31 acres in the parish of Wolstanton, no doubt in the immediate neighbourhood of large and populous towns, but what was stated as the reason for its inclosure?

"That the land was wet and marshy; the turf peeled. The fets and open drains receptacles for refuse, and breeding places of fever, ague, and rheumatic complaints, epidemics frequently prevail, and the marsh in its present condition is a nuisance."

The other was a common alleged to be in the vicinity of Sheffield, whereas it was in fact several miles from that town, and never resorted to by the inhabitants of it, who had large tracts of common land almost up to their very doors, but being on the borders of three counties—Notts, Derby, and Yorkshire—it was much resorted to for training, prize and dog fighting, and other illegal purposes, and had become a perfect nuisance to the neighbourhood. The hon. Member for Hackney further said, that the Commissioners had out of 60,000 acres only set apart 7,000 acres for recreation; but the fact was that they had set apart 14,000 acres of the best land for the construction of roads, the erection of schools for recreation, and other purposes, which tended greatly to public advantage.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he had no wish to attack the Inclosure Commissioners, but he thought they had taken a narrow view of their duties, in facilitating every inclosure without taking into consideration the benefits arising from lands in their uninclosed condition.

Question put, and agreed to; Preamble postponed accordingly.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

PART I.

LAW AS TO THE REGULATION AND INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.

Applications in relation to Commons.

Clause 2 (Alternative provisional order for regulation or inclosure of Commons).

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE moved, as an Amendment, the insertion of words at the end of the clause, to the effect that after the passing of the Act the Commissioners should entertain no application for the inclosure of any common, but only for the regulation of it. The purpose of the facilities given by the Inclosure Acts had been the growth of corn, and the best land was already inclosed. The feeding of cattle was obtained as well by regulated pasture as by converting common land into private property. No public advantage was secured by changing commons into private parks, woods, or game preserves. Though individual labourers might be compensated, their successors, as a class, were deprived of comfort and profits. The loss to the public would be severe when all waste lands were fenced in, and they ceased to be used for public enjoyment and recreation. The open land in England was not more than sufficient, and certainly facilities for inclosures should not be given. Perhaps in particular districts there might be advantages to the neighbourhood by inclosing, and thus creating a demand for labour; but still the land had probably been open ever since the Norman Conquest, and there was no particular reason that it should be inclosed just at this time. He believed that the Amendment which he proposed would be an advantage in carrying out more effectively the object which the Secretary of State said he had in view in proposing the measure.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 31, to leave out all the words after the word "Common," to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words "but after the passing of this Act the Commissioners shall not entertain an application for the inclosure of any Common or any part thereof; and notwithstanding any proceedings taken under any Act other than this Act, or any Provisional Order of the Commissioners made but not already confirmed by Act of Parliament, proceedings may be taken under this Act for the regulation of any Common,"—(Mr. Cowper-Temple),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. GOLDNEY differed very materially from the right hon. Gentleman, though he would endeavour to identify his own feelings with those of the right hon. Gentleman so far as he could. He, however, was sure that the plan proposed would to some extent be destructive of the object sought—the regulation of commons. Now, he maintained, that inclosure and regulation were necessarily hand in hand. The right of common was nothing more than the right of certain persons to enjoy rights of a definite kind over the land of another. Common rights were of three sorts—appendant to certain estates, appurtenant to certain districts, or common in gross; and the common rights was mostly of four kinds—feeding animals on the land, catching fish, cutting turf, or cutting wood. If all the persons so interested in the lands agreed, then it could be inclosed without the action of the Inclosure Commissioners, who were only required when some of the parties did not agree. The Bill provided that in regulating commons they might purchase up certain interests; but still a man might say that he would not have money, that he would only forfeit his right upon having a portion of the land allotted to him. To arrange in such a case there must be a power of inclosure. In many instances also inclosure was of the greatest benefit. At present the public had not the full enjoyment of commons, for certain persons could insist on cutting wood, digging gravel, and exercising their other rights at the best places, and he could fully bear out the statement of the leading journal that commons were often taken possession of by a low class of people, to the exclusion of the respectable portion of the public. In his opinion, the present Bill was rather hard upon the owners of land, and especially upon the lords of manors. He declared that it was the most liberal and advanced measure on the subject that had been introduced into Parliament during his experience.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE contended that the Bill should be confined to the regulation of commons, which had never yet been tried on any large scale, and that inclosures should be postponed for five or six years, in order to give a fair trial to the schemes for regulations. If the regulation schemes succeeded, it would not be necessary to proceed to inclosure. His fear was that if they offered the alternative of inclosure, parties would not be found to put the scheme for the regulation of commons into operation. He entirely disagreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken that this measure was the most liberal and advanced one which had been introduced into Parliament. It did not compare in this respect with the Bill of 1871.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was impossible for the Government to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), for the reason that if all inclosure was stopped, they would be doing all they could to further illegal inclosure. The Committee had already decided, by a very large majority, that it would not interfere with the rights of the lords of the manors or of the commoners without compensation. That question might be considered as settled. The Bill was accompanied with proper safeguards, and, under its regulations, it would be found that the commoners would derive much greater benefit from their commons than they had ever done before. Moreover, he believed that lords of the manor and commoners would not make application for inclosure where there was any chance of its being opposed and lost. Therefore he did not apprehend the dangers entertained by the hon. Gentleman, and he hoped the Committee would assent to the scheme propounded in the Bill. On the other hand, the Amendment would so mutilate the measure as to make it hardly worth passing into law.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that on the last occasion when this subject was before the House he voted in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), because he thought it desirable that commons near large towns ought to be preserved. But he thought that commons of that kind and those situated in distant parts of the country stood on a very different ground. He was opposed to the present Amendment, for he thought it would be to the benefit both of the lord of the manor and of commoners that in certain cases provided for inclosures should take place. He thought that commons under the authority of the Crown ought to be brought within the purview of the Act. While the Bill provided facilities for keeping open commons near large towns, it did not provide sufficient facilities for inclosing the waste lands in remote and hilly districts such as he knew in North Wales, and especially in Cardiganshire. They were held, not in common but in severalty. The consequence was, that the sheepwalks were over-stocked, to the injury of the farmers themselves as well as of the community. The Returns on this point were misleading. He knew of one district in which the waste and uninclosed lands were given at 460 acres, whereas they amounted to 20,000 acres. He hoped the Government would provide greater facilities for the inclosure of such wastes in remote and thinly-populated districts. He was sure such a measure would be popular throughout the whole country.

MR. WALSH agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris as to the necessity of inclosures, and said that large commons in remote districts—like that in his own county (Radnorshire), which embraced 28,000 acres—should be dealt with on a different footing from suburban commons of 100 or 200 acres. These large commons led to constant feuds and bad blood, to sheep stealing; while, in his own part of the country, one of the chief reasons given for the spread of foot-and-mouth disease was the indiscriminate feeding of sheep on commonable lands.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE supported the Amendment. He asserted that mountain pastures such as were referred to by the two last speakers were exceptional cases, and might with advantage be dealt with by Private Bills. He would also observe that sections of the Act other than that under discussion would give the Commissioners ample power to deal with any quarrels that might arise as to common rights in the case of regulated pastures.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he was glad to hear some common sense on the subject after the poetical talk to which they had listened from some hon. Members. These wastes in remote districts ought to be inclosed, for in their present state they simply encouraged a race of "squatters," a most miserable class of neighbours, and the lands undrained and uncared-for were a source of disease. He thought it would be advisable to separate the regulation from the inclosure clauses in the Bill.

MR. HOPWOOD supported the Amendment of the right hon. Member for South Hants. Whatever might be the case in the remote healthy districts to which hon. Members had referred, he hoped the Government would take care that in the Home and Southern counties the small open spaces in the neighbourhood of large populations would be preserved for public recreation.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT based his opposition to the Amendment on the argument that it would neither be possible nor politic to make a law that should apply to all commons. He was disposed to allow commons to remain open where they would be for the benefit of the district, but held that it was monstrous to lay down the proposition that no commons whatever should be inclosed, as many inclosures would be for the benefit of the country. He wished to see each question as it arose dealt with on its merits. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment who was to pay for the expense of regulating those commons under the Bill. Was the cost to be borne by the lords of the manor or the commoners? In either case he believed it would be difficult to work the Act. Much of what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen opposite was nothing but "wild talk," and he challenged them to point out in what possible way the poor man would be deprived of any right that he possessed at the present moment.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he could not agree in the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Baronet in opposition to the Amendment. He did not understand it as going to the extent of prohibiting inclosures altogether. He was of opinion that the Bill did not sufficiently provide for the interests of those who, perhaps, could not claim to have rights in the strictly legal sense, but who had undoubtedly exercised the privilege of enjoyment over commons for centuries. The object of the Amendment was to impress on the Committee that the Act of 1845, which might have been at the time considered satisfactory, inasmuch as it gave power to bring portions of the commons into cultivation for the increased production of food and the increased employment of labour, was now no longer required as the objects which that Act had in view, had been sufficiently attained. Looking at all the circumstances, he approved of the Amendment, and should give his vote in support of it.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE pointed out the error of supposing that it was commonly the interest of the lord of the manor to inclose, and that of the commoners to keep the commons open. He thought there would have been a great deal more to say for the Amendment if it had prohibited all inclosures whatsoever. That might have been impossible, but it would at least have made the proposal a consistent one. He would urge his right hon. Friend opposite not to press the Amendment to a division; for, as he understood the drift of it, it would not prevent illegal inclosures while it would take away that control over possible inclosures which might be given under the remaining clauses of the Bill by shutting the door on all but high-handed proceedings.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, as he understood his right hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment, he said—"You have suspended the inclosure of commons for the last six years, and you now come forward with a scheme which you call a Bill for the regulation of commons, which would give you a power to inclose." But legislation for the future must be guided by the experience of the past, in which several objectionable inclosures had been proposed by the Commissioners, and he contended that admitted abuses could be got rid of by regulation without inclosure. They were asked who were to pay the expenses of those proposals. Let the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill answer that. He had received a number of letters from gentlemen on this subject, and amongst them from rectors of parishes, expressing their disapproval of the scheme for inclosing the commons and taking them from the people. With the object and spirit of those letters he entirely agreed, seeing that some of the commons scheduled in the last Report of the Commissioners were the most beautiful commons in England. He would be glad to know to what commons the Bill would apply.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Bill would apply to commons of a different character from those of Wisden and Withycombe, which the Commissioners had proposed to inclose, but whose schemes the House refused to sanction. For his own part, he had never attempted to pass any one of such schemes through Parliament. He could not accept the Amendment, and trusted the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cowper-Temple) would not press it to a division.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, the alternative of inclosure or regulation did not give the latter fair play. More money could be made by individuals out of a common by making it saleable private property than by improving it as joint property. But the public interest was not promoted by inclosure. The Bill would work better for the welfare of the nation if his Amendment were carried, and therefore he would divide the House.

LORD HENRY SCOTT opposed the Amendment, urging that if the Bill were confined to the mere regulating provisions, they would be thrown back, as regarded inclosures, upon the Act of 1845, which it was most desirable to amend in the way proposed by the Government.

MR. FAWCETT contended that the argument of the Home Secretary, that if they accepted the Amendment it would very much increase the temptation to inclose commons without the intervention of Parliament, had no foundation. He did not see how the Amendment could be rejected consistently with the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. The admirable regulating scheme proposed by him would be rendered nugatory, if it were accompanied by provisions for inclosure. In answer to the assertion that the existence of commons encouraged a lawless set of persons to squat upon or near them, he would refer to the evidence given before the Select Committee of last Session in relation to the New Forest, which showed that the existence of that large tract of uninclosed ground had tended to foster the settlement on its borders of a honest and independent class of people. In reply to the challenge which had been thrown out to him to state what the right of the public was in regard to the Sussex commons, he said as one of the landless public he enjoyed the right and privilege of wandering over all the commons which existed in the Kingdom. But the moment the commons were inclosed every rood of this public land was converted into private property.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 66: Majority 137.

On the Motion of Mr. WHITWELL, Amendment made in page 2, line 32, by inserting after "commons," the words "or parts of a common."

MR. FAWCETT moved as an Amendment, in page 3, line 6, to insert the following words after "effect:"—"unless they are of opinion that such application will be for the benefit of the neighbourhood."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to the principle of this Amendment, only it came in the wrong place.

MR. FAWCETT said, under those circumstances, he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved an Amendment, to the effect that while application might be made by two-thirds of the commoners for inclosure, one-third of the commoners might apply for regulation.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS objected to the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the House having decided that inclosures were to take place, he was anxious that they should not take place in any other way outside the present measure. He would therefore move as an Amendment, in page 3, line 9, after "order," to insert the following words:—

"From and after the passing of this Act any inclosure of a Common, Town Green, or Village Green existing at the time of the passing of this Act, or of any part thereof, shall be unlawful, unless sanctioned by Parliament under the provisions of this Act."

He must remind the House that during the last few years numerous attempts had been made to inclose commons under the pretended sanction of the Statute of Merton or otherwise. Lords of manors had arbitrarily seized commons, trusting that no one would undertake the vast cost of proceedings in Chancery to resist them. Fortunately, in every case public spirited persons had been found who had undertaken the task of resisting these inclosures, and a series of suits had been promoted, which culminated in the great Epping Forest suit. If every one of these cases the Courts of Law had decided that the inclosures were illegal. It might, therefore, be confidently stated that, although theoretically, a lord of the manor could inclose with the consent of the commoners, yet that practically it was impossible for him to obtain this consent, and that all inclosures were illegal which had not been sanctioned by Parliament. This was in conformity with the views of all lawyers for centuries, for if not, why was it that so many thousand private Inclosure Acts had been applied for and passed by Parliament, and why was a general Inclosure Act necessary? If an inclosure took place with the consent of Parliament, the interests of the public were considered, and the claims of the labouring poor for garden allotments were provided for; but if inclosure took place without Parliamentary sanction, no such consideration was given either to the public or to the labouring poor. If there was any ground for believing that these inclosures were legal, he would not ask for such a remedy; but the experience of the last 10 years had conclusively shown that all such inclosures were illegal, and that it was only necessary to institute a suit in the name of a commoner, though at a vast cost, in order to abate them. It might be said, why not, then, trust to the remedies already provided by the Courts of Law? The answer was that the prize at stake was so valuable that it was worth while to a lord of a manor arbitrarily to inclose or to run the risk of being opposed in the Courts of Law; on the other hand, the commoner was called upon to defend, at a vast expense, a right of common of little or no pecuniary value to him, where success only resulted in leaving things as they were in preserving the common from inclosure, and in maintaining a right of turbary, the value of which consisted in its being the means of keeping the common open. It appeared to him that these cases of arbitrary inclosure had become a great scandal. They amounted to land robberies on a great scale, and they ought to be put down in the interest not only of the public, but of morality.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, after the word "order," to insert the words "From and after the passing of this Act any inclosure of a Common, Town Green, or Village Green, or of any part thereof, shall be unlawful, unless sanctioned by Parliament under the provisions of this Act."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. SANDFORD opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would interfere with the rights of property by not only prohibiting lords of manors from inclosing commons under the provision of the Statute of Merton, but also denying them the power so to do even though the whole of the commoners consented. What was complained of was the practice which some lords of manors pursued of filching pieces of commons, inclosing them, and taking the chance of commoners instituting Chancery suits to upset illegal proceedings of the kind. The fault of the Bill was that it offered no opposition to such cases, and he would on the Report bring up a clause to deal with them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS opposed the Amendment, remarking that it would involve an interference with the rights of property, against which the House had already decided by an overwhelming majority on the early stage of the Bill. The principle the Bill went upon was that they should not take away rights without giving compensation, and he must endeavour to confine the measure to giving power to acquire rights by paying for them. The Bill already provided against illegal inclosures; but if his hon. Friend the Member for Maldon thought he could improve upon the proposal contained in the Bill, his suggestions should receive careful attention.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE denied that the Amendment was an attack on the rights of property, and maintained that it was necessary to prevent lords of manors and commoners, in concert or separately, from filching hundreds of acres from the commons, to the detriment of their poorer neighbours.

MR. LEEMAN said, that the Amendment would have an ex post facto operation. It applied to every "existing" inclosure, and under it every inclosure of a common since the time of Adam might be held to be bad.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE did not think the words of the Amendment included past inclosures; it was certainly not intended that they should, and on no principle of construction could it be held that they had this interpretation. The words had been inserted with the object of limiting the application of the Amendment and not of extending it.

MR. GREGORY also was of opinion that the Amendment would have an ex post facto operation.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN thought it would be a pity for the Committee to go to a division on a false issue; and would, therefore suggest an Amendment of the proposed Amendment, to prevent the possibility of such a result, and to ensure something being done towards putting a stop to illegal enclosures.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved to Amend the proposed Amendment by omitting the words "existing at the time of the passing of this Act."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would consent to the omission of the words, though he could not admit they had the meaning imputed to them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought it did not make the slightest difference whether the words were retained or omitted. What he said was, that they had no right to interfere with the rights of property. The proposed omission the Committee might accept without a word, and then they could negative the whole thing. He thought the omission, however, had better be negatived.

Amendment of said proposed Amendment negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 206: Majority 124.

MR. PARNELL said, notwithstanding the result of the division, and recollecting that two hours of the valuable time of the House had been wasted the other night—"Oh, oh!" He said "Yes"

—two hours of their valuable time had been wasted the other night.—[Renewed cries of "Oh!"] He said "wasted."—[Laughter, and loud cries of "Oh!"] Notwithstanding that two hours of their valuable time had been "wasted" the other night by hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House in opposing a Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney, and notwithstanding the interest taken in the measure, he would now move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Committee would consent to pass the clause under the discussion, as it had been thoroughly discussed. As soon as that had been done, and Clause 3, to which an Amendment had been proposed, had been disposed of, he would himself move that Progress be reported.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE supported the appeal of the Home Secretary, as he considered his suggestion a very fair one.

Motion negatived.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 252; Noes 9: Majority 243.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. CALLAN rose to a point of Order. He wished deliberately to impugn the decision of the Chairman when the Motion to report Progress was previously made by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). The Chairman's ruling that the "Noes" had it had been distinctly challenged on the second and third occasions when the question was put, and yet no division was taken.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that though he had listened attentively, he had not heard the Chairman's decision challenged.

MR. J. COWEN also held that there was no ground whatever for impugning the decision of the Chairman, who invariably presided over their proceedings with dignity and fairness, which he (Mr. Cowen) had never seen surpassed. Hon. Gentlemen near him wished to adjourn the House at an early hour—a desire with which he sympathized; but they should pursue their object openly, and not by a course which had the appearance of factiousness, and which would never receive his support.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) was wrong in one point. He (Mr. Parnell) should not feel the least afraid of impugning the decision of the Chairman if he thought it was the wrong one; but on the present occasion he thought nobody was in fault but himself. He owned he had not been sufficiently attentive in challenging the Chairman's decision on the one or two occasions when he put the Question. He knew not whether the Chairman was right or not in his ruling; but there was a larger question involved—namely, as to the practice on the part of hon. Members who had not attended the discussion during the evening, but who came down to the House at a late hour and voted without knowing the merits of the question at issue.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD rose to Order, and asked whether the hon. Member was speaking to the Question?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question before the Committee was that he report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. After he had put that Motion the hon. Member for Dundalk challenged his decision on a previous question. He hoped he was not wrong in supposing that no hon. Member would impugn his conduct in the Chair, unless he thought he had some reason for doing so. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) he was quite sure, would not have impugned his conduct in the Chair unless he had felt it his duty to do so. He (the Chairman) thought it was only respectful to the hon. Member for Meath and to the Committee to wait before giving any explanation of his decision until the hon. Member for Meath had an opportunity of responding to the appeal made to him by the hon. Member for Dundalk. He acted simply in conformity with the Rules of the House when he declared that the "Noes" had it. He was justified in doing so, because no voice had been heard in the affirmative. He trusted that the hon. Member for Dundalk and the Committee were satisfied with what he had done.

MR. CALLAN said, he had made the statement on the authority of the hon. Member for Meath, and on that impression he voted with him, although he would otherwise have voted against him.

Mr. J. Cowen

MR. PARNELL, who spoke amid considerable interruption, said, he considered he was perfectly in Order, the question being the propriety of proceeding with legislation at that late hour of the night; and that hon. Members who had not heard the discussion should leave their conscience at the disposal of the Whip and do as he directed them.

MR. MACDONALD said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Meath in principle, and characterized the conduct of the House as that which might be expected not from an Assembly of Gentlemen, but an assembly of coalporters. ["Oh, oh!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stafford must see on reflection that his observations were not respectful to the House. At the same time he would point out to the Committee that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was entitled to a fair hearing.

MR. MACDONALD withdrew the observation he had just made, but considered the business of the House should be concluded at 12 o'clock. He and other Members had made up their minds that they would make use of every means which the Forms of the House allowed to put a stop to these late sittings. They had shut up places of amusement, and when the House rose the only stray persons to be found in the streets were the Members of the House of Commons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS regretted the interruption of Public Business, but, considering it was now 1 o'clock, he would not oppose the Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, in bringing forward the Motion of which I have given Notice, I shall endeavour to spare your Lordships any details which are not necessary to the proper explanation of the subject in hand; but must ask to be excused if, in doing so, I trespass at greater length upon your Lordships' time than I have hitherto done. In reminding your Lordships that in the Acts to which it refers is contained the entire machinery by which county taxation in Ireland is kept in motion, I shall have said, I hope, enough to secure your Lordships' attention, while endeavouring to lay before you the objections that may be taken to the constitution of those bodies which originate and carry out county works in Ireland, and some further points in which the present system has been deemed to fall short. I have ventured to come forward, as I am convinced that any discussion which may arise in your Lordships' House on this question, cannot fail to be most profitable, and to elicit valuable opinions on what appears to me a very necessary measure of reform. My Lords, although there is some difference of opinion as to what its extent should be, still we may say that the desirability of some reform in the Grand Jury Laws is recognized by all parties in Ireland. Already this Session three Bills dealing with the question have been introduced by different Members of the House of Commons; and as far as my own experience goes, and from information that has reached me from various quarters I believe any wisely-conceived changes would meet with general satisfaction. But before stating my own humble views, I will, with your Lordships' permission, say a very few words as to substitutions that have been proposed for the present working system. A great deal has been said outside this House about sweeping away the Grand Jury altogether, and recasting the entire machinery. Now, my Lords, I have searched with a good deal of care for any arguments pro and con which bear upon this point, and I have failed to discover that any sound reason has been advanced in support of a radical change. Very many charges have been brought against the Grand Jury, but not one of them has ever been proved—nay, the evidence we have at our command goes distinctly to disprove them. The Grand Jury was intended to be, and may be said to be, the representation of the landed proprietors of the county. It must be remembered they have no right to originate anything—with a few exceptions—only a right of control. As a matter of fact, those gentlemen summoned by the Sheriffs represent pretty fairly the landed proprietors, and their working has in almost all cases given satisfaction. Their administration has been pure and, on the whole, economical; and I do not believe you will find by any means, or in any form, whether in the form of County Boards or otherwise, a body of men who would so persistently set their faces against jobbing or anything of that sort as Irish Grand Juries do. The question was constantly asked by the late Lord Mayo and other Members of the Committee of 1868, and not a single witness, however averse to the present state of things, was able to bring forward an instance in which anything approaching jobbery or corruption could be imputed to Grand Juries. And again, my Lords, in retaining the Grand Jury, we retain at the same time that excellent function of control which they exercise in all matters which entail expenditure of the county cess. There is a feeling even among those who desire a complete change that control is necessary, and I find it in the Appendix to the Report of 1868, advocated by one witness in a form analogous to the Poor Law Commissioners. We have then, my Lords, a system in working order, the working of which has given satisfaction, and one in which the controlling body represents that just and proper authority which the landed interest is entitled to exercise in county matters. I am sure that under these conditions your Lordships will agree it is a far wiser course to deal with the question as far as possible on the principle of leaving well alone, instead of making sweeping changes, and establishing a new order of things which would certainly take time in righting itself and becoming efficient, and, perhaps, might fail altogether. Having said so much in reference to this part of the subject, I have to draw your Lordships' attention to those changes which it might appear advisable to bring about in the summoning and elements of the Grand Jury. It is, I believe, the legal supposition that the Sheriff of a county, in forming the Grand Jury, should first summon for each barony, a freeholder of £50, or a leaseholder of £100, but in reality there is nothing in the law to compel him to do so. The words of the statute are—"duly qualified by law," and however far we go back, we shall find no satisfactory definition of this qualification. Again, at present, the Sheriff's duty is discharged by his merely placing one name from each barony on the panel. It is no business of his to see that that person attends—merely to summon him and no more. The name must appear, and that is all; so that in reality there is no proper qualification, and no security for the representation of all the baronies. The former objection would be easily met by laying down in any future legislation some distinct qualification, say of £50 freehold, or £200 leasehold, and the second by requiring the Sheriff, in forming his panel, not merely to place one name for each barony first on his list, but to call through the entire list of qualified persons in each barony, until such barony is represented, or the list exhausted, and then, and not till then, to proceed to complete his panel. The proposal is not a new one, it has already been before Parliament, and I believe the principle of the Bill in which it is contained has been recognized by Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, there is one point connected with the elements of the Grand Jury upon which I wish to say a word, and that is as to whether it is advisable to permit the eldest sons and agents of qualified persons to act in their place. Now, my Lords, in particular cases the entire withdrawal of this permission would no doubt act very harshly. There is a constitutional objection, as your Lordships are aware, arising out of the duties of the Grand Jury in criminal cases, which precludes Peers from giving their services. Minors, of course, cannot, nor women, nor lunatics or idiots. In these cases there could, I would submit, be no possible objection to retaining the present state of things. But, in general, my Lords, I believe there is a very strong feeling, that these persons should not be permitted to serve on the Grand Jury. The position of agents, merely as managers and not owners of property, would seem to exclude them even under the present very uncertain qualification. Again, the knowledge that their agents may be summoned indiscriminately may tend in many cases to encourage absenteeism, of the evils of which, at one time at all events, we used to hear a great deal. I do not desire to bring any charge of this sort against any class or individual, and we, who live in the country, know well the interest which some of the Members of your Lordships' House and others take in their Irish properties; but, still, the present system may be fairly said to be open to that objection. It might be argued in favour of eldest sons that, as they will be one day called upon to perform those duties which are now in their father's hands, it would be of advantage to them to have the means of acquiring a knowledge of those duties; but we must bear in mind that it will be in every man's power to give his son a qualification if he thinks necessary, a step which would seem to be a very wise one, as it would give him not only a prospective, but an immediate interest or stake in the county. I hope, therefore, that in dealing with this matter hereafter, Her Majesty's Government will limit the right to be summoned to the agents of those disqualified by law, under which phrase the different classes I have enumerated would come. The change would give general satisfaction, and one great advantage would certainly arise from it, it would tend to make non-resident proprietors take a more direct and personal interest in county affairs. I now come to the Resolution which deals with the appointment of committees, and as to their desirability I need not trouble your Lordships, only refer you to Section 14 of this Report, where the Committee have clearly stated their views; but as to the limits which should be put upon their jurisdiction I should like to say a word. In a Bill introduced by Lord Hartington some years ago, the powers of the proposed committees under his scheme were defined. The clauses in that Bill which I allude to seem to have been framed with a view of avoiding the danger which must attend the existence of these committees, if proper care is not taken in limiting their powers—that of their eventually usurping the functions of the Grand Jury; and I would suggest those clauses to Her Majesty's Government as a basis for future legislation; with this addition—that the committee should have a right of examining all accounts instead of those only of the cess collectors, and that it should be decidedly stated that it should have no power to deal summarily in any case, merely a right to report at the next Assizes. It should, I would suggest, be appointed by the Grand Jury out of their own body; and for this, among other reasons, that as one of the chief advantages we hope to derive from it is a greater sense of responsibility in county officers, the committee should consist of members of that body, to whom the responsibility is due. All I am suggesting to your Lordships is, that there should be some supervision in the interval from Assizes to Assizes. I have already indicated the danger into which the appointment of these committees may lead us; and I cannot help thinking that it would be more difficult to restrain them within proper limits, if they were formed out of those bodies with whom everything in the county originates. However, from whatever body they are taken I believe that with proper safeguards we should secure a very necessary element in county management, by establishing a body, the presence of which would be most useful in creating a more continuous sense of responsibility among county officers than it is possible should exist at present. My Lords, one argument that has been adduced in favour of sweeping away the present state of things is, that the Irish people have no control or authority over the expenditure of the

£1,300,000 that is yearly levied by way of county cess. Now even supposing this were the case, it is quite impossible that the fault should lie with the Grand Jury, for we all know very well that nearly 90 per cent of that expenditure is entirely beyond their control. But where reform is needed—and urgently needed—is in those bodies which are termed the presentment sessions. In fact, we may go further, and say that it is with these bodies we are bound to deal first, as with them really rests the control and authority over the expenditure. This Report tells your Lordships all the objections against them as they are—as to the mode of their formation—as to the irresponsibility, non-attendance, and causes of non-attendance of cess-payers, and the risk of their being swamped by an overwhelming majority of magistrates at sessions—so it will not be necessary for me to enter into them. If the right to sit at presentment sessions were accorded only to such magistrates as possessed a residential or property qualification in the barony—and their number were limited by the number of cess payers who had a right to attend—we should remove one of the great causes of apathy, the fear the associated cess payers entertain of having their opinions entirely overruled. But the great and most important object of all, is to secure that those cess payers should adequately and fairly represent those classes who pay the rates—and we have at our hands a system already in existence, which will enable us to fulfil those conditions. The Guardians of the Poor fairly represent the people for Poor Law purposes, and would do so equally for purposes of the administration of the county cess; and the great advantage of such an arrangement would be, that we should attain our object without any of the difficulties attending the creation of new constituencies, franchises, and territorial divisions. The Baronial courts being thus constituted it would follow as a matter of course that they should appoint their representatives at the county at large sessions, by electing them from among themselves. As to the question of boundaries, it is no doubt one which will require consideration to deal with it satisfactorily; but I believe a mode of dealing with it could be found by which electoral divisions could without much trouble be rendered coterminous with the baronies. Most probably a Return exists—or at all events it could be procured, of those electoral divisions which are coterminous with baronies; and I feel confident we could find an already-established body in Ireland competent to deal with such as are not. I believe that if Her Majesty's Government laid their instructions on that authority, and directed them how to act in this matter, that by judicious pruning here, and adding on there, and the occasional suppression of an electoral division, the whole question of boundaries might be easily and quietly settled without any necessity of issuing a Commission, as was proposed by Lord Hartington's Bill of 1872. My Lords, I have now, I fear very imperfectly, touched upon those matters to which these Resolutions have reference; but before concluding I am anxious to ask your Lordships to consider one point, which I would submit should find a place in any measure of reform dealing with this question. I mean traverses. We may divide them into two classes—first, those of presentments on their merits, of contractors' applications for payments, and of presentments for damages; and, secondly, those of presentments for malicious injuries, and of disallowed applications. In the case of the former, the section is what I believe is called in law a mandatory section, the Judge being obliged to impanel a jury to try the case. In the second, it is within his discretion to do so or not. My Lords, it seems to me a matter for very serious consideration whether even the discretionary power to send a traverse to a petty jury should exist, although I cannot help feeling that, in the present state of juries in Ireland, it is one which Judges are not likely to exercise very widely; but still there may be, from a legal point of view, something to be said in its favour. In the other case, however, as it at present stands, the law may often have a very mischievous operation. Only the other day, in my own neighbourhood, a presentment for a bridge to connect two counties was passed by the two Grand Juries, fiated by the Judge at one Assizes and traversed at the other, on the two grounds of improper posting of notices and of utility. On the first, or technical ground, the decision was in the Judge's hands, but to try the second he was bound to impanel a jury; in fact, to refer it from a higher to a lower tribunal. What was the result, my Lords? That this useful work, which for two years the most respectable cess-payers and gentry in the neighbourhood had been endeavouring to carry out, was quashed upon traverse at the instance of a few public-house keepers living on the approaches to an old and insecure existing bridge, who were afraid that traffic would be diverted from their doors. I merely mention this to show what may happen; the very possibility of which should not exist. Surely when a presentment has to pass through the various stages it does, there are plenty of means of judging of its utility, or the contrary. It would be quite fair, if there is any objection to doing away with their assistance in traverses altogether, to leave the impanelling of a jury in the hands of the Judge of Assize; and to give, at all events, a more satisfactory tribunal, by empowering him, if he thinks proper, to grant a special jury on the application of either party to a traverse. Such a change would be more especially of advantage in cases of compensation for malicious injury, where local circumstances and feelings are likely to carry weight, and we should run less risk of having proposals extinguished just as they are arriving at maturity, through the ignorance or venality of the final tribunal that may have to decide on their merits. My Lords, I have here one or two suggestions, coming mostly from gentlemen well acquainted with the practical working of Grand Jury Laws, which I hope will be deemed worthy of the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Under compensation for malicious injury there are many cases in which no remedy can be obtained—as, for instance, growing fruit-trees, fences, timber, boats, yachts. In a recent case it was decided that valuable animals in a menagerie did not come under the Act, nor do fox-coverts. You can get compensation if your fox-hounds are poisoned, but not if your coverts are burned down, and I cannot see the use of one without the other. It would be for consideration whether injury to "all classes of animate or inanimate property" should give a claim to compensation. Again, it has been suggested that some means should be devised for paying road contractors at earlier periods, as at present they have a long time to wait for their money. In cases of payment for materials the actual value of the materials should be estimated, and not only surface damage. And with regard to the collection of the county cess, a practice held to be legal exists, to continue the rate as a charge on houses even while unoccupied, and if at any time a house should become occupied then to recover all arrears. This is not done in the case of the poor rate, and would certainly appear a hardship. There are other points of detail, but these are the most important, and I will not trouble your Lordships any further. With regard to the Resolutions, I submit them to your Lordships with a certain amount of confidence, as they have for their basis grounds which should recommend them to all parties in this House. They are based, as your Lordships will have seen, on the recommendations of the Committee of 1868, which was composed of hon. Gentlemen of different political views, on Mr. Kavanagh's Bill, of which the Chief Secretary has signified his approval, and upon Lord Hartington's Bill of 1872, which we may presume is satisfactory to noble Lords opposite. I believe legislation on these grounds would be welcomed in Ireland by the farmers' clubs, by the gentry, and by the cess-payers, and the subject seems one eminently fitted for the hand of a Conservative Government, being one connected with that internal and local reform which they acknowledged last year as their peculiar province. My Lords, I will therefore trouble you no longer. I have to apologize for detaining you at this length, but I feel a sincere hope that a consideration of the subject by your Lordships on the lines I have indicated may lead to the passing of a measure which will give us every prospect of finality, and which will render more perfect and economical the machinery for county taxation in Ireland. The noble Earl concluded by moving the following Resolutions:—

“(1) That no person should be summoned to serve on the grand jury of any county who is not possessed of a fixed property qualification in such county ;

“(2) That the grand jury should annually at the summer assizes appoint from amongst their body a committee to represent the grand jury for certain limited purposes ;

“(3) That the baronial presentment sessions should be composed of justices of the peace qualified in respect of residence or property in such barony and of the poor law guardians elected to serve for the electoral divisions wholly or partly situate within such barony ;

“(4) That the county at large presentment sessions should be composed of persons elected by the several members composing the baronial presentment sessions in such county.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, he could only compliment the noble Earl on the clear and temperate manner in which he had dealt with so complicated a question as that of the county taxation of Ireland. No one, indeed, was better qualified to deal with this important subject as his noble Friend, for no noble Lord connected with Ireland took a more active part in the business of that country. The Irish Grand Jury system was so different from the Grand Jury system of England, that there was considerable difficulty in mastering the details of the Irish system. He agreed with his noble Friend that upon the whole the present system worked well—though he was far from saying that there was no room for improvement—and he was not sure that even after reform it would be found to be more pure and more economical than it was at present. He thought that they must all agree that the first Resolution of his noble Friend—that no person should be summoned upon the Grand Jury who had not a fixed property qualification—was one that must commend itself to their attention. Whilst, however, admitting that this would be right in theory, he was afraid that if it was attempted to be worked out in practice inconvenience and, in some cases, injustice would follow from the alteration. If such a qualification were insisted on there were parts of Ireland which would be deprived of all representation upon the Grand Jury. Again, lunatics and absentees whatever their fixed qualification could not sit upon the Grand Jury. As to the second Resolution, as to appointing a committee to represent the Grand Jury for certain limited purposes, he thought that a sufficient case had not been made out for alteration in that direction. The existence of the Grand Jury terminated with the Assizes ; and a body which had such a very limited existence could not very well appoint an active body to represent them during the whole year. Further, he could not say what work this Committee would find to do even if it were appointed. One consequence of appointing the committee would be to reduce the Grand Jury itself, as regards matters of finance, to much the same position as their Lordships' House held in relation to the House of Commons in respect of Money Votes. Nor did he think that the appointment of such a committee would impose upon the officers of the county a sense of responsibility arising from the feeling that they were overlooked by the committee. Any officer who should be guilty of malpractices would now be liable to have his conduct brought under notice at the next Assizes, and this, he believed, was far more efficacious than anything that could arise from the Grand Jury delegating their powers to a smaller body. The two remaining Resolutions commended themselves very much more to his mind than the two previous ones. The present mode of electing members to serve the presentment sessions was not satisfactory, because there were not as many representatives of the cess-payers as it would be desirable to have, and the third proposition of his noble Friend was an improvement. He could not pledge the Government to bring in a Bill upon the subject this year, but he knew that the matter had occupied the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and two Gentlemen in the other House had brought in Bills upon the subject: the interest which was taken in the subject was further shown by the fact that two or three Committees had sat upon it within the last few years. He should be glad if the Chief Secretary should be in a position in a future Session to bring in a Bill to deal with the matter in a satisfactory manner.

LORD INCHQUIN concurred with his noble Friend who had brought forward the Resolutions (the Earl of Donoughmore) that on the whole the Irish Grand Jury system had worked well; and though, no doubt, there were anomalies in its working, he did not think it could be much mended by the action of Parliament. He regretted that his noble Friend had not moved in the matter by presenting a Bill, because he did not think that much could be done by the adoption of abstract Resolutions. There could be no objection to the committee of supervision suggested by his noble Friend, if such committee were appointed only from one Assize to another; and he also thought there was no valid objection to Peers serving on Grand Juries so long as those bodies were only engaged in fiscal business and before they entered upon the discharge of criminal business. It appeared to him that in the selection of members to serve on the committee of supervision there was no good reason for confining the selection to members of the Grand Jury. Therefore, although he raised no decided objection to these Resolutions he should hold himself free, in case any Bill were introduced, to give it his support, although it might not be exactly in agreement with his noble Friend's proposal.

LORD WAVENEY concurred with the noble Lord who had just spoken that there was no valid objection to Peers discharging the fiscal duties of Grand Jurors. He desired to point out that the sheriffs had a large discretion, and exercised it considerably in the selection of Grand Jurors in Ireland. They would get rid of much of the difficulty which was now felt in that country if there was a fixed property qualification for Grand Jurors. He was convinced, however, that where the Irish Grand Jury system was carried out by a proper order of selection of the Grand Jurors, great attention was given to the business of the country, and, notwithstanding all that had been said against the present Grand Jury system, a very slight alteration was necessary to make it an excellent one. So far as regarded the public works of the county it was superior to that which prevailed in the counties of England. In many parts of England the roads and bridges were still in an unimproved condition, while in Ireland they were attended to by those of the Grand Jurors who resided in the baronies. Under the Grand Jury Act, Poor Law Guardians were to save money and economize on all occasions; while the functions of the associated cesspayers were to act in conjunction with the Grand Jurors and to decide what money should be expended on county works for the public good. He thanked the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) for bringing forward these Resolutions, but he thought the discussion had shown that the present system required very little or no alteration when it was administered fearlessly and honestly.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, he had known something of the Grand Jury system in Ireland for 30 years, and believed that the system worked well and honestly. It was often said that it did not comply with the principle that taxation and representation should go together; but it should be remembered that as regarded nine-tenths of the taxation the Grand Jury had merely a power of veto. The great evil in the present system was that they had not a permanent body to constantly look after all the works that had to be carried out.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN pointed out that of late years greater duties had been thrown upon the Grand Juries. They had now to manage the industrial and reformatory schools and other institutions, and the Grand Jury of the County Wexford had found it necessary to appoint a Committee to consider such matters, he therefore thought there might be abundant employment for such a Committee as was mentioned in the Resolutions.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, an objection had been taken to the Resolutions on the ground that it would have been better to have brought forward a Bill. But he did not think that the Resolutions were open to such an objection. They had all recently seen the result of an abstract Resolution in the other House. But if an attempt were made to embody a scheme of Grand Jury law in a Bill it would be found that nearly every one of the clauses would have to be originated in the other House of Parliament; whereas the opinion of their Lordships' House could be taken on these Resolutions, and by that proceeding public opinion would be matured in the country. He hoped that his noble Friend would be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place. His noble Friend had shown that he had fully considered the subject and mastered all the details of it. There might be some necessity for an alteration in the law—and all noble Lords who had spoken seemed to admit that some alterations were desirable—but, if any, it should take place in the lines pointed out by his noble Friend. He thought, however, that having drawn attention to the subject and elicited opinions, his noble Friend would not advance his cause by asking the House to divide on this occasion. This was a matter which deeply engaged the attention of the Irish Government, and he might mention that there was now a Bill in the other House which dealt with a portion of the subject; therefore he hoped the Resolutions would not be pressed further.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that after what had fallen from the noble Duke and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack he would be satisfied with the result of the discussion and not divide the House on the present occasion.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS.—QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, in asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Whether the same rules which prevented the acceptance by a British subject of orders or decorations from Foreign Sovereigns apply to the acceptance by British subjects of titles from Foreign Sovereigns; and, if those rules were held not to apply, whether there were any others that do; and, if there are none that apply, whether British subjects are free to accept titles from Foreign Sovereigns; and, if so, whether he does not deem it desirable that some rules should be made to protect the prerogative of the Crown as the sole fountain of honour in the United Kingdom?—said, these Questions arose out of the discussion in this House on Friday evening last; and he would wish rather to speak upon the subject with the higher authority of the noble Lord (Lord Houghton), who then brought forward the question, than his own. The Question on Friday last was whether decorations conferred by Foreign Sovereigns could be worn by British subjects residing in this country? and the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who had been Foreign Secretary when the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) brought the same subject forward in 1873, in answer, said, that there had been rules at all times in force to prevent British subjects, with a few exceptional cases, from accepting those decorations without the consent of the Crown; and he gave as an illustration the anecdotes of Queen Elizabeth, who declared that her dogs should wear no collars but her own; and of King George

III., who liked all his sheep to be marked with his own brand. The noble Earl the present Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) on that occasion stated that he assented to all that had been previously said by the noble Earl (Earl Granville). Therefore the condition of things was this—that both the present and late Secretaries for Foreign Affairs had stated that the Crown was the only fountain of honour, and that it was contrary to the rules which prevailed in England that foreign decorations should be worn by English subjects. It followed that if foreign decorations were not to be accepted, it was far more important that foreign titles should not be accepted. It appeared, however, that if upon any great public occasion an English gentleman who had accepted such a title was invited to Court and received by that rank, he obtained the precedence of that rank. So that it came to this—that if a gentleman of great influence and position received a foreign title, a certain precedence was given to him, which became habitual, and he took a higher place than that accorded to him by his own Sovereign. That recognition seemed to him calculated to introduce confusion and perhaps contempt. Therefore it was that he desired to put his Question to the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF DERBY: In answer to the Question of the noble Lord, I can only say that no rules have been laid down as to English subjects receiving titles from Foreign Sovereigns. It rests entirely with the Crown whether the acceptance of such a title should be sanctioned or not. There are some cases where a Royal licence has been granted to enable British subjects bearing foreign titles to use them in this country. When no such licence has been granted the use of the titles would not be sanctioned or recognized at Court or in any official communications; nor, I presume, in any legal documents. With regard to the second point—whether British subjects are or are not free to accept and use titles from Foreign Sovereigns—the only answer I can give is that they incur no penalty by doing so. In point of fact, I do not believe that a man would incur any legal penalty if he called himself by a title to which he had no right, and which had not been conferred either by a British Sovereign or any other. It is a matter of which the law takes no cognizance. With regard to the last point, I am not aware that any great inconvenience arises from the present state of the law on this subject, and I do not think that any new regulations are necessary. With reference to the case put by the noble Lord as to the acceptance of foreign titles not sanctioned by the Government of this country, but which cannot grow into use and give the bearer precedence on public occasions, I can only point out that this is a case which cannot occur, because precedence at the British Court is regulated by fixed and well-known rules. That is not a matter which is dealt with by the law of England, but which is regulated by custom and social convention, and I think we may leave it on the footing upon which it stands at present.

TURKEY—REPORTED DEPOSITION OF THE SULTAN.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR desired to ask the Foreign Secretary, Whether he was in a position to make any communication to the House with respect to the reported deposition of the Sultan?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I can only confirm the truth of the statement which has appeared in the newspapers of this evening. I have seen two telegrams, one of which is from Sir Henry Elliot, while the other was addressed to the Turkish Ambassador by his own Government. Both state the fact that the late Sultan has been dethroned, and that his nephew has succeeded to his throne. I am not in a position to give details, because I have not received any; but in both telegrams which I have seen it is stated that the revolution has been accomplished without disturbance of any kind.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL SHARES. QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he will lay upon the Table of the House details of Suez Canal Shares purchase, promised by him on an early day when the Bill authorising the borrowing of four million pounds sterling for payment was read a second time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he proposed immediately after the Whitsuntide Recess to give Notice to introduce a Bill for dealing with the Suez Canal shares, and providing for the mode in which the accounts should be rendered.

ARMY—THE MILITIA BALLOT ACT. QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any measures have been taken regarding a revised Militia Ballot Act; and, if any, then what progress has been made in giving effect to such measures in order to remedy the slow action of the present Act and its unequal pressure on the people? The hon. and gallant Gentleman explained that he did not mean to imply that there was any immediate necessity for a Militia Ballot. He only wished to know what would be done in case of a great national emergency.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to inform him that a draft Bill has been prepared, but no steps further have been taken in respect to it pending the Report of a Committee which is sitting upon the Militia at the present time.

ARMY—MOBILIZATION OF THE FORCES—THE ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would be good enough to give the House a supplemental statement of the details of the lump-sums scattered over the various Votes of the War Estimates to meet the cost of putting two Army Corps into the field this summer, adding such further particulars of probable expenditure as the arrangements for their mobilization would permit? of course not referring to contracts.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: My hon. and gallant Friend says "not referring to contracts," but that is a considerable item in the matter. It will not be possible for me to give the details so fully as he requires. The whole sum that was taken in the Estimates, as I stated in moving them, was £40,700.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHS—ORKNEY AND THE SHETLAND ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. LAING asked the Postmaster General, What is the reason of the long delay in giving the county of Orkney and Shetland the long promised extension of the postal telegraph; and, whether he can state what steps the Government is taking, and how soon those islands will be relieved from the exceptional position of being the only considerable district of the United Kingdom which is deprived of the benefit of the postal telegraph?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that within the last 24 hours the Postmaster General had been informed that the Orkney and Shetland Telegraphs Company had, after long negotiations, resolved to accept the terms offered by him. An engineer would go down this week, and it was hoped that arrangements would be made by which the postal telegraphs would be extended to those Islands.

INLAND REVENUE—GAME LICENCES.
QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has taken steps to check the evasion of the Duty on Game Licences among persons in a certain station of life, brought to his notice by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in their last Annual Report; and, whether he will take steps to protect, in future, the officers of Excise from the indignities and obstructions to which they are now subjected when performing their duty with respect to Game Licences, also brought to notice in the same Report.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the officers of Inland Revenue did all in their power to check evasions of the duty on game licences, and when the offence was committed it was usually on private property. The paragraph in the Report of the Commissioners was inserted with the intention of enabling country gentlemen, magistrates, and others, to assist in carrying into effect the provisions of the law, which assistance, under such circumstances, they could render in a greater degree than the Inland Revenue officers.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—OFFICIAL
REFEREES.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Official Referees of the High Court of Justice have been appointed upon the understanding that they are or are not to be at liberty to carry on private practice at the Bar?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend, he was enabled to inform the hon. Gentleman, on the authority of the Lord Chancellor, that the Official Referees would not be allowed to carry on their private practice.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS — ASSISTANT MASTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, when the control of the Endowed Schools was transferred in 1875 to the Charity Commissioners, they found that it "did not answer" to give the power of appeal against dismissal to assistant masters, and that they had therefore taken it away, excepting in the case of masters who had laid out large sums in boarding houses with consent of the authorities; and, whether it is true, as reported in the public journals, that the Charity Commissioners have recently approved a new scheme for the government of Felstead Grammar School, by which assistant masters dismissed by the head master are given an appeal to the governing body?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was understood to say that the power of dismissing the Assistant Masters was vested in the Head Master, and that the Charity Commissioners had made no alteration in this respect.

ARMY — MOBILIZATION OF THE FORCES—THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will give the House an opportunity for expressing its opinion, by a Vote, upon the propriety of adopting a measure involving so large an expenditure of public money as that which will be necessary to carry into effect the scheme called the "Mobilization of the Forces," which he laid before the House when moving the Army Estimates for the present year, and which has been published in the official Army List for general information?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he must take exception to the assertion that any great public expenditure would be necessary, as there was nothing of the kind. If the Army Corps were brought up to a war footing such might be the case, but nothing of the kind was intended. As the Mobilization Scheme had been discussed in the House on several occasions, he did not think it necessary for him to adopt the course suggested by his hon. and gallant Friend. Moreover, the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had given Notice of his intention to bring that subject under the discussion of the House, and his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) could take part in that discussion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN: I give Notice that I shall ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will give some assistance towards keeping a House on the day the Question is discussed?

THE PATENT OFFICE AND MUSEUM. QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that a Committee of the Treasury has recently considered and reported on the Patent Office Museum; whether it is a recommendation of that Committee that all objects not patented, irrespective of their importance as illustrations of the progress of science and invention, shall be excluded from that Museum; whether he is aware that the collection of all patented inventions at Washington is stated by the American Commissioners of Patents to be of little or no service; whether, in the Loan Collection of Scientific Apparatus now exhibited at South Kensington there is any separation of patented from non-patented objects; and, whether such separation is not opposed to the Fourth Report of the Royal Commission on the Advancement of Science, which recommended the formation of a general collection of Physical and Mechanical Instruments under the authority of a Minister of State?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is true that a Committee of the Treasury has recently considered and reported on the Patent Office, including the Patent Museum. Such inquiries and Reports are being constantly made, but they are confidential documents intended for the information of the Heads of Departments and the Government, and unless the Government lays them before Parliament it is a breach of official confidence to make the contents of them known, and largely interferes with their utility. It is a recommendation of the Committee that non-patented inventions should be excluded from the Museum, because the Museum is intended to be ancillary to the Patent Office Library, and both Museum and Library to be ancillary to the business purposes of the Patent Office, which is not an institution for the general promotion of science. The question of patented or non-patented objects has never been raised in forming the Loan Collection of Scientific Instruments and Apparatus at South Kensington. They have been admitted only on the recommendation of Scientific Committees of Sections.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1875—THE ELEVENTH SECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Green v. Browning, reported in "The Times" of the 29th instant, when an action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice by a London tradesman against a person resident in Dublin for the price agreed on for the construction of a skating rink in Dublin; if it was the intention of the Eleventh Rule in the Schedule to "The Judicature Act, 1875," that there should be service out of the jurisdiction in such a case to bring parties resident in Scotland or Ireland to defend themselves in England; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps to have the said Eleventh Rule repealed or modified; and, if so, when may such repeal or modification be expected?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the matter was under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, who was consulting the Judges upon the matter to see whether something could not be done.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE NEW BUILDINGS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE asked the First Commissioner of Works, When the additions to the National Gallery will be finally completed and ready for use?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, he was happy to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the additions to the National Gallery were completed, and that the building would be handed over to the Board of Works before the end of the week. He might mention that any

Members of the House wishing to see the new buildings might do so on presenting their cards at the door.

MR. MONK wished to know when they would be open to the public?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that would rest with the Trustees of the National Gallery, who were now rearranging the pictures.

COUNTY PRISONS (IRELAND) LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he proposes to introduce a measure dealing with County Prisons in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I had hoped, so far as it was dependent on myself, that this measure might have been introduced at the same time as the English Bill on the same subject, and that the two Bills would proceed pari passu; but, as the English Bill cannot be introduced before Thursday, and arrangements have been entered into between hon. Members for Ireland and myself that no Irish business shall be transacted until after the 12th of June, I fear I am obliged to postpone the introduction of the Bill until that date, but it shall be introduced as soon as possible afterwards.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is able to place upon the Table any further Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Foreign Powers on the Eastern Question?

MR. BOURKE: In answer to the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend I have to say that Her Majesty's Government are very anxious to lay upon the Table of the House any further Correspondence on the Eastern Question at the earliest possible moment that is consistent with the public interest; but at the present time they cannot think it would be expedient to lay such Correspondence before Parliament. Perhaps, as I have received several private Notices of Questions from hon. Members with respect to the news which has arrived in this country with regard to the Throne of Turkey, I may take this opportunity of stating that I have received a copy of a telegram received by the Turkish Ambassador in London, and a telegram from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, stating that the Sultan Abdul Aziz has been dethroned, and that his nephew and heir, Mohammed Murad, has succeeded to the Throne. No particulars have as yet reached Her Majesty's Government, except that there are no disturbances at Constantinople. We have also received intelligence from Salonica that the new Sultan was publicly proclaimed there this morning, and that the announcement was received with general approbation.

ARMY—MILITIA STAFF SERGEANTS—PENSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. DEASE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any decision has been arrived at as to an increase in the rate of pensions to Militia staff sergeants who have never served in the regular Army; whether the rate of their pensions, which is limited to five pence a-day, was not granted so far back as 42 Geo. 3, c. 90; and, whether they will be placed on an equality in respect to pensions with the remaining portion of the permanent staff?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he could not give any further answer to the hon. Gentleman than that the subject had been referred to the Treasury, who were considering the matter.

ARMY—THE QUEEN'S COUNTY MILITIA REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. DEASE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any advertisements were published in the local or other papers with regard to supplies for the Queen's County Militia Regiment during the forthcoming training; and, whether the District Commissary General was justified in withholding information from those who desired to send in tenders, and in ignoring their letters?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: No advertisements were published in the local or other papers. The Commissary of Supplies, under the orders of the District Commissary General, called for tenders, as in former years, from those who had previously supplied the regiment in a satisfactory manner, and these tenders were submitted to the War Office on the 30th of March, and sanctioned on the 4th April. After the transmission of the tenders to the War Office, a Mr. Mercier applied to the District Commissary General on the 3rd April for tenders, but was informed that a contract had been already entered into for supplies. Mr. Mercier wrote again on the 5th April stating that he had applied also last year, but unfortunately the application not having been registered was overlooked. He was, however, informed that care should be taken in future to send tenders to his address. I regret that in this case the regulations requiring tenders to be invited by public advertisement were not acted upon, and I have given instruction that they shall invariably be adhered to for the future, unless time does not admit, or the supplies are too trifling to make it worth while.

THE NEW FOREST—STONEYCROSS INCLOSURE.—QUESTION.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he has obtained an opinion on the legality of the recent inclosure in the New Forest near Stoneycross; and, whether he considers that any of the rights of the Crown or of the commoners have been infringed?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to take the opinion of the Law Officers on the question.

POOR LAW—OUT-DOOR RELIEF. QUESTION.

MR. BROWN asked the honourable Member for South Leicestershire, What are the precise terms of his Resolution with reference to this subject?

MR. PELL, in reply, said, that, as far as his mind was made up on the subject, the Resolution which he intended to move would be to the effect that it was desirable to check their regular distribution of outdoor relief, with a view to the gradual diminution of such an encouragement to pauperism and improvidence.

PARLIAMENT—THE DERBY DAY.

MR. DISRAELI: I believe I am acting in accordance with the general wish of the House when I move that the House, at its rising, do adjourn to Thursday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising this day, do adjourn until Thursday next."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the right hon. Gentleman had informed them that he believed his Motion was in accordance with the general wish of the House. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would not dispute his words, but he was quite sure that, as there was a minority who would not approve of that Motion, they would be patiently heard. He had heard a good many debates that Session, and he had observed that the proper thing was for every Gentleman to declare that the subject on which he spoke was not a Party question. Perhaps the House would be surprised when he said that he considered this Motion to be a Party question. It was supported by the party of sentiment and it was opposed by the party of sense. Now, he said unfeignedly that he had a great respect for the party of sentiment, and he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), who, in a recent speech, said that without sentiment life would be a poor thing indeed. On this occasion the question for the House to decide was whether the sentiment was sufficiently strong and worthy of support to overcome the reasons which could be brought against the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. That he ventured to say was just one of those Motions which ought not to be carried, or even proposed, against the feelings of a considerable and a respectable minority. In their Parliamentary and social life they always bowed to the decision of the majority; but there were occasions when it was foolish for the majority to push their opinions to such a length as to carry them out against the wishes of the minority. This was not a constitutional question, which some people believed it to be. This adjournment over the Derby was not quite 30 years old, and there had always been a considerable minority to express disapproval of the practice. He was happy to say that minority was increasing slowly, but steadily. In 1872 the minority amounted to 58; in 1874 to 69; in 1875 to 81; and if they went on at that rate they would some day have satisfaction, and upset the Motion. It was a bad precedent that this House should be called upon to adjourn in honour of any particular sport. Just now horse-racing was the popular sport; but some day they might be called on to adjourn in honour of pigeon shooting. Not long ago a letter appeared in The Times from Admiral Rous, in which he said that, but for a strong sense of obedience to the law, he would go 200 miles any day to see a good cock-fight. And if cock-fighting were to be in popular estimation, who knew but that some day the House of Commons would be called upon to adjourn for a cock-fight? He was encouraged to ask some hon. Gentlemen opposite to vote on that Motion even against the Government; because he had seen how nine of them, headed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid-Kent (Sir William Dyke), voted on a question of adjournment against their Leader the other night, and he hoped they would do so again. He regretted they could not get the Movers of Motions like this to make speeches. The right hon. Gentleman made the Motion without comment, though he was quite sure he could have given the House an interesting speech if he were so minded. They watched the proceedings of the right hon. Gentleman even during the Recess with great interest, and they were glad to be told in all the papers that he had gone to refresh himself by attending the St. Leger Race, in Yorkshire, so that he was well qualified, even better than before, to speak on the subject of this racing question. He remembered that while going to attend that demonstration the right hon. Gentleman, while in a train, came into collision, unfortunately, at the station with another railway train. The papers told them how there was great excitement and alarm at the time, and how the right hon. Gentleman never raised his eyes from the newspaper he was reading. A very fine picture it must have been to see him there, amid the crash of carriages, the smashing of engines, and the shrieks of passengers, never even raising his eyes from The Standard newspaper he was reading. He heard the right hon. Gentleman say last year, in the debate on horses, that horse-racing was a very noble and inspiring pastime, and he had heard other distinguished men describe it as a noble, manly, and historical amusement. Now, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) denied that there was anything noble or exceptionally national about it.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

It was not connected in any way with the well-being, credit, or position of the country. It was not, for instance, connected with the maintenance of Church and State. He, however, read that once when a Derby winner returned to its native village in the West of England, the church bells rang a "merry peal." That, however, was not enough to make it a national question, because, he could remember that, in Lancashire, after a contested election, when the Conservative candidate was returned, the church bells rang and flags waved from all the breweries. Racing was not a noble sport. It was entirely a money-making affair. It was the same as stock-jobbing—not a bit more respectable and no worse. The Sultan of Zanzibar, on the occasion of his visit to Ascot races, remarked that in his country their horses ran in a straight course, not for money, but for the sake of emulation and the glory of winning. From all he (the Sultan) observed and heard, however, he was under the decided conviction that many lacs of rupees must have passed from pocket to pocket at Ascot. If horse-racing was not a money-making piece of business to those engaged in it, how was it that not very long since there was a memorial presented from the owners and trainers of horses to the Jockey Club requesting them to take such steps as would prevent "touts" attending training grounds and giving information to the public? If they did not want to keep the whole thing dark for the purpose of putting money in their own pockets, why did not those who promoted horse-racing put forward full information to the public as to what horses stood the best chance of winning? Let there be meetings where there should be no stakes, and where horses would run with no other object and for no other purpose than to see which might win. He read last year in a paper not at all squeamish—The Daily Telegraph—on the morning of the Derby, that "It may also be true that Epsom Downs will contain this afternoon the grandest assemblage of blackguardism on the face of the earth." Then, in a few sentences lower down, it went on to say—there was no accounting for taste—"the sight is one of the prettiest in the world." He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had seen blackguardism enough on a small scale without going to see it on a large scale.

What would be thought of a Home Rule Parliament, if they could suppose such a thing, deciding to adjourn their sitting at the busiest period of the year because there was to be some horse-racing? What would be thought of a corporation or a school board if it acted in a like manner? Why, then, should they, the Imperial Parliament, give their sanction to such a proceeding? Last year somebody sent him a French newspaper after he had opposed the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day. It was stated that a revolutionary Member, "Sir Lawson," had so acted; and the journal in question then went on to say that if such a thing were proposed in the French Assembly as to adjourn for a race on a week day there would be a charivari terrible—whatever that might mean. The astonishment seemed to be that we should adjourn on a week day. In this country they adjourned for gambling on week days, and they kept their Sundays strictly for drinking. Do not let him be misunderstood. He was not objecting, and had no business to object, to anybody in his individual capacity going to the Derby and enjoying himself to his heart's content. Let those who wished go and welcome. But what he did object to was that this House should, in its national capacity, give its sanction to racing. He made a Motion last year, and a paragraph went the round of the newspapers, saying that "Sir Wilfrid Lawson was seen going to the Derby with a green veil on and a sporting coat." He would give £100 to any man who proved it; but there was no reason why he should not go. He could conceive it a duty to go, as it was, for instance, on the part of some members of the Press. The Pall Mall Gazette said the presence on the course of an assemblage of the first gentlemen in Europe would tend, if not to elevate the Derby from the sad condition into which it had fallen, at least to lend it some respectability, of which it stood so much in need. Charity, however, began at home; and he thought they had better make themselves respectable at home before they went to try and regenerate the Derby. The House of Commons was no missionary body, but a legislative Assembly. If any one took The Pall Mall Gazette view, and thought he could convert the black-legs of Epsom from the error of their ways let him go, and he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) wished him success in his mission. The advocates of the measure could not plead that they wanted a holiday; that would not do. They were going to break up for a week on Thursday; they were only just come back from Easter, and he was sure nobody was worked to death in that House. Besides, they must do some work to-morrow. There was the Bill of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Smyth), the principle of which had been sanctioned by the House, and which excited more interest in the country than any measure brought before it that Session. The Government, if they had the interests of the people at heart, might give facilities for that Bill to advance a stage of it to-morrow. The Home Rulers would come down and support it, for he was sure no Home Ruler would allow his face to be seen on the Epsom racecourse. There was another Bill down for to-morrow—the Colonial Marriages Bill. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope) had a Notice down to oppose that Bill. They had often heard him with great pleasure on British marriages; would it not be a pleasure to come down to-morrow and hear him make a speech on colonial marriages? But, if that was not enough to keep hon. Members from voting for this measure, he hoped they would seriously consider whether it tended to the honour, the dignity, and credit of that House and to the estimation in which they were held out-of-doors. If they would but give the thing a moment's thought, they would see they were not so foolish in this opposition to the Motion of the Prime Minister; and he did hope on this occasion he should have a good following of Members from both sides of the House, who would protest by their votes against a proceeding which was somewhat inconvenient and slightly mischievous, which was altogether childish, and thoroughly contemptible.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT, in supporting the Motion for adjournment, said, he had been in the habit of going to the Derby for the last 20 years, and he intended to go to-morrow, in spite of the annual performance of the hon. Member for Carlisle. He wished the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had got up on this occasion, and administered to the opponents of adjournment the rebuke which he administered to them before, when Mr. Thomas Hughes brought forward a similar Amendment, and when he said that they treated the subject in a sanctimonious manner. He could not say that the hon. Member for Carlisle had done that; but he could not help thinking that public business might readily dispense with the hon. Member's annual remonstrance. People might say what they liked; the Derby was regarded as a general holiday, at least in the metropolis, and he did not see why an attempt should be made to prevent Members of the House from enjoying it. The hon. Member for Carlisle had a line of his own—a very useful line, no doubt—and he ought to remember the old proverb, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam." Let him stick to temperance questions and not meddle with other matters. The hon. Member for Carlisle was supposed to have been at the Derby last year. He (Mr. Bromley-Davenport) did not say that he was; but it was a curious coincidence that while he was at Hyde Park Corner, late on the afternoon of "the Derby Day," he saw a carriage going past, in which was a gentleman in a very dusty condition, and very cheerful, who had a doll on his hat, and who bore a most marked resemblance to the hon. Member for Carlisle.

MR. ASSHETON, in opposing the Motion for adjournment, protested against the question being treated in a jocular manner. He thought it was a matter for serious consideration whether the House was justified in wasting a day for the sake of the Derby. Lord Palmerston was unable to give any better reason for such an adjournment as was now proposed than that the Derby might be said to be our Isthmian Games. It was said the officials of the House required a holiday; but as the House was about to adjourn for a week that argument did not apply. Another argument was that it was a good old custom to adjourn over Derby Day. Well, he denied that it was either good or old. When these adjournments over the Derby Day first took place the circumstances were different, as there was then not nearly so much business to transact, and a day could better be spared. Besides, those who owned the racehorses then consisted mainly of Peers and Members of the House of Commons, and he questioned whether the same could be said generally of the owners of the horses which ran in the race now-a-days. No sound reason had been given for the adjournment over the Derby Day. Members who wished to do so could attend the Derby as well without the House adjourning as they could attend the shooting at Wimbledon or a regatta without the House adjourning. If the hon. Member divided the House he should certainly vote with him, although he was quite certain that he would not lead his supporters to victory.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I am only going to add one sentence to the discussion which has taken place. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle has a special right to ask the House to consider this question in the light in which he views it. He asks us annually to consider a Bill on another subject, and he is met constantly—I do not meet him with that argument at all; I have met him with another argument—but he is constantly met with the argument that it is an absurd idea to think of making people temperate by Act of Parliament. It is the common answer to his proposition. We have found out that we cannot prevent betting or gambling, which are attended with enormous evils, by any amount of legislation which this House in past years has agreed to; but this, at least, we may do—we may avoid offering an example. We may avoid giving the sanction of this Assembly—whose character is as high as that of any Assembly in the world—we may avoid giving its sanction to an employment and an amusement which, though it may be said to be innocent in itself, yet is the cause of enormous evil in almost every town in this country. Let any Member of the House just go in his mind to any considerable town; let him go to Birmingham, or Manchester, or Leeds, or Newcastle, and he will know at once that in those towns, and in almost all towns, there is a practice of speculating and gambling in connection with horse-racing—and especially with the race of to-morrow—which is productive of incalculable mischiefs throughout the country. I have no objection to a holiday—I am rather one of the idle Members of the House, and I have no objection to an idle day; but we are about to separate for a week, and the pretence of a holiday to-morrow cannot therefore be offered in this case. What I object to is, that we should give our sanction as a legislative Assembly to these races. I agree with the hon. Member for Carlisle, and the hon. Member who has made observations most judicious and most creditable to himself from the other side of the House, that the character of the House would stand higher with the country, and wherever our debates and proceedings are read and heard of, if we were to abandon the custom which the right hon. Gentleman opposite proposes that we should follow; and I should be glad if the House would reject the Motion to-night; but if that should not be the result, I trust this may be the last time that it will be brought forward.

MR. R. POWER: The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) alluded several times to the Home Rulers. If we had an Irish Parliament, I will tell him what we would do; we would adjourn for every Derby, and if it was run twice a year we would adjourn twice a year. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Goulding) had arrived to-day in order to see the Derby to-morrow. The hon. Baronet objects to it because it is only 30 years old. Well, that is old enough for anything or anybody. The Amendment has become the perennial weed of a morbid imagination, inaccessible to reason and common sense. There has never been a Derby without a Derby dog, and some Members of this House seem to think there ought never to be a Derby without a Derby debate. I cannot understand the over-zeal for work which suddenly characterizes some of my hon. Friends. Hon. Members who oppose the adjournment always give different reasons. Some do not like to be suspected of sporting proclivities, others consider that, as legislators, they are fathers of the nation and should show no bad example to their sons, others have prejudice or ill-feeling towards the national sport, but I venture to say out of the 30 or 40 poor misguided men who will canter over the Lobby presently, there are not 10 who will not, by some accident, see the Derby to-morrow. I have been to every Derby for the last five years of my life that I have had the honour of a seat in this House; the first man I met on the course—aye, and in the betting ring—was an hon. and gallant Friend of mine who the previous night was most energetic in opposing the adjournment of the House. When I said, "You are a consistent man!" "Oh," he said, "I voted on principle last night." Well, I suppose he came to the Derby on principle also, but then sporting men are not expected or required to act on principle. But whatever their faults may be, they have not the convenient principle which some hon. Members seem to appreciate. Scotch Members might be excused for not going to the Derby. They are naturally a cool-blood, anti-sporting, anti-amusing people, and some of them would not know a horse from a mule, but that any Irishman should join the anti-Derby party is "one of those things which no fellow can understand." As an Irish Member and Home Ruler, I would be ashamed of any countryman of mine, and would certainly cut his acquaintance, who aids in any way against the adjournment of the House. In conclusion, I have three reasons against the Amendment—first, I am fond of sport, and like to see a good horse with a good man on it; secondly, I think it is the duty of every good citizen to encourage a great, ancient, and national pastime; and, thirdly, I believe I shall meet more of my constituents at the Derby than anywhere else.

The House divided:—Ayes 207; Noes 118: Majority 89.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY (MR. JOHN CROKER).—RESOLUTION.

MR. BRUEN rose to call attention to the case of Mr. John Croker, late Sub-Inspector in the Royal Irish Constabulary, and to move—

"That the punishment inflicted on him by reduction in rank in 1867 and subsequent dismissal from that force, for offences of which he declared himself to be innocent, without first affording him an opportunity of proving his innocence before an independent tribunal, was not just; and, in the opinion of this House, such an opportunity ought now to be given."

The circumstances under which Mr. Croker had been dismissed from the force were these:—When stationed in the town of Carlow, about the time in question, Mr. Croker experienced some difficulty in obtaining a house suitable for his family. After a while a house fell vacant within the town of Carlow, although out of his district, but attached to it, and without which it could not be had, were seven acres of land. The rule of the Constabulary was that no sub-Inspector should take more than three acres of land; and as the house would not be let without the whole of the land attached to it, he determined to enter upon the occupation of the premises and to give the extra four acres to his son, who was then 21 years of age. As the house, although within a few yards of the barracks, was not in Mr. Croker's district, it was necessary that he should obtain the consent of the Inspector General to live there. He went to Dublin for that purpose, and as the Inspector General was very busy at the time he told the whole of the circumstances to the private Secretary, who, having communicated with the Inspector General, came out and told Mr. Croker that it was all right. He accordingly entered upon the occupation of the house. But a few months after, when he was absent on duty, an informer wrote to the Inspector General, Sir John Wood, that Mr. Croker held more land than he had a right to do under the Constabulary Regulations; and thereupon the Inspector General, without inquiry or asking any explanation from Mr. Croker, reduced him from a first-class to a third-class sub-Inspector, involving a loss of pay of £50 a-year, and removed him to a station in the North of Ireland, thus separating him from his family. Mr. Croker remonstrated against this arbitrary and despotic act; but his remonstrances were not attended to. The case was then brought before the late Lord Mayo, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, who, on the private report of the Inspector General, which Mr. Croker had never seen, confirmed the previous sentence. It appeared that on this occasion the Inspector General had suppressed more than half of the favourable records received by Mr. Croker during his years of service. This was a matter of some importance, because the whole course of promotion in the Constabulary service depended on the records for and against their character in the Constabulary Office. Mr. Croker had 14 records in his favour, but only six of these were submitted to Lord Mayo, while all the unfavourable records against him were produced. Mr. Croker, smarting under a sense of injustice, wrote a letter to the Inspector General which the latter considered insubordinate towards himself, whereupon he dismissed Mr. Croker from the service altogether. The case was subsequently brought before Lord Mayo, in 1868, who entered fully into the matter and recommended Mr. Croker to the Treasury for a retiring allowance. It appeared, however, by the Treasury Regulations that a retiring allowance could not be granted unless upon a certificate of his commanding officer that he had served with fidelity and diligence. Sir John Wood, the Inspector General, had stated that if the Government thought fit to recommend Mr. Croker for a retiring allowance he would not oppose him, and the way he kept his word was to refuse to give the certificate. Since then Mr. Croker had never ceased to protest his innocence, and to claim that the retiring allowance, which the action of the Inspector General alone had prevented him from obtaining from the Treasury, should be given to him in some way or other. He (Mr. Bruen) confessed he could not imagine what answer could be given to the case which he had laid before the House. He understood the ground the Inspector General took was that Mr. Croker was a bad officer and unfit to be in the service; but in opposition to any statement of that nature Mr. Croker could refer to the numerous recognitions of his services both from his official superiors and public bodies during the 31 years he had been in the Constabulary, and the records in the Office were in the highest degree creditable. In 1837 there was an entry praising his promptitude and efficiency in arresting a man who was lying in ambush to shoot a landlord; in 1838, for pursuing alone two men who had shot a person on the highway just as Mr. Croker rode up, and capturing one, after an exciting chase; in 1843, from the Inspector General himself, in approval of his conduct and efficiency; and, in 1848, from the magistrates to a similar effect, during a period of seven years. He believed the charges against Mr. Croker would, when investigated, be found to be of a very trivial nature. The Government, he sincerely trusted, would cause an inquiry to be made into this case, so that the question of the guilt or innocence of Mr. Croker might be tried by a legal tribunal. He cared not what the tribunal was as long as it was impartial, and he left the choice of it to the Government. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. MELDON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the punishment inflicted on Mr. John Croker, late Sub-Inspector in the Royal Irish Constabulary, by reduction in rank in 1867 and subsequent dismissal from that force, for offences of which he declared himself to be innocent, without first affording him an opportunity of proving his innocence before an independent tribunal, was not just; and, in the opinion of the House, such opportunity ought now to be given."—(Mr. Bruen.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had never heard of the name of that gentleman before, but it appeared to him that unless the Government had facts of an entirely different character to place before the House the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) ought to be acceded to. It was a Motion which concerned the welfare and efficiency of a Force upon which the maintenance of good order in Ireland was largely dependent. This was not the only case by any means in which arbitrary proceedings had been instituted against members of the Constabulary without an opportunity of appeal being given; and unless an appeal were allowed to Parliament in such cases, they would be entirely denying justice to men who had as much a right to justice as any other of Her Majesty's subjects. Great dissatisfaction already existed in the Force, and the Government's assent to the Motion would tend greatly to allay it, without implying any distrust of the heads of the Constabulary.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not admit the existence of great dissatisfaction among the Irish Police Force, who, he believed, had the greatest confidence in the decisions of the Inspector General, which they knew would be reviewed by the Government when necessary. The course pursued was this—whenever any complaint was made against an officer of the Force it was always sent down to him with a request that he would answer it in writing, and if the matter were of sufficient importance a court of inquiry into it was held. The official Papers relating to this case were very voluminous, but he had gone through them most carefully and had ascertained the following facts relating to Mr. Croker's career. Mr. Croker, who was a gentleman of good family, and had entered the Constabulary Force many years ago, was referred to as far back as March, 1854, by Sir Duncan Macgregor, who was then at the head of the Irish Constabulary, as an officer who would continue to be useless and troublesome wherever he was stationed. The same officer, again referring to Mr. Croker in 1858, said that no admonitions, however severe, would make him conform to the regulations of the Force and that he was an encumbrance to the establishment. In the same year Mr. Croker was again reported for neglect of duty: but another chance being given to him he was merely reduced to the bottom of the list of first-class sub-Inspectors. In 1863 Sir Henry Brownrigg wrote a memorandum of a similar character with reference to Mr. Croker's conduct and he was again reduced two steps. In 1865 a commission of inquiry was held upon him, and he was found guilty of keeping a number of racehorses and of being so greatly involved in debt that his creditors had seized his horses in satisfaction of their claims. That he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) considered a most serious offence. He was warned that such conduct would lead to his dismissal; but in 1867 he was again brought under the notice of the Inspector General, and charged with having disregarded the regulation which prohibited officers in the Constabulary from occupying more than four acres of land. The result was that he was reduced to the bottom of the list of second-class sub-Inspectors and again warned. In February, 1868, the Inspector General recommended Mr. Croker's dismissal in consequence of his insubordinate behaviour, in addition to a long list of previous offences, and the late Lord Mayo, after a careful inquiry into the case, concurred in that recommendation. A compassionate allowance was applied for, but was not granted, in consequence of the Inspector General not feeling himself justified in certifying that Mr. Croker had discharged his duties with diligence and fidelity, and he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could not blame him for not doing so. It had been stated that Mr. G. A. Hamilton, the late

Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, was directed by the Treasury to inquire into this matter; but he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could not find any official trace of such direction or of any Report by Mr. Hamilton on the subject to the Treasury. A document had been circulated among Members of the House purporting to be a copy of the Report of Mr. Hamilton to the Lords of the Treasury on Mr. Croker's case. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was bound to say that this appeared to him to be a very remarkable document. In the first place, it was not dated, nor, as far as he was aware, was any manuscript copy of it by Mr. Hamilton in existence. Its phraseology, though like that used in Mr. Croker's statements, was very unlike the language that would probably have appeared in a Report by an experienced official like Mr. Hamilton. In 1872 a Commission sat in Dublin on the general question of the Constabulary. Mr. Croker brought his case before them, but not conceiving themselves authorized to inquire into particular cases, they made no Report upon it. One of the Commissioners, however, the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Major O'Reilly), had informed him that, having heard Mr. Croker's statements, the Commissioners were of opinion that he had no ground of complaint. Whether he ought to receive a compassionate allowance on the ground of his long services was another matter. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) would do his best with the time at his disposal to look into the case, and no one would be more glad than himself, if consistently with the duty he owed to the public, he could advise the Government to grant a compassionate allowance to Mr. Croker.

MR. MELDON said, he considered that Mr. Croker had been most inconsiderately and harshly treated throughout. Even when the Lord Lieutenant had assented to the dismissal of Mr. Croker, he recommended that that officer should receive a retiring allowance from the Treasury. Sir John Wood, though he had previously promised that he would not oppose the grant of that retiring allowance, afterwards refused to sign the certificate upon which alone the Treasury were authorized to pay it. It was one of the most remarkable features in this case that so few records favourable to Mr. Croker had been found. A large number had been suppressed of which he ought to have had the benefit when his case was submitted to the Lord Lieutenant. Then, with regard to the unfavourable records, it was to be observed that they dated from 1849, when the late Inspector General had a son in the force under Mr. Croker. The son left duty without leave and when the men were dying of cholera, and Mr. Croker felt it necessary to reprimand him. Ever after this Mr. Croker was subjected to the harshest treatment. He had himself read statements from parties who were ordered narrowly to watch Mr. Croker and to report him for the smallest irregularity. It was not fair to say that Lord Mayo had refused Mr. Croker's Petition—in fact, he recommended the case to the Treasury.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No—he sanctioned his dismissal, but recommended him for a compassionate allowance.

MR. MELDON: He sanctioned his dismissal on the distinct statement of Sir John Wood that he had been recommended for a pension. In 1868 Mr. Hamilton was deputed to investigate the case. He made the Report to the Treasury which it was now said to be a forgery. If it was a forgery, it could easily be proved to be so. Had any appeal been made on that point to Sir John Wood? The Report circulated among Members as being the Report of Mr. Hamilton had been stigmatized by the Secretary for Ireland as a forgery. That was a most unfounded charge. Mr. Hamilton was dead—had he been alive the charge would never have been made. Moreover, they had a certified copy of a letter of Mr. Hamilton bearing witness to the excellence of Mr. Croker's character. With that before them what ground had they for declaring that Mr. Hamilton's Report in his favour was a forgery? What he asked for was inquiry. There were two questions to be inquired into: first, was the charge against Mr. Croker true, and, secondly, had the records favourable to Mr. Croker been suppressed? He denied that the charge was true; but it was only in case that it was that the other question would arise, for then the favourable records would come in in mitigation of punishment. He asked, was it consistent with the English spirit of fair play that a man who had given 31 years of his life to the public service should be allowed to fall into indigence? for that, he regretted to say, was what awaited Mr. Croker if no further steps were taken in this matter. The only offence committed by Mr. Croker was that he held more than three acres of land, and if there were any other offences they had been condoned.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he held in his hand the paper which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had insinuated was a forgery; but, if it were a forgery, nothing would be easier for the right hon. Gentleman than to prove it. Moreover, if it were a forgery, how was it that Mr. Croker had been recommended for a compassionate allowance?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he had guarded himself against saying that Mr. Hamilton's alleged Report was a forgery. All he had said was that the style of the document was extremely remarkable, and that there was no trace of it in the Department.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, it was evident from the fact that the Chief Secretary proposed a compromise that he had his doubts in respect to what had been said in regard to the authority of the Report, for if it were a forgery he could not conceive how the right hon. Gentleman should take that course. There were other serious charges made in Mr. Croker's Petition. If there was any truth in the allegation that promotion had been given by the late head of the Constabulary in return for money lent by his subordinates, the Government ought to be most anxious for inquiry. On the contrary, if the statement were false, it was absolutely necessary for the honour of the Irish Constabulary that there should be some sort of investigation.

MR. PARNELL bore testimony to the zeal and efficiency of Mr. Croker during the time he was sub-Inspector in the county of Wicklow. On one occasion when there was a strike of the miners had it not been for him there would have been great bloodshed. He held in his hand a number of letters from men of the highest character, who described Mr. Croker as a man of honour and a gentleman.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had known Mr. Hamilton, who was a gentleman and a scholar. He could not believe that the illiterate Report was his production. But this doubt was a reason for inquiry. And as new facts of great importance had been made known in the discussion, in justice to Mr. Croker as well as in the interests of truth, a new inquiry was desirable.

MR. VERNER said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) had no intention to throw any reflection upon Sir John Wood. He hoped that after what had come out in the course of the debate the Government would accede to the Motion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, it was impossible for the Government to assent to the Resolution as it stood, inasmuch as it involved a Vote of Censure not only on Sir John Wood, a distinguished public servant, but also on the Government of the day. Since the Chief Secretary had spoken several matters had been brought before the House of which his right hon. Friend was not aware when he rose to address it. He had now to announce to the House that if the present Motion were withdrawn the Government would institute such an inquiry as would, he thought, be satisfactory to all parties. He wished to mention that his right hon. Friend had, before coming down to the House, made inquiry at the Treasury, and had been informed that there was no such letter or Report as had been referred to.

MR. BRUEN said, that under the circumstances he should, of course, withdraw the Motion. He wished, however, to mention that he himself sent the autograph letter of Mr. Hamilton to the right hon. Baronet.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he had no recollection of anything of the kind. Certainly, he should not have made the statement if he had not believed it to be true.

MR. CALLAN hoped the promised inquiry would extend to all the allegations contained in the memorial of Mr. Croker.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ELECTORAL SYSTEM—BOROUGH AND COUNTY CONSTITUENCIES.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. TREVELYAN, in rising to move the Resolutions of which he had given Notice—course, I am very well aware that, as the debate proceeds, a new set of objections will crop up to meet the new contingency. Those hon. Gentlemen who in 1872 voted against the principle of Household Suffrage because it was asserted in an abstract Resolution, and who, in subsequent years, voted against it because it was embodied in a single-barreled Bill, will now have the pleasure of voting against it as an abstract Resolution again. But these subtle and delicate considerations will not have much effect upon the conduct of those, who having already recorded their votes against the continued exclusion of their fellow-countrymen from the pale of citizenship, are now ready to repeat that protest, even when it is coupled with a declaration that the existing distribution of political power among our constituencies might easily be altered for the better. We are not so passionately enamoured of the inequalities and anomalies of an electoral system, which, even after it has been twice altered, first by our fathers, and then by ourselves, is still by far the most inequitable and the most anomalous electoral system that anywhere exists. So glaring and so universal are its defects that it is difficult to say in which quarter of the United Kingdom they are the most apparent. In England, 800,000 electors, in the 26 largest cities return between them 73 Members; while exactly the same number of Members are returned by 70,000 electors scattered over 55 little towns or villages which are called towns only by courtesy. In Ireland 35,000 electors, in Dublin and Belfast, return only four Members; while 22,000 electors in other Irish towns return as many as 33 Members. In Wales the vote of an elector who happens to reside in Merthyr Tydvil has only one-tenth of the weight of the vote of an elector who happens to reside in Brecon. In Scotland, the vote of an elector who lives in Glasgow has only one-eighth of the weight of the vote of an elector who lives in New Galloway. We have taken nationalities as a whole. Let us take a single county. In Yorkshire 3,200 electors in Richmond, Thirsk, Northallerton, and Knaresborough return actually twice as many Members as the 32,000 electors of Sheffield; while Keighley, and Barnsley, and Batley, and Todmorden—towns whose population is equal to that of half-a-dozen pocket constituencies, and whose wealth is equal to that of a dozen and a-half—are not thought worthy to appear in the rank of Parliamentary boroughs at all. We have taken a single county. Let us take two counties and compare them together. There are ten times as many people in Middlesex as in Wiltshire, but, instead of returning only one-tenth as many Members, Wiltshire returns 15 Members to the 19 of Middlesex. There are ten times as many people in the West Riding as in Dorsetshire, but the Members for the West Riding, instead of being as ten to one to the Members for Dorsetshire, are little more than two to one. Anyone who is familiar with the talk of our Lobbies knows that many hon. Gentlemen shrink from an extension of the county franchise because they are under the impression that the re-distribution of seats which would follow upon such a measure would take the direction of diminishing the political power of the towns, and increasing the political power of rural, and, as they think, less intelligent and progressive, districts. But an examination of our existing electoral arrangements will soon convince those hon. Gentlemen that they may spare their fears. The most ingenious manipulator of statistics is welcome to spend his ingenuity on our Parliamentary Returns as long and as often as he will, for, however he may turn and torture the figures that he will find in those Returns, he can arrive at only one result. Wherever there is a district which, taking the county and the borough seats together, is over-represented by the number of Members that it returns to Parliament, it will invariably be the case that such a district is one where, by comparison with other parts of this favoured island, trade is not the most active, education is not the most advanced, wages are not the highest, and capital is not increasing with any exceptional rapidity. On the other hand, whenever a district is greatly under-represented in proportion to its population, in such a district every symptom of commercial prosperity and social and intellectual progress will be found. Let me call the attention of hon. Gentlemen to one single item of calculation which, by itself, should be sufficient to re-assure those who apprehend that a fresh re-distribution scheme will be to the disadvantage of the intelligence and independence of our great national constituency. A re-arrangement of political power, strictly based upon population, would considerably more than double the number of Members now allotted to Middlesex, to Surrey, to Lancashire, and to the West Riding of Yorkshire. Where will you match that list? Not in any quarter of the civilized world is now, or ever has been, collected together so much industry, knowledge, and enterprize, or so much material wealth—the natural fruit of those qualities—as in the four districts which I have named. Continental countries have regarded with admiration many of our institutions, and have imitated them with eagerness, and sometimes with success. They are not very likely to imitate a system under which political power is distributed among the different sections of a nation exactly in inverse proportion to the share which those sections contribute towards making that nation prosperous at home and powerful abroad. What would a German statesman think of a proposal to give to the vote of a Pole or East Prussian four times the weight that he would give to the vote of a citizen of Cologne, and ten times the weight that he would give to the vote of a citizen of Berlin? What would an Italian say to the notion of favouring Calabria and Sicily in the proportion of five to one as compared with Lombardy and Piedmont, or a Spaniard to the notion that the most scantily represented places in the Peninsula should be Madrid, Barcelona, Seville, Valencia, and Cadiz? No, Sir, my motive in bringing forward the second of these two Resolutions, and of coupling it with that which precedes it, is to afford hon. Members an opportunity of proclaiming that they will not be deterred from extending civic rights to the excluded population of our counties, merely because the consequence of that extension may be that we shall be under the obligation of giving to Manchester and Liverpool, to Leeds and Glasgow, to Southwark and Westminster, to the wool districts of Yorkshire, the cotton districts of Lancashire, and the mining districts of Durham, something better than the mere shadow of representation with which they now are mocked; and that we shall not be frightened out of one act of justice because circumstances are such that it must necessarily be accompanied by another. And now, Sir, having secured the ground in our rear by assuring those whose general sympathies are with us that we are prepared to treat electoral reform as a whole, and deal with it as it should be dealt with, by responsible public men, we may with renewed confidence face once more to the front, and challenge hon. Gentlemen opposite to bring forward a single valid argument which may convince those who ask for admission to the franchise that their claim, if it cannot be granted, has at the least been thoughtfully and respectfully considered. One argument which has some appearance of validity, and one only, has hitherto reached my ears. It is said that if we insist upon conferring the franchise on those who have not got it already, we shall give them something which has no tangible and material value, and which they are therefore just as well without. This argument has something about it so invidious—I had almost said so repulsive—that it is usually enveloped in a cloud of phrases which may render it a little less unattractive to an English ear. The shape in which it is usually put forward is something of this sort—We are told that the House of Commons is a practical Assembly, full of common-sense men, whose time is so taken up with useful matter-of-fact legislation that it has not the leisure to attend to a grievance which is not so much one of reality as of sentiment. Sir, it is for those who suffer under a grievance to define its nature, and not for those who obstinately refuse to redress it. It is all very well for us to be contented with the relations which at present exist between Parliament and the country. We have quite as much business as we can do. We have quite as many constituents as we want. We are, most of us, conscious that we are earnestly and laboriously striving to do our duty by the great body of our countrymen, and we honestly believe that we know quite as much about the feelings and opinions of the outside public as is required to guide our deliberations. But, Sir, we must remember that this is not the first Parliament that has taken too favourable a view of the extent to which it represents the country. No one can study the debates which preceded the passing of the great Reform Bill without being persuaded that many of those who opposed reform were sincerely convinced that the Members for the old rotten boroughs thoroughly understood the interests and the wishes of the great unrepresented cities. No one can study the Reform debates of 1866 and 1867 without perceiving that there were many hon. Gentlemen who were sincerely convinced that the Representatives of the £10 householders thoroughly understood the interests and the wishes of the unfranchised mass of the town population. The illusion was honourable; but none the less was it an illusion; and I will venture to say that there are many borough Members in this House who will willingly confess that Household Suffrage has had an unexpected influence on their political conduct, and to a most unlooked-for extent has added to their political knowledge. And if we are obliged to make this confession, and to couple it with the natural and inevitable deduction that, if Household Suffrage were extended to the counties, we should learn a great deal that we did not know before, what do we think must be the aspect of the situation to those who view it by the light of a great wrong inflicted upon themselves? Who, standing outside the fence of political privilege, are doomed to hear their dearest interests discussed in an assembly in which they have neither part nor parcel, and their condition in this world, social, moral, and material, settled for them, without their once having the opportunity of expressing their own wishes in the matter? Why, what are the questions of this Session, and what portion of our population do they especially affect? Among the first measures which were submitted to us from the Treasury bench was a Bill relating to the preservation of commons. Now, Sir, for one piece of waste land which is valuable as a recreation ground of a neighbouring town or city, there are 20 which are important to the agricultural labourer as a playground for his children, and a pasture for his scanty live stock. And yet, in discussing the Commons Preservation Bill, we hear everything that has to be said by the Representatives of those whom it concerns but little; while those whom it concerns most have absolutely no Representatives at all. The most important matter which we shall have to decide this year is the extension throughout the country of some form or another of obligatory education, and the process by which, and the authorities by whom, the obligation is to be enforced. But already the immense majority of our town population lives under a system of compulsory education. That problem, broadly speaking, is already settled as regards the towns; it is for the rural districts that we are now proceeding to legislate, and in the rural district not one in 100 of those whom our educational legislation will touch has the means, directly or indirectly, of making his voice audible within these walls. There is another matter which has not, indeed, been brought forward by the Government, but which has been debated so ably and so seriously, both here and in "another place," and has provoked such a large and evenly-balanced expression of Parliamentary opinion, that it cannot fairly be denied a rank among the questions of the day. The law under which burials are to be conducted in our churchyards is one which, however keenly it may be contested on the ground of abstract principle, as a practical matter concerns the smaller towns but little, and the larger towns not at all, but which gains its material importance from its bearing upon the sentiments of our rural population, and it is precisely those sentiments at which we can do nothing more than guess so long as the country householders are unrepresented here; and as it is in the present, so it has been in the past. Every succeeding Session places on the Statute Book a fresh crop of laws—well-meant, indeed, and often well devised—which regulate the lives of our rural population, but on the scope and the details of which in this country is called self-government, their opinion is never so much as asked for. One year, by our system of short enlistment, we entirely altered the conditions of our military service, without consulting the class from whom the recruiting agent draws the largest part, and the best part, of our rank and file. Another year we dealt, for good or for evil, with the licensing system of the country, without consulting the class from whom the village publican draws his customers, or his victims. Sanitary laws are passed for the prevention of the spread of infectious disease, which entail on the agricultural labourer trouble, and worry, and expense, but to the framing of which he has just as little to say as the cattle have to say to the Circulars on the foot-and-mouth disease which the Privy Council may judge fit to issue. Game laws, enclosure laws, vaccination laws, poor laws, registration laws—from the cradle to the grave, the rural householder lives under the dominion of enactments which are passed for him, and not by him, and in which, freeman as he is called, he has no part except to obey them. Surely it is high time that Parliament, recognizing those disadvantages in his position which I have feebly and briefly endeavoured to indicate, should, by giving its adhesion to these Resolutions, hold forth to him at least a pledge that, at the first convenient opportunity, he shall be raised to the same political level as the peasantry of France, of Germany, of Switzerland, of the United States—of every nation, in short, which can for a moment compete with his own in the race of enlightenment and civilization. Sir, it has been said that there is no demand for this measure; but I shall leave that allegation to be answered by those hon. Gentlemen who were present at the meeting at Exeter Hall on Wednesday last, and at the Conference which preceded it. Never, I will venture to say, has there been a demonstration in favour of any public object which, in one sense, so merited the respectful notice of the Legislature; for never perhaps before was so large a body of men collected together at such cost and inconvenience to themselves. When we remember how slender are the finances of a cottager in a rural village, even when they have been eked out by the sixpences and shillings of the neighbours of his class whom he has been chosen to represent, I think that we shall allow that this assemblage of agricultural labourers, who have travelled at their own charges from Dorsetshire, Cheshire, and Lincolnshire, deserves at least as much consideration as those troops of well-to-do gentlemen in broad cloth, who flock up to London for public business on the eve of the Derby day. It is a very hard thing that we should force these poor men to leave their work, which is not overpaid to that degree as to give them much margin for political leisure, in order that Session after Session and Parliament after Parliament they may hang about our lobbies and haunt our galleries, pressing us to grant them a demand, the intrinsic justice of which none of us disputes. The peasantry of this country have not the time or the taste for being members of these annual deputations. Their object is to have a permanent deputation, which may watch their interests and speak their mind at Westminster, in old constitutional shape of county Members, whom they have had their share in sending to Parliament. That is what they want. That is what they have a right to get; and I am sure that, whoever may think fit to refuse them this boon on the ground that there is no call for it, such a response will never be heard from the Members of that great Party, whose historical policy it has been to anticipate the demands of justice, and to grant, in obedience to reason and equity, concessions which must sooner or later be yielded to political expediency and political pressure. On the 4th of March, in the year 1790, it was proposed to amend the representation by a scheme, the essential part of which consisted in extending the franchise to the resident householders of the counties; and on that occasion Mr. Fox pronounced that "he thought the outline of the present proposition the best of all which he had yet heard suggested." Such, nearly three generations ago, was the view of that great statesman, the father of modern English Liberalism; and we, on this side of the House, may feel confident that by assenting to the Resolutions before us, we shall be faithful to the interests of our country, and true to the tradition of our Party. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the first of the Resolutions.

MR. FAWCETT, in seconding the Motion, observed, that it would not be well for its supporters to underrate the difficulties with which they had to contend, or the obstacles they had to surmount. It might be that his hon. Friend had added to those difficulties by associating with the proposal for an extension of the franchise the proposal for a redistribution of political power; but, in doing so, he could not but think that his hon. Friend had acted with great judgment. Heretofore, an abstract Resolution or a Bill in reference to the extension of the suffrage had been invariably met with one argument to the effect that that subject could not be considered separately from the subject of a re-distribution of seats. That argument had been used last year by the Prime Minister. It had also been urged by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and the opinion expressed by the noble Lord was shared by many hon. Members on that side of the House. The two questions should be considered together, because if they extended the suffrage simply they would increase the anomalies and inequalities of the electoral system; they would add to the existing inadequacy of county representation, and, in the case of populous towns not separately represented, they would more and more swamp the rural element by urban votes. In 1867 there was a small movement towards re-distribution, and it was then said that a larger measure in that direction would be taken up afterwards; but, notwithstanding, nothing more was ever heard of it until there began to be a talk of a further extension of the suffrage. It was injustice more keenly felt when a man had no vote because he lived on one side of an artificial boundary, whilst his friend who lived on the other had a vote; there was the injustice of a vote having only one-tenth the force that another vote in a smaller borough had. It might be asked why they were not content to do one thing at a time, and the answer was, that even if they secured an extension of the franchise in the first instance, they could not be sure of obtaining afterwards a comprehensive re-distribution of political power. They should no doubt be told that in order to be logical, it was necessary to go beyond household suffrage, and demand equal electoral districts, since nothing short of such a measure would give equality of representation. It seemed to him that to press such an argument upon the House was most unfair, because every one knew that no political question was ever determined in this country by the political necessities of the case. Such an argument would have been equally forcible on the occasion either of the first, or the second, Reform Bill. It was also said, and with some truth, that those who advocated a re-distribution of seats were bound to show how the present inequalities were to be redressed and to indicate the nature of the reforms they had in view. He was not going on the present occasion to sketch out the details of a new Reform Bill; yet, he would not shrink from enumerating some of the general principles of such a measure. He had no right to speak for any one but himself; but he thought he could show that a juster distribution of political power might be attained without any tendency towards equal electoral districts or the destruction of those local associations which were so dear to many hon. Members. It would hardly be disputed that towns with 500,000 inhabitants, or divisions of counties like the South Western Division of Yorkshire with 400,000 inhabitants, should have more political power than they now enjoyed. It was also desirable that the present constituencies should be preserved as far as possible, and that, instead of disfranchising the smaller boroughs, that they should be wherever it was practicable, grouped with other towns and places. The large unrepresented towns, by becoming representative boroughs, would be taken out of the counties, and something would be done to remedy an inconvenience at present complained of. If large counties and boroughs obtained more Members, he was so anxious to avoid equal electoral districts that he would do nothing to destroy the integrity of those county and borough constituencies, and if, for example, a large town returned five Members, he would not divide that town into five wards, with a Member for each ward. In those great constituencies, moreover, which ought to have four or five Members some plan should be adopted so as not to give the representation entirely to the majority, but to enable all important sections of political opinion to exercise the political power which was fairly their due. Those who advocated the present Resolutions would admit that whenever this question came to be dealt with by a Government, many collateral questions would have to be raised. If, for example, a uniform suffrage were adopted in counties and boroughs, there could not be a vestige of a reason why the non-resident qualification in counties should be maintained. At the present time no less than 10 per cent of the voters in counties were non-resident, and it had always appeared to him a matter of great injustice that a man who perhaps represented a purely fictitious qualification, should be able to neutralize the vote of some resident of a county whose life had been spent there. Probably the argument that would be most advanced against his hon. Friend would be that his proposals were abstract Resolutions. But had his hon. Friend embodied his proposals in a Bill, he would have been told that, as a private Member, he had been guilty of great presumption in bringing forward a scheme of Parliamentary reform. That, however, was an argument which he should be surprised to hear advanced from the Treasury Bench, because its occupants when in opposition were the great advocates of abstract Resolutions, and there was nothing that helped them so much into power as the abstract Resolutions they were perpetually moving respecting local taxation and local government. Then, too, it must be remembered that this House was not only a Legislative Assembly; it was a great Representative Assembly where the opinions and the feelings of the people found their most legitimate and constitutional expression. Perhaps at the present moment the question was not ripe for the Government to undertake; but if there was a strong—he did not say a predominant—feeling in the country in favour of these proposals, it would be wrong that such a feeling should not find expression in this House. When a deputation waited on Earl Russell in 1866, many wishing that his Reform Bill should go further, that distinguished statesman asked how many Members of the House of Commons were in favour of such an extreme opinion as household suffrage; and somebody answered, “Not 40.” Yet, within a year and a-half from that time the Prime Minister had educated his 40, and 350 Members of the House of Commons supported household suffrage, thus enabling the right hon. Gentleman to perform the greatest achievement of his life. He should not venture to predict when the minority of to-night would grow into a majority, but that it would become so no one could doubt, and all the more rapidly the oftener the subject was discussed. Perhaps his hon. Friend had confined his remarks too strictly to the rural labourers, for, as the Prime Minister pointed out, this was also the case of the urban population, the expediency of whose admission to the franchise nobody disputed. During the last 20 years he had attended many public meetings as large as that held on Wednesday last; but he unhesitatingly asserted that he never attended one at which greater enthusiasm and greater earnestness were displayed, accompanied with so much moderation, sober judgment, and sound sense. At some former period doubts were entertained as to the desirability of conferring the suffrage on the rural labourers. These doubts must be removed by the conduct they had exhibited during the last few years. There had never been a greater industrial dispute in this or any other country in which so much good sense, sobriety, and desire to avoid violence had been displayed as had been by the agricultural labourers in their recent efforts to obtain an advance of wages. He hoped, in conclusion, that the House would support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for the Border Burghs propose that the Resolutions should be put separately or not?

MR. TREVELYAN: I propose that they should be put separately, Sir.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to adopt an uniform Parliamentary Franchise for Borough and County Constituencies.”—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he did not propose to follow the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, a speech which did no less than shadow forth a Reform Bill. He had listened, as he always listened, with great pleasure to the speech of his hon. Friend who had introduced the subject, and he ventured to say that if eloquence of statement and brilliancy of illustration could insure success, he might fairly look for a triumphant majority. The object he (Mr. Dalrymple) had, however, in now rising was to explain why, having voted for the Bill of his hon. Friend in 1874, he intended to vote against his Resolution to-night. Though this was his intention, he remained of the same opinion as before, and in no way repented of his former vote. He could not see how, if in 1867 household franchise should have been given to boroughs, it could be refused to counties at the proper time. He did not speak of parts of the country with which he was unacquainted; but he had in his mind two towns in a Scotch county, separated by some three or four miles. In one there was household suffrage, because it happened to belong to a group of Parliamentary burghs, and in the other, where the people were of a superior character, the county franchise prevailed. It was almost as remarkable as where a man on one side of a hedge had a vote, and a man on the other had not. It was nothing to the purpose if it were said that the agricultural labourer, from want of education, was not fitted to have a vote; for in 1867 the suffrage was given to a large number of persons notoriously but little fitted to exercise it. Granted that his hon. Friend would give the franchise to persons not fitted for it, he would also enfranchise persons who were well qualified to use it. There was as much to be said against the Motion, and no more, as there was against the Household Suffrage Bill in 1867. He knew that these matters were not settled by consideration of logic. He knew that the franchise was not a panacea for all evils, social and political. He repudiated the notion that the franchise was an educator. It would be just as true to say that it was a great demoralizer, because there were evils connected with popular election. He could not agree with the hon. Member for the Border Burghs when he said that because a man had not a vote therefore he was unrepresented in the House. He did not take so lofty a view of the franchise, nor so low a view of representation. Many a man might be thoroughly represented in the House who had not a vote. He should think himself a poor Representative indeed, if he could only represent the class to which he belonged. He supposed the Members who claimed to represent the working men did not assert that they represented them only; and it was as absurd to say that because a man had not a vote, therefore he was unrepresented, as it would be to say that because a Member of a particular class was not in the House, therefore that class was unrepresented. It was a poor compliment to the intelligence and generosity of those who sat in the House to say that they only represented the class to which they belonged. What the hon. Member said on that point, if carried out, would point to universal suffrage; because as long as any number of persons were without the suffrage, it might be said even of the extreme residuum that they were unrepresented in Parliament.

Mr. Dalrymple

Further, though he sympathized two years ago, and still sympathized, with the proposition to equalize the country and borough franchise, he must express his strong dissent from some of the proceedings which took place at a public meeting held last week in another part of London. Many statements were there made of an exaggerated and irresponsible character, which rather brought discredit than honour on a great movement. It was not the comparatively moderate proposal of his hon. Friend, but manhood suffrage that was approved. ["No, no!"] He knew that the meeting wisely and judiciously guarded itself against any resolution in favour of manhood suffrage, but many who were present pointed to manhood suffrage as the glorious goal they had in view, and towards which the movement of his hon. Friend was a mere fingerpost and stepping-stone. But, apart from all the exaggerations with which it was surrounded, he believed, when the proper time arrived, his hon. Friend would be found to have justice on his side. He had supported his hon. Friend in 1874, but he was not prepared to vote with him to-night, and it was that course which he (Mr. Dalrymple) had risen to explain. He would, however, reserve to himself that liberty and independence which he had before exercised in regard to the subject. The question did not now stand where it did in 1874. He thought that when Parliament had once expressed its opinion on the subject, as the House then did in a most significant manner, the decision should hold good while the Parliament lasted. The present was not a question within the domain of practical politics during the present Parliament, and he believed it was quite hopeless to think of carrying the equalization. But other considerations demanded attention. The Government had set to work, in fulfilment of many pledges, to carry out practical legislation. A Bill for increased education had been introduced into the House, and he could not help hoping that increased provisions for compulsory education might be introduced; but if the agricultural labourer had the opportunity of voting in the abstract, he (Mr. Dalrymple) doubted whether he would be in favour of compulsory education. Again, if the question were really before Parliament, a whole Session would be occupied with its consideration. The present Government had shown that they were not afraid of an extension of the franchise. In 1867 they gave household suffrage in boroughs. It might be said, and had been said, that the Conservative Party did the work of the Liberal Party. But in 1867, by a majority of 21, household suffrage in boroughs was carried against the vote of the Liberal Party. It was not, therefore, impossible for the Government to deal with the matter. But they did not come into power to disturb the franchise, and while at least they would not consent to have their hand forced, for anything he knew they were at present satisfied with the political machinery they had. Whatever the result of the vote might be, his hon. Friend might console himself with more than one reflection. Whenever the equalization of the county and burgh franchise took place his name would be mentioned in connection with the subject. Whatever might be the decision of the House that night—and no one could doubt what it would be—there were a number of Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House who had expressed themselves in favour of equalization; and many would vote in favour of it when the proper time arrived. For himself, he might say that he never gave any pledges on the subject. A vote given in 1874 in favour of equalization had probably offended as many persons as it gratified. He (Mr. Dalrymple) remained of the same opinion on the subject as he formerly held; but the time had clearly not yet arrived for the change which the Motion pointed to, and he held that it was not in accordance with political wisdom to urge on the question year after year against the clearly-expressed opinion of Parliament.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that he had never in his Parliamentary experience listened to such an extraordinary speech as that of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. Whatever else the hon. Member might be, he was certainly not the man one would choose to go tiger-hunting with. The hon. Member had supported the Motion of his hon. Friend two years ago, and the only reason why he was not prepared to do so now was that Parliament had then pronounced against it. He had said that household suffrage in the boroughs was carried by the Conservatives; but the fact was that the Conservatives were in a minority when household suffrage was carried, and but for action in the Tea Rooms of a large number of persons who had been Radicals all their lives, it probably would not have been carried at all. Then the hon. Gentleman made a most unfounded attack on the late meeting at Exeter Hall. There was no foundation for the statement that all the chief speakers had manhood suffrage in their minds.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he made no such statement. His knowledge of what occurred at this meeting was not derived from newspaper reports which might mislead, but from one who like the hon. Baronet was present. What he said was that the meeting guarded itself against adopting manhood suffrage, but that persons present, not the most obscure, pointed to it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he wished the hon. Gentleman had named those persons; he was present, and he heard nothing of the kind. An Amendment, no doubt, was moved in favour of manhood suffrage, but it was only supported by eight votes. The real point, however, of the argument of the hon. Member who had just sat down was that he and his Party would vote for the proposal of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs when the proper time came. It seemed, however, that the proper time had arrived two years ago, when the hon. Gentleman voted in favour of the Motion; and when the question was taken up by the front Bench opposite, no doubt, the proper time would have arrived once more. To-night the House would have to argue it altogether as a question of time. It could not be contended by hon. Members opposite that the rated householders in the counties were not fit to exercise the franchise, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had himself said that they were as fit to exercise that trust as were the rated householders in the boroughs. The real reason for the opposition to the Motion of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs was that the question of re-distribution underlay that of the franchise, and it was for that reason that he (Mr. Trevelyan) had placed a re-distribution Motion on the Paper, coupling the two things together. The Prime Minister had thrown out a challenge on the subject, and that challenge had been accepted, a complete scheme being brought forward. The bugbear which had been conjured up in connection with a complete and logical scheme was the effect which it would have in diminishing the number of Representatives in certain counties. But the whole class of county Members, with the exception of three or four from Scotland, would be unaffected; the Members for the large boroughs also would be unaffected, and it was only Members for the small boroughs in Ireland and England who would be touched. He had presented a remarkable Petition that day from Midhurst and Chichester, in which it was stated that political life was extinct in those boroughs, and that they were entirely in the hands of certain great families. But no one who knew the county from which the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) came could doubt, no matter how the county was divided, that he would obtain a seat; and so it would be with most hon. Members who now had seats in the House. It should be remembered that the anomalies mentioned that evening were not only enormously great, but were rapidly increasing, as appeared by a Return for which he had moved. The small constituencies were standing still or going back, while the large constituencies were increasing at a rate of which hon. Members were hardly aware. For instance, Liverpool in 1872 had 48,000 electors; in 1873, 53,000; in 1874, 56,000; in 1875, 59,000; it had now 61,000, thus increasing at the rate of 3,000 a-year. How many small boroughs would it take to make up 3,000 electors? Very lately there was an election in Manchester, and his hon. Friend (Mr. Jacob Bright) was returned by exactly 300 times as many votes as the hon. Member for Portarlington (Captain Dawson-Damer), who obtained a seat by 76. While in some constituencies candidates had secured 21,000 votes, and yet had been defeated, 76 votes and 86 votes had sufficed to send two Members to the House. Twenty-eight Members sat for constituencies with more than 20,000 electors; 72 sat for constituencies with more than 10,000; and 52 sat for constituencies with fewer than 990 electors. The Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, of which he was Chairman, had taken evidence on the working of the Ballot in large as compared with small towns, and that evidence showed that it was useless to attempt to make provisions against intimidation and corruption in very small constituencies, because they were so easily manipulated and managed; and the same reason led to the abuse of the provision for taking the votes of illiterate voters, in whose cases intimidation was made stronger than it ever had been before. These difficulties disappeared with the increase of the size of constituencies, until in one of fair average size the attempt to follow individual voters and discover how they had voted was abandoned as useless. The anomalies which existed in our representation were a scandal to the country. It was a crying scandal that boroughs should be bought and sold as was frequently the case. He had known of an instance in which landed property was put up for sale, and as an inducement to purchase it was distinctly stated that the property carried with it the representation of a particular borough—indeed, the fact was stated in Parliamentary handbooks. The supporters of the Motion, therefore, thought that not only were they right in bringing forward the question of re-distribution along with the proposal to assimilate the county and borough franchises, but also that the re-distribution of political power would be a wise just reform in itself.

MR. BURT said, he thought that the hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion had done well in dealing with the question of re-distribution of seats, because the Prime Minister two years ago declared that his chief objection to the Bill then introduced was that there had been no instance of extensive enfranchisement without a simultaneous consideration of the re-distribution of political power. He trusted that as that objection had been met, the right hon. Gentleman would not discover any new objection. He did not desire to argue the claim to enfranchisement on the ground of abstract right, although he believed, with the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), that every man not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or public danger, was morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution, and he had never yet met with the man who did not believe that he was one of those who had the moral right. In reply to what had been said by the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple), he would quote the advice of Lord Palmerston—"Yield to-day that which is reasonably demanded, and resist to-morrow that which you would be borne out in resisting; do not let us put ourselves in the wrong to-day merely that we may find ourselves in the right to-morrow." The Members of the present Government having in 1867 brought forward a Bill based on household suffrage, it was not unreasonable to ask them now to carry out the principle they had formerly adopted as their own. If it were to be suggested that working people in the counties were ignorant, he would reply that we had not laid down any educational test for the franchise. It might be that some who had it in virtue of their material possessions were educationally less fitted to exercise it than some who claimed it. He was much gratified to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister declare two years ago that, in his opinion, the householders in the counties were as fit to exercise the franchise as those in the towns, and he had no doubt would exercise it with equal prudence and advantage to the community. He could say, from experience, that the best portion of the working classes in this country thought they were unjustly excluded from the right, or, as some would call it, the privilege, of voting for Members of Parliament. They petitioned and they held demonstrations; and one recently held in the metropolis was a spontaneous one, got up without organization, and attended by delegates whose expenses were paid by the pence of their fellow-workmen. Hoping that he might be excused an apparent breach of good taste, he would mention his own case. From the age of 10 to that of 28 he worked in a coal mine, and for the last eight years he was a householder, but, although he took an earnest interest in political questions, he was on no Parliamentary or municipal register. When he was 28 years of age he took the position, at the earnest request of his fellow-workmen, of secretary of a trades union. Now, the significant fact was that, though he had taken an active interest in the political questions of the day during the time he was earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, he was never on the political register; but as soon as he became a trades union secretary he was put at once on the register and obtained the right to vote for the election of a Member of Parliament. He did not know whether hon. Members thought that a hard-working man, honestly maintaining his family, was a less worthy member of society than a trades union secretary; but such was not his opinion. In his judgment nobody could take a more honourable place than the man who earned his bread by the labour of his hands. His (Mr. Burt's) former position was similar to that of tens of thousands at the present time, and these men considered that the deprivation of the franchise was a stigma on their poverty. The broad line of distinction between the voters and the non-voters in a country village was this. The voters lived in big houses and never soiled their hands by manual labour; whereas the non-voters lived in the small houses, and were the people who tilled the fields and performed the manual labour of the country. He appealed to hon. Members on both sides of the house to remove this injustice. The working classes did not desire patronage or favouritism, but they wanted fair play, and they did not believe they were fairly treated at the present moment. They did not entertain those chimerical notions by which the working men of some other countries were carried away. They did not envy the rich man his wealth. They did not care for social equality, but they believed in political equality, and in having equal civil rights with their fellow-countrymen. They might be very ignorant of the history of their country; but they had learnt that a good cause wisely and persistently advocated was irresistible, and must ultimately prevail. In conclusion, he appealed to the House to confirm them in that belief, and to show them that they could attain their object by a peaceable appeal to the justice of their fellow-countrymen and without resorting to riot or turmoil.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, everybody must have been glad to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), who had gained the respect of the House by the able way in which he had always addressed it; and if every working man could boast of having done as much as the hon. Gentleman, he, for one, should have nothing to say against the present Motion. But all were not in the same proud position as that of the hon. Member for Morpeth. The Motion was intended to add 1,000,000 voters, according to some, or at least 1,100,000 or 1,200,000 voters, according to others, to the constituencies of the United Kingdom. Consequently, a very great re-distribution of political power would be necessary, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) was wise in his generation when he added a second barrel to his gun. Was it expedient at the present time again to tamper with and alter the Constitution of the country? The Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) said it was absolutely necessary to do so, but this he entirely denied. He did not know what the alleged anomaly was. [Laughter.] The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) smiled at this statement; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he considered a vote to be a right or a trust, and whether it ought to be local or universal? For his own part, he maintained that it should be local; that a vote ought not to be the property of any one individual; and that it ought to be various, and not uniform. If it was various, and not uniform, where was the anomaly of which hon. Members opposite complained. Last year the hon. Member for Hackney said he was anxious that the franchise should be extended, not on account of the agricultural labourers, but in order that votes might be conferred on artisans who lived outside the towns. He ventured, however, to assert that, as a general rule, this particular class had votes at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) went further, saying that if these men had votes education would be in a very different state from what it was now. The great difficulty was with the parents, and no doubt in many instances great excuses might be made for them, but they were the chief difficulty; and if this class of men were permitted to return Members to that House, the last thing they would think of would be the question of education. ["No, no!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite had had a practical acquaintance with the difficulties school managers in the country had to contend with they would come to a different conclusion. [MR. GREENE: Why do they want coercion?] Well, when a working man was supported by the labour of his children it was a great sacrifice to give that up, as he admitted he ought to do, for the sake of educating his children. There was no class of men more anxious than the landlords to promote the welfare of the labouring classes. The truth was, that men in the country never had the same means of educating themselves for the exercise of the franchise that those in the towns had; and even in towns many of those who possessed the franchise voted "yellow" or "blue," as the fancy took them, or rather as they always had done, without having the slightest idea of politics. He knew an instance in which a Member now sitting in the House had asked a man for his vote, on which the latter replied—"I never had a vote afore, and now I means to keep it." He, at all events, did not mean to part with it for nothing. Education would in time do much to fit the agricultural labourer for the exercise of the franchise; but to give it to him at present would change him from a happy, contented, and an honest man to something very much worse. Much had been said about better cottages, but experience showed that where the best had been done to place the working people in a comfortable cottage they would, if possible, let their extra room to lodgers, or fill it with apples and onions. The great object of all these proposed changes was to improve the representation of that House, and it was a very serious question whether they would effect that purpose. He maintained that there was not a class in the country whose interests did not receive the greatest attention from the House, which was always anxious to do what was just, right, and fair by every member of the community. If this proposed change would not improve the constitution or the conduct of the House, he urged upon hon. Members not to bring about an agitation which might eventually have most mischievous results, without waiting to see the full effect of the very large reforms which had been recently effected.

MR. LOWE: The change which we are invited by this Resolution to make is no slight one. I hold in my hand a pamphlet written by a gentleman of great ability, in which it is calculated that the effect of the proposed measure would be to treble the number of voters in the counties. Now, that is a very serious consideration, because it really amounts to a complete shift, so to speak, in the centre of gravity of power—it is an enormous change in the balance upon which the working of our Constitution depends. Under these circumstances, it is not unreasonable to ask for some reason to be given before we accept that change. I have listened with the greatest attention to the two hon. Members who commenced this debate—the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) and the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and I confess that I can find in their speeches no reason at all alleged for this change. Doubtless, they have reasons which appear to them to be convincing, because they evidently speak under the strongest possible conviction that this change would be beneficial to the community at large. They, however, appear to assume that the burden of proof lies upon those who withhold from any Englishman of good character and of the proper age a right to the franchise. That appears to them to be a proposition so self-evident that they do not take the least trouble to prove its soundness, but content themselves by declaiming against those who do not admit it as a matter of course. I hope I am not too inquisitive when I ask these hon. Members to tell us upon what principles their opinions are based. I want to know why it is to be assumed that every man ought to have a vote who is not disqualified by some fault or incapacity. I confess I am at a loss to understand whence that assumption arises. I heard with the greatest pleasure the speech of the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), because he seemed to feel that it was necessary before he asked us to adopt this very strong measure to lay some foundation in reason and argument for doing so, and thus, so far at all events, he carries away the prize of reason and logic from the two hon. Members. The hon. Member, doubtless, placed the matter on the ground of abstract right, and argued that every man ought to have a vote in the affairs of his country, whether his possessing it were for the advantage of his country or not. If that were the case, we could not limit that right to men, but must extend it to women and even to children, and we should cease to be guided by experience and expediency. I therefore cannot agree with the hon.

Member's argument, although it is creditable to him that he has sought to base his opinion upon a principle. What are the other grounds upon which we have been asked to accept this Resolution? We have been told that we may learn something from the representatives of the agricultural labourers. It is doubtless a good thing to learn; but we do not come here to learn, we come for other purposes, to act and to legislate. Some people say that the franchise is a privilege that ought not to be withheld from the agricultural labourer. I, however, have yet to learn that the vote is a privilege, and is something that is to be given to people as a mark of distinction or reward. The whole of the arguments in support of this Resolution resolve themselves into some vague feeling of equality or of rights. The fallacy that runs through the whole of these arguments is this, that people think there is such a thing as science in politics—that there are certain axioms in politics so certain that they need only be stated without requiring any proof whatever. I hope the hon. Member for the Border Burghs will excuse me if I take his uncle's opinion (Lord Macaulay), rather than his—namely, that we know nothing of politics except by induction and experience. If we find that a certain thing has constantly happened we infer that the same thing will happen again under similar circumstances. Thus we have found that to tax people equally is the way to make them pay their taxes most readily and to make them pay the largest sums, and that to make no distinction of persons in the eye of the law is the best way to make them obey the law willingly. But where has our experience shown us that an Assembly is good in proportion to the largeness of the numbers by which it is elected? I know that upon these questions I hold doctrines which are unpopular, and I am sorry for it; but it is most right and proper that in this House all sides should be heard, and therefore I will in a very few words tell the House what my theory of the franchise is. Hon. Members who have taken part in this debate have said nothing about the franchise itself, they have referred only to the persons who they say ought to exercise it. They look upon it as an honour, as something to be given, or, rather, they think that to withhold it is to cast a stigma upon those to whom it is not given. I hold that to be an entirely mistaken view of the matter. We are asked to make great and sweeping change in the incidence of power in this country. Suppose that it was any other system, any other machine, or any other institution, what should we do? We should act as practical, sensible men would do. We should sit down and consider what is the end or object of that machine — what it was made to do. For instance, if it was a clock, what is the object of a clock? To tell us the time. Then we should consider whether the proposed scheme tended to promote that main object. If it did, we should probably adopt it; or if it did not promote that main object, but would accomplish some other object that was valuable and would not interfere with the main object, we should, no doubt, adopt it. But supposing a man to come to me and say—"I have discovered an invention which will make the clock in this House strike 10 times louder than it does now." I ask him "What will be the effect of that?" He says—"The effect of that will be in a short time that probably it will break the bell of the clock, and very likely it will knock down the tower on which it stands." Then I say—"My object is to have the advantage of a clock to tell me the time, and I do not approve your invention, which, though it might give a collateral advantage would injure the main object for which the clock was made." Except from the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down, we have not heard anything which touches the real essence of this case. In my opinion, what we have to consider is, what effect these changes will have on the House of Commons—whether by making these changes the House of Commons will become a better machine for the purposes for which it was made for the making of laws and for the administration of government. And I must point out to the House that this is a question which it becomes every year more delicate and difficult to answer, because the House of Commons is continually making advances on the province of the Executive Government. It is a matter of extreme delicacy and difficulty to alter the constitution of this House without seeing very clearly in what direction you are going. You are not justified, in my opinion, in altering the Constitution merely because a great number of very worthy people would be much pleased if they had the advantage of being relieved from the stigma that they have not the franchise, unless you see clearly that by making the alteration the Constitution, if it be not improved, will at least not be injured. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs seemed to think we can stop with this change, but when the number of constituents is increased to the extent he proposes, it will be absolutely impossible that the present system of electoral districts can go on. It might be said that we are not proposing these alterations with a view of improving the House of Commons, but that it was a concession to a feeling—an honourable feeling, no doubt—a feeling of equality. But we cannot stimulate those feelings of equality and then regulate them, saying we will go to a certain point and then stop. When we have given these rural voters the franchise, it will be demanded, as is demanded by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), that the striking and startling differences in the amount of electoral power shall be remedied. No one can be so weak as to suppose that things can stop there. We have made a little deity of equality. We have set it up as an idol, and we must take the consequences. The result will be to carry us in the direction of equalizing electoral districts. When I look at the great disparities which now exist, and at the feelings so honestly and sincerely entertained on this side of the House, and I believe on the other also, in favour of this idol of equality—which is no idol of mine—I cannot help feeling very confident that when we come really to address ourselves to this question of electoral districts, we shall find it absolutely impossible to give equality on the old basis, and I do not think it is conceivable, remembering the differences in different parts of the country, that we can maintain the old distinction of counties and boroughs. We cannot put ourselves on an equality else, and it is no use sacrificing so much, unless we give satisfaction. I feel as certain as anyone can of the future—and I hope the remote future—that the result of what we are going to do will be to drive us not to remodel our present electoral districts, but to some process of this kind. We shall have to take the whole number of electors, divide that by the number of Members, and take the quotient as an electoral district, with some such plan as that in America, for a power of revision every 10 years. I cannot conceive how we can avoid such a conclusion. The more a man studies it, the more he will see how impossible it will be to go upon the old plan. What is to prevent it? You would concede the franchise generally to men in the rural districts and towns, and you would concede equal electoral districts, or something closely approaching to them. Is any man sanguine enough, or rather weak enough, to suppose that we can stop there after sacrificing everything to equality and recognizing its principle in this way? Is it possible to go no further, and not give an equality by extending the franchise to manhood suffrage? It is utterly impossible, and we must make up our minds to the whole course. I may be told that some countries are tolerably well governed by manhood suffrage. I do not deny that, if we had a large military power to keep order, or if we would consent to have a Constitution like that of America, where they elect a King for four years, who really governs, and whom they cannot get rid of unless he is impeached for some crime, and where the Ministers are not responsible, except they commit some crime, Government under universal suffrage might somehow go on. America shows how, under very favourable conditions, it is possible to carry on the Government; but to suppose that a Government like ours, which is not merely legislative, but in a great measure the Executive Body of the country, can be carried on under universal suffrage, is a dream, as it seems to me, too idle to be considered. It is impossible to do it; it must involve a reconstruction of our institutions of some kind or another under circumstances the least favourable to permanence, because it would be made under the influence of tremendous, sweeping change, and must be made by persons or by bodies comparatively unacquainted with the art of manipulating matters of this kind. I have felt it my duty, therefore, although I have already reaped sufficient unpopularity in this field, after nine years, once more to break silence and unburden my conscience by stating to the House what I believe must be the inevitable results of these proposals. You may say that I exaggerate in many respects; but I ask you, are you so very ill off now in this the happiest and best governed country in the world that you should try these tremendous experiments? If we were like some other countries you might say desperate diseases need desperate remedies, but where is our desperate disease? We are only too prosperous, too happy, yet I fear in the extremity of that prosperity, and happiness we shall not be satisfied until by our own hand we have pulled down the noblest fabric of liberty and justice that human hands ever raised, or human folly ever destroyed.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I have heard with pleasure, at least in one sense, and with very great interest, the speech of my right hon. Friend. I think many Members of the House who were here about 10 years ago then heard arguments somewhat of the same kind, though at that time they were not delivered with the calmness and the kindly feeling which have been displayed to-night, and I was further led to imagine that a speech of the same kind might also have been delivered previous to the year 1832. Every argument used by my right hon. Friend against the step which the House is now asked to take would have been perfectly good from this bench, if it had been adduced in company with Sir Charles Wetherell and other opponents of the Reform Bill brought in by the Government of Lord Grey. At the same time, I am not about to say that there were not words of warning which my right hon. Friend uttered, to which the House may not well pay attention. But I am glad to find that on this occasion we can debate this question in a less stormy condition of things than I have known to exist in past years. We have no anger on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, and, except from my right hon. Friend, there does not appear to be very much timidity on this side. We are, in fact, in a cool and temperate atmosphere, and we can discuss this great question now apart from the terrors and alarms with which some Gentlemen were accustomed to discuss it in past years. It is a very curious thing that these terrors or alarms should seize my right hon. Friend or affect the minds of any other hon. Members, because we must bear in mind that this country has been a country of Parliamentary representation for a great number of centuries, and that of late years—I mean within the last century, certainly within the last two centuries—we have been responsible for the spreading of representative Government of the most complete character almost all over the globe, and certainly among many considerable communities throughout the world; for instance, in what were once our colonies, and now that great nation the United States of America; again, in our great colonies of Australia and New Zealand; and also in the populous communities of South Africa under the British Crown. In all those countries representative institutions have been established on the basis of our own, but with a wider scope and including a greater portion of the population with their privileges. And, further, we may say that in most of the countries of Europe where there has been any advance of political liberty—and I doubt whether there is any in which there has not been some advance—we see that there is a representative system—following very much in the steps of ours—being gradually established. I see, moreover, in the newspapers startling news—some of which was mentioned to us this evening by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs—to the effect that in Constantinople an educated class called the Softas have even some dim idea of establishing representative institutions in that capital. Well, if this be so, we really have had a large experience—an experience of our own and other peoples. We have more than this. We have admitted—and admitted, I think, with great success—that a wide suffrage is better than a narrow suffrage. Indeed, my right hon. Friend himself speaks of this happy country, and says—“You are going to pull down the noblest fabric of liberty which human hands have ever reared.” But of this noble fabric some of the top stones—and, as I think, some of the most ornamental stones—are the very stones against which he himself protested some 10 years ago. I should hardly have thought my right hon. Friend would have spoken in such terms of eulogy about a constitution that had so recently undergone changes which in his view were likely to involve the country in danger if not in ruin. But I will now endeavour to confine my observations to what I understand to be the precise object of this Motion and this debate—namely, whether it would be judicious to extend the franchise now possessed by householders in boroughs to householders in counties. That, I think, is the question in which, whether in the counties or in the boroughs, the greatest interest is felt by the people at this moment. It is said there is something special and different about the counties, and that it is not necessary or desirable to establish in them the same franchise as exists in the boroughs. We know that there is something different. Up to 1832, no man voted for a county who was not a proprietor of the soil. It was not so much Gentlemen on this side of the House who broke in upon the practice of that time. The Chandos Clause, which gave the franchise to occupiers of the value of £50, was a clause introduced, I believe, but certainly supported, by the great body of the Party opposite. Therefore, they were the first who broke down the rule which prevailed up to the passing of the first Reform Bill. During the discussions on that Bill the House came to the conclusion that it was not wise—I agree entirely in this—to confine the county franchise to the freeholders. In past times the freeholders were a much more numerous body than they are now; and it would be impossible at this moment—as every Member of this House must know and feel—to have confined the franchise of the counties to freeholders in the counties. Then it seems to me that when the old plan of a freehold franchise was given up, and a ratepaying or occupying franchise was adopted, that was a very great step in the direction of what we are proposing to the House to-night. But still there remained a great difference between the counties and the boroughs, for in the counties you still had the freehold franchise, and a very high occupation franchise; and in the boroughs, by the first Reform Bill, you had only an occupation franchise of the value, not of £50, as in the counties, but of £10; and that difference continued for a great number of years. But there came a time when the right hon. Gentleman, now the head of the Government, being the Leader of the House, but not then the Prime Minister, himself introduced a Reform Bill, and on that occasion he objected to reduce the borough franchise at all. He was for something that was called “lateral extension.” It was a thing which nobody was able to understand, but still it sufficed, of course, for the Gentlemen who voted with him. The right hon. Gentleman was for a lateral extension of the borough franchise, but he proposed to bring down the county franchise to the same point as that which then existed in the boroughs; and the House will recollect that two of his Colleagues—the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), who always sit together—seceded from his Government because they differed with him on that question. And, therefore, if anybody feels great doubt as to the constitutional propriety of having an equal franchise in the counties and in the boroughs—especially if anybody who sits on the opposite side of the House and follows the First Minister entertains any such doubt—his difficulties may be entirely removed, because it was on the authority of his own Leader that that proposition was first submitted to Parliament. In 1866 a proposal was made that the borough franchise should be reduced to £7, and many Gentlemen now present will remember the terrible denunciations that were levelled at that so-called democratic step. In the following year the right hon. Gentleman was not only willing to accept a £7 franchise, but he was willing to go down to household suffrage, and to have no qualification whatever in the boroughs except the fact of inhabiting a house or appearing on the rate books as a householder. The Party opposite—I am sorry they afford so much opportunity for unpleasant criticism—exhibited what, to my mind, was ignorant and abject terror in 1866. I did my best to disabuse them of it. I tried to show them that, with all their Conservative intentions, it would have been wise for them to accept the Bill offered by Lord John Russell's Government. They refused, but yet in the following year they plunged into an extreme far beyond that which the year before they declared to be perilous, if not destructive, to the country. Within a few years, therefore, the Party opposite—for I must identify them with their Leader—have done two things, they have proposed that the county and borough franchises should be equalized, and they have brought forward a measure which with their consent ended in the granting of household suffrage to the boroughs. I therefore say that if they accept the first of the two Resolutions that have been proposed, their course will be entirely logical; but if they reject it, they will have to use arguments in support of their position which will entirely condemn what they have done heretofore in regard to this question. My right hon. Friend has asked two or three questions in the course of his speech. I would like to ask another, which I think ought to be settled before we proceed with this Resolution. I would ask whether the change that has been made in the borough franchise has proved itself fairly satisfactory to the House and the country? The Party opposite proposed it in such a manner that at last household suffrage in counties became unavoidable, and I have observed that in speeches made at the last General Election, and at single elections which have occurred since—especially when they have been speaking to numbers of working men—their orators always exulted in that which was done in regard to this matter. They saw what a grand and admirable thing it has been for the country, and, if I am not mistaken, Lord Derby, speaking at Edinburgh a short time since, referred to household suffrage and the working man's vote with something akin, not merely to satisfaction, but to exultation. I never have attempted to deny that a wide suffrage must, as a matter of course, introduce a great many persons who are of no advantage to the constituencies, and to whom, I am sorry to say, the franchise can be of no advantage either; but this is inevitable, and, on the whole, it will be admitted by everyone that the results of what was done in 1867 with regard to the borough franchise have been satisfactory and give us no cause whatever for alarm. Ignorance undoubtedly prevailed in regard to this question, but that ignorance is now more rapidly than at any former period in this country giving place to instruction and to schools; while corruption and intimidation, as shown by the experience of elections that have been held within the last 10 years, are giving way to a growing and strengthening moral sense throughout the constituencies. We now come to the question of the counties, in regard to which I think the inhabitants may be divided into four classes—owners of land and tenant farmers, labourers and shopkeepers, and inhabitants of towns and villages, of whom there must be a large number. Two of these classes have votes, and one of them mainly has the power. The great bulk of the labourers and of the householders in villages and small towns are excluded because of a franchise of £12 rating, which is equal to a £15 or £16 rental. [Cries of "£14."] Take £14 if you like, but £15 or £16 is nearer the mark. My right hon. Friend behind me did not give us a reason why a person living in a £15 house in the county town should not have a vote if a person living in a house at £5 rent in a borough has a vote. There must have been an object in giving votes to such persons in boroughs, and I can see no reason why the same reasoning should not apply in counties. It seems to me quite impossible and unreasonable on a speculative argument like that which has been used by my right hon. Friend to shut out, it may be, 1,000,000 persons from the franchise, every one of whom would have the power to vote if they happened to live in boroughs. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister gave household suffrage in boroughs as a means of settling the question for ever; and I can see no reason why the same rule, with a similar view, should not be adopted in the counties. It has been said that one result of passing the Resolution which has been proposed would be to lead to agitations for manhood or universal suffrage. So far from holding that view, my opinion is that the best means of putting an end to the possibility or probability of any such agitation would be to give a free vote to every householder in the country. Depend upon it, you will leave the discontented there of no authority, and you will add a vast number—hundreds of thousands, it may be, it will be—to the present electors, who will be satisfied with the rights and privileges they have secured, and will not be willing, for merely fanciful reasons, to extend them to those who may have less claim to a vote than themselves. Now, I must touch upon one question which has been remarked upon by the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), and I think it fortunate that upon this subject we should have heard that speech from the hon. Member—that is, whether the persons to whom we are now proposing to give the vote are capable of the fair and judicious exercise of their franchise. Let hon. Gentlemen opposite and the right hon. Gentlemen behind me bear in mind that there is a large class between the labourer in the county and the £16 householder. I do not know whether there is any Return which gives the precise number, but it must be nearly half of the whole number who would come between £16 and £5 rental. The farm labourers in the county would be below or about £5 rental. I think the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Walter Barttelot) would scarcely object to give the franchise to persons living in houses of from £5 or £6 to £15 or £16 rental. I would say they are persons who know something of politics, and are fairly trustworthy in the matter of the vote. Suppose we were to give it to £5 or £6 householders, would it be wise to draw a line at a point which would absolutely and effectually exclude whole classes of labourers in the counties? The moment it was done you would have the excluded labourers knocking at your doors, just as the labourers in boroughs knocked at your doors. It would be seen that it had been unwise to exclude them; and then the door would have to be re-opened to admit them. The hon. Baronet said he was not to be understood as saying anything against labourers; but I am afraid that if they could have heard him they would not have appreciated his compliments, particularly his description of their ignorance. He did not seem to bear in mind that if they are ignorant of politics they are becoming less so every day; and if it be true they are somewhat ignorant of politics, I must say that is a curious plea to be put in by Gentlemen opposite. I think the labourers need not blush compared with them if we look back over 30 years in this House. I have been in this House since 1843, and I think that nearly every measure the House is now particularly proud of has been opposed in the main by hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is a terrible thing to recall such things to hon. Gentlemen opposite. There was great terror about the importation of corn. There was great terror of the importation of cattle. I remember an hon. Baronet on this side of the House, who represented a western county, and who was known by the name of "longhorns and shorthorns," because he always told Sir Robert Peel that the introduction of longhorns or shorthorns, I forget which, would be ruinous to the trade of the country. They objected to free trade in sugar, to the abolition of the duties on paper, and to the abolition of the 4*d.* stamp on newspapers, and the duty of 3*s.* 6*d.* on advertisements. I need not talk of church rates; we are all glad to have got rid of them. Since they were abolished churches have been better cared for than ever they were before in the history of the English Church. The Irish Church question was another on which hon. Gentlemen opposite differed from us. They differed very much with regard to the legislation on Irish land. They differed from us very much about the Ballot; but they rejoice in the Ballot. ["No, no!"] It is not a question to be argued, because their approval is notorious; and in the course of another year they will be bringing in a Bill to make it permanent, and not a single voice will be raised to protest against it. With regard to education, when Lord John Russell proposed the first Vote to be given by the Privy Council, I believe it was objected to almost unanimously by the Party opposite, and it was carried only by a very small majority. Again, the French Treaty, about which there seems to be now no difference of opinion either in England or France, so advantageous has it been, was made a Party question by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I do not say this for the sake of saying anything unpleasant to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they speak of the ignorance of farm labourers, whether they might not make a little allowance for them? As far as they have had the opportunity of reading newspapers, attending meetings, or otherwise expressing their opinions, I will be bound that during all this time they have favoured the policy which hon. Gentlemen opposite have stubbornly and, I think, unwisely objected to. If they are ignorant, their ignorance is lessening every day. The condition of the farm labourer just now is one to my mind of extreme interest. I reckon wages to be a first-class question. If they can be doubled, you will double many things; you will give the labourer a better home, his children a better education; you will lift him gradually, it may be slowly, but certainly, in the scale of the society in which he lives. I recollect the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, in one of those speeches which may be amusing to his friends, but which are sometimes distressing and even painful to us, and in which he declaimed to the House about the vast sufferings of the agricultural interest, concluded by saying he was willing to rest his whole case upon the effect which would be produced on the agricultural labourer. I was speaking lately to one from his own county, who was working as a navvy in Lancashire. He was at his mid-day meal, resting from his work, and I asked him where he came from. He said from Buckinghamshire. I said—"How are things going on in Buckinghamshire?" and he replied—"A good deal better than they used to do. When I was a lad my father worked for 7*s.* a-week; but when I left home he was getting 11*s.*, and I have since hear'd as they're givin' him 14*s.*" That was double the wages received there 30 years ago. Now, about that time I went with a gentleman now in service under the Government to visit Stonehenge. It was a miserable, drizzling day; the shepherd of Salisbury Plain made his appearance in a long coat, and I asked him, among other things, how many children he had. He said—"Only one, thank God." I said—"Do you thank God, then, for having only one child?" and he said—"If you had to be on this plain seven days a-week for 8*s.* a-week, would not you thank God you had only one child?" I do not know exactly what a shepherd of Salisbury Plain gets now; but I rather think he gets double that. [An hon. MEMBER: More.] Only the other day I was going down to the North, travelling with a gentleman from Northumberland, who is a landed proprietor and farmer, and, I think, has some interest in collieries. He told me he gave 26*s.* a-week to the labourers on his farm—21*s.* in money, house, coal, and potatoes. [An hon. MEMBER: Where?] I will not give the name to anyone; but I have no doubt the statement was quite true. If that be true, the wages of the agricultural labourer have risen very greatly indeed—in some cases fully double. This brings me to the meeting held last week. I think it is a deplorable thing that the newspapers being pressed with matter at the time it was held, the proceedings were not adequately reported. There were more than 600 farm labourers, who came from various counties and districts, not at the expense of any general association, but at their own expense and the expense of their immediate friends, to discuss this very question which we are now discussing. I am sorry I was not able to attend, but the accounts I have received of it from several Members of this House who were there show it to have been one of the most remarkable political meetings held for many years in this metropolis. All these men have now their newspapers. There are newspapers printed for them, and circulated by thousands every week. Hon. Gentlemen opposite know there are such papers. There are, no doubt, many things in some of those papers which it would be better if the agricultural labourer did not read. I have seen many things that no intelligent friend of the agricultural labourer would have placed before him for his mental instruction. But the papers are there; the labourers are reading; their wages are greatly increased; their independence is increasing; and among them all there is a gradual movement which it is quite impossible for this House to undertake to suppress — a movement in the direction of asking that they should be placed on an equality with their fellow-countrymen in the towns, and that they should have that small but fair share of political influence which the man has who is intrusted with the elective franchise. Now, we know — the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) referred to them — of questions which are before the House in which the labourers and the population of the counties are greatly interested. These are the question of education; the question of local government, which hon. Gentlemen opposite find so difficult; the administration of justice; the laws relating to land; they may think some day that the land is to be made as free as the produce of the land has been made. Well, the question is a fair question; shall their Representatives speak no word on their behalf with regard to these questions? I will not enter into the question of distribution. I think that the theory that the two questions should be proceeded with together is not a wise one. I believe it would be better if the House concentrated its view upon the question of the franchise, not that it will not be necessary to touch the matter of the distribution of seats, but because that is not a matter which requires to be argued. The moment the franchise is amended, all men's eyes who look with interest to this question, will be turned to the question of distribution. But the question of the franchise is one which presses much more than the other, because a great body of the labourers feel that they are aggrieved. They are not aggrieved on the question of distribution any more than we are. We all feel alike about that. But all these people feel the question of the franchise, and I believe that the true policy of the people moving in this matter is the true policy of any honest Government; that when a due registration is made of the enfranchised bodies and a Return shown so that you can get an exact return of the number of electors throughout the towns and boroughs, then you will have a great amount of accurate information upon which you can proceed if you think the time is favourable and right to deal with the question of the distribution of seats. I ask the House with great sincerity to consider the question as it has been discussed on the whole to-night. It cannot be called a Party question. ["Oh!"] It is not a Party question. There is scarcely a Member on the other side of the House with whom I have gone into the question, who has not said that it cannot be put off for very long, and when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government proposes that it shall be done, no doubt it will be accepted and adopted by an overwhelming majority even in this House. And when it is done a great thing will be done. We shall have the counties put in as favourable a position for legislation on their behalf as the boroughs occupy now. The freedom of the towns will be extended to the counties, and we shall have what I fear is a great amount of social tyranny in the counties broken up. We shall have what I have described as the paralysis of half the political interests and power of the country removed and healed, and we shall have the industry, the intelligence, and the freedom of both town and country brought to combine in the election of a really free Parliament, that shall be a credit and a permanent safeguard to a great and a free people.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman is never more at home and happy than when he dwells on the history of successive Reform Bills and of the political struggles in which he has taken part. To-night his memory is completely historical. He has taken the opportunity, in the first place, of attacking my inconsistency in proposing the schemes for Parliamentary Reform which at different times of my life I have made. Whether the right hon. Gentleman attacks me or not, I accept his remarks in the spirit in which they were offered, and what that spirit is I do not stop to inquire. The right hon. Gentleman says that in 1859 I brought in a Bill on reform, the principle of which was identity between the borough and the county franchises—that is to say, I proposed to reduce the county franchise to the £10 franchise of the boroughs. We were induced to take that course for this among other reasons, but for this principal one, that we were convinced no lowering of the borough franchise could be a final settlement. Well, that Bill was not successful. A Bill was introduced by the Friends of the right hon. Gentleman, which proposed the reduction of the borough franchise to £7. I and those who acted with me opposed that measure, and the right hon. Gentleman says this was very inconsistent. He says—"You opposed this reduction of the borough franchise to £7, and yet the year after you proposed household suffrage." I maintain, as I have ever maintained, that our course was perfectly consistent. We took our stand upon the £10 franchise on the ground that if you once tampered with it you could have no final settlement; that every year—I will not say every year, but every period—when a Party was in distress and wished to increase and strengthen their popular balance, a new Bill would of course be brought forward, and that we should soon have had, as was adumbrated in many speeches at the time, a £5 borough franchise. I, and many others were sick of these proposals of £7, £6, or £5, and this tampering with the liberties and franchises of the people for 10s. or 20s., and accordingly we brought in a measure which would meet the difficulties of the case, and upon the success of which the right hon. Gentleman has to-night congratulated us. Then the right hon. Gentleman has made a severe answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), whose speech he says might have been made in opposition to Lord Grey's Parliamentary Reform Bill of 1832. There is no end of saying things of that kind. I might say, for instance, to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham—"Why have you just made a speech which might as well have been made in favour of a Parliamentary Reform Bill based on manhood suffrage?" For every single argument of his tended in that direction and indicated that course. The right hon. Gentleman also took refuge in a very original observation—namely, that the debate now going on in the House was not on a Party question. Why, we have heard this every night and on every subject. Hardly any colonial, financial, or other question has been brought before the House this Session that has not been baptized by that title of peace. The right hon. Gentleman had in this case, however, some reason for the statement, because the scope and tendency of his speech was entirely to throw over the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) and his Motion. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs, for reasons which he deemed good, brought forward Resolutions to-night which not only aim at equalizing the franchise between counties and boroughs, but meeting objections which he deemed valid, which had been urged before, he also proposed that the House should reconsider the re-distribution of seats. That was the Motion, and the hon. Member for the Border Burghs and the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), his most efficient supporter, were not justified in making their speeches unless they were prepared to adopt this combination of measures. That is the very basis on which this Motion has been made to-night; but what says the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham? He says he is not one of those who approve the policy of considering the re-distribution of seats. He does not admit that it is at all a corollary of the other question. He protests against their being combined together, and he makes a speech which, as an avowed supporter of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, he was not justified in making, for it was an argument against the very policy which the hon. Member for the Border Burghs has pressed upon us to-night. When this question of equalizing the franchise in boroughs and counties was first brought forward, it was my duty to oppose the proposition, and I opposed it on broad grounds. I said that by this measure of reducing the county franchise to the level of the borough franchise you will have an enormous increase in the constituencies. I gave figures, and I am almost tired of giving figures to the House on a subject on which it has been my duty to address them so often. However, I gave figures which may not be as striking as those to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London has adverted, and which are to be found, I believe, in a pamphlet of great authority, but which I have not had an opportunity to look at. Still, the figures I gave were taken from authentic records and Parliamentary Returns. From them I showed that we had in England and Wales 1,800,000 houses in the boroughs, which furnished us with 1,250,000 electors giving the proportions of votes to houses as 25 to 36. I further stated that in counties there were 2,500,000 houses and 720,000 voters, and the House saw from the Returns upon the Table that the figures would add 1,000,000 of voters to the counties, and cause the county voters to exceed the borough voters by 500,000; and I said—I take the liberty of quoting my own words—

“Now as to the result, 1,740,000 county voters would return 187 Members to Parliament, while 1,250,000 borough voters would return 297 Members.”

The House felt that that was a state of affairs which it was impossible for the moment to admit, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, admitted that it was impossible for them to say that nearly 2,000,000 of voters should return only 187 Members to Parliament, while little more than 1,000,000 returned 297. Everybody said, indeed, that that was a proposition which never could for a moment be entertained by Parliament, and I call the attention of the House to this fact, that the necessary consequence of adopting the policy which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham professes to-night, and which I did believe he was the only person of authority who could for a moment sanction, was a great re-distribution of political power—one that must necessarily break up the borough system of England. I gave no opinion on the expediency or inexpediency of following that course, as another time would come for the consideration of that question. All I did was to impress upon the House the facts to which I have alluded. Well, Sir, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs and the hon. Baronet have admitted frankly and completely to-night that the view I took was a just one—one which has been adopted by the House and the country—and that they have felt that this question could never be brought before us again unless the extension of the franchise was associated with the re-distribution of seats. I cannot say that I think the manner in which they have dealt with the second part of the question is entirely satisfactory. Still, it is, at least, a homage to the convictions of Parliament. The hon. Baronet said—We have come forward to-night with a complete scheme of re-distribution. Now, the language I find on the Paper on that subject is scarcely satisfactory. The second Resolution is—

“That it would be desirable to so re-distribute political power as to obtain a more complete representation of the opinion of the Electoral body.”

Well, I think that before the House could sanction any Motion of the character of the first Resolution we should have a statement of the principles on which the re-distribution is to be made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham will not give any attention to the subject, and his whole argument has been not only in favour of the lowering of the franchise, but against a re-distribution of seats. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] Yes. The right hon. Gentleman may take refuge in saying that when we have got an extension of the franchise then we can consider the question of re-distribution, but at this moment he has advocated a lowering of the franchise without a re-distribution of political power. Well, from the right hon. Gentleman I expected nothing, but

I certainly expected from the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, and especially from the hon. Baronet, who is very learned in Parliamentary statistics, that we should have some idea of what, after all, is one of the greatest Parliamentary revolutions that could be carried into effect, even in what the hon. Baronet said might be a more mitigated form. Sir, I contend, as I have ever contended, that we cannot deal with the franchise of this country or extend it in any way without some general survey of the distribution of political power, and, without going back to 1832, I beg to say, with reference to the measure of 1867-8, that the re-distribution was by no means contemptible; 45 new seats were added to Parliament. The absolute necessities and claims of the most considerable counties were entirely met, and a number of very considerable towns were enfranchised. The fact that 45 new Members were introduced into the House shows at once, as regards the re-distribution of political power, how very considerable the measure was. Well, now, I want, before we divide, to bring before the House the real question for its decision. The question before us is not the political biography of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham—although a more interesting and agreeable one it would be somewhat difficult to find; it is not the Bills on the subject of Parliamentary Reform which I may have brought in; it is not what financial and economic measures have been passed during the last 30 years; it is not any of the various questions which the right hon. Gentleman has included in his self-complacent catalogue; we have before us a very important, but very single and simple issue. It is really pretty well the same question as we had before—namely, a proposition to lower the franchise in counties to the same rate as exists in boroughs; because, although we have had a great homage to truth paid by the acknowledgment that the House ought to come to some Resolution as to the re-distribution of political power, that part of the subject has not been placed before us in that practical way which alone would enable us to deal with it. We must urge against the proposition of the hon. Gentleman the argument that we have urged before—Your Resolution, if it were carried, would add enormously to the county constituency, and this county constituency, with its enormous numbers, would command much fewer seats in this House than the borough constituency, with its numbers so diminished comparatively with the counties. You cannot practically advance in this way without breaking up your present borough constituencies. The question is, are you prepared for that? Do you think it desirable that it should be broken up? Because it is vain to suppose that when you come to business in this matter you can take refuge in the vague expressions of the hon. Member for Chelsea, that men of the world would know how to manage these things, that when the changes take place they will not be so great as we anticipate, that some Gentlemen may lose their seats, but that if they do they will come in for others. These are not considerations that you can put into a Parliamentary schedule. Here are the facts. That a constituency of 2,000,000 will be represented by 143 votes, while a constituency of 1,200,000 will be represented by 300 votes in Parliament. Everyone believes that if it came to a vote in favour of equalizing suffrages the necessary consequence must be that we should pledge ourselves to a policy which must destroy entirely the whole of the borough constitution. Some of it may be re-constructed. I do not mean to say that Parliament would not recover or survive such an event, or that the House would entirely consist of the Representatives of electoral districts. But do not conceal from yourselves that it will immensely alter the character of Parliament and in a great degree affect its popular character. The variety of character which this House derives from its municipal communities is one of the important features of Parliament and one of the richest elements of representative power. This, then, is the issue before us. We must not be distracted from it by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, which had in fact nothing to do with the question. It is a mere plea for a wide extension of the franchise, without a due and statesmanlike consideration of the consequences of such an act. I therefore trust the House will vote against it, and oppose the Resolution of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs.

MR. TREVELYAN wished to say a few words in reply, as very few Members were in the House when he moved his Resolution, and one of those who had followed him had contrived greatly to misunderstand him. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), who in old days led the Conservative Party from the back benches of the Liberal Party, now appeared to lead those Conservatives from the front benches of the same Party. The absence of the noble Marquess the Member for the Radnor Burghs was regrettable, but it was now seen to be explicable. It now appeared that their Leader took counsel, not with the majority of his supporters in that House and the country, but with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, and to spare his susceptibilities the chosen Leader of the Liberal Party was not in his place to-night. The right hon. Gentleman taunted him with not having given any practical reason why his Motion should be adopted, but he should be so audacious as to attempt to give the right hon. Gentleman a lesson in history. The franchise was extended in 1832, and the consequence was that within two or three years slavery was abolished, municipal government was set up in our towns, the Church of England was reformed to a state in accordance at least with the feelings of Churchmen, the Corn Laws were abolished, and the fiscal condition of the country improved with great rapidity. The franchise was extended in 1867; and what was the consequence? The Factories and Workshops Acts were dealt with so as to protect the women and children employed there; the Artizans' and Workmen's Act was passed, and was supplemented by the excellent measure passed by the Home Secretary on the same subject last year; protection was given to miners; the power of wealth was abolished in the Army; Acts of great importance were passed relating to Ireland which he did not expect hon. Gentlemen opposite to approve, but which he knew the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) approved very strongly; and, finally, the education of the country was extended in a manner with which hon. Gentlemen opposite found fault in some respects, and with which hon. Gentlemen on his own side found fault in other respects, but which both Parties agreed to have been an immense improvement.

Judging from experience, therefore, a further extension of the franchise would result in a fresh crop of beneficent legislation; and, believing that the enfranchisement of the agricultural labourers would have this result, and would give us a better Parliament, he hoped that the House would, at all events, support the first of the two Resolutions.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I would not have risen after the hon. Member for the Border Burghs has replied, but I failed earlier to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, had I not some information that I desire to convey to the House. I have made inquiries with regard to the means by which the meeting in London was brought together in support of these Resolutions, as well as a similar meeting which has been held in my division of Warwickshire. The former meeting has been spoken of as if it were spontaneously drawn together solely by the action of the labourers themselves. We, who live in North Warwickshire, know something of what is going on in Birmingham; and to-night I presented a Petition to the House from a meeting which was held at Merriden, in North Warwickshire, but which really emanated from Birmingham; that Petition was in favour of, and embodied the terms of, the Resolutions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs. I thought it rather strange, after my speech and my vote of last year upon this question, that I should be desired to present such a Petition, so I set myself accurately to ascertain from whom this Petition really came; and I discovered that the meeting at Merriden, at which the Petition was adopted, was attended by two delegates from the Liberation Society and by the President of the Labourers' Union. One of the delegates from the Liberation Society informed the meeting that, finding the action of the Labourers' Union was parallel with that of the Liberation Society, that Society had elected the President of the Labourers' Union, Mr. Arch, to be one of the Council of the Liberation Society, and that the future action of the two bodies would be combined. When, therefore, we hear the hon. Member for the Border Burghs citing the advantageous legislation which this House has from time to time carried out, and the peaceful state of this country as the effects of the last Reform Act; when, too, we hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) assuring us that, if we do this act of what he calls justice to the agricultural labourer, the future legislation of this House will be as moderate, as reasonable, and as beneficial as it has hitherto been—I beg to mention to the House that this does not seem to be the expectation of those who convene these meetings. I assert this from what occurred at this meeting in Merriden. At that meeting it was boldly stated that the clergy of the Church of England have robbed the people of education. Mr. Arch declared that he challenged any one to contradict that assertion; and, speaking of the farmers also, he accused them of having caused pauperism and misery among their labourers; and, quoting an expression once used in this House by a Member of the House, and applying this expression to the clergy and the farmers, he said—"It is our object to unmask these villains," and inferred that he would treat them accordingly. Such are the objects of those who, being out of this House, are promoting the Motion now before it. Sir, I do not believe that the agricultural labourers will generally unite for such objects; I am firmly convinced that the working classes would not unite for such objects; yet it is for those objects that they are invited to give their support to the Motion of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs. His active supporters are, indeed, those who would bring the clergy and the farmers of the country into antagonism with the labouring classes of the country. I think it right, therefore, when we have a Motion like this brought before us, and laudatory allusions are made to the peaceful manner in which it is supported in the country, that the House should know what are the ulterior objects of the prime movers and promoters of these meetings, and that the peaceful assurances which we receive here should be contrasted with the language that is used elsewhere. I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham should seem so anxious to get rid of the question of re-distribution of seats. He and I have some recollection of what occurred during the re-distribution of seats that followed upon the Reform Act of 1867. There happened to be a large parish forming part of Birmingham—the parish of Aston—in which is situated property belonging to the Corporation of Birmingham, and it was proposed by the Boundary Commissioners that that parish should be included in the borough of Birmingham, but the right hon. Gentleman, who is so zealous for the extension of the household franchise elsewhere, joined a combination in this House to overrule the decision of the Boundary Commissioners, and by excluding Aston from the borough he represents, he deprived thousands of his neighbours of household suffrage, and left them to be, as I conclude he thinks, misrepresented by myself and my Colleague as county Members. The right hon. Member seemed to fear that he might have too much of household suffrage near home. The right hon. Gentleman has now recommended that the re-distribution of seats shall be postponed, until after the extension of household suffrage to the county constituencies has been effected. Many of the county constituencies would thus be encumbered by an enormous and disproportionate number of voters; and the right hon. Gentleman actually proposes that to a House of Commons, returned by these reformed constituencies, acting as a sort of confused Convention, should be committed the delicate task of re-distributing the seats for all the constituencies. I will only, in conclusion, say that the warning given by the right hon. Member for the University of London seems to me founded in true wisdom; and that the proposal submitted to the House in the first Resolution without the second appears to me inconsistent with common sense.

MR. PARNELL, who spoke amid loud cries for a Division, was understood to express his intention to support the Motion with a free heart, because there was no distinction drawn between one part of the country and another, and it would include Ireland.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 165; Noes 264: Majority 99.

PARLIAMENT—EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS. — SESSIONAL ORDER.

MR. DISRAELI moved for the renewal of the Sessional Order made last Session, providing that Strangers be excluded on the Motion of any hon. Member only upon a division, to be taken without discussion or Amendment, stating that the concurrence of opinion on both sides of the House, which had been ascertained, was that the Order should not be made, as had first been proposed, a Standing Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order of the 31st day of May 1875, relative to the Exclusion of Strangers, be made a Sessional Order."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not desire to take a course that was unreasonable or unfair; but as there was no urgent necessity, and as they could not have the matter reported in the public Press, he thought it would be better to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. PARNELL seconded the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. J. COWEN thought a Motion which involved the honour, and to some extent the interest, of a Gentleman who had a seat in that Assembly, should not be debated at that hour, and therefore he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite, whose conduct was always marked by a sense of fairness, would allow this debate to be adjourned until the collateral points could be discussed.

MR. DISRAELI said, that was a mistake. The other Motion by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) now stood as a separate Motion, and had nothing to do with his.

MR. BUTT objected to the Motion being agreed to without full debate and consideration. If carried it would be fatal to freedom of discussion, and would be an encroachment on the privileges of hon. Members. It would establish a precedent for carrying a Motion without debate. He had an Amendment to propose.

MR. DISRAELI: I was not aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to move an Amendment, otherwise I should not have pressed the matter. I have no objection to the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday 13th June.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to allow me to call attention to a subject which I am afraid will not appear to be one of much interest, but which really is of great importance to various classes in this country—particularly to the mercantile and trading classes. I do not propose to go into the history of the Law of Bankruptcy in this country, or of the various changes which it has undergone; but I may remind your Lordships that the course of legislation on bankruptcy in this country has shown very remarkable fluctuations between extremes. Up to 1832 to a great extent the control of proceedings in bankruptcy was left to the creditors or those who directly represented the creditors in the bankruptcy. That system was thought to result in considerable evil and disorganization:—a change was called for, and in 1832 commenced a period of what may be described as “officialism”—that is, bankruptcy proceedings were, to a greater extent than had been the case previously, intrusted to the Court of Bankruptcy, and to officials paid by salary was confided the task of winding-up estates in bankruptcy. That continued from 1832 until 1861. In the latter year the tide had set in a different direction, and an advance was made towards giving the creditors once more the control of bankruptcy proceedings. That movement was consummated by the Act of 1869—the present Law of Bankruptcy—which to a greater extent than perhaps had ever before been contemplated, handed over to the creditors of the bankrupt the control and administration not only of the bankrupt’s estate, but of all arrangements in the nature of bankruptcy. But, my Lords, this produced evils which are now greatly complained of. Great complaints were made before 1832; but from 1832 to 1869 there were other complaints—namely, complaints that the creditors of a bankrupt were not allowed to manage the bankrupt’s affairs. I am sorry to say that since 1869 the discontent has not ceased—on the contrary, there are now great complaints of the working of the last Act relating to bankruptcy. Those complaints were laid before me in the course of last year, and I determined to appoint a small Committee of those who were best qualified to judge of the matter, in order that such Committee might consider and report whether any change by legislation, or by means of General Orders, was necessary to abate the evils which have arisen in the working of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. I should like to mention the names of the members of that Committee. First there was Mr. Kettle, a County Court Judge, who has great practical knowledge of the working of bankruptcy proceedings. Then there was Mr. James R. Brougham, the experienced Registrar in the London Court of Bankruptcy; next, Mr. Mansfield Parkyns, the Controller in Bankruptcy, who makes an annual return as to the expenses of bankruptcy; then Mr. Henry Nicol, an officer of the Treasury, to whose care the details of the finances of the County Courts are intrusted; and, lastly, Mr. W. Hackwood, who, perhaps, more than any other professional man, has practical experience of the working of the bankruptcy system. The Committee made a Report which is now before your Lordships, and which is not the less valuable because of its conciseness. Before calling your Lordships’ attention to some of the statements in the Report, it may be well that I should state that, in point of fact, the cases in which actual bankruptcy occurs in this country are rare. There are various ways in which, when a man becomes unable to meet his engagements, he and his property may be dealt with. In the first place, he may be made a “bankrupt” in technical form, and remain so until he has been “discharged” and his property has been divided among his creditors. In the second place, a man may be made a bankrupt, but that proceeding may be displaced by a composition or deed of arrangement with his creditors, which would put an end to or supersede the bankruptcy. In the third place, without a technical bankruptcy, a debtor’s property may be made the subject of a deed of arrangement and distribution among his creditors. In the fourth place, the creditors, without making the debtor a bankrupt, may agree to a composition, and liberate the debtor from the full amount of his debts. Now whether there is an arrangement with bankruptcy or a composition without bankruptcy in all cases action in the matter proceeds on a resolution by the creditors, and the minority of the creditors, whether they like the arrangement or not, are bound by that which is decided by the majority. Your Lordships might like to know the comparison in point of numbers between the cases in which bankruptcy results and those in which there are arrangements or compositions. I have got a Return for the year 1875, and I find that there were in that year adjudications in bankruptcy, 965; liquidations by arrangement, 4,233; and compositions with creditors, 2,691—so that there were as nearly as possible 7,000 arrangements and compositions, as against 965 bankruptcies, or, in other words, the bankruptcies were only about one-eighth of the whole number of cases. When I came to the property dealt with, I found the results still more curious. In the same year the liabilities in the case of the bankruptcies were £6,981,240; those in the case of the liquidations by agreement no less than £12,443,999, and those in the case of compositions, £6,068,405. The assets realized were in the case of actual bankruptcies, £960,755; in that of liquidation by arrangement, £4,598,473; and in those of composition with creditors, £1,773,551. Your Lordships will see, therefore, that the interests involved in the case of liquidations and compositions are, one might almost say, infinitely larger than those involved in the case of bankruptcies proper. As these liquidations and compositions appear to be so largely favoured by creditors, it might seem that there ought to be no reason to be dissatisfied with the result. If, indeed, they were in all cases freely entered into, without compulsion or restraint, there would seem no reason for interfering; but when I lay before your Lordships a few more facts, I think you will come to the conclusion that in very many cases these liquidations and compositions are not freely entered into, but that great pressure is brought to bear on creditors in order to make them consent to such arrangements. Before I go further I will ask your Lordships' attention to this passage in the Report of the Committee—

“We find a general concurrence of opinion that the Act of 1869 has not in its working satisfied the expectations of the public, inasmuch as it affords great facilities for a debtor to relieve himself of his liabilities, while there is great extravagance in administering and long delay in winding up estates.”

Now, to show your Lordships how the system works, I will first take the case in which the debtor is actually made a bankrupt. The principle of the Act of 1869 is that in this case the creditors should choose as their trustee a person in whom they have confidence, and that the trustee should undertake the responsibility of getting in and realizing the property of the bankrupt and dividing it among his creditors. In theory nothing can be more plausible than that; but it is not found to work at all well in practice. In the first place, your Lordships will find that which is not to be wondered at in a body which has no harmony—namely, that it is impossible to get all the creditors to work together. In general, only one or two would occupy themselves with the matter, but by far the greater number would interfere very little in the business, and what ought to be done by the body at large is generally left to one or two persons. It is necessary that the body of creditors should be allowed to vote by proxy, and there is scarcely a case in bankruptcy where the person who desires to become trustee does not obtain proxies from the creditors sufficient to his own appointment. The way in which trustees are appointed is thus described by the Committee—

“It happens, not occasionally, but so frequently as almost to form the rule, that a stranger, so far as appears on the face of the proceedings, is enabled, by the proxies he has obtained, to vote himself trustee, to fix his own remuneration, to nominate the committee of inspection, to order the payment of his costs, and finally to vote, in liquidation cases, the debtor's discharge. We report, both upon our own experience and upon the information we have collected, that nearly all the evils which have led to so much dissatisfaction with the working of the Act of 1869 can be traced to the direct or indirect effect of the proxy system; and that in our opinion no effectual check can be given to these evils so long as remunerative employment is the prize for which proxies can be used.”

My Lords, that is a very serious and solemn censure of the mode in which trustees are appointed; but, turning to the Report of the Controller in Bankruptcy (Parl. Paper 210), I find this further information—

“The total number of estates pending on the 31st of December, 1875, was 3,191. . . . In 98 of these pending cases the trustees cannot be found. The number of reports made by me to the Courts on the conduct of trustees, during the year was 446. In 228 cases the trustees complied before the hearing of the summons; in 181 cases orders were made against the trustee, 162 of which have been complied with; in 30 cases the trustee could not be served with the summons; and 7 cases are still pending.”

The Lord Chancellor

Thus, my Lords, out of the whole number of persons entrusted with the most important of duties in connection with bankruptcy one-sixth of the whole were in default in the execution of their duties, and this in one year. But there is even worse than that, my Lords. I ask your Lordships' particular attention to these facts, which are stated by the Committee—

“In one case where the receipts were some £700, received by the trustee in one cheque, the costs allowed to him and to the solicitor greatly exceeded the £700. The Controller has a list of 25 bankruptcies, in which the same person was trustee, the remuneration voted to him by the creditors—i.e., by himself as their proxy—was in every case most excessive, in some instances exceeding the receipts. In only two instances did creditors personally attend, and in one it was stated by one of them that he was promised payment for attending. In another case, where the trustee had been allowed some hundreds, he claimed a further sum of £130 for closing the bankruptcy; the solicitor, who had also been allowed some hundreds, claimed £50 odd for the same six months, and an examination of the bill showed that not a dozen of the items were other than charges for doing trustee's work. Among them were journeys to see the trustee to explain his accounts, writing on same, making out trustee's accounts, fair copies of same, entering them in the trustee's books; while the accounts were the receipt of one sum on the debit side and half-a-dozen payments to the trustee and solicitor on the credit. In another, in a County Court, the receipts amounted to £107, paid to the trustees in two sums. Out of this the trustee disbursed £44 in four items, and then persuaded the creditors to vote him the balance, £63, for his remuneration. The Registrar of another Court, having struck off £150 from a solicitor's bill, the trustee called a meeting of creditors—i.e., of himself and solicitor—and voted £150 additional remuneration to the trustee, who handed it over to the solicitor. It is but just to say that where the trustee is an honest man of business the results are satisfactory. I have before me a statement of 20 bankruptcies and liquidations, in which the total receipts were £11,404, and the trustees' remuneration but £565, or 5·1 per cent, and the total solicitors' costs but £750, or 6·6 per cent. The trustee in these cases was for years a chief clerk in a County Court before 1869, when he resigned.”

My Lords, after these instances, your Lordships will not be surprised to hear the views which the Committee take in reference to the expense of this system. The Committee state—

“It may, perhaps, have been expected that the introduction of the present system of administration by paid trustees would lead to a reduction of expense, on the ground that accountants or other persons experienced in bankruptcy administration would undertake the realization and distribution of the property of debtors for a fair commission to be agreed beforehand; and that being themselves well acquainted with the rules and practice of bankruptcy, they would not need the general and costly assistance of solicitors formerly needed by unpaid and inexperienced creditors' assignees. The great majority of bankruptcies under the present Act have been wound up by professional trustees, mostly described as accountants, but a number sufficient for comparison have been wound up by creditor trustees, who, though generally accepting remuneration, appear to have been at least as dependent on their solicitors as if they had been unpaid assignees. Ninety-four bankruptcies with assets between £500 and £5,000 (averaging £1,112) which have been wound up by creditor trustees, have cost on an average £244 per estate, which seems a very large average for the class of bankruptcies, and considering that heavy Court fees are no longer levied for the expenses of the Judicial establishment. This amount, however, includes about £100 charges and expenses for which the trustee is not responsible, the expenses referable to the creditor trustee being £43 for his remuneration, and about £101 for his solicitor's charges and incidental expenses. In 204 bankruptcies of the same classes (averaging £1,258), which have been wound up by professional trustees, the expenses averaged no less than £321, or (deducting £100 as above) the expenses referable to the professional trustee were 55 per cent greater than those of the creditor trustee, being £106 for the trustee's remuneration and £115 for his solicitor's charges and incidental expenses. It appears, therefore, as a rule to which there have been two or three, but only two or three, striking exceptions, that neither the experience of the professional trustees nor the large sum paid them for realizing the estate, has prevented their incurring at least as heavy solicitor's charges as when the solicitor's bill included nearly the whole charges of realization.”

My Lords, that is the manner in which we find that bankruptcies proper are dealt with by the trustees; but now I will refer to what appear to me to be even greater evils than those which the Controller and the Committee describe in the extracts which I have just read to your Lordships. In actual bankruptcy, abuses in the administration of the estate may be corrected if brought before the Court; but I am now about to refer to the much larger number of cases in which the control of the trustee is much greater, because in liquidation or composition the trustee is absolutely master of the situation. He is chosen, in the first instance, in the way I have described, and he decides as to debts which ought to be proved, and, in fact, as to everything which ought to be done in the liquidation of the estate, or the payment of the composition. Here is an extract from a letter addressed to me in January last by the Secretary to the Mercantile Law Amendment Society—

“A debtor can now file a petition for liquidation by arrangement, and convene a meeting of his creditors at any time within a month, and almost at any place he pleases, and if at such meeting a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors there present, or represented by proxy, pass a resolution agreeing to a composition, and such resolution is afterwards confirmed at a second meeting, by a bare majority in number and value of the creditors present, or represented, such arrangement is binding on all the creditors. As a rule, the chief creditors rarely attend such meetings, and the result is that the debtor, by the aid of proxies of friendly, bribed, oftentimes of full-secured, and sometimes of fictitious creditors, can get released from his debts upon almost any terms he thinks fit. The Controller of the Bankruptcy Court in the annual Reports to Parliament states that there has been a continued and regular decrease in the rate of composition allowed by debtors to their creditors in each year since the commencement of the Act.”

My Lords, that is a serious statement coming from a body of that kind. Allusion is then made to a remarkable fact commented on by the Controller in his Report of last year—namely, the increase in the number and the increase in the value of compositions. The Controller says—

“I have again to call attention to the increase in number and decrease in value of compositions paid to creditors under Section 126, which, continuing year by year since the commencement of the Act, can hardly be attributed to temporary causes, or explained in any satisfactory manner. The number of compositions registered has increased from 1,616 in the year 1870 to 2,691 in the year 1875, the additional 1,075 cases being thus accounted for:—Increased number of compositions—not exceeding 1s. in the pound, 465; from 1s. to 2s. 6d. in the pound, 434; from 2s. 6d. to 5s. in the pound, 300. Increase in number of compositions at the lowest rates, 1,199: decrease in number of compositions at higher rates, 124—total, 1,075.”

My Lords, I am sorry that what you have heard does not represent the whole of the evil, because I find that there is too much reason to believe that even those small compositions which the minority of the creditors are forced to accept are not paid. The Controller says—

“The loudest and most general complaints against the present system are against these arrangements and compositions, and yet practically everything is drawn into them. Out of £5,432,000 assets declared by debtors in the year 1874, £4,946,000 (or more than 90 per cent) were under these two sections. In the same year, out of 2,549 compounding debtors

(under Section 126) only 162 were able to pay their creditors more than half they owed them, while 1,803 were unable to pay more than one-fourth, and 1,059 of these not more than one-eighth, including 501 debtors whose compositions averaged a few pence in the pound. The trustee, who is not unfrequently the debtor's agent, can generally, by proxies held by himself or his solicitor, resolve his own release and make his own terms with the debtor for a discharge from his debts; and as the trustee's accounts are, for some reason, specially exempted from official supervision, nothing is officially known of the results of administration except that general rules requiring the taxation of charges and other important matters are disregarded, and that the trustees appropriate the undivided balances and unclaimed dividends, which may be very largely manufactured in liquidations by arrangement, and that they can employ the funds in hand to their own advantage. The same agents practising in both, it cannot be doubted that they who profit too much in bankruptcy profit much more in liquidations, or that unless there is some hidden advantage to creditors sufficient to more than balance the many and manifest disadvantages, the surprising preponderance of liquidations by arrangement may be more reasonably attributed to the influence of agents than to discriminating preference on the part of creditors. In the year 1874 there were 4,400 liquidations by arrangement, with assets amounting to £3,462,000, against a total of 930 bankruptcies, with assets amounting to only £485,000, and the assets in the liquidation were of the class that would bear a very much larger amount to be abstracted from them by expenses or otherwise, and yet pay very much larger dividends to the creditors, there being on an average £31 assets in liquidations, and only £13 in bankruptcies, to every £100 liabilities.”

Now, my Lords, I have, I think, stated enough to satisfy your Lordships that there is justice in the complaints made by these creditors who are in the minority as to the way in which those liquidations and compositions are worked. I have now come to another class of serious evils which have been pointed out. In the case of liquidation by arrangement under the present system there is no audit. The creditors might be able, perhaps, by a process of law to call the trustee to account; but there is no audit that the trustee must submit to, or which any Court, by summary process, could compel him to pass. Under the old system of insolvent estates there was a very large sum of money paid into Court in the shape of dividends which were never called for. I think I am not wrong in stating that it accumulated until it amounted to some millions sterling. Some years ago that money was, by the authority of Parliament, taken for public uses—of course, on a guarantee that payment would be made out of the public funds to any persons who could prove a claim against any portion of the money so taken. But since 1869 there has been no control whatever over unpaid dividends; and this presents a serious and important question, the magnitude of which startled me when I came to consider it. There are now about 3,000 open bankruptcies—bankruptcies not closed under the Act of 1869; and between 16,000 and 17,000 arrangements and liquidations open—that is, 20,000 estates in which dividends have been declared. In this state of things the Controller has adverted to this question of unpaid dividends. He says—

“Under the present system, the funds collected are not paid into any public account, but left practically in the control of the trustees. The large and continually increasing balance in hand, which arises from the excess of aggregate receipts during a given period over payments accruing due during that period, cannot, therefore, be employed for the direct or indirect benefit of the creditors, except in rare cases; though a considerable portion may be employed for their own benefit by trustees who calculate on a continuance of business enabling them to pay dividends on older estates from assets to be realized in newer estates. The balance declared by trustees in bankruptcy proper for the 31st of December, 1875, amounting, with unclaimed dividends to nearly £500,000, it is probable, from the amount of assets given up, and from other circumstances connected with administration under liquidation by arrangement, that the total balance amounts to between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000.

This may be a very lucrative business to some persons, as we find that one person may be trustee of 25 different estates. A trustee may keep in his hands a very large amount of unclaimed dividends, because demands on the older estates can be more than paid out of the dividends coming in from the newer ones. The Controller says it is probable that the balance amounts to between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000. But that is not the whole, because that calculation only extends to what comes under the Act of 1869; and in a Return to Parliament it is stated that under trust deeds, between 1863 and 1869, principal to the amount of £42,500,000 had been received by trustees, and I believe I am correct in stating that there has been no audit of any of those accounts; and seeing that there is a balance of between £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 since 1869, it would not be easy to speculate as to the portion of those £42,000,000 which may not yet be outstanding. Observe, my Lords, how this works—what a temptation there is to trustees to increase the amount of unclaimed dividends. Any one acquainted with dealings in the estates of insolvents knows how this can be done by a system of making frequent declarations of dividends of very small amounts—paying the money realized from the estate in such dribblets that there is the greater chance of creditors not coming forward to claim their dividends. This object may be further promoted by making the declaration of dividend as little public as possible, and also by putting as many obstacles as possible in the way of those who come forward to claim. I have gone through the difficulties of the present system:—and now, my Lords, as to our remedies. I will set out by saying that we desire to preserve, as far as possible, the principle of the Act of 1869, believing it to be good and wholesome, and that the evils arise from the defective manner in which it is carried out. The first improvement we propose to make in the present system is this:—This system on the one hand affords an inducement to creditors, and especially to creditors who are inflamed by temper, to make persons bankrupt who have been guilty of no misconduct, and whose trading has been perfectly bonâ fide. On the other hand, it offers an inducement to debtors who have misconducted themselves and incurred debts without a reasonable prospect of being able to pay them to run a race with them, and force them to a composition, which is agreed to, or apparently agreed to, by a majority of the creditors. We propose that in all cases of liquidation, whether the person initiating the proceedings is a creditor or is the debtor, that application should be made to one and the same Court for what I shall term, in the first instance, liquidation. Security will be taken that the application shall be in the Court of a district where the debtor is known, and where his creditors are to be found. There is no such security now. We propose that the Court should have power in the case of a trader debtor to make a liquidation order nisi; which may be revoked if the debtor shall show that the petition is insufficient, but which, if not revoked within a specified time, shall be deemed an order absolute for liquidation. In case of a non-trader debtor, the Court will make an order nisi in the first instance, but will not make the order absolute, without direct proof. In the case of a non-trader debtor the Court, either in making the order nisi, or afterwards on making it absolute, may appoint a receiver of the debtor's property. When the order has been made absolute the debtor must, within a specified time, file a list of his creditors. All the creditors will be bound by the liquidation proceedings. Then a provisional committee of inspection will be formed to act until the first general meeting of the creditors. We propose that at the general meeting of the creditors a permanent committee of inspection should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the affairs of the debtor, and that the investigation should be held as soon as possible. The committee of inspection will appoint a receiver or trustee of the estate. At the second general meeting of creditors it would be for an adequate majority of the creditors to decide whether they would discharge the debtor or make him a bankrupt. Any proposal for a composition must be made with the knowledge of the committee of inspection; and in the adoption of such a proposal not only will a majority of the creditors be requisite, but the rights of the minority will be protected. We propose that the trustee shall be appointed, not by the creditors at large, but by the committee of inspection, and that he shall hold office at the pleasure and under the inspection of that committee at a maximum scale of remuneration. The use of proxies will be permitted; but if a trustee should use them for his own interest the Court will have a right to deprive him of his trusteeship. When the debtor has not been discharged by the second general meeting of the committee of inspection he, after six months, may apply to the Court for an order of discharge. If this be granted he will be released from all liabilities except debts incurred by fraud or breach of trust, debts due to the Crown, or penalties due to the Revenue, and, should there be any surplus of the estate, it would be paid over to the debtor. With regard to deeds of arrangements, which make over the whole property of the debtor, those will depend on the vote of a majority excluding secured creditors. We propose, further, that all accounts in bankruptcy and in liquidation shall be audited, and that in all cases, whether the bankruptcy or the liquidation be closed or not, the whole of the property remaining in the hands of the trustees shall at the end of two years be paid into Court, so that there may be every inducement to the trustees to close each case, where it is possible, within two years. There are various minor provisions in the Bill to which I need not at this moment refer; but I may be allowed to say that the measure proposes to repeal the Act of 1869, so that the Bill may be complete in itself, containing the entire law on the subject with which it deals. I have only to add that, if the Bill receives your Lordships' sanction, I propose to introduce a Bill making corresponding alterations in the Debtors Act of 1869. I have only now to lay this Bill upon the Table, and ask your Lordships to read it a first time.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Bankruptcy, and for other purposes—presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD HATHERLEY said, that many attempts had been made to deal with the subject of Bankruptcy, and various Bills had been presented to Parliament during a long series of years with the purpose of amending that law; but, notwithstanding these successive attempts at legislation, experience had shown that they had proved inadequate to overcome the difficulties inherent in the subject, and continued complaints from the mercantile classes showed that further amendment was necessary. When he had the honour of filling the position now held by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, he found that no fewer than three successive Law Officers—one of whom was Sir Hugh Cairns—had prepared Bills on the subject; and in the Bill which he himself (Lord Hatherley) brought in he embodied what he considered the most valuable portions of those Bills. That Bill passed the ordeal of the House of Commons after considerable discussion, and when it came up to their Lordships' House it was referred to a Select Committee composed of many eminent and learned Peers. It then came back to their Lordships, and finally became law. The causes to which the failure of the Bill might be attributed were not far to seek—they were to be found, indeed, in the Report made to the Lord Chancellor by a gentleman eminently qualified to give an opinion on the subject. Mr. Mansfield Parkyns, in his Report, said—

“The special policy of the Act of 1869 was to give creditors the right to administer its provisions with the least possible official assistance. In the few cases where this almost exclusive authority has been prudently and diligently exercised the working of the Act of 1869 has not been unsatisfactory.”

The Legislature endeavoured to give the machinery to the creditors, and left it for them to use it, and in the concluding passage which he had just read, their Lordships had the key to the failure of the Act. What did they find as to the system of proxies? The Report went on to say—

“It happens not occasionally, but so frequently as almost to form the rule, that a stranger, so far as appears upon the face of the proceedings, is enabled by the proxies he has obtained to vote himself trustee, to fix his own remuneration, to nominate the committee of inspection, and finally to vote in liquidation cases the debtor’s discharge.”

This, however, could not be done except by consent of the creditors, because the Act gave the decision to a majority in number and three-fourths in value. There was a point of even greater importance than the abuse of proxies. The Report recommended that the debtor should be at liberty to petition for administration. That would revive many, if not all, the abuses of the present system, and he trusted this point would be re-considered, and that it would still be left in the hands of the creditors to choose their own trustee and their own mode of recovering their debts. He had that morning received from the secretary of a society for amending the law on this subject a statement that the reason why the existing Act worked so badly was because creditors could not be got to attend the meetings. It could not, however, be laid as a fault against a Bill that it did not work when no one would be at the pains to work it. The abuses connected with the system of trustees would be greatly under the regulation of the Court if its powers were properly put in motion. He trusted that the Bill would bring about an improvement in the choice and selection of the persons who were to act as trustees, and that it would also amend the abuses connected with the system of proxies. The Bill should also deal with the large amounts said to be left in the hands of trustees. In all these cases their Lordships would find that the supineness of the large body of the creditors interested in the management of the bankrupt’s estate constituted a vast difficulty. In the management of public companies there was the same difficulty in interesting the shareholders, unless some calamity occurred; and in winding-up these companies great scandals had arisen just as they had occurred in bankruptcies, and in a considerable degree from the same cause. Creditors would not bestow that care and attention which the administration of a bankrupt’s estate required. If the dividend were very small they wrote it off their books, and treated it as a bad debt; and, on the other hand, when the creditor’s debt was very large, he was very unwilling that his name should appear, especially if the bankruptcy threatened to be unpropitious—he did not wish the world to know of his loss any more than he could help, and he therefore abstained from appearing in the proceedings. It was in the power of the creditors to settle the terms on which a trustee should hold property, and the deed had to be enrolled with the registrar, where any creditor might see it. He regretted that the financial portion of the Bankruptcy Law, which was favourably spoken of in the sensible Report of Mr. Parkyns, had not been submitted to the same scrutiny as its other provisions.

TURKEY—THE SECOND NOTE OF THE THREE POWERS—THE DESPATCH.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAMPBELL asked Her Majesty’s Government, Whether they object to present the despatch in which they have refused to concur in the proposals recently agreed upon at Berlin? When on Monday last he asked the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether the Government objected to produce this despatch, he did not put the Question because he thought their decision stood in any need of explanation or defence; on the contrary,

When on Monday last he asked the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether the Government objected to produce this despatch, he did not put the Question because he thought their decision stood in any need of explanation or defence; on the contrary had they come to an opposite decision, then he would have thought both explanation and defence might have been required, although they would not have been easy to give. The production of the despatch might lead to three desirable effects. One was, that it might tend greatly to reclaim France and Italy from the unhappy course into which they had been hurried; secondly, it might retard the application of the proposal in which Her Majesty's Government were not able to participate; and, thirdly, it would tend to uphold the advisers of the Porte in listening to the counsels of its friends, and in turning a cautious ear to the proposals of its enemies. He would, however, defer to the judgment of Her Majesty's Government, as they must be conversant with this important document. He was perfectly aware that since giving Notice, on Monday last, of his intention to put this Question, events had taken place which might make it imprudent to do now what might have been previously done consistently with sound policy. It would be premature to speak with any freedom upon what had recently happened on the Bosphorus, since to do so would raise a tumult of ideas even in minds the most insensible; but from information that had reached him he was able to assure their Lordships that among the British residents at Constantinople the event was viewed with joy and exultation, and with an increased sense of security. His own impression was that there was but one Embassy at that place by which that event would be bitterly lamented. The immediate and practical effect must be to secure the power of men who alone were able to regenerate the Empire, and whose power, under the late Sultan, would have had, at any rate, so precarious a tenure that it might at any moment have been overthrown. He trusted that what had occurred would tend to strengthen Her Majesty's Government in the determination to avoid any general Conference to which they might be invited—and which, in the present state of Europe, would be nothing but a snare, and in the determination in no manner to depart from the principles they had laid down, or the position they had occupied. The event might tend to increase their firmness in maintaining their present passive isolation, as it was calculated to add to their conviction that those who first endured would ultimately conquer. Having weighed this event, he had arrived at the conviction that it ought not to be regarded as the effect of any sudden, impassioned, and unpremeditated impulse; but, on the contrary, that it had been long contemplated, and had been matured and deliberately organized, though rapidly accomplished. He trusted that there would be no objection to the production of the despatch referred to.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My noble Friend asks whether I now object to present the despatch as to which he put a Question 10 days ago. I have already stated the only objection I feel to making public any Papers on this question. I need not point out that it would be impossible to present a despatch containing certain proposals in which we have refused to concur without, at the same time, presenting the proposals themselves. My only objection to that, and the objection which still remains in force, is that these proposals, although agreed upon by the various Powers, have not been laid before the Government of the Porte, and cannot, therefore, be considered as a public document. The proposals are still in the condition in which they were when the Question was put to me previously—that is to say, though they have been agreed upon as between the proposers, they have not been formally placed before the Porte. I am, therefore, still unable to lay these Papers on the Table. With regard to the grave and important event to which my noble Friend has referred, I agree with him that this would hardly be the time to discuss it in all its bearings. It is an event which has arisen, I believe, from the spontaneous feeling of the people of the Turkish Empire, not influenced by any foreign agency. It is an event the consequences of which may be extremely important, but from which I hope we have no reason to anticipate any but good results. When we meet again a fortnight hence, we shall probably be in a condition to speak with more knowledge and with more confidence upon this matter than we can do now.

LORD WAVENEY said, events had marched with such rapidity that the Berlin Conference and the Andrassy Note had as much passed out of the domain of diplomacy as the Treaty of Paris. Still, a very large discretion must be left to Her Majesty's Government as to the publication of any details they might have in their possession. There were, however, some details published which he would refer to, in the hope that the Government might be able to give satisfactory assurances as to that which was known only through the public Press. It appeared remarkable that the public Press had been supplied with information that there had been some undercurrent of apprehension communicated from the centre of distrust, Constantinople, to the Government of Servia; and if the public Press had been rightly informed, three measures of a trenchant and decisive character had been under preparation for some months to be ready in case of emergency. The Press was silent, and a general reserve was maintained on the subject; it was understood, however, that a forced loan was to be raised for Servia; that the period for discharge of private obligations was deferred; and that repressive laws on the Press were prepared; and, again, a colourable nationality had been given to an officer who had served with distinction in Central Asia that he might pass into the employment of the Servian Government. He made no comments, but he recommended the matter to the attention of the Government. The public mind was grievously disquieted, and he hoped some satisfactory explanation would be given on the subject.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—
MR. HERBERT'S PICTURE.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he would state to the House when Mr. Herbert, R.A., received his commission to paint a companion picture to the "Moses Delivering the Tablets of the Law" in the Peers' Robing Room; what is the sum he is to receive; what money on account has been paid to him; what are the dates of such payments; and, what progress has Mr. Herbert made with the work?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, the picture had been ordered in 1866, and the sum to be paid was £4,000. Since that time Mr. Herbert had received three instalments of £1,000 each. When he received the last instalment the work was three-fourths finished. Mr. Herbert then moved from one studio to another, and in the course of the transmission of goods from one studio to the other the picture was so seriously injured that this distinguished artist had to put it by and begin to paint another. The hon. and learned Gentleman he (Lord Henry Lennox) was sure would agree with him that it did not behove his Office to be too severe with regard to time. He might say that Mr. Herbert had, within the last year, rendered him much valuable time and service with regard to the preservation of the frescoes in that House, and he had rendered these services gratuitously. He hoped that towards the close of the year, notwithstanding all these delays, the work of this great artist would be completed.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—TIDESWELL
GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Vice President of the Council, If it be true that the Grammar School at Tideswell has been closed for three or four years past; and, if so, to state to the House why it has been closed, and whether any steps are being taken to have it re-opened?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I have referred the hon. Gentleman's Question to the Charity Commissioners, and I am informed that it is true the Grammar School at Tideswell has been practically closed for three years and some months. I am also informed that it is understood it has been closed principally on account of dissensions between the master and other members of the Governing Body. A scheme for the future administration of the school has been framed by the Charity Commissioners and has recently been passed by the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, so that I trust after a short time the school will be re-opened.

INDIA—INDIAN GAOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is true, as stated in a letter published a few days ago, that prisoners in many of the Indian gaols are locked up at night in scores together, in single rooms; that the prison officers are in most cases convicts themselves, and that the prisons in India are manufacturing criminals through a general neglect of moral instruction, and of the simplest provision for separation, at any rate, by night; and, if the statements referred to be true, whether any steps have been taken to remedy the evils complained of?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: There is no doubt that overcrowding is an evil which has been complained of in Indian gaols, but in the new gaols steps have been taken to remedy this evil. The prisoners are, however, classified with great care. In certain prisons convicts are employed as gaol servants, but never in greater proportion than 12 per cent of the average strength of the prisoners. The various Governments in India have done much during the past few years towards improving gaols, both as to accommodation as well as to moral instruction and superintendence, and the hon. Gentleman may rest assured that this important subject will still continue to occupy their attention.

MALAY PENINSULA—THE BRITISH RESIDENT IN SALANPORE.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to Despatches from and to the Governor of the Straits Settlements, lately published—viz. No. 19, of March 18th, 1875, and No. 23, of May 17th, 1875, and also with reference to a previous Despatch, No. 74, of January 30th, 1875, and enclosed letter from Mr. J. G. Davidson, Whether Her Majesty's Government has permitted an officer holding the appointment of British Resident in Salanpore to remain interested in private financial transactions with the Chief of that State, and to obtain commercial concessions from him?

MR. J. LOWTHER: There has been a good deal of correspondence of a confidential character upon this subject, which in the interest of the public service it has not been considered advisable to publish. I may mention, however, that it was suggested to the Governor by the Secretary of State that, in consequence of commercial arrangements with the native officials, it would be preferable that some employment should be found elsewhere for Mr. Davidson, who is believed to be a most efficient public servant. I regret, however, to hear that this gentleman's state of health is such that his return home is expected very shortly.

SCHOOL FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD (for MR. COLMAN) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, under Clause 24 of the Elementary Education Bill, it is intended to give the different local committees authority to decide the ability of the parent to pay the ordinary school fee; and, whether it is the duty of such committees, if satisfied of the inability, to give the parent sufficient money to pay the said fee?

VISCOUNT SANDON: It is certainly intended in the Elementary Education Bill that Boards of Guardians only should have the power of deciding as to the ability of parents to pay the school fee and of paying such fees, and not the committees which they or the Town Councils may appoint. If there is any uncertainty as to the wording of the clause, I shall take care to set it right in Committee.

PUBLIC HEALTH—MEDICAL OFFICER TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WADDY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is prepared to state the intentions of the Government in regard to the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Simon as Medical Officer of the Privy Council? He also wished to ask the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is prepared to state the intentions of the Government in regard to the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Medical Officer of the Board, Mr. Simon?

VISCOUNT SANDON: It is not proposed to fill up the post of Medical Officer to the Privy Council which has lately become vacant owing to the resignation of that most distinguished public officer, Mr. Simon. Any advice which the Privy Council may require upon medical questions will be obtained from the Medical Department of the Local Government Board.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply to the second Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, said, he had appointed Dr. Seaton, the second Medical Officer, to be Medical Officer of the Local Government Board in the room of Mr. Simon. The office would not be exactly the same as that held by Mr. Simon, which was constituted by an Act of Parliament.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT COMMISSION — CASE OF FREDERICK HARCOMBE.

QUESTION.

MR. M. A. BASS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of Frederick Harcombe, a goods guard lately dismissed from the service of the Taff Vale Railway Company, without the usual recommendation of character, in consequence of having given evidence before the Railway Accident Commission; and, whether he can suggest a remedy for such a proceeding, or any means by which Harcombe can be compensated for the loss he has sustained?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he had received a complaint from this man, who said that he was dismissed by the railway company in consequence of the evidence that he gave before the Commission which was appointed to inquire into the question of Railway Accidents. It was quite clear that, as Secretary of State, he had no power to say what course the man ought to take in order to procure compensation if he had been wrongfully dismissed, nor had he the slightest power to inquire whether the railway company had sufficient justification for dismissing him. All he could say at the present moment was that he represented the man's case immediately to the railway company. Their statement was that they dismissed this man because he gave untrue evidence. That was a question which must be decided elsewhere, but he (Mr. Cross) thought it his duty to write a letter to the railway company, which, with the permission of the House, he would read—

"The Secretary of State, while he is unable to give any direction, or offer any opinion as to the merits of a matter which is not within his jurisdiction, feels it his duty to point out the evil results which will follow if the notion were to get abroad that the fact of a servant in the employ of a railway company having given evidence before the Railway Commission, even if not quite in accordance with the views of his

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Commons Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

COMMONS BILL—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.—LAW AS TO THE REGULATION AND INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.

Applications in relation to Commons.

Clause 4 (Explanation of adjustment of rights).

MR. STANTON moved, in page 4, line 11, after “land,” to insert—

“(4a.) The confirmation of any exchange of any portion of any Common for any adjoining land of equal or greater value, or any sale of any portions of any Common for the purpose of purchasing adjoining land of equal or greater value out of the proceeds of such sale: Provided, the Commissioners are satisfied that such exchange is beneficial to the interests in the Common affected by such sale or exchange, and that such exchange has been or shall be approved by the vestry or vestries of the parish or parishes in which such Common is situate, and provided that, in the case of any such sale as aforesaid, land of equal or greater value adjoining the Common has been or shall be purchased and thrown into the Common, or an equivalent improvement or benefit to the Common carried out.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not object to the principle of the Amendment, but said there were certain legal difficulties in the way which he did not at present see the way to overcome, but he would give the matter further consideration.

MR. WHITWELL moved, in page 4, line 22, after “Common,” to insert—

“Provided always, That no such adjustment of rights shall prohibit the use of any Common or uninclosed land for the free passage of a person or persons thereupon for the purpose of going from place to place, or for the enjoyment of air, exercise, or scenery on foot or on horseback, in such manner, freedom, and extent as such person or persons or other persons have heretofore been accustomed to enjoy.”

His object was to prevent any person from being deprived of any privilege which had been enjoyed from time immemorial, and he trusted that nothing would be done to prevent the free enjoyment over the broad expanse of mountain tracks which had hitherto existed.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS objected to the Proviso, and said he thought it would be better to leave the matter as it now stood in the Bill.

MR. LOPES hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. At present no express right was enjoyed by the public, and he did not think it desirable to confer upon them a right which did not now exist.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE apprehended that there was danger of those rights which had been acquired by custom being withdrawn in the absence of legal sanction, which the hon. Member for Kendal aimed at obtaining.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Explanation of improvement).

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 4, at end, to add—“5. The appointment from time to time of Conservators of the Common for the purposes aforesaid.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (“Inclosure” means inclosure in manner provided by the Inclosure Acts) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provisions for the benefit of a neighbourhood applicable alike to orders for regulation and orders for inclosure).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, in page 4, line 40, to leave out “may,” and insert “shall.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Suburban Commons.

Clause 8 (Sanitary authorities to be represented in the case of commons in the neighbourhood of towns).

MR. A. MARTEN moved, in page 5, line 22, after “situate,” to insert “either wholly or partly in any town or towns or.”

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LOPES moved, in page 5, line 22, after "Common," to insert "or any part of a Common."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE moved, in page 5, line 38, after "aforesaid," to insert—

"Provided that after the passing of this Act the Commissioners shall not entertain an application for the inclosure of a suburban Common."

He thought there was no valid public reason for facilitating the conversion into private property of common land that was furnishing health, recreation, and enjoyment to the weary inhabitants of smoky towns. The powers of regulation would enable lords of manors and Commoners to improve waste lands for pasture without shutting out the public by fences, or transforming them into villas and streets; but if the alternative of inclosure or of regulation was given, the pecuniary profit of the former to individuals would outweigh the advantages to the public of regulation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 38, after the word "aforesaid," to insert the words "Provided, That after the passing of this Act the Commissioners shall not entertain an application for the inclosure of a suburban Common."—(Mr. Cowper-Temple.)

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS opposed the Motion, urging that there were a great many commons to which the Amendment would not apply, and that it would be a very unjust, very injurious, and very inconvenient course to take, to decide by a hard-and-fast line, that no commons within a certain distance of a town should be inclosed. Every case must be judged on its own merits; and there were several strong provisions in the Bill to enable the local authorities to prevent these commons being inclosed, if they ought not to be inclosed. In his opinion, they had very much better leave this matter to the discretion of the local sanitary authorities.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE supported the Amendment, which he thought an extremely important one. He felt satisfied that unless they drew a cordon round the large towns and said these commons should not be inclosed, there would never be any application for their regulation. There might be an absolute prohibition of the inclosure of commons within a certain distance of populous towns. The principle in this clause had received the sanction of both Houses of Parliament, and although the different Bills on the subject had been lost, the clauses they contained embodying it had been agreed to.

Mr. GOLDNEY urged that some latitude should be allowed to corporations, who should be empowered to appropriate portions of their funds to the preservation of suburban commons in cases in which they thought it desirable to adopt that course.

Mr. WALTER pointed out the difficulties that would arise if a hard-and-fast line were drawn which should apply to commons within six miles of towns having 5,000 inhabitants equally with those which were within that distance from towns having 500,000 inhabitants, and stated that in his view the Committee should not hastily lay down an arbitrary rule of that character, which would disregard all local peculiarities and requirements. It being difficult to argue a point of this kind without having some particular case in view, he would take that of Windsor and Eton in illustration of his contention. Windsor and Eton contained some 14,000 or 15,000 inhabitants, to whom Windsor Forest, with its beautiful scenery and everything that conduced to their enjoyment, was always accessible, and could the Committee suppose that any great hardship would be inflicted upon those persons by some small and almost unknown common six miles away being inclosed? A similar observation might be made with reference to the commons near Richmond, the inhabitants of which town, also had the enjoyment of a fine park. For these reasons he was unable to support the Amendment.

Mr. FAWCETT did not attribute the same importance as the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) did to the argument founded upon Windsor Forest and Richmond Park. For his own part, he preferred to walk over a common, because he could go where he liked and felt as if it was his own property. Words could be inserted in the Amendment which would restrain it from applying to small towns in the same way that it would to large ones. He hoped it would be pressed to a division. It had twice been accepted by both Houses of Parliament so far as its principle went. Without the Amendment it would be impossible to work the scheme of the Home Secretary, because the proposal to improve a common would be vetoed, and when nothing else could be done application would be made to Parliament to have the common inclosed.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE regretted the proposal had been made in so short and crude a form. He suggested that it should be withdrawn; but if it were pressed he must vote in its favour, as a protest against the inclosure of suburban commons.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STANTON moved, in page 6, line 34, after "expedients" to insert—

"Where any Common (whether situate within six miles of any town or not) is situate within six miles of any village or villages, or other populous place or places, containing in the aggregate not less than five thousand inhabitants, but not constituting a town, notice of any application under this Act in relation to such Common shall be served as soon as may be on the urban sanitary authority or authorities, or the rural sanitary authority or authorities having jurisdiction over any such village or populous place, and all or any of the powers conferred by this section upon the urban sanitary authority having jurisdiction over any town may be exercised by any urban sanitary authority or rural sanitary authority having jurisdiction over any such village or populous place.

"When more than one sanitary authority is entitled to exercise the powers conferred by this section in respect of the same Common, the Inclosure Commissioners may consign the future management of such Common, under any order for its regulation, to a body composed in such proportions as they deem advisable, of representatives of all or any of such sanitary authorities, and may decide that certain parts of the parish or parishes in or near which such Common is situate shall be a contributory district for the purposes of this Act, and may make such rules for the election or nomination of such representatives by such sanitary authority as they think fit."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS objected to the proposed Amendment, on the ground that it was not necessary. With respect to the mention of villages and places comprising 5,000 inhabitants, he might say there were no such places. This question had been discussed two years ago, and he was very sorry he could not now assent to it.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he was sorry to have heard the Home Secretary express himself so. He could not understand how the inhabitants of a village, or place, or places in the neighbourhood of a common, and not having 5,000 inhabitants, should not have a right to appear as a representative body. It seemed to him altogether wrong, and he should certainly support the Amendment.

MR. LOPES considered the Amendment unnecessary.

MR. MARLING said, there were many places having populations amounting in the aggregate to 5,000 and upwards, and it would be right that they should have a voice in the matter. The object of the Amendment was to give those somewhat scattered inhabitants the benefit they would have if more densely situated. They were anxious to have their commons regulated and improved, and were willing to bear their share of the expenses.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, if there was one thing which was more necessary than another, it was to give the scattered rural populations the same advantages as were given to the populations of towns, and on those grounds he should certainly vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend; but if the Government would bring up a clause having a similar object he should support it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite, in the many Bills they had brought in on this subject, never introduced any such provision. What were rural sanitary authorities? They were here to-day and away to-morrow. He had no intention of doing what he was certain would lead the ratepayers into endless litigation.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE remarked that it was no answer to say that this provision had not been contained in former Bills which were introduced when people were ignorant of the extent of the common lands in England. He was ready to admit that it was a defect in former Bills that they did not contain this provision. He thought if there were several villages and places, the inhabitants of which amounted to 5,000, that they might apply to the Commissioners.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND suggested that application might be made to the Guardians. He considered them a proper body through whom representations should be made, and he hoped the Home Secretary would give to all Boards of Guardians the power to make representations, and to have a voice in the matter. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to take the Guardians by the hand.

LORD HENRY SCOTT contended that if this Proviso were adopted they would be opening up a frightful source of public expenditure on the part of Boards of Guardians.

MR. A. BROWN thought nothing more than was reasonable and desirable was asked.

MR. FAWCETT said, the Government had so much time at its disposal as to introduce a Bill that never was asked for. He was surprised to hear the Home Secretary speak of the Guardians in the manner he had described them—as “here to-day and gone to-morrow”—thus indicating that they were a body not to be trusted. He (Mr. Fawcett) submitted that the Guardians were the official persons; and if it was proposed to inclose a common they were the proper authorities to whom power on the question should be given. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary addressing the Members who sat on the front Opposition bench, used the tu quoque argument, saying—“Why did ye not bring forward a measure of this kind when ye were in power?” He maintained that the course taken by the Home Secretary was singularly unfair; and the moment they proposed anything that was not in the Bill of 1871, the Home Secretary said—“Oh, but that was not in the Bill of 1871.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS explained that the object of the clause was to empower the rural sanitary authorities to contribute to the funds for the improvement of the commons, and give compensation for the rights of the commoners. The question of notice would be dealt with in Clause 10.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he was surprised that the Home Secretary should treat the Board of Guardians with contumely. In the Education Bill he had not treated them as bodies that were “here to-day and gone to-morrow,” but had entrusted them with the permanent administration of the educational affairs of the rural parishes.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT congratulated the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) on the change of his views in regard to the rural authorities, and inquired of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) his authority for saying that there were only 1,500,000 acres of common in England. He hoped the Home Secretary would stand to his guns and not make the concession asked for, because the more concessions he made the more were required.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND trusted the Committee would insist upon the carrying out of two objects—first, that notice should be served upon the rural sanitary authorities as authorities, and not merely as individuals; and, secondly, that they should have the power to do certain things which at present they had not the power of doing for the benefit of those whom they represented.

MR. PELL expressed a hope that the Government would adhere to their proposition, for he was quite convinced that the sanitary authorities had quite a sufficient number of matters to attend to at the present time.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE explained that he had taken his figures from Domesday Book, and judging from the Returns given for the Home Counties, with which he was personally acquainted, he was induced to think the total correct. The Inclosure Commissioners who, in 1870, stated that there were between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 acres of uninclosed common land, now stated that there were only 2,500,000 acres; but he thought their estimate was still too large and that the Domesday Book was nearer the mark.

Question put, “That those words be there inserted.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 79: Majority 24.

MR. WHITWELL moved the insertion of the word “three” instead of “five” in page 6, line 41, the object being that the word “town” in the clause should be held to mean a place with 3,000 inhabitants, and not the greater number.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 41, to leave out the word “five,” in order to insert the word "three."—

(Mr. Whitwell.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought that by adopting the number of 5,000 the Government had gone quite far enough.

Question put, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 46: Majority 18.

MR. SANDFORD moved, in page 7 at end of line 4, to add—

"The powers conferred by this section upon the urban sanitary authority of acquiring by gift and holding any suburban Common, and any rights in such Common, and of purchasing and holding any saleable rights of Common or any tenement of a commoner having annexed thereto rights of Common, may be exercised by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting by the council of any borough constituted such either before or after the passing of this Act (whether they are the urban sanitary authority or not), with respect to any Common within seven miles of such borough, whether the borough have a population of not less than five thousand inhabitants or not."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH pointed out that the Amendment might have the effect of giving these burgesses power to charge rates outside of their district, but promised that it should be considered before the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, "That the Clause do now pass,"

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked why the urban authority should be compelled to purchase the land as well as the rights of common in respect to such places within a certain distance of towns? Why should they not have power to purchase the rights of common and hold them for the benefit of the people?

MR. GOLDNEY observed, that any right whatever could be purchased under the Bill as it stood; and he thought that it would be sufficient to meet everything that was required.

Clause agreed to.

Procedure.

Clause 9 (Issue of forms by Commissioners) agreed to.

Clause 10 (Rules as to application to Commissioners) agreed to.

Clause 11 (Rules as to local inquiry) agreed to.

Clause 12 (Rules as to provisional orders).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved an Amendment, the object of which was that whilst the assent of two-thirds of the commoners should be required before any common could be inclosed, and while the lord of the manor should have a veto on that transaction, that the assent of one-half of the commoners should be sufficient to regulate the common, and the veto of the lord of the manor should in the case of mere regulation be abolished.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 25, after the word "order," to insert the words "for the inclosure of a Common."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not see why the veto should not apply to regulations, considering that the same rights were involved as in inclosure, and he objected to reduce the proportion of assents because liability to be rated for improvement would follow.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE observed that regulation would not deprive the the lords of manors of their rights in the soil, nor the commoners of their use of it, as inclosures did.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE supported the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 74: Majority 31.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved in page 14, line 42, after "Commons," to insert "with such modifications, if any, as to Parliament seem fit," the object being to enable such defects as might be found in the original scheme to be amended.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 24, after the word "Common," to insert the words "with such modifications, if any, as to Parliament seem fit."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS could not accept the Amendment. The scheme would be drawn up after certain consents had been obtained. If a power of altering it were given, the scheme might become altogether different from that to which the consents had been given.

MR. A. BROWN supported the Amendment, on the ground that in the original scheme some minor points might have been overlooked which it would be desirable to provide for.

LORD HENRY SCOTT opposed the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the original design of the Home Secretary was to bring all the details of a scheme under the review of Parliament. As the Bill stood the Standing Committee, no matter what the defects of the scheme, would not be able to add a single acre to the recreation ground of the public or the allotment grounds of the poor. They must either accept or reject as a whole the Provisional Order. Considering that the very essence of the Bill was to bring these schemes under the review of Parliament, the measure would be a perfect farce without such provisions as he had proposed.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, under the existing law when Provisional Orders were passed by the Inclosure Commissioners, the Home Secretary had to bring in a Bill for their confirmation, and he did that with the whole strength of the Government in the House of Commons at his back. It was to that he objected. He therefore fell back upon a Standing Committee who would go through all the details and see whether those schemes were such as in their opinion ought to be presented to Parliament. The bringing in of a Bill in that case would be purely a Ministerial act. But if they were to say that this Standing Committee might alter what had been agreed upon that would be quite another thing.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND opposed the Amendment, on the ground that if they passed an Act saying a scheme should be dependent on certain consents, they should not turn round when those consents had been obtained and allow something else to be done. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the measure should be so altered as to provide for schemes being adopted which had the assent of all the persons interested in the commons to be dealt with.

MR. KNIGHT said, if the Amendment were adopted, it would be unsafe for persons to apply for an inclosure, as they would be completely in the power of the Committee.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that Committees on Private Bills had power to alter the schemes submitted to them. It was possible that as this Amendment was now worded, the parties would not be able to withdraw from their proposal if they disapproved of the changes made; but that difficulty could easily be met by an addition to the Amendment.

MR. FAWCETT believed the Home Secretary would have met with stronger opposition at the earlier stages of the Bill, if it had been understood that he meant to leave everything to the Inclosure Commissioners, whose decisions the Standing Committee could not revise.

MR. DODSON suggested that the Home Secretary should bring up a clause which would place the parties to an inclosure before the Select Committee in the same position as the promoters of a private Bill, and enable them to withdraw the scheme if they did not like any change which was made in it. If the right hon. Gentleman would not assent to that course, it would be desirable that the hon. Member for Reading should divide the Committee on his Amendment, though it did not fully solve the difficulty.

MR. WHITWELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary proposed to give to a Standing Committee powers which he objected to confer upon the House. For his part, he objected to any such power being given to the proposed Committee, and he hoped the proposal would be rejected.

MR. GREGORY thought the clause as it stood proposed a convenient as well as a reasonable mode of procedure.

MR. BRISTOWE objected to the method proposed by the Home Secretary, that these Provisional Orders should be submitted to a Standing Committee of that House, simply for acceptance or rejection, without giving such a Committee the power of going into details, and making such alterations as they might think reasonable. A doctrine of that kind, if acted upon, would furnish a very unsatisfactory precedent for the conduct of Select Committees, and one which, so far as he knew, was altogether foreign to the practice of the House of Commons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the object of the Bill was to put the Select Committee in the place of the Secretary of State, who at present could make no alteration in schemes and could only refuse to bring forward the Bill embodying them. If the Select Committee had power to alter the particular schemes, it could only be after hearing the parties; but the result of such an arrangement would be much in favour of the rich man, for the poor persons interested could not afford to appear. A local inquiry, where all parties could be heard, was the cheapest and simplest way of making any changes in a scheme. Sir George Grey, when at the Home Office, would not allow alterations to be made in an inclosure scheme even in this House, because the parties interested had consented to the scheme as it stood, and it would be unjust afterwards to alter the scheme without hearing them. In the same way he proposed when the Bill embodying these schemes went before the Committee that they should have before them the documentary evidence and say whether a particular scheme was one which, in their opinion, Parliament ought or ought not to accept. He was willing to confer with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) before the Report; but he could assure the Committee that there were practical difficulties, and meanwhile he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. DODSON said yes; the subject was one of difficulty, and here was a defect in the measure to which there were great objections. The observations which the right hon. Gentlemen addressed to the Committee were an argument against the whole Bill. It seemed to be a Bill for relieving the Secretary of State from responsibility and throwing it upon the Standing Committee. It was going very far to say that a Select Committee, of this legislative body, should have no power to alter and modify a scheme because the Secretary of State, who was an Executive officer, had no such power.

MR. GOLDNEY opposed the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE still retained his opinion that a Parliamentary Committee ought to have power to deal with the details of schemes. He had always understood until now that the intention was that the Committee should have the power of making modifications.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 56; Noes 99: Majority 43.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 17, inclusive, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

In reply to the Marquess of HARTINGTON,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Commons Bill would be taken as the First Order on Thursday, after which Supply would stand next if the Bill was got through in sufficient time. Then on the following Monday the First Order would be the second reading of the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, and if there was time afterwards they would proceed with the University of Oxford Bill. On Thursday, the 15th, they hoped to take the second reading of the Elementary Education Bill.

PRISONS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons, said: In a paragraph of Her Majesty's most gracious Speech it was intimated that a measure would be introduced into Parliament, in the first place, for promoting economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons; and secondly, at the same time for effecting the relief of local burdens. I therefore now rise to lay before the House the measure we have to propose in regard to England. Of course, some analogous measures will follow in due time, both with regard to Ireland and to Scotland, which will be brought in respectively by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland and by the Lord Advocate. I shall confine my observations to-night entirely to the case of England. The subject resolves itself into two questions; first, the condition of our prisons, and, secondly, the expense of their management. Both of these matters have been brought before my notice not only as a Member of Parliament, but as a magistrate of some standing. They were specially brought before my notice in 1874 by a deputation which waited on me at the Home Office from the Social Science Association. That deputation pointed out that, although the Act of 1865, which has done so much to improve not only the discipline of our prisons, but their entire management, has worked very well—and in its main features we do not propose to interfere with it, subject to certain exceptions—still there was a great want of uniformity of discipline in the prisons throughout the country, a great want of efficiency in many of those prisons, and a great amount of unnecessary expense, owing to the excessive number of our prisons. Further, that there was a great mistake made in having regard too much to penal labour as opposed to industrial labour; and perhaps the result of that may be traced and may be seen very visibly, not only financially, but also morally, as far as our prisons were concerned. Therefore, this matter demands our attention with the view to two objects—first, to secure more uniformity of discipline in prisons, and secondly, if possible, to reduce expenditure on their management. The subject was brought forward in a different shape in 1872 by my hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) when the celebrated Resolution upon Local Taxation was passed by the House. And one of the main points that was insisted upon by my hon. Friend at that time was the fact that all the expenditure incurred for prisons, and which amounted, as he gave it, on an average of the previous four years, to £590,000 a-year, less, of course, the sum which must be deducted as being the grant from the Treasury—namely, about £99,000 per annum, was fairly an Imperial and not a local charge—that is to say, that our prisons and our whole system of gaol discipline were kept up for the safety not only of real property, but of personal property, which did not pay its share, and not for the safety of property simply, but for the protection of life. The great aim of my hon. Friend's speech was to show that many charges were Imperial charges and not local ones merely, as they had been hitherto regarded. Now, both of those considerations must be borne in mind when we come to deal with the question of prisons. I have certainly no wish to squander public money in any way that is not useful, neither would I ask the House to consent to give any money from Imperial funds except for Imperial purposes. I do not think that money ought to be granted from the Imperial Exchequer, unless there be good reason for granting it, and unless it can be shown that not only will it improve the discipline in our gaols, and also reduce the expenditure upon them generally, but likewise that some substantial advantage will accrue to the country from the Imperial Exchequer giving greater aid than it now gives. Now, what is our system of gaols in England at present? We have 116 county and borough gaols. That gives one gaol to an average of 22 square miles, and one to about every 200,000 of the population. The average cost, I think, this year or in some previous year, for all the gaols, is about £27 2s. per head for the prisoners. The greatest number of prisoners in gaol in England at one time was 52,500, while the daily average number in gaol was 18,500. But when you come to look at the question of gaol accommodation you will find it very unequally distributed throughout England. I will take, in the first place, the distribution and proportion of prisons that exist to the population. I find that in Rutlandshire there is one gaol to 20,000 inhabitants. In Lincolnshire there are seven gaols, or one for every 48,000. In Worcestershire there is one gaol for 338,000. In Lancashire there are six gaols, or one for 469,000. In Middlesex there are five gaols, or one for 507,000. In Surrey there are two gaols, or one for 445,000. In Stafford there is one for 858,000. But the distribution does not quite stop there, because I find that in some places the proportion is different. In Leicester there are two gaols, one for the borough and one for the county. The county gaol is for 174,000 inhabitants, the borough gaol for 95,000. There is sufficient room in the county gaol for the whole of the prisoners, so that there is a great waste in respect of the gaols in Leicestershire. In Northampton the county gaol is for 199,000, and in the borough for 5,000. Therefore, all the borough prisoners could be accommodated in the county gaol. In Lincoln there are not less than three prisons—materially increase the cost of conveying prisoners from the places at which they are committed to the prisons in which they will have to serve their sentences. The next item on which a saving would be effected is the earnings of the prisoners. I find that in one prison the earnings of prisoners are close upon £10 per head per year; in another the sum is a little over £6; in a third the average earnings amount only to 6s. 9½d. per head per annum; whereas in the Convict Prison at Pentonville each prisoner earns, apart from the labour on buildings, which would materially increase the amount earned, on an average £9 a-year. We have no reason to doubt that if all these prisoners were under the same discipline and properly grouped together the amount of money they earn would not be as large as is now earned in the best managed convict prisons, and we believe also that it would go on continuously increasing. Again, it is quite obvious in the small prisons they cannot afford to pay for instructors to teach the prisoners. The third item of saving which will arise from doing away with 50 prisons will be considerable—that is to say, in the cost of repairs. The result of all this, if the House sanctions the scheme, will be that we shall not make any serious inroad on the Imperial Exchequer, and we shall save very much more to the local jurisdictions than the present charge. The total average cost for 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875 of the county and borough prisons is £592,390; and deducting from that the interest on the loans obtained for building prisons—namely, £42,472—it will leave the actual cost of the prisons at £549,918. Now, the funds that have hitherto been made have run as follows:—The profits upon prison labour amount to £50,312, and some small contingent receipts, in round numbers £8,000. From the rates there have been paid £392,000; from the public revenue £99,100. We propose that the gaols shall be handed over to the Government, and it will be carried out in this way. We have no doubt that by closing superfluous prisons we should be able to effect a saving at once of £50,000 or £60,000. We have no doubt also that there will be an increase in the value of labour of £50,000. This, therefore, would only leave a charge upon the public revenue of £385,000. Taking the small contingent receipts into account, this will be somewhat increased, so that practically there would be a saving from local rates of £392,000, and only an additional charge upon the public revenue of £285,000. In doing this, therefore, we should, in round numbers, save to the local jurisdictions something like £100,000 more than the expenditure which we propose. I think that this alone would be a satisfactory result, taking into consideration the improvement which will, no doubt, be brought into existence in discipline and good management, and also in the good conduct of the prisons and of the prisoners themselves, for we should go much more into the question of industrial as against penal labour, and this would practically be a great matter, and would, we believe, tend very much to the diminution of crime. Of course, two or three questions will be asked, and I would very shortly state the provisions of the Bill that have been framed to carry out our scheme. We propose that this Act shall come into operation at the commencement of the next financial year. It will be quite impossible that in undertaking this scheme you should take immediately all these things over. You must have a certain number of months for carrying out your scheme of reduction, therefore we do not propose to take the matter into our own hands until the end of March, 1877; but from that day all the expenses incurred on prisons and for the prisoners therein will be defrayed out of monies to be provided by Parliament. As to local jurisdictions, from the time of a man going to prison as a committed prisoner they will practically cease. Of course, we have no notion of buying the gaols, for if we did that we should have to pay a very large sum of money; and therefore we say that the prisons and the furniture and effects belonging thereto shall be handed over to the Secretary of State for the purpose of keeping prisoners there. Although I say that they are to be handed over to the Secretary of State, and he shall act in reference to the appointment of all officers, and shall have the control and custody of the prisoners and all the power of the Quarter Sessions and the Visiting Justices shall be primarily vested in the Secretary of State, I do not mean to propose that the Secretary of State should administer a matter of this kind. I propose—following the recommendation of the Commission that sat a long time ago—that there shall be established Prison Boards, which shall practically carry out all the details of this question. I propose that there should be Prison Boards composed of a certain small number of members for this purpose, and to be called Prison Commissioners, and that they should have the general superintendence of prisons under this Bill vested in them, but subject to the control of the Secretary of State. One question to be considered will be the appointment of officers, for the question of patronage will, no doubt, be considered. As Secretary of State I have no wish to have the slightest amount of patronage more than I can help, for nothing more encumbers a Minister or gives him more trouble and anxiety; but I propose that the appointment of the superior officers should be in the Secretary of State, of course taking the opinion of the Visiting Boards, but all the rest of the subordinate officers shall not be appointed by the Secretary of State, but by the Prison Commissioners themselves. This will take a vast amount of patronage from the Secretary of State, and the Boards would administer it more satisfactorily than he could. One advantage of this will be that, by being all together, there will be a much greater flow of promotion in the service, and a much greater inducement to officers to work well than there is at present, and practically you will get a much better staff of officers than you have had down to the present. I do not, however, find any fault with the existing officers, who I think are exceedingly satisfactory. But there is another question which hon. Members will be asking—What are you going to do with your Prison Inspectors? It is quite clear that there must be Inspectors. You cannot well work even 50 gaols from London without some one to visit them. We propose not to keep up the Prison Inspectors as at present, but to give the Prison Commissioners certain assistants, who will visit periodically the gaols, reporting to the head quarters in London. There is also one valuable body that I should be very sorry to lose, I mean the Visiting Justices. It is absolutely necessary when dealing with prisons of this kind that there should be that supervision and constant visiting that you cannot get except from the Visiting

Justices. You must have an army of Inspectors without this; and although the whole control of the prisons and officers will be in the Prison Commissioners, or Assistant Commissioners, yet I do propose that in the counties and boroughs there should be, though in a somewhat different way, appointed by Quarter Sessions, Visiting Justices, as heretofore. I propose that this committee should not have the same extended powers of actually ruling the prisons as at the present moment; but the Prison Commissioners should visit from time to time any prison and report upon it. It is also quite necessary that prisons should be under the constant action of the visiting Justices, so that the public should be satisfied that the prisoners were properly taken care of, and that there should be an independent body of Justices, who would inform the Secretary of State if there was anything wrong. There is another point, and that is about the prisoners themselves. The House must know very well that counties are divided for prison purposes, that there are for this purpose boroughs, cities, and divisions of counties, and in every such case the Prison Board is bound to provide by the Act a prison. Most counties have built their prisons; but many places not having prisoners enough to build a prison for, have very properly not thought of building a prison, but have put their prisoners out in some neighbouring jurisdiction, paying a certain sum, not merely for their board, but also for the accommodation they have in the prisons. We propose that this Bill shall not come into operation until the end of the financial year, and we shall have time to see how this work is performed. We should then say to these places that if it could be shown that they had provided accommodation fit for the daily average of prisoners for the last five years, when they had done all that the law required of them, that the Government should take possession of the gaols. Those places which have not provided this accommodation, but have put out their prisoners into other jurisdictions, we should say this to them—We would take the daily average of prisoners for the last five years and that they should pay the equivalent of the cell accommodation that they would require. I would, however, also say that we should not propose that they should pay in cash, but that we should be perfectly ready to lend them money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners and that they should pay interest upon it at a certain rate. There are, of course, some jurisdictions which have provided prisons, and some which have not. Yet the latter have practically done so by contributing to the prisons of their neighbours. Where that course has been followed we propose to take that into consideration. When the prisons are discontinued we shall, of course, be perfectly ready to let the jurisdictions have their prisons back again under specified conditions. Or if it be preferred, we shall sell the prisons for them, and any surplus that may be received we shall hand over to the jurisdictions. I do not think I need trouble the House further with the provisions of this Bill. All I can say is that I believe if it is carried out we shall do exactly what was stated in the Queen's Speech—namely, produce a measure which will undoubtedly “promote economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, besides being a measure which will largely relieve local burdens.”

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That leave be given to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons.”—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. WHITBREAD said, that, in so far as the Bill would secure greater uniformity in the management of prisons, and would enable them to shut up many costly and practically useless gaols, he thought it was a good measure. He was delighted to think that the Government were inclining more towards industrial than towards penal labour. He admitted that there would be a difficulty in shutting up these prisons and grouping them unless the Government took the matter up. The localities would not easily agree to a proposal for grouping the small prisons, and he really believed they would make a harder fight before giving up their gaols than in parting with one of their Representatives. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly bid high for the surrender; but he must enter his protest against the way in which he was dealing with this question of local government. He did not intend that the taxpayer should not be called in to the relief of the rate-payer. That must be the case; but when he was so called in he was entitled to make conditions that the relief given should be accompanied by such reforms that he should not be called upon for further contributions. He protested against rendering all these gifts from the Imperial Exchequer without insisting on those reforms which could be made palatable and possible by means of those gifts only. The right hon. Gentleman was proceeding in a very dangerous course in thus touching the question of local government here and there, and fragmentarily, instead of dealing with it in a statesman-like and comprehensive manner. The Government gave largely out of the Exchequer last year, but had there been an equal corresponding diminution of the rates? He was afraid that an attempt was to be made to pass a Highways Bill without even that Valuation Bill which had a little modicum of reform in it, and without which it would only intensify the inequality between one Union and the other. He trusted that if the House surrendered the public money in proposals of this kind, it would insist on some useful reforms as part of the consideration.

MR. PELL said, he agreed with a good deal that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman, but he had omitted to apply his remarks to the Bill. The Home Secretary had clearly shown the enormous waste in prison management and the inequality and want of uniformity in the treatment of prisoners. The scheme of the Government would, he thought, effect an enormous saving of expenditure on local funds by means of a comparatively small contribution from the Imperial funds. He had himself reckoned up from 55 to 60 small prisons that might be disposed of, and which had only 1,600 prisoners among them, although they had a staff of 487 officers. This gave an average of three officers for 10 prisoners, a number for which in larger prisons one officer would be sufficient. The reduction in the number of prisons proposed by the Government would leave an adequate proportion of prisons to the population. In some prisons the prisoners were maintained for 1s. a-day, and their earnings still further reduced their cost from £16 to £10 a-year; but at Lincoln the cost was 6s. 3d. a-day and there were no earnings at all. No Government could rightly permit this state of things to continue without making an effort to change it, and if it involved any charge upon the Exchequer it was for purely national purposes. There could be no valid objection to the principle of the Government assuming the cost of maintaining prisons. So far as he understood the proposal of the Home Secretary, it appeared to be good, proper, and timely.

MR. WHALLEY complained that the Home Office did not co-operate with the Justices in matters of this kind, and hoped the House would not be deluded by statements such as those made by the Home Secretary, for the design seemed to be to carry out further the system of centralization. The practical effect of centralization had been to disqualify the local bodies from managing their own affairs, and the right hon. Gentleman was now seeking to carry the system further. He never heard such a weak and inefficient case put forward for centralizing the management of matters which were now regulated by the magistrates, and of all business taken in hand by the Government there was none that, according to his experience, they administered so unsatisfactorily as that relating to prisons, so that there was the greatest danger in the transfer of authority which had been proposed that evening. The perversion of central government, in some cases, where the management of prisons was under the control of the Royal Catholic party was notorious. The Home Secretary had exercised most unwarrantable strictness in respect to a certain remarkable case, and he could only attribute that to special influences brought to bear upon the right hon. Gentleman outside the House. In the three countries in which he took part in the management of prisons he had heard of no complaint which could not be remedied by local action.

MR. RAINALD KNIGHTLEY rose to make an answer to an observation made by the hon. Member for Bedford.

MR. WHALLEY said that the proposal of the Government was to relieve certain responsibilities on the exceptionally busy and overworked magistrates, and to give a more uniform system. There was no danger of the proposal being carried out, and he hoped that the Government would not be misled by the observations of the hon. Member for Bedford.

MR. DODSON said, the financial proposals of the right hon. Gentleman offered what was per se a distinct advantage; but the price they would have to pay for it was centralization; and, without committing himself now to a final criticism upon the scheme, he must say that he should have liked to see relief given to local rates by some measure which, instead of weakening, would have strengthened and extended local self-government. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would not only weaken local self-government, but would actually lead to the suppression of a branch of it that was by no means an unimportant one. It was true that the Visiting Justices would be retained, but a great deal of their present power would be taken from them and they would be in reality unpaid Inspectors. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he had reduced the number of prisons from 116 to 66, what he was going to do with the surplus staff of those prisons—governors, chaplains and other officers. Were they all to be absorbed under the new system, or were they to be pensioned off, and if so, at whose cost? A great test was that the maximum of the existing salaries would become the minimum of the future salaries, when the officials now employed by the different local authorities were taken into the service of the Government. He perceived that the right hon. Gentleman would find it more difficult than he supposed to reduce the number of prisons to 66, because considerable pressure would be brought to bear upon him on all sides to prevent him from maintaining existing establishments. He gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for having made his calculations with the greatest care and accuracy, but remembering what had been the result of the Government's undertaking heavy losses in the reduction of the number of prisons, he was not prepared to participate with the Government in the proposal. He hoped that the Government would not be misled by the observations of the hon. Member for Bedford.

right hon. Gentleman opposite had made in reference to the question of compensating officials in existing prisons whose services would be no longer required if the Bill which had been described by the Secretary of State for the Home Department became law. In his speech, the right hon. Gentleman had only given a slight sketch of the Prisons Commission which was to have the management of the prisons after they had passed into the hands of the Government. It would be satisfactory to know whether the members of the Commission were to be paid for their services, and, if so, where the money was to come from. On the whole, he was much pleased with the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had made, in that it was a redemption of promises contained in the Speech from the Throne with which the Session commenced, and was, moreover, a continuation of the policy which in the past had worked well. Nothing was more thoroughly national than the making of provisions for the security of life and property; and, if one branch of the public was more interested than another in a measure of the kind, it was that branch which owned personal as distinguished from real property. It must be clear that if the Commission to be appointed did their work as well as the local authorities who at the present time had charge of the administration of prisons, the whole cost must be much less than if the existing number of prisons was maintained. This was undoubtedly a very bold measure, especially when they considered that it was brought in on the 1st of June. He did not know whether they could look forward to its being carried this Session. He foresaw the usual block of Business, and Heaven only knew which of the measures now before the House would be carried. He hoped the Government would not be dismayed by the denunciation of the principle of centralization which they would hear from the other side. He was quite ready to accept the centralization with all its drawbacks, when it was accompanied by a substantial pecuniary benefit. On the whole, he believed the Bill would largely improve the management of our prisons, and the Government had done well to introduce it.

MR. WHITWELL thanked the Government for having introduced the Bill.

Mr. J. R. Yorke

It would, he believed, contribute to the better management of our prisons, and that was an object of greater importance than the mere saving of money—though, of course, if the two things could be combined, so much the better.

MR. PAGET said, there was no doubt that the principle and details of the Bill carried centralization still further than it had been. The question was whether it was a good or bad direction. As far as he understood the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, though it might be exceptional in some respects, it was a step in the right direction. They could not have an Imperial grant without at the same time submitting to Imperial interference. He did not approve of the management of the prisons as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, as he had a strong objection to the administration of public affairs by Commissioners.

CAPTAIN NOLAN considered it would be unfair to take the second reading of this Bill before the Irish Bill was in print. In fact, unless the Irish Bill were printed in time the Irish Members would be voting in the dark.

MR. RATHBONE said, he did not object to the measure on the ground of centralization, or because of the transfer of the cost from the local to the general taxpayer; but he did regret that the Government did not undertake to reform the whole system of local self-government, especially as the present Administration was, from its experience in such matters, peculiarly qualified to deal with it. Every day's delay would create a greater chaos, and render the work a more difficult one.

MR. J. G. TALBOT regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not gone further, and taken the matter entirely out of the hands of the Visiting Justices, who, under the Bill, would be reduced to the position of mere Inspectors. They had a precedent for it in the case of the convict prisons, which were entirely administered by the central Government. He entirely approved of the principle of the Bill.

MR. EARP said, he thought it scarcely fair, Session after Session, to transfer the local charges to the Imperial Treasury. To that portion of the Home Secretary's scheme which dealt with prison reform he did not think there could be any objection; but the other portion, which dealt with financial re-adjustment, would be unpalatable to the country.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, expressed his conviction that when hon. Gentlemen came to consider the Bill they would find all the objections urged against the measure entirely vanish. As to the question of centralization, even now the local justices had very little power in the management of prisons. If a prisoner were sentenced in Liverpool, it did not at all follow that he should serve out his sentence in Liverpool Gaol. He might, according to the circumstances of his case, be sent elsewhere, but be brought back and discharged there at the expiration of his sentence. The Government proposed that when the Bill became law the prison officers should come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. Any officer whose office would have to be abolished would, of course, be pensioned, very much in the same way as those officers were pensioned who belonged to the prisons that were discontinued by the Act of 1865. Practically, however, few of them except those who were aged would be deprived of their employment. The new prisons which might be required would be built with Government funds, but with prison labour. The Prison Commissioners would be in direct communication with the Home Secretary; their number should not exceed five, and he would be responsible for them. He did not propose to take the second reading of the Bill until the 22nd of June; and he had no doubt that before that date the analogous Bill for Ireland would be in the hands of Members.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS — MORNING SITTINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will take into consideration the propriety, when he proposes that the House shall have Morning Sittings on Tuesday and Friday, of arranging that Notices of Motion shall take precedence in the Morning Sittings of Tuesday?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, he was afraid if he consented to the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman all that benefit which the House expected from a Morning Sitting would be prevented. It was not a proceeding which he would ever have recourse to, except towards this time of the year, when the pressure of Public Business was great; and it was his intention, with the permission of the House, that there should be a Sitting next Tuesday morning. In that case he should say with reference to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, that the Government could not undertake to make a House in the evening, because that was not in their power; but they used their utmost efforts to make a House in the evening when they asked for a Sitting in the morning. On Tuesday next he would propose, if the House assented to a Morning Sitting, that the Poor Law Amendment Bills for England and for Scotland should be taken at the Morning Sitting.

PARLIAMENT — PRIVILEGE — EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the cause of the adjournment of the Debate on the Resolution as to the Exclusion of Strangers from the 30th May last, he will make some other arrangement to ensure the continuance of the Debate at an earlier hour than that of a late Order of the Day on Tuesday the 13th of June, after the discussion on Motions and several other Orders of the Day?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, that the Order of the Day was fixed for the 13th of this month; and in the present state of Public Business he could not venture to interfere with its position on the Notice Paper. He could not, therefore, at this moment see any prospect of meeting the wishes of his hon. Friend; but he would bear the matter in mind.

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 1st June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

AMENDMENT OF THE INCLOSURE ACTS.

Field Gardens and Recreation Grounds.

Clause 18 (Situation of allotments for recreation grounds and field gardens).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE proposed an Amendment requiring that in all schemes for inclosure there should be appropriated for the purposes of recreation or of field gardens an allotment of not less than one-tenth of the whole common to be inclosed. The object of the Amendment was to provide that when inclosure took place greater regard should be had to the interests of the poor. Hitherto, since the passing of the Act of 1845, the provision for the allotment of garden and recreation grounds for the labouring poor had been of the most niggardly description. The agricultural labourer whose cottage was in the neighbourhood of a common practically enjoyed the right of turbary and the right of turning out his cow, his donkey, or his geese upon the common, although in strict law the right of common, being only appurtenant to land, belonged to the owner of the cottage, of which the labourer might be only a weekly tenant. Parliament, therefore, had thought that their practical enjoyment of those rights entitled the agricultural population to consideration when a common was inclosed; and, accordingly, under the Act of 1845, power was given to set out garden allotments of not more than a quarter of an acre each. If the Commissioners in carrying out the Act had not made sufficient reservation for garden allotments and recreation grounds, he admitted that the House was as responsible for that as the Commissioners themselves were. But in the Committee which sat in 1869 on that subject the Commissioners explained the principles on which they made garden allotments. They stated, for example, that they made no such allotments where the cottages were already supplied with gardens, and they did not take into consideration the possible increase of labouring men. Now, he maintained that where the agricultural poor had practically enjoyed rights of common it was unjust to tell them, when the common was about to be inclosed, that they were to have nothing, because they had already got a small bit of land attached to their cottages. It was only fair and reasonable that some allotment should be made to them. The same argument applied to recreation grounds. Hitherto miserably insufficient bits of land had been set out by the Commissioners for that purpose, one or two fenced-in acres being offered as the equivalent for the right of ranging over the whole common. As to recreation grounds, that Bill went somewhat beyond the Act of 1845, because it removed restrictions and left greater discretion with the Commissioners. But their acts for the future might be judged of by their acts in the past. It was most desirable that some limit should be laid down, especially as in future there was to be no appeal to the House for the amendment of the inclosure scheme, and the House could only accept or reject it. The Government in 1871 therefore laid down in their Inclosure Bill a limit up to which those reservations for allotment gardens and recreation grounds should be made; they thought that one-tenth of the common about to be inclosed should be so reserved, but that the reservation should not exceed 50 acres. The clause so amended was approved of by the House of Lords, and he would submit to the Home Secretary whether it would not be wise to act generously with regard to this matter, particularly as the labouring classes believed that the protection proposed to be given to them was insufficient. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 4, after the word "appropriated," to insert the words "and the Inclosure Commissioners shall require, and in their Provisional Order for the inclosure of the waste lands of any manor specify as one of the terms and conditions of the inclosure thereof, the appropriation free of all charge for the purpose of a recreation ground or recreation grounds, or a field garden or field gardens, or partly for one purpose and partly for the other, of an allotment not less in extent than one-tenth part of the whole of such waste lands; and whenever the waste lands of a manor proposed to be enclosed shall exceed five hundred acres it shall be open to the Commissioners to make such allotment as they shall think fit, having regard to the special circumstances of the neighbourhood, provided only that no such allotment shall be more than one-tenth of the said waste lands, nor of less extent than fifty acres: Provided always, That notwithstanding anything in the Inclosure Acts, 1845 to 1868, contained, it shall not be necessary to drain and level more than twelve acres of any allotment or allotments for the purpose of a recreation ground or recreation grounds."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS must ask the Committee to reject the Amendment. He considered that each scheme ought to be considered by itself and upon its own merits, and, therefore, that no maximum or minimum should be fixed with respect to the reservation of recreation grounds. If a tenth were fixed upon as a limit the result would be that in the case of the larger commons the recreation grounds would be much greater than the requirements of the population, while in the case of the smaller commons, which were generally situated in populous districts, the quantity reserved would be too small. He believed the fact that Parliament would have the power of throwing out an inclosure scheme would be strongly in favour of those who did not want commons to be inclosed. By throwing out one or two schemes in which sufficient provision was not made for the public and the labouring poor the House would effectually prevent the bringing forward of schemes which did not come up to the approved standard. The hon. Member thought that nothing was done by this Bill for the labouring poor, but he denied the accuracy of that view. They had done a great deal for the poor. They had provided for the expense of clearing all the allotment grounds, which, instead of being handed over to the cottagers in a rough state, would be placed in a fit and proper condition at the expense of those to whom the commons belonged. They were also given other advantages; but the main ground on which he resisted the Amendment was that every case ought to be considered on its own merits, and that the Committee ought not to be tied down by any hard-and-fast rule.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE observed, that although each scheme was to be determined on its own merits, it might so happen that when a scheme came before the Commissioners some member might approve of the whole of it, except that the recreation ground set out was insufficient, and he would consider himself incurring a grave responsibility if he insisted in throwing out the whole scheme on that ground. A power of amendment ought therefore to be given.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in his regard for the labouring poor, forgot that in a great number of cases there were no labouring poor to enjoy the extensive reservation of these commons which he would secure for them. If the Committee looked at the Bill as a whole they would see that under the present system there were common wardens and proprietors whose interest it was to see that no injury was done to the commons; but in future if large spaces were set out where there was no corresponding population, there would be no one practically to look after its management; it would become a "no man's land," and the source of all sorts of evil. In his opinion the special circumstances of each common ought to be taken into consideration by the Commissioners when they laid down their scheme for its inclosure.

MR. FAWCETT said, the country had ample opportunity of considering this point and they had decided in its favour. The Home Secretary constantly in these debates referred to the decisions of the Committees of 1869 and 1871, when they agreed with his proposals as conclusive on all controverted points. But the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), who was on that Committee, and took the greatest interest in its proceedings, moved a clause exactly identical with the present Amendment, which was repudiated by the Home Secretary. The Committee was entitled to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury adhered to his former views, or if not, what had led him to change them. The Home Secretary asked the Committee to place confidence in the Inclosure Commissioners, but when he saw what their recommendations were he could not do so. In one case there was a scheme for inclosing 685 acres, and out of that they only proposed to reserve for recreation two acres; and in another case there was a beggarly reservation of one acre, which was their last creditable performance! ["Where?"] In these cases there ought either to be no reservation at all, or a very different one. He found four acres was their usual allowance in the case of large allotments; but unless the House, instead of leaving it to their discretion, fixed on a definite proportion, they could not be sure even of that. In the last Bill this very proposition of one tenth was passed, but in "another place" a noble Duke said that the rights of property were in danger—that it was confiscation; and the Bill was in that "other place" in that way unceremoniously rejected. The House must, therefore, distinctly assert the principle that the public and the poor had rights in these commons. He thought that the Government ought to accept the Amendment.

MR. GREGORY said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down accused the Home Secretary of unfairness when he pointed out that the Report of the Committee of 1869 agreed with his proposals; but the unfairness of the hon. Member in his remarks upon the Commissioners was much more to be condemned. He quoted isolated cases, but did not give their names, which rendered it difficult to follow him. He (Mr. Gregory) thought he had found out the case of 600 acres and the beggarly two acres of reserve on which he had wasted so much scorn and indignation. At St. Dennis, where the common lands proposed to be inclosed were 636 acres, the inhabitants were 1,064, part of whom were engaged in the china and clay works, and the rest in agriculture. The two acres were set apart for an outlying hamlet for recreation, and six acres for gardens; while in St. Dennis itself every cottage had a garden varying from five perches to half an acre; and it was situated at the distance of a mile from any part of the moor, which could not be available so as to render it suitable for exercise and recreation. But the Commissioners did not consider four acres as a maximum, for on turning over the Report in his hand he had just hit on a scheme in the Potteries where the land inclosed was 31 acres, and the allotment 10 acres, or just about one-third. The reason given was that it was near two large towns, and it showed that the Commissioners had adopted and followed out the right principle—namely, that of being guided in each case by its own circumstances.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that was a case where there ought not to be any inclosure at all, the common in question being in the very heart of the Potteries, and surrounded by Stoke, Burslem, Newcastle-under-Lyne, Hanley, &c. He wished to explain that in alluding to the Acts before 1845 he had by no means intended to express his approval of them. What he meant was that, on the whole, the interests of the neighbourhood were better protected before 1845 than they had been since. In his own district large reservations had been made for the poor under private Acts before 1845. The feeling against the Inclosure Commissioners had been caused by the insufficient reservations made by them; and, judging from the speeches delivered by the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Marquess of Salisbury, and other noble Lords, in the House of Lords, it was unlikely that they would make proper reservations in the future. Therefore, he moved the Amendment, which laid down a rule that henceforth adequate provision should be made for this purpose. He wished, however, to propose it as an addition to the clause.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 110: Majority 43.

Clause 19 (Amendment of law as to letting field gardens).

MR. FAWCETT moved, in page 16, line 29, after "gardens," insert "not exceeding an acre each."

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Application of surplus rents of recreation grounds and field gardens).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, in page 17, line 27, after "neighbourhood," to insert—

"The trustees of any recreation ground and the allotment wardens of any field gardens may, with the approval of the Inclosure Commissioners, sell all or any part of the allotment vested in them, and out of the proceeds of such sale purchase (by agreement or otherwise) any fit and suitable land in the same parish or neighbourhood: Provided, That the land so purchased shall be held in trust for the purposes for which the allotment so sold as aforesaid was allotted, and for no others: And Provided, That the Inclosure Commissioners shall not sanction any such sale as aforesaid unless and until it shall be proved to their satisfaction that land more suitable for the purposes for which the allotment proposed to be sold was allotted may and will be forthwith purchased; and the proceeds of any such sale shall be paid to the Inclosure Commissioners, and shall remain in their hands until such purchase of other land as aforesaid.

"For the purpose of any such purchase of land as aforesaid "The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845," and the Acts amending the same, shall be incorporated with this Act, except the provisions relating to access to the special Act; and in construing those Acts for the purposes of this section the special Act shall be construed to mean this Act; and the promoters of the undertaking shall be construed to mean, in the case of the purchase of land for a recreation ground, the trustees of such recreation ground; and in the case of the purchase of land for field gardens, the allotment wardens of such field gardens."

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 (Reports to be made by managers of recreation grounds and field gardens) agreed to.

Clause 22 (Amendment of law as to town and village greens.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (for Mr. MACDONALD) moved, in page 18, line 7, after "mentioned," to insert—

"But no public meeting held on such village green or recreation ground shall be deemed a public nuisance under this Act."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should not like to accept these words. Some meetings might be very proper, but others might be very improper; and while he sympathized with the object of the proposal, he must have regard to the right of the public to have the enjoyment of these open spaces.

MR. DODSON thought the language of the Amendment too wide.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE believed it was a mistake to suppose that this clause would interfere with the right of public meeting.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn;

Clause agreed to.

General Amendments.

Clause 23 (Substitution of Summary Jurisdiction Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. for repealed Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30, in certain sections of the Inclosure Acts), agreed to.

Clause 24 (Extension of Sec. 105. of the Inclosure Act, 1845, as to exchanges and partitions), agreed to.

PART III.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 25 (Repeal of certain parts of the Inclosure Act, 1845, and amendment of law as to reports.)

MR. FAWCETT moved the omission of certain words in order to provide that certain commons (which he named) might be brought under the regulation clauses of the Bill, and so saved to the people for purposes of enjoyment and recreation. The commons to which he referred were situated in the neighbourhood of large towns, many of them places in which manufactures were carried on, and the populations of which therefore stood in need of as much fresh air and space for exercise as could be obtained. Under the scheme of the Inclosure Commissioners the portion of these commons proposed to be set apart for recreation grounds was altogether inadequate. To inclose many of the commons, which were very small, would be of no real advantage to anybody, to leave them open under the regulation clauses would prove an immense boon to the teeming populations resident in their neighbourhood. If the old law was inadequate to prevent the public being wrongfully dispossessed of privileges of great value to them, and did not give proper security against wrongful inclosures and for ample reservations in favour of the poor, was it, he asked, unreasonable that the commons he had referred to should be rendered subject to the operation of the present Bill? If he was told in reply that Provisional Orders had been made for them on the Report of the Commissioners, he would ask what became of the control of that House with respect to any inclosures for which Provisional Orders had been given? Under all the circumstances, he hoped some alteration would be made in the Bill with regard to the commons to which he alluded.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that technically speaking, the retention or omission of the words referred to in the Amendment of the hon. Member would, as he had been advised, make little difference so far as the operation of the clause was concerned, but the point raised—namely, What was to become of those inclosure schemes which had already passed through the ordeal of the Inclosure Commissioners?—was one of considerable importance. Certain schemes had been passed by the Inclosure Commissioners, and a certain amount of expense—about £700 he understood—had been incurred by the parties interested in those schemes, giving an average of a little more than £30 in each case. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that the awards of the Inclosure Commissioners were of no avail until they were confirmed by Parliament. Of late years Inclosure Bills had been introduced, but very few indeed, if any, had passed. He had been in communication with the Inclosure Commissioners on the subject, and the result of his consideration of the matter was this—he would submit a clause on the Report authorizing the Secretary of State to send schemes, Provisional Orders, or whatever they might be called, to a small Committee consisting of one of the Inclosure Commissioners and other Gentlemen selected by him to be further considered by them. On their Report the Secretary of State would form his opinion, and, if necessary, would refer the scheme back to the Commissioners to consult as to the steps to be taken under the altered circumstances of the case. Many of the schemes referred to the House, he believed, would never sanction; but there were others which he thought ought to be agreed to without further expense or delay.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was in favour of the Amendment; but he considered the statement of his right hon. Friend so satisfactory that he thought the matter might safely be left in his hands.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE was glad that the Home Secretary proposed to bring up a clause on the Report to enable him to refer back certain schemes to the Inclosure Commissioners, and he trusted that when the clause was presented it would prove sufficient for the purpose.

MR. GREGORY, with reference to the allotments made by the Commissioners which had been alluded to, pointed out that they had been acting under the Act of 1845, under which the acreage for allotments was strictly limited.

LORD HENRY SCOTT, now that the Home Secretary had undertaken to deal with the question, hoped that there would be an end to the objectionable schemes which had been too often sanctioned by the Commissioners.

MR. FAWCETT expressed his satisfaction at the offer of the Home Secretary, but declined to express a decisive opinion until he had seen the words of the clause.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 26 (Act not to apply to metropolitan commons), agreed to.

Clause 27 (A common regulated under Act not to be inclosed without sanction of Parliament), agreed to.

Definitions.

Clause 28 (Definitions) agreed to.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, after Clause 22, to insert the following clause :—

(Jurisdiction of county court in respect of illegal inclosures.)

“A county court within whose jurisdiction any Common or part of a Common is situate shall have jurisdiction to hear, in respect of such Common, any case relating to any illegal inclosure or encroachment made after the passing of this Act, or to any nuisance impeding the exercise of any right of Common arising after the passing of this Act, and to grant an injunction against such inclosure, encroachment, or nuisance, or to make an order for the removal or abatement of such inclosure, encroachment, or nuisance.

“Any person aggrieved by any injunction granted or order made or refusal to grant an injunction or make an order by a county court in pursuance of this section may, on giving security for costs to the satisfaction of the county court, appeal to the High Court of Justice in a summary manner, or by special case or otherwise, as may be prescribed by rules of court to be made by the Supreme Court of Judicature in manner provided by the seventeenth section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875.

“The appellate court may on hearing the appeal reverse, modify, or confirm the injunction or order complained of, or remit the case to the county court from which the appeal lay, with instructions to deal with the case according to the directions given by the appellate court.

“Where an appeal is lodged against the order of a county court directing the removal or abatement of any inclosure, encroachment, or nuisance, such order shall be suspended during such time as such appeal is pending.

“Nothing in this Act contained shall abridge or interfere with any existing right of abating or otherwise preventing any illegal inclosure or encroachment on any Common, or any nuisance interfering with any right of Common.

“Until rules of court are made for the purposes of this section, an appeal may be had from the decision of any county court under this section in the same manner in which an appeal from the decision of a county court may be had in a case within its ordinary jurisdiction.”

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thought the clause good as far as it went; but if the right hon. Gentleman wished to put a stop to these illegal encroachments, he must be a little bolder. These arbitrary encroachments were really confiscations. He would accept the clause, although he did not think it applied a sufficient remedy.

LORD HENRY SCOTT wished the clause had gone further, and desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he could not devise a clause which would bring all inclosures under the eye of some authority—the Inclosure Commissioners or some other body.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved, in page 3, after Clause 2, to insert the following Clause :—

(Repeal of statute called the “Provisions of Merton,” and of other statutes.)

“2a. The following statutes shall be repealed from and after the passing of this Act, viz. :—

Chapter four of the statute of the twentieth year of Henry the Third, called the ‘Provisions of Merton;’

Chapter forty-six of the statutes of King Edward, made at Westminster in his Parliament at Easter in the thirteenth year of his reign, commonly called the statute of ‘Westminster the Second;’

An Act of the third and fourth years of Edward the Sixth, chapter three, entitled ‘An Act concerning the improvement of Commons and Waste Grounds.’”

The noble Lord said, that the effect of the Statute of Merton was to give power to the lord of the manor to enclose part of the common land without having obtained the consent of the commoners thereto; but the state of things in England was entirely changed since that Act was passed, and it had indeed become obsolete. The only practical effect of the statute now was to encourage illegal inclosures. The Committee of 1865 were, he added, unanimously in favour of its abolition, which would be desirable even merely as a matter of law reform. He was aware that it had been said that the Statute of Westminster was only declaratory of the common law, but that was a position controverted by those who had made a special study of the question.

New Clause—(Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS pointed out that the statute was founded on the common law, and was afraid that its abolition, instead of being a reform, would lead to complications, inasmuch as it affected the titles by which the rights over commons were in many cases exercised. To interfere as proposed with those titles would, he thought, be a very strong proceeding, and he therefore hoped the Committee would not accept the clause.

MR. SANDFORD said, that he believed, though opinions differed on the subject, that the Statute of Merton was not an exacting, but a declaratory statute of the common law. If the statute were repealed it would probably be necessary to go further and repeal the common law also. Whilst saying this, however, he was very much in favour of limiting inclosures by lords of the manor under the Statute of Merton.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the object of repealing this statute was, if possible, to get rid of those legal proceedings which had been frequent during the past 10 years in reference to commons. Though there was very high authority (Lord Coke) for saying that the Statute of Merton was simply declaratory of the common, there were some recent decisions which looked the other way. It had been held that the Statute of Merton did not apply to right of "turbary," and, if so, it could not be simply declaratory of the common law. The statute was practically obsolete, for the lord could never show that after his inclosure there would be sufficient land left for the commoners. He believed that the statute might be repealed without interfering with any right of importance.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 79: Majority 51.

MR. RALLI moved, in page 15, after Clause 15, to insert the following clause:—

(Definition of power of Charity Commissioners in certain cases.)

"Whereas by several awards made under the authority of Inclosure Acts prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, fuel allotments for the poor have been set out and awarded, and vested in divers persons and bodies of persons as trustees of such allotments."

"And whereas under the provisions of the Inclosure Acts, 1845 to 1868, and the several Acts of Parliament and awards made thereunder, allotments for recreation grounds and field gardens have been set out and awarded to the churchwardens and overseers of parishes and other persons:

"And whereas power is claimed by the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales and by other bodies, under divers Acts of Parliament, to divert such allotments from the uses declared by Parliament respecting the same: Be it Enacted, That after the passing of this Act, notwithstanding anything in any other Act contained, it shall not be lawful (save as hereinafter mentioned) to use any such allotment, or any part thereof, for any other purpose than those declared concerning the same by the Act of Parliament and award, or either of them, under which the same has been set out: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the said Charity Commissioners, upon the written application of the trustees of any fuel allotment, and with their consent and the consent in writing of two-thirds of the persons for whose benefit the said allotment was set out, to authorise the use of such fuel allotment as a recreation ground and field gardens, or for either of those purposes, and to make an order under the provisions of "The Charitable Trusts Act, 1860," for the establishment of a scheme for the administration of such fuel allotment accordingly."

He said that the object of his clause was to preserve the fuel allotments and the allotments for recreation grounds for the purposes for which they had been set apart, or, in other words, to prevent them from being diverted from the uses declared respecting them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not see why this property should have more protection than any other especial property. It would be rather hard to tie this property up without the possibility of any interference with it by the Charity Commissioners. At the same time, he saw no particular harm which the clause would do.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the substitution of land for money to be spent in coals for distribution amongst the poor was undesirable from its demoralizing effect. It would be better that it should be devoted to recreation grounds or allotment gardens. It was also desirable to stop this land from being devoted to the building of schools.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, after Clause 27, to insert the following clause:—

(Proof of ancient rights over Town and Village Greens.)

"Whereas the strictness of proof required by law to establish a custom makes it difficult to maintain the ancient rights of the inhabitants of towns and villages over the pieces of land known as Town Greens and Village Greens, by reason that such pieces of land, being commonly unfenced, are occasionally used for recreation by other persons than inhabitants of the places in which the same lie, and also by such inhabitants themselves, for purposes other than recreation: Be it Enacted, That after the coming into operation of this Act evidence of the customary right of the inhabitants of any town, parish, vill, tithing, or hamlet to the use for purposes of recreation of any piece of land commonly known as or reputed to be the Town Green, Village Green, or recreation ground of such town, parish, vill, tithing, or hamlet, when the use thereof by such inhabitants for the purposes aforesaid has been shown during such a period as according to law constitutes user from time immemorial, shall not fail because it is proved that such piece of land has also been used for recreation by persons not being inhabitants of such town, parish, vill, tithing, or hamlet, or by some of the inhabitants thereof, for other purposes not inconsistent with such rights of recreation.

"Nothing in this section contained shall affect the exercise of any rights not inconsistent with the said rights of recreation which may lawfully be exercised by the owner or owners of the soil, or any other person or persons, upon or over any such piece of land."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS opposed the clause. He thought it was necessary to prove in such cases that there was an absolute user as of right by the inhabitants of the village.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE pointed out that as the law now stood it was practically impossible to prove the ancient rights of the inhabitants over town and village greens in the neighbourhood of large towns.

Clause negatived.

MR. GREGORY moved the following clause:—

(Power to raise money for improvement of Common.)

"A Provisional Order for the regulation of a Common may provide for the raising from time to time by such persons interested in the Common, and with such amounts as the Commissioners think fit, of money to be applied towards the improvement of such Common, either by means of rates to be levied on the persons and in respect of the property who and which respectively will be benefitted or principally benefitted by such improvement or regulation, or by means of the sale of any outlying or other small portion not exceeding in the whole one-fiftieth part of the total area of such Common, or by means of letting the pasturage of a part of the Common for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, and mortgage of such lease."

The object of the clause was for the protection of a common in North Devon known as Westward Ho.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE objected to the latter part of the clause, as the power of letting would virtually lead to the inclosure of at least a great portion of this and other commons. He moved the omission of the words—

"Letting the pasturage of a part of the Common for any term not exceeding 21 years, and mortgage of such lease."

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, there was no other means of preserving this common from the encroachments of the sea.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the words would apply to all commons, as they were general and not particular.

MR. GREGORY said, the Committee might very well leave it to the Commissioners to see that the proposal was carried out for its legitimate object.

MR. RYLANDS supported the Amendment.

MR. FAWCETT said, the proposal would infringe the main object of the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, there was no necessity for creating such a long vested right in the pasturage as 21 years. It might be let from year to year.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, that if the pasturage of Westward Ho could not be let a portion of the common must be sold to raise sufficient funds for the protection of the remainder.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought there was no necessity for a lease, and security should be taken that the land so let should not be inclosed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. WALSH moved the following clause:—

(Appointment of valuer to be confirmed by Commissioners.)

"An appointment of a valuer after the passing of this Act shall not be valid until it has been confirmed by the Commissioners. The Commissioners may disapprove of a valuer on the ground of his incompetency, interest, want of impartiality, or any reasonable cause, and where they so disapprove of a valuer may call a meeting, and a meeting may be held to appoint, and another person appointed (subject to the approval of the Commissioners) to be valuer in like manner as if no previous meeting had been held, and no valuer had been previously appointed, and so on until a valuer approved by the Commissioners is appointed."

The ground upon which he moved the clause was, that a man appointed valuer, might be incompetent or interested, and in other respects not the proper person to appoint.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved the following clause:—

"The unlawful inclosure of any Common or part of a Common shall, after the passing of this Act, be deemed to be a public nuisance."

The hon. and learned Member said, he did not propose in this Amendment to trench upon the rights of property. That was out of the question. He wished only to interfere with unlawful inclosures, and that he believed was the object which the Home Secretary had in view. When a party came to Parliament and got a power to inclose a common, Parliament protected him; and he thought, with regard to uninclosed commons, the same legal right of protection should be given to the poor, and any invasion of it should be regarded as an illegal act against the public rights, and one which the public had a right to resist. But the poor were not in circumstances to bring an action in a Court of Law to defend their right, and the Parliament should therefore protect them, so that the party illegally inclosing should be compelled to remove the nuisance. The evil of the present state of things was that there were encroachments being made, not under the Statute of Merton, nor under any Common Law right, but by force of the strong arm, or rather the strong purse, of the person either encroaching on or inclosing a common, trusting that those who had a right to resist him would not be powerful enough to do so. He approved of the course which the Home Secretary had adopted with regard to encroachments on village greens, and he only wanted him to take the same course with reference to commons. The effect of the clause which he proposed would be to give a larger locus standi to resist unlawful inclosures—that was, instead of giving it to a few commoners, who might be poor, they would give it to the public at large. The result of making it a public nuisance to unlawfully obstruct or inclose a common would be that any one might abate it, and then the person who put up the obstruction or inclosed the common must prove his title. By adopting this clause the Committee would recognize in the public some right in the commons, and if they were not prepared to make that admission, then the Bill would be of no use at all. He believed the time had come when they ought to recognize that there was a public advantage in these commons which the public had a right to protect. Mr. Augustus Smith, whom he regarded as a public benefactor, prevented the inclosure of a beautiful common by pulling down the railings which had been erected; but he happened to be a commoner, and therefore had a locus standi, which enabled him to act. In like manner, the Corporation of London, having a locus standi, were able to preserve Epping Forest for the public; but they ought not to allow the prevention of a public wrong to depend on the accident of a wealthy person or body having a locus standi. He believed the Home Secretary was as anxious as any one could be to prevent unlawful inclosures; and he hoped, therefore, that he would accept the clause either in its present or in any other form that would effect that object.

New Clause—(Sir W. Vernon Harcourt,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not think the hon. and learned Member quite saw the effect of his own clause. He said he did not want to trench on any rights, but the effect of the clause would be to do so. There was a very great distinction between a village green or a highway and a common. A village green was clear and defined; everybody knew what it was, and nobody had a right to encroach on or inclose it. Therefore, any inclosure of it was practically unlawful. So, again, in the case of the Queen's highway. No one had a right to inclose it, and any obstruction of it would be a public nuisance, which any one would have a right to abate. But in the case of commons it was admitted that there were persons who had a right, under certain conditions, to inclose them. Suppose the lord of the manor, with the consent of the commoners, proceeded to make an inclosure, which he had a perfect right to do, it was clear, if this clause were adopted, that any one who said this was an unlawful inclosure would have a right to indict him for a public nuisance. That appeared to him (Mr. Assheton Cross) to trench on the rights of property. Again, though the lord and commoners had legally inclosed, if they afterwards wished to sell any portion of the common they would never be able to make out a title, for 30 years after the inclosure some one could come forward and say it was a nuisance, and abate it. If that was not trenching on private rights, he did not know what was. If the clause said that the inclosure of a common, when it was proved to be unlawful, was a nuisance, he would not object to it; but he could not accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Member in the form in which it now stood before the Committee.

SIR HENRY JAMES pointed out that if a nuisance were erected on what was called a village green the first thing to be determined would be what the limits of the village green were, and therefore the very same question would be raised as in the case of the unlawful inclosure of a common. The suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman to apply the clause to cases where common had been declared to be unlawfully inclosed would be of no advantage whatever, because the tribunal having declared the inclosure unlawful it would, of course, be abated. His hon. and learned Friend's Amendment stood on the foundation that the inclosure was unlawful. The objection that a man might be indicted for an inclosure which was subsequently found to be lawful applied to every case of an indictment being brought against an innocent man. The clause simply amounted to this, that whereas at present a commoner could abate an inclosure if it were unlawful, the clause, if adopted, would give that power to the inhabitants generally.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the village greens referred to in the Bill were only those greens or recreation grounds which had an old and defined boundary. The inclosure of such a green would be unlawful, and he saw no reason why such an act should not be treated as a public nuisance. To say, however, that any one who considered the inclosure of a particular common a nuisance would have a right to throw the inclosure down and abate it would be to leave the owner, although he had acted legally, practically without a remedy, for he could only proceed by an action at law against those who had thrown down the inclosure, who, in all probability, would be unable to satisfy his claim for damages. It would also be objectionable that a man, if he had unlawfully inclosed a common, should be liable after the lapse of 60 years to be proceeded against by indictment. No lapse of time would, under such circumstances, give him a title to the property. The law at present gave lords of manors and commoners a right to inclose under certain conditions; but the effect of this clause, if it was agreed to, would be far too stringent on the owners of property, whose rights the Bill set out by declaring them to be preserved.

MR. SANDFORD said, the clause would only apply to the owners of property who had illegally inclosed commons, not to those by whom they had been legally inclosed. Lords of the manor or others would be deterred from making illegal inclosures, by the knowledge that they forbade them, and provided a direct means of preventing them. He thought that principle ought to be adopted not only with reference to individual instances, but on the grounds of public policy, and the clause would really be one of the most valuable in the Bill if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was adopted.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Amendment simply gave the public the power of calling upon lords of manors to show their right to inclose. The Bill had in some respects gone in that direction; and this Amendment, while it would not interfere with any existing right, would certainly prevent illegal inclosures.

MR. FAWCETT said, if the Amendment was not adopted the Bill would leave untouched the greatest evils of the present law. They all knew cases in which village greens and commons had been gradually filched from the public; but if this Amendment were agreed to it would give the public a right to reclaim such illegal appropriations without regard to the lapse of time. If that right were not given, when the Bill came to be examined by those outside who were interested in the matter it would be pronounced to be worthless.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had as much respect for the rights of property as either the Home Secretary or the Attorney General, and the Amendment did not trench upon these rights in the slightest. One of the arguments of the Attorney General against the Amendment was that it would prevent the legalization of illegal inclosures after the lapse of time—say 30 years. That was just what he and those who agreed with him wanted to do. The Bill for lords of manors was an admirable one, and that was no doubt the reason why it appeared to give such satisfaction to the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) who was the greatest incloser in the country. They might be defeated on a division; but at the last moment and at the last stage of the Bill he felt that they were bound to enter a protest against the power to make illegal inclosures, which would be left untouched by the Bill.

MR. LOPES opposed the clause as giving an entirely new remedy, and as being an invasion of existing rights of property.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 64: Majority 34.

MR. KNIGHT stated that he had never made an illegal inclosure.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE (for Lord HENRY SCOTT) moved in the Preamble, page 2, line 4, to leave out after "commons" to "interests," in line 6, and insert—

"And that inclosures of Commons should not be hereinafter made unless it can be proved to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners and of Parliament, that such inclosure will be of benefit to the neighbourhood as well as to private interests, and to those who are legally interested in any such Commons."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to the Amendment, but he suggested that words should be inserted stating that a preference should be given to regulations over inclosure schemes.

Mr. Fawcett

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought this would be an improvement.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

MR. FAWCETT moved in page 2, line 16, after "whereas," to insert—

"It is no longer expedient, as recited by 'The General Inclosure Act, 1845,' to facilitate the inclosure of Commons, but."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS expressed his belief that the Amendment just agreed to would meet all the purposes they had in view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday 19th June, and to be printed. [Bill 184.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK CORNER.

RESOLUTION.

MR. C. B. DENISON, in rising to move—

"That the annually increasing congestion of traffic in the approaches to Hyde Park Corner has become the source of hindrance, annoyance, and danger to the public, and merits the early attention of this House," said, the importance of the matter was so great that he was justified in bringing it before the House by a direct Motion rather than leave it to be discussed on the Vote for the Public Parks in Committee. The question had been considered by the late Government, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adam) prepared a plan. Last year, also, a Vote on Account was taken for a scheme of the present Chief Commissioner of Works, but this scheme had been withdrawn, and another substituted, which was open for inspection at the Office of Works. Meanwhile the evil was a great and growing one. If the House took the line of traffic from east to west—from Charing Cross to Kensington—a distance of 2½ miles in a straight line, they would find that there was practically only one cross-over road for every species of traffic. It was much the same as though the Thames flowed for that distance and there was only one bridge at Hyde Park Corner to accommodate the traffic from north to south. In all Europe there was no other capital in which the great arteries of traffic were so intercepted. The result was great delay to people having urgent business, and at times risk of injury to life and limb. The public were naturally jealous of any curtailment of the Parks, and he would be the last man in the country to propose anything of the sort; but the advantage to the public would be so great by the sacrifice of a small portion of the corner of the Green Park which abutted upon Hyde Park Corner as to utterly outweigh any sentimental objection. That would give a sensible relief to the great bulk of the traffic now existing, and it would require a very trifling outlay of money. Several plans to effect the object so much desired had been suggested. One plan was to throw open Constitution Hill to the general public, but that did not meet with favour, for reasons which remained now in their full force. Another was to make a road from Hamilton Place to Grosvenor Place by means of a partial tunnel, and that that did not meet with favour nobody was surprised. That plan was followed by a plan of the late Chief Commissioner (Mr. Adam) for diverting Constitution Hill roadway, thereby isolating the Archway and bringing Piccadilly by a sweeping curve down into Grosvenor Place. This plan also failed to meet with favour. The present First Commissioner had also his plan, which was to pass under Grosvenor Place by an archway, but there were engineering difficulties in the way, and that had to be abandoned. The latest plan was one, as he understood it, carrying further inland, so to speak, from Grosvenor Place the present Constitution Hill road by a curve, and then passing over Constitution Hill a new road from Hamilton Place down to Halkin Street West. This plan would involve the placing of gateways or arches both in Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, and would, he feared, be very inconvenient. Of course, every plan would be sure to meet with objections—first, on æsthetic grounds; next, on the score of expense; and, lastly, from its interference with the Royal road by Constitution Hill and with the Archway and the Wellington Statue. The question, however, was the most practicable mode of preventing the present great obstruction of traffic. His own idea was that it would be far better to draw a boundary line from Hamilton Place down to Halkin Street West, making that boundary the Green Park and throwing open the intervening space into an ornamental Platz, intersected by the necessary roadways. At any rate, it was a question for the consideration of the House, and he hoped that no plan would be carried out which had not been so considered and discussed in the House. The new plan of his noble Friend would simply give two roads running at right angles into the main road at a very short distance from each other. Such a plan would give no sensible relief to the traffic. He believed there was no satisfactory mode of remedying the evil except that of throwing open this corner of the Green Park as an open space and leaving it afterwards to be dealt with in the matter of roads and cross-roads as the traffic might from time to time require. As to the subsidiary questions of gradients, levels, and the like, he need not detain the House except to say that no possible gradient in these arrangements could be steeper than the one running by St. George's Hospital down Grosvenor Place; and the distance from any point being about the same the gradients would not materially differ.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the annually increasing congestion of traffic in the approaches to Hyde Park Corner has become the source of hindrance, annoyance, and danger to the public, and merits the early attention of this House,"—(Mr. Christopher Beckett Denison,)

—instead thereof.

MR. ADAM said, he was in office so short a time as First Commissioner that he had no opportunity of maturing the plans he had in contemplation. There was no doubt that something required to be done in the direction intimated by the Motion. The block of traffic during the season at Hyde Park Corner was a spectacle which no other capital in Europe could show. Seven different streams of traffic seemed to meet at this point—one from Hamilton Place, two flowing east and west along Piccadilly, two flowing to and from Belgravia and Victoria Station, and two streams flowing out of and into the Park; and this without taking into account the carriages which passed from the Park into Constitution Hill. The difficulty, however, was how this immense traffic was to be relieved. Several plans had been submitted and considered, but none had yet been adopted. While he was in office a scheme was prepared by the Metropolitan Board which involved the throwing open of Constitution Hill to light traffic. The Government, however, were of opinion that this scheme interfered with the Park for pedestrian purposes, and it was consequently abandoned. His opinion was that no scheme which would curtail the privileges of pedestrians in the Park ought to be adopted. The Parks were primarily designed for pedestrians, and not for equestrians or people in carriages, and ought to be maintained in the interests of the former. To his mind the scheme which would commend itself most to public favour would be one which would interfere as little as possible with the use of the Park for pedestrians. Another scheme proposed to turn Piccadilly a little before it came to the Wellington Archway, leaving this Archway standing in the open, like the Arc de Triomphe in Paris. But the arch would, in this case, be isolated and useless, and the question would soon inevitably arise—"Why leave it there at all?" He had suggested a small palliative measure. There was at present an unnecessarily broad foot pavement on the Piccadilly side of the Archway and a little garden in front of the Archway. He proposed that this pavement should be thrown into the roadway and the foot pavement put where the garden now stood. One great advantage his proposal would have would be that it could be carried out within the space of three or four weeks. The model of the plan proposed by the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works had not been seen by many hon. Members. He had had an opportunity of inspecting it, and he objected to the plan because it would cut across a corner of the Park and would interfere with the enjoyment by pedestrians of the Park. It was also open to the great objection that if it were carried out one road would cross another road on the level. Each scheme proposed was no doubt attended with difficulties; but he believed the best solution of them all would be the removal and throwing back to the extent of 50 feet or 60 feet of the Archway surmounted by the equestrian figure of the Duke of Wellington to a position across the entrance to Constitution Hill. That would not in any way interfere with the space available for the public in the Park. The only objection to that plan would be the expense, but that could be got over. The suggestion, at all events, was well worthy of consideration.

SIR JAMES HOGG observed, that the Board of Works had given much consideration to the question before the House, and, speaking for himself, he must say he regretted that the Government of the day had not seen their way to carrying out the plan which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adam) had submitted to them. He had not seen the model of the plan proposed by his noble Friend, and could, therefore, give no opinion in reference to it; but this he must say—that some remedy must be found, and speedily, for the great inconvenience which now arose from the constant block of traffic at Hyde Park Corner.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he gave a cheerful and willing assent to the statement of his hon. Friend's Resolution—that the increasing congestion of traffic at Hyde Park Corner had become an annoyance and a grievance, and he could assure the House that he had given a great deal of time to the elaborating of a scheme for the remedying of that grievance. He did not consider that any plan which had been proposed could be regarded as perfect in all its details. All he could do was to recommend one which he believed would be attended with the fewest objections and the greatest benefits. There was always a great objection to throwing any of the Royal Parks into the roadway, and to do what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adam) proposed would not only take off some of the Green Park, but make Constitution Hill a zig-zag for persons going across Piccadilly into Hyde Park. Neither of the plans which he had heard from his hon. Friend (Mr. Denison) would meet with his sanction. His hon. Friend had not seen the model of the plan now proposed; if he had, he believed his hon. Friend would have said that it fairly met the difficulties of the case. If his hon. Friend had seen his (Lord Henry Lennox's) model, he would have perceived that if he made a road across the Green Park, from Hamilton Place to Grosvenor Place, he would have intersected the line of traffic from east to west by one coming down from the north. The road which he proposed to lay down, however, would do nothing of the kind. It would be 40 feet wide, and would be wide enough to hold four distinct lines of carriages—two going north, and two south. The road would be trumpet-mouthed at both ends. It would be from 76 feet to 100 feet wide in Piccadilly, and the heavy traffic coming from the Midland and Great Northern Railway Stations, and from the east and north-east, would come down Piccadilly, and instead of joining with the traffic coming down from Hamilton Place from the north, it would turn off by the trumpet-mouthed road across the Green Park, and run down Grosvenor Place to the Victoria Station of the London and Brighton and London, Chatham, and Dover Railways. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adam) said he had seen the model, and that he objected to the scheme, because it required embankments and cuttings; but, in point of fact, the scheme did not include either embankments or cuttings. He also said there would be a great pressure of traffic crossing this road across Constitution Hill, in the same way that there was now from Grosvenor Place to Hyde Park across Piccadilly. The traffic, however, across Constitution Hill, as now regulated, did not amount to one-twentieth or even one-thirtieth the traffic which now ran along Piccadilly and met the traffic into Hyde Park. There would be gates, and there would be no more stoppage for traffic than existed all over London wherever two lines of thoroughfare met. Whenever the Royal carriages were seen coming either way, the gates would be closed for a few seconds, and then the traffic would be resumed. If the hon. Gentleman who said he (Lord Henry Lennox) had never given the reasons for abandoning his former scheme would refer to the answer he gave early in the Session, he would find that he gave up his scheme on account of certain engineering difficulties in the gradients, which made it impossible to make a satisfactory job of it, and that he stated it was better to acknowledge an administrative failure than to carry out a plan which he was convinced, after a close examination, would not be satisfactory to the public. Among other engineering difficulties there would be a serious injury to the houses in Grosvenor Place, belonging to the Duke of Westminster. Constitution Hill must necessarily have been raised to such a height as to make a very steep embankment in front of those houses, thereby seriously prejudicing the light and comfort of the ground stories, if not partially of the first stories also. His hon. Friend knew that he could not carry out this scheme without asking for a Vote of money. He was not, however, asking for a Vote to-night for that purpose. After what happened last year his hon. Friend might feel satisfied he would not ride any hobby of his own to death, or carry out any road in which there might be serious difficulties without bringing it under the notice of the House. Even after that had been done, if he found that there were difficulties in the way, the course he had taken with regard to his plan of last year might teach his hon. Friend that he was not likely to force his own opinion in favour of a scheme which would be unsatisfactory to the public. The matter had given him great and constant anxiety, and he had looked into it very closely. He had examined the scheme of his right hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam), and found that it would increase the difficulty. It would widen Piccadilly, which was not what they wanted. It would only widen the road to the extent of one line of carriages down Grosvenor Place, and would leave the narrow neck of the bottle almost untouched. He felt himself, therefore, unable to counsel the adoption of that scheme. He could assure his hon. Friend that every facility should be given to him to examine the model, and to express his views upon the plan when the Estimate for it was brought forward; and, in the meanwhile, he should be grateful for any assistance which his hon. Friend or his right hon. Friend opposite would give him in regard to this matter. He might mention in favour of his own scheme that the Inspector of Police who was responsible for the safety of the public at Hyde Park Corner and Grosvenor Place had inspected his plan, and had reported that the relief which it would give to the heavy traffic would be enormous, and that, in his opinion, it would be the only reasonable solution of the difficulty.

MR. C. B. DENISON said, that after what had been stated by the noble Lord he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing on this question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

(1.) £26,303, to complete the sum for Royal Palace.

(2.) £95,105, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

MR. RITCHIE stated, with reference to the charges which had been brought against the management of Victoria Park, that he had been in communication with his constituents on the subject, and he had every reason to believe that the charges were totally unfounded. He would be glad to hear if any further communication had been received on the subject from the inhabitants. In the name of his constituents he begged to thank the First Commissioner of Works for the great facilities he had afforded for recreation in Victoria Park, especially in the matter of the extension of the hours for bathing in the lake and the promotion of the game of cricket.

MR. ADAM inquired whether it was intended to abandon the Vote for lectures to gardeners sanctioned by the Treasury upon the recommendation of Dr. Hooker?

MR. C. B. DENISON asked what had become of the amount of £5,000 voted for a new road across the Green Park?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had much pleasure in informing his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), that he had received a memorial expressing regret that an anonymous attack should have been made upon the superintendent of Victoria Park, and pointing out that even if the charges could have been substantiated, they would not have been worthy of attention. He had also received numerous letters, all testifying to the fact that perfect satisfaction was felt by the respectable portion of the inhabitants of the East End of London with the present management of Victoria Park. In answer to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adam), he had to state that the lectures to gardeners were not to be discontinued; and as to the Green Park, he must explain that on finding his plan of last year impracticable, he had surrendered the supplemental sum of £5,000 to the Treasury. It would, therefore, be necessary for him to ask for a Vote for the new scheme.

MR. ADAM said, that some of the mounds in Hyde Park had been removed, and expressed a hope that the rest would be taken away, and the ground laid down with grass.

MR. MELLOR hoped the noble Lord would let the mounds remain. He had been at some trouble to know where they were, and on having them pointed out, found they were of a decorative character, and as the expense of placing them in the Park had been incurred, he trusted the noble Lord would spend no money in removing them.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £112,938, to complete the sum for Public Buildings.

MR. RAMSAY took occasion to object to the item of £3,400 for the maintenance and repair of the structure of the prison at Broadmoor, which, he said, was a comparatively new building.

MR. C. B. DENISON said, that upwards of £8,000 was asked for the Probate Court and Registries, and this required some explanation. There were serious complaints about the proposed removal of the documents from the local registries to London; and he wished to know whether it was intended to bring all these records to London?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that a departmental Committee had been appointed to inquire into the whole question of the expenditure on Broadmoor, and that he had thought it right that certain works which it was proposed to carry on in connection with it should be put a stop to, until the result of that inquiry had been ascertained. Broadmoor was under the control of a peculiarly constituted Board, composed of gentlemen of the highest standing, who took a great interest in it, and who, he felt satisfied, did their utmost to maintain it in a state of efficiency at as cheap a rate as possible.

MR. RAMSAY said, it was far from his intention to impugn the conduct of those by whom the affairs of Broadmoor were administered; but he could not help thinking that the sum asked for the ordinary maintenance of the building was excessive.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to ask his noble Friend, whether the scheme which had been entertained for a number of years for re-building the public offices, on a scale befitting their dignity, on the plot of ground lying between the present Foreign Office and Great George Street had been, as stated in the newspapers, abandoned; and, if so, for what reason?

MR. W. H. SMITH informed the hon. Member (Mr. Denison) that the sum asked for was to be spent upon district registries, and not for any building in London. The Vote had nothing to do with the removal of the records to London.

MR. C. B. DENISON asked for information as to the £1,500 required for the restoration of St. Peter's Chapel in the Tower of London.

LORD HENRY LENNOX observed, that the scheme for the concentration of the public offices involved an expenditure of £3,000,000, and it was not for him—not having a seat in the Cabinet—to state the reasons which had led to its abandonment. The hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) should rather address his question to his right hon. Friend sitting near him, who, he had no doubt, would be able to give a satisfactory answer. He could only assure him there was nothing in the scheme which commended itself less to his notice now than it did before, as one that would lead to the ornamentation of London and the convenience of the Public Offices. With reference to the question of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. C. B. Denison), he would say that St. Peter's Chapel in the Tower had fallen into a very disgraceful state for want of repair. Under the chancel was buried Queen Ann Boleyn, and the chapel contained other monuments of great interest. Having opened the Tower of London two days in the week free to the public—a movement which had been deeply appreciated—he thought it would be well that St. Peter's Chapel should be added to the other interesting monuments to which the public were now admitted.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE would avail himself of the hint given by his noble Friend and ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the scheme for the concentration of the Public Offices had been definitively abandoned or only postponed, and whether there was any chance of their being a large scheme for placing the Public Offices upon any other site?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER could not say that the decision of this question proceeded upon grounds which would lead to the definitive abandonment of the scheme. These grounds had reference mainly to the circumstances of the present times, and to the fact that we had a very large and important amount of building on our hands. There were the Courts of Justice, the Natural History Museum, and other buildings which it was necessary to proceed with, while the work that would have had to be done in connection with the concentration of the Public Offices would have cost a very large sum of money even immediately, and would have involved considerable expense prospectively; and from circumstances he need not detail it was not convenient to undertake at the present moment that charge in addition to our national burdens. But he was fully convinced that it was desirable, in the interests of the public service, that they should, as they could, proceed with the concentration of the Public Offices. That object had been kept in view for a great number of years by successive Governments, and from time to time steps had been taken in that direction. One large block within a year or two had been completed, and was now occupied by the public Departments; and he hoped it would be in their power by-and-by to proceed with the work. By placing the Public Offices on the site referred to, they might hope to be able to save a good deal in the shape of rents for offices now scattered over different localities. But it would not have been wise in the circumstances of the present year to proceed with the scheme, although he could say the subject was one they had much at heart. He might add that one or two small portions of the site had been purchased.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £13,440, to complete the sum for Furniture of Public Offices.

(5.) £25,569, to complete the sum for Houses of Parliament.

(6.) £4,360, to complete the sum for the new Home and Colonial Offices.

MR. ADAM observed, that those Offices still remained unfinished, and he wished to know whether the ornamentation originally designed would be carried out?

MR. C. B. DENISON asked, whether it was true that the drainage of these new Offices was in a highly unsatisfactory state? It had been publicly asserted that owing to some carelessness on the part of the builder or architect there had been no communication made between the drains in those buildings and the main sewer, and that our public officials had in consequence been subjected to an unwholesome atmosphere prejudicial to their health. He wished to know who was responsible for this state of things if it existed?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, it was not the present, but the late Government, which was responsible for the corners of the offices referred to being deprived of cupolas. Since he had been in office Sir Gilbert Scott had suggested another way of treating the corners, but the suggestion was not one he approved. However, he laid the scheme before Her Majesty's Government, and it was now under consideration. The drainage of the Home and Colonial Offices had been found on one or two occasions to be in a very deficient state; and, of course, the person responsible was the man who designed and under whom the contractors built—namely, Sir Gilbert Scott. His (Lord Henry Lennox's) attention was called to the matter, and in an incredibly short time the evil was remedied, as far as possible, and since he received the expression of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's gratitude he had heard nothing more on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £9,506, to complete the sum for Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. RAMSAY said, he observed the greater part of the money asked for was in respect to the new Sheriff Court buildings, and that it had in point of fact, been expended. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, having reference to the Sheriff Courts Bill, which was now before the House, should have advised the Chancellor of the Exchequer to withhold this Vote altogether for the present. There could be no doubt that the Scottish judicial system and the Scottish judicial staff as a whole must come under the consideration of the Home Secretary at an early period. They had about 80 sheriffs and sheriffs-depute in Scotland; but he really could not understand what justification there could be for a grant of public money to erect a new Court House at such a place as Fort William, where the whole sum under litigation during the year was not equal to the interest of the sum of money the public were going to pay. His own opinion was that they might reduce the number of Judges in Scotland in those Courts by one-half, and, with great advantage to the community, get the business done as it was done elsewhere, by the Sheriff going about from place to place. As he observed the Lord Advocate in his place, he did trust that the right hon. Gentleman would concur with him in these observations, and that he would advise the discontinuance of such Votes for such places and for such purposes. It was simply a waste of the public and the ratepayers' money, and of the energies of the officers that were employed in those Courts. He saw that certain sums of money had already been voted, or he would have asked for a discontinuance of these Votes altogether. Under the circumstances, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would take care that he did not lend his sanction to Votes of this character in future, or if he (Mr. Ramsay) had the honour of a seat in that House, he should certainly take the sense of the House against voting such sums of money.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £2,084, to complete the sum for National Gallery Enlargement.

In reply to Mr. ADAM,

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the new National Gallery had been finished and handed over to the Office of Works. He could not say when it would be opened to the public, as that depended on the Trustees, who were at present engaged in re-arranging the pictures.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £143,718, to complete the sum for Post Office and Inland Revenue Buildings.

(10.) £11,573, to complete the sum for British Museum Buildings.

(11.) £46,050, to complete the sum for County Courts Buildings.

(12.) £4,043, to complete the sum for Science and Art Department Buildings.

(13.) £105,500, to complete the sum for the Surveys of the United Kingdom.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT asked whether the survey had been going on satisfactorily, and whether the Government were using their best endeavours to advance it? In his own county a certain portion of the survey had been completed two years ago, and they had not any maps yet. He was told that a certain number of persons had been discharged, and that as little expense as possible was being incurred. This was a matter in which all were exceedingly interested, and the great object was that the survey should be carried on as rapidly and finished as soon as possible.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the survey was progressing very favourably, and every exertion was being made that the means placed at the disposal of the Government would allow. It was quite true that some men had been discharged, but that was owing to the natural wish expressed by the Treasury that they should not have Supplementary Votes this year. His hon. and gallant Friend would understand that he felt a delicacy in pushing on maps of a district with which he was connected, lest other parts of the country should charge him with partiality. The maps, however, were being pushed on, and he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that there was no one who had more at heart the rapid progress of the survey than he had.

MR. DODSON said, he did not think the noble Lord had answered the question whether the Government were doing their best to advance the survey.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he understood the answer of his noble Friend to be that the progress was satisfactory to himself and the Government. No doubt if a larger sum were placed at the disposal of the First Commissioner the advance would be greater and more rapid; but it was not thought right to spend more than £130,000 in the course of the year on the matter. It was hoped that the surveys would be completed within the next 13 or 14 years.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £7,405, to complete the sum for Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade.

(15.) £7,500, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Fire Brigade.

(16.) £194,991, to complete the sum for Rates on Government Property.

(17.) £951, to complete the sum for the Wellington Monument.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE trusted that at last some satisfactory assurance would be given that a positive date had been fixed for the completion of this monument?

LORD HENRY LENNOX reminded the hon. Member that at the time he came into office this monument had been in hand for upwards of 23 years, during which period little or no progress had been made towards its completion, while great doubt had been entertained whether even when finished it would be successful. Since the death of Mr. Stevens the castings had gone on with great rapidity, and several portions of the monument had been exhibited in the sculpture gallery, and no dissentient voice had been raised against the extreme merit possessed by the work. The work was rapidly approaching completion, and he hoped the country would have an opportunity of judging before long whether the monument would be one worthy of the country and of the illustrious man in whose honour it was being erected. He understood that the work would be completed before the end of the present financial year.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £65,000, to complete the sum for the Natural History Museum.

In reply to MR. ADAM and MR. BERESFORD HOPE, who trusted that Mr.

Ayrton's proposed mutilation of the building by razing the towers and cupolas would not be carried out.

LORD HENRY LENNOX stated that the Government had the contractor's assurance that the building would be completed by the 1st of November, 1877, and that it was under his consideration whether it was advisable to restore to the proposed elevation the ornamental features which the late Government had directed to be struck out.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £4,644, to complete the sum for Metropolitan Police Courts.

In reply to Mr. ADAM,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the site in Castle Street fixed upon for the erection of the new Bow Street Police Court and station had been given up on account of its great inconvenience, and arrangements had been practically concluded with the Duke of Bedford for a site for both in Bow Street, and a Bill would shortly be introduced for carrying it into effect.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) £65,325, to complete the sum for New Courts of Justices and Offices.

SIR HENRY JAMES called attention to the fact that £933,000 had already been expended in purchasing the site of the New Courts of Justice, which at 4 per cent interest represented £37,000 a-year lying useless. £148,000 had been expended, and as £826,000 was to be expended, and they were progressing at the rate of £80,000 a-year, it would take 10 years before the whole sum was spent and the buildings completed. He wished to know whether it was true that the contractors were confined to the expenditure of only £80,000 a-year?

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT asked for an explanation of the item of rates and taxes which were paid in respect of the site of the New Courts of Justice.

MR. MELLOR called attention to the sum of 15 per cent being charged for architect's fees.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the Government were not satisfied with the progress which had been made in the building of the New Law Courts. Everything had been done that could be done to urge the contractors to a completion of the work. Mr. Street, the architect, had been unceasing in his appeals to them in their own interest—for if they failed in their contract they would have to pay a very heavy penalty—to proceed more vigorously with the work. Mr. Street had reported to the Office of Works quite recently that the contractors had not been employing a sufficient number of men to carry on the work according to the terms of their contract. In the month of May they had expended only a sixth of the money that had been voted for the building. Only two years and a quarter remained to them to finish the eastern portion of the building, and only four years and a quarter to finish the whole building. The building ought to be completed in seven years from the time when the work was commenced. Unless the contractors exhibited much more vigour and employed more men than they did at present, he could hold out very little hope to the hon. and learned Gentleman that the building would be completed within the four and a-half years that had yet to run.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, it was currently rumoured that no provision was made for the Court of Appeal in the new building, and that Court would have to sit in the Chancellor's Court in Lincoln's Inn. He hoped that rumour was not correct. Such a course would be very inconvenient to the Court itself, to the Profession, and to the public. He hoped that some assurance would be given that provision would be made for the Court of Appeal in the building.

MR. RYLANDS said, it appeared from what had been stated by the noble Lord that there was little chance of the Courts being completed within the time contracted for. If not, he should like to know if the Government intended to press for the penalties for non-completion? He should also like to know how it was that £11,000 had been paid to the architect for commission?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Act of Parliament under which the site of the new buildings was acquired provided that certain rates and taxes which were chargeable in respect of the property that was cleared away from the site should continue to be paid, and they had been paid from the moment the Government acquired the site. No more had been paid to the architect for the preparation of ^{the} and drawings than the agreement provided for. That agreement was made by the preceding Government, and it had been most strictly complied with. Mr. Street had not asked for and certainly had not received a single farthing more than he was entitled to. He might state, on behalf of the Treasury, that the greatest possible dissatisfaction had been expressed at the very slow progress which had been made with those buildings. Although £80,000 was taken in the present year's Estimates, the smallness of the sum was due to the hopelessness of their getting more of the work done than would be covered by that amount of expenditure. Remembering that the money voted in past years had been surrendered, he thought it would have been simply deceiving the Committee to have made a larger provision than there was a reasonable prospect of expending. But the Treasury had intimated to his noble Friend that if the contractors would advance faster with the work there would be no difficulty in providing the money required for its execution.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that although no blame attached to the Government, the result was most unsatisfactory and very injurious to the country. Everything that was possible ought to be done to compel the contractors to complete the buildings. The penalties to which they were liable ought to be enforced against them; and, if necessary, the work should be taken from them and put into other hands.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd), observed that Mr. Street's original designs included no salon or hall for the Court of Appeal, because, at the time when the drawings were made and accepted by the Government of the day, the new Court of Appeal was not in existence. His attention had been called to the matter last year; and, no doubt, when the work had progressed a little further, the Lord Chancellor would communicate with him, and proper provision would be made for the Court of Appeal if it was necessary or expedient to place it there. At the same time, Lincoln's Inn, the present site of the Court of Appeal, was, he believed, in every way satisfactory to those who practised in that tribunal.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD regretted very much that he had failed to get a satisfactory reply to his question. He could not believe that if, owing to any course whatever, provision had not been made for the Court of Appeal, it was too late to make it now; and he thought also that the Government should take steps to press on the construction of the buildings.

MR. W. H. SMITH remarked that the designs for the New Courts of Justice were settled before the new Court of Appeal was dreamt of, and to attempt now to interpolate the Court of Appeal into a contract which was not being carried out in a satisfactory manner would be to afford the contractors a very good excuse for not completing the work in time, and also take from the Government the power of enforcing against the contractors the penalties to which the latter were liable, penalties which it was their intention to enforce as far as possible.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £1,951, to complete the sum for Ramsgate Harbour.

(22.) £2,100, to complete the sum for New Palace at Westminster, Acquisition of Lands and Embankment.

MR. C. B. DENISON asked his noble Friend for information as to the probable time when these works would be completed, and what was to be done with the land after the completion of the Embankment?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the Embankment had been completed, and the present Vote was merely required for railings and for laying out the ground. It was not intended to place anything on the Embankment until a general plan had been arranged with regard to the concentration of Government buildings.

Vote agreed to.

(23.) £12,960, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.

(24.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £37,330, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the British Embassy Houses, Consular and Legation Buildings, &c. in China and Japan, Constantinople, Therapia, Madrid, Paris, Teheran, Vienna, and Washington."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF complained that proper houses had not been provided at Berlin and Rome; and also that some of these Embassy houses were managed by the Chief Commissioner of Works and some by the Foreign Office.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the present arrangement had been determined by the Treasury in order that the whole of the Votes might appear under one head; and added that suitable houses at Berlin and Rome had been applied for, and that the subject was under the consideration of the Government.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the Estimates under this head were in a most unsatisfactory state, and that there was a great deal of looseness in the drawing up of the Foreign Office part of them; he therefore moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

MR. W. H. SMITH stated the Estimates were now under one head instead of two as formerly, and that the whole subject would be fully considered by the Government.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 78.]

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 12 (Paupers not to vote election of guardians.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH (for Mr. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE) moved, in page 4, line 5, to add—

"and that a list of the names of persons objected to who have received relief during the past year, sealed with the common seal of the board of guardians, shall be sufficient evidence of their having received relief."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked if this was not the measure which the Prime Minister stated would be taken on Tuesday next?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it always was his intention to take the Bill that night in preference to any other he had on the Paper, and if his right hon. Friend said that the Bill would be taken next Tuesday, no doubt he thought it would not be reached in time before then.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 153.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the object of the Bill was to simplify the registration of criminals, and thus make the system more effectual for the prevention of crime. At present there were 169,521 names on the register, and the number was increasing at the rate of 28,000 a-year. A large number of names were registered for trifling offences and for juvenile offences; and numbers entered made the registry of comparatively little value for purposes of reference. The Bill would empower the Secretary of State to limit the number of crimes for which registration would be necessary, and make the system more handy and practical than the cumbrous system which now existed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES ACT

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that under the Act of last Session provision was made for the registering of branches affiliated to Friendly Societies as branches, instead of, as heretofore, as separate societies; and that it entailed considerable expense in advertising upon societies which, having registered as separate societies, desired to be registered as branches. The object of the Bill was to do away with the necessity of advertising, providing that the societies certified to the Registrar that both the branch and the society were willing to agree to the proceedings, and the measure had the concurrence of all the great Friendly Societies. Any questions of detail could be considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

BANKERS' BOOKS EVIDENCE BILL.

Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Backhouse, Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Watkin Williams.

[BILL 171.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to permit certified copies or extracts from bankers' books to be produced as evidence instead of the books themselves.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD supported the Bill, and observed that he had known cases in which great inconvenience had been caused by bankers' ledgers being detained in Court for several days.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Government did not object to the Motion, but the Bill would be submitted to the scrutiny of the Attorney General before it went into Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

HOUSE OCCUPIERS DISQUALIFICATION REMOVAL BILL.—[BILL 29.]

(Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ryder.)

SECOND READING.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [[22nd March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. HAYTER objected to the Bill being proceeded with in the absence of some hon. Members who were interested in it. He should support the Bill if the whole subject of the registration were dealt with; but he objected to any alterations being made in favour of a particular class. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned." (Mr. Hayter.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF hoped the Bill would be read a second time, and he pledged himself to give reasonable opportunity for introducing Amendments in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he understood that the question raised by the Bill was not one as between one side of the House and the other, and expressed an opinion that his hon. Friend was not making an unreasonable request in asking the House to proceed with this Bill before the hour of half-past 12 had arrived.

MR. RYLANDS thought at that late hour it was unreasonable to ask the House to proceed with the debate.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 57: Majority 44.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to make further provision for the better prevention of the Pollution of Rivers, said, that he would not at so late an hour detain the House by a lengthened statement. He wished, however, to remind the House that the subject was entirely removed from anything like a Party character. A Royal Commission on the Pollution of Rivers had been sitting for many years, and last year the final volume of their Report was published. The time had therefore arrived when something ought to be done. Three or four Bills had been presented to Parliament, and, although they had from various causes failed to pass into law, there had never been any dispute as to the necessity for legislation on this subject. The obstacles were, however, very great, and the alarm of the manufacturers had been so difficult to deal with that successive Bills had been brought in and withdrawn. Last year there was a reasonable opportunity of passing the Bill brought into the other House by the Marquess of Salisbury, if it had not been for the late period of the Session at which the measure came down to that House and the necessity of proceeding with other measures. A Bill for preventing the pollution of rivers, however, formed no part of the Government programme of the Session, and advisedly so. But several hon. Members had within the last few months urged him to bring forward a measure on the subject, and he had reason to believe that a Bill somewhat of the character of that which had passed the House of Lords last year would be generally acceptable. The present Bill, he might add, proposed to enact generally that rivers were to be kept free from pollution, and that their pollution in various ways was to be a statutable offence. In the first place, it was intended to prohibit the casting of noxious refuse, whether manufacturing or mining, into rivers so as to pollute the stream or to impede navigation. The second part of the Bill related to the mode of dealing with the sewage of towns, and it was proposed that the pollution of rivers by that means should also be made a statutable offence, but that ample time should be given within which proceedings should be instituted, as well as ample time to the authorities within which to construct necessary works. There was nothing in that portion of the Bill more stringent than had for many years been the law with reference to the streams which flowed into the Thames and the Lea, in both of which cases the arbitrary power of preventing the throwing of noxious sewage into those streams had been prohibited. The manufacturing and mineral pollution of rivers stood in a very different position; but it was not deemed expedient in such a Bill as the present to make any exceptions from the general obligations of the law, but it was proposed in the case of manufacturing and mineral pollution not only that ample time should be given, but that industrial interests should be duly considered, and that no prosecution should be instituted except by the public sanitary authority with the sanction of the Local Government Board. Up to that point the Bill stood very much in the position of that which had passed through the House of Lords last year, but there were two or three important additional provisions. It was proposed to constitute a Conservancy Board which would take in hand the function of carrying out the necessary works, and that the sanitary authorities might be permitted to pass bye-laws and regulations and give facilities for the use of their sewers. The prosecutions under the Bill were, he might add, to be carried on before the County Court Judges, as under the Bill of last year. Other points of importance would remain which might be dealt with in future measures; but he hoped the present Bill, as an initiative measure, would in future secure our rivers from pollution. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU supported the Motion. There was a general consensus of opinion in favour of Watershed Boards.

MR. M'LAGAN said, the people of Scotland would experience a great disappointment if the Bill did not pass, and he urged hon. Members on both sides of the House to do their best to help the President of the Local Government Board on with his scheme. He did not believe there would be much difficulty experienced in preventing the pollution of rivers by sewage, as there were now so many plans for the utilization of liquid manure. He felt convinced that the measure would prove of the utmost utility and benefit to the country.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make further provision for the better prevention of the Pollution of Rivers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH and Mr. SALT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 186.]

DIOCESE OF EXETER BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the foundation of a new Bishopric out of a part of the Diocese of Exeter, said, that the first reason for the creation of the See of Cornwall was that the diocese of Exeter was a very large one, not only in numbers and population, but in size. The second reason why he asked the House to consent to this Bill was the special one that the funds were practically forthcoming for the purpose. An offer had been made to the Government of the sum of £1,200 a-year from a single individual for the formation of the See; but attached to that condition was one condition that the See should be formed in the lifetime of the donor. That gift had been most generously met by the Bishop of the diocese. The See of Exeter was entitled to an income of £5,000, and it was proposed to transfer it from that which was the highest to the lowest of the ordinary Sees—namely, £4,200; but the Bishop of the diocese, with that generosity and zeal which characterized him in every action of his life, insisted that this reduction of his income should take effect from the moment the new See was founded. To meet the sum of £2,000 a-year a very large sum was collected among the people of the new diocese. He proposed to follow precisely the plan of last Session for the formation of the See of St. Albans—namely, to enable Her Majesty, whenever she received a certificate from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that the funds were in hand, to form the new See out of the Archdeaconry of Cornwall. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE hoped that in the course of time a more extended Bill for the increase of the Episcopate would be devised.

MR. HAYTER expressed his thanks to the Government for having brought in the Bill, which he believed would meet a pressing want.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the foundation of a new Bishopric out of a part of the Diocese of Exeter, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary CROSS and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 185.]

QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is, as reported, true that an attempt which nearly proved successful has been lately made by some of the boys from the training ship "Lion" to sink Her Majesty's Ironclad "Caledonia," lying off Devonport, on board which ship they were temporarily berthed; if so, if he would explain to the House under what circumstances the act was committed; if not, what caused the ship to be in a sinking condition; if the boys have been in a state of insubordination on board the ship; and whether, seeing that more than one training-ship has been recently wilfully destroyed, it is not possible to find accommodation for them in hulks without risking the destruction of iron-clad ships which form part of the effective naval forces of the country?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I am happy to be able to inform the hon. Gentleman, in answer to the first part of his Question, that no attempt was made by any boys from the training ship Lion to sink the Caledonia, and no insubordination has been manifested by these boys. A certain amount of water came into the ship through an act of inadvertence on the part of an able seaman who had charge of the tank-room, and who turned the wrong lever. The water was soon pumped out, the ship was never in a sinking condition, and no damage was done. With respect to the second part, the Caledonia is placed upon the list of harbour ships, and does not form part of the naval forces of the country available for service.

ARMY — THE ROYAL ARTILLERY — NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If the lately granted increase of pay to acting non-commissioned officers in the Royal Artillery has been suddenly stopped without any explanation; and, also if the recruitment of gunners for that regiment is in a satisfactory condition?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the lately granted increase of pay referred to had not been stopped, but it had been suspended in order that the number of those entitled to it might be apportioned to each battery. The recruiting had been in a very unsatisfactory condition with respect to gunners in the Royal Artillery. They were now nearly 1,500 deficient, and he had taken steps to obtain, if possible, recruits from the Militia. He was happy to say that at present the recruiting was in a better condition than it was before.

THE ESCAPE OF FENIAN CONVICTS. QUESTION.

DR. C. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Times" of Tuesday last, that all, or all but one, of the Fenian prisoners undergoing sentence in Western Australia made good their escape from that colony on Easter Monday in an American whaler?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The report, Sir, to which the hon. Gentleman refers is substantially correct. I may state for the information of the House that there were in all 10 military convicts in Western Australia. Of these, two were out on ticket of leave, leaving eight in prison; and of those six have effected their escape. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman wishes to know the names of the persons who have escaped. ["Yes, yes!"] They are Robert Cranston, Thomas Darragh, James Wilson, Michael Harrington, Thomas Hassett, and Martin Hogan.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL—THE RE- PRESENTATION AND MANAGEMENT. QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the meeting of the Suez Canal Company which he stated in April would be held in the course of May, has been held; and, whether the arrangements referred to by him on the 5th day of May as proposed by Colonel Stokes and M. Lesseps, or any other arrangements for the representation of this Country in the administration of the Company have been decided upon; and, if so, whether he will state to the House the nature of those arrangements?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had understood that the Suez Canal Company would hold a meeting in May, but a meeting had not yet been held. It appeared, however, that a meeting had been called for the 14th of June, and that subsequently M. Lesseps had given notice for a special meeting on the 27th of June, for the purpose of considering proposals that had to be made. He

(the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proposed, on Monday next, to ask for leave to bring in a Bill to make provisions with respect to the shares in the capital of the Suez Canal Company, and he hoped to be in a condition to say then, or at least before that Bill was read a second time, what would be the arrangements for the representation of this country in the administration of the Company.

MR. GLADSTONE asked, Whether the Government were in a position to state what arrangements were to be made with regard to the proposed surtax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he hoped they would be able to lay upon the Table the correspondence on the subject both of the surtax and of representation.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION—MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—THE BERLIN NOTE—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in reference to the recent negotiations in Turkish Affairs, of which I have given the right hon. Gentleman private Notice; and perhaps the House would allow me in explanation of the Question to say a very few words. It will, no doubt, be in the recollection of the House that before the Whitsun holidays it was stated in this and in the other House of Parliament that the Note known as the Berlin Memorandum had not been presented to the Turkish Government, and that there was reason to suppose it would not be presented. I understand that up to the present time that Note has not been presented, and it may perhaps not be unreasonable now to presume that there exists no intention on the part of the three Powers to present it. I believe that in "another place" the Earl of Derby stated that the proposals of those Powers not having been formally communicated to the Porte the document in question could not be considered as a public document, and that he would therefore be unable to lay it upon the Table of the House. Now, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, now that this chapter in the negotiations is apparently concluded, that is still the opinion of Her Majesty's Government; or whether they are of opinion that the time has now arrived when it would be in their power, and might not be inopportune, to lay upon the Table some Papers and afford the House some opportunity of forming an opinion as to the course which has hitherto been pursued by the Government with regard to these negotiations. I do not forget that on a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman stated that the position of affairs was critical, and I am sure that I have no desire to press the Government for any explanations which might cause them any embarrassment in the present condition of affairs; but, at the same time, it seems to me that Her Majesty's Government might be willing, and possibly anxious, to afford to the House some opportunity of becoming aware of the course which they have hitherto pursued, and of giving them some explanation as to their policy and as to the state of our relations upon this subject with the other Powers of Europe. I do not believe there exists in the country any distrust of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government; but, at the same time, I think we must feel that, at a moment when it has been considered necessary by Her Majesty's Government to make a considerable demonstration of the naval power of this country in support of the policy of the Government, we are in a state of somewhat unusual uncertainty, not only as to the details, but also as to the main scope and aim of the policy which is being pursued by Her Majesty's Government. With these few words of explanation, therefore, I wish to put the Question to Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is their intention to lay upon the Table of the House any Papers in relation to the recent negotiations on Turkish affairs?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite natural that the noble Lord should have made this inquiry of Her Majesty's Government, and that it is one which is perfectly consistent with his duty as Leader of the Opposition. I can assure him that as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, they have no wish to exercise any unnecessary reserve towards the House, nor are there any documents which they have sanctioned that they would object to place upon the Table of the House. But there are interests superior even to the natural and justifiable curiosity of Parliament, and even to the feelings of a Ministry; and when those interests take the form of the maintenance of peace—the maintenance of honourable peace—I am sure the House will not unnecessarily press the Government on the matter. At the same time, I am perfectly ready to give such information as I can to the noble Lord. It is very true that when I last addressed the House in reference to the Berlin Memorandum, I informed the House that that Memorandum had not been presented to the Porte, and I expressed a hope that it might not be presented. I believe I am quite authorized in now saying that the Berlin Memorandum has been withdrawn. It has been notified to us that its consideration is adjourned sine die. No doubt the remarkable events which have occurred at Constantinople would in a great measure account for that withdrawal, because already the Porte—although that Note has not been presented—has made suggestions which have anticipated more than one important point expressed in the Memorandum. And I think that when I refer to the fact that the Porte itself has spontaneously offered an armistice, that alone might be a sufficient reason for a considerable pause in the presentation of that document, even if that which I look upon as a more satisfactory result than the postponement of its presentation had not occurred. At the same time, I wish to remark that although we felt it to be our duty not to give our sanction to that diplomatic instrument, that notification on the part of Her Majesty's Government was received in no unfriendly spirit by any of the Powers that we had to address. Quite the contrary. Great regret was expressed as to the course which we felt it our duty to take, and a lively desire was also expressed that we should reconsider our decision on a step which they believed to be important to the interests of Europe. At this moment I think I am justified in saying that there is more than one point on which Her Majesty's Government are acting with the other Great Powers, and acting, I hope, successfully. We have concurred entirely with the other Powers, or rather the other Powers may be said to have concurred entirely with us; but, at any rate, there is a complete understanding between us and the other Great Powers that there should no undue pressure put upon the new Sovereign of Turkey; that he and his counsellors should have time to mature their measures and the policy which they mean to pursue. Then, again—which I look upon as not of less importance—we have added our representations to those certainly of Austria and Russia, and I believe also of France, and I have little doubt that at this moment the representations of all the Great Powers are made to impress Serbia with the importance of a temperate conduct on her part. I hope we have impressed those counsels of moderation on Serbia not unsuccessfully. There is a third point on which all the Great Powers have agreed to act, if not simultaneously, yet unanimously—namely, as to the recognition of the new Sultan. In our opinion, it was a matter of great importance that that recognition should be accorded without waiting for those delays which, under the circumstances, the usual diplomatic etiquette must have produced, because on that immediate recognition the Ambassador of the Queen can exercise his privilege of personal audience and conference with the Sultan. I believe the credentials of Sir Henry Elliot have been received from Her Majesty, and will be despatched to him this evening. I may also mention, with regard to the recognition of the Sultan, that that recognition has not been confined merely to the Great Powers of Europe, but I may say there certainly has been a general feeling of adhesion from all sections, creeds, and races among the subjects of the Porte. I think it is very important that the heads of all the Christian communities have personally congratulated, or have requested permission personally to congratulate, the Sultan on his accession to the Throne, and to express their confidence in the policy which he will pursue. I do not, of course, wish to exaggerate the importance of such an incident, but I think it may have a beneficial influence over the insurgents, and will certainly not diminish but rather increase the effect of the counsels which I hope all the Great Powers of Europe are giving the insurgents to avail themselves of the opportunity which now seems to be offered of insuring the pacification of Europe. There is one other point on which I wish to remark. It is not my habit, and I hope it never will be, to trouble the House with anything which is personal to myself; but, as in the present case that personal reference is mixed up with high considerations of policy, therefore I trust the House will pardon it. I understand that there appeared in the journals of Vienna yesterday a letter bearing my signature, which commented freely upon the present political situation of Europe, dilated on the intentions and the policy of England, and spoke with unpardonable disrespect of a Great Power which is an ally of our Sovereign. I therefore only wish to take this the earliest and most public opportunity—inasmuch as that letter has been reproduced in some English journals—of announcing that the letter is a forgery.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman not having definitely stated it, I wish to ask, whether the Government anticipate that they will be able to lay on the Table the Papers relating to the recent negotiations?

MR. DISRAELI: I was remiss, perhaps, upon the point, as I wished it to be inferred from my observations that I should imagine that eventually there would be no objection to lay on the Table, with hardly any omission, all the Papers relating to these transactions. But I think at this moment that, the Papers to which the noble Lord refers being necessarily of a controversial character, and it being our desire to maintain as much as possible a complete good understanding with the Powers which are virtually acting in concert, the appearance of those Papers should at least be delayed.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—CASE OF MR. CHARLES FREDERIC HENWOOD.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

COLONEL BERESFORD, in rising to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the Petition of Charles Frederic Henwood, naval architect, of 110, Cannon Street, in the City of London, said, he thought the evidence he should adduce would reveal a state of things which demanded inquiry. In his Petition the petitioner stated that he

"Is by profession a naval architect and practical shipbuilder, and was trained under his father, an eminent naval architect and master shipbuilder in Her Majesty's Service; and has been concerned in the construction of upwards of 70,000 tons of shipping, comprising wooden and iron armour-clad ships of war for the Admiralty and for foreign Governments; and has held the responsible position of chief constructor and manager of an extensive shipbuilding establishment; and all the vessels designed and built under your petitioner fulfilled their estimated results, whereby his reputation as a naval architect and practical shipbuilder was established, and he was well known and acknowledged by the profession and the public Press as an eminent constructor and shipbuilder. That in the years of 1866 and 1867 your petitioner invented plans whereby the obsolete but sound and strong line-of-battle ships might efficiently, promptly, and economically be converted into armour-plated, sea-going turret ships, to supply an urgent and temporary demand for increasing the number and power of the iron-clad Navy; and thereby also effect a saving of several millions sterling in the naval expenditure of the country, which plans received the approval of eminent naval officers and of Mr. Isaac Watts, C.B., formerly Chief Constructor of Her Majesty's Navy, the designer of the Warrior, Lechilles, and Agincourt, and of most of the line-of-battle ships proposed for conversion. That your petitioner's plans were rejected by the Board of Admiralty as being unsuitable for Her Majesty's Service; but your petitioner was not informed, and did not at that time know, of any other alleged reason or cause for such rejection. That your petitioner has now in his possession official copies of the Admiralty Minutes and the Reports of the then professional officers of the Admiralty, made concerning your petitioner's plans furnished to him by the Solicitor of the Admiralty."

He (Colonel Beresford) was prepared to show that the designs of the petitioner were rejected because the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) then Chief Constructor of the Navy, together with Mr. Barnaby, the present Chief Constructor, had evidently determined that no designs except their own should be acted upon, and there was no doubt Mr. Henwood's professional prospects had seriously suffered in consequence.

MR. E. J. REED rose to Order. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member would speak up, as he could not be heard on that (the Opposition) side of the House. As far as he could understand, the hon. and gallant Member was making serious aspersions on his (Mr. Reed's) character.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he was speaking as loud as he could. Had his views been honestly carried out, Mr.

Henwood believed the necessary improvement in the state of things would have been effected at an expenditure of one-third less than was actually incurred. The petitioner went on to say that—

“From such Reports and other official documents your petitioner finds that the designs for ships represented to the Board of Admiralty as those of your petitioner were not the designs or plans proposed by your petitioner, but were in fact altered and thereby made absurd and ridiculous, and such as no experienced constructor (in his senses) would have put forward. And your petitioner agrees with the officially expressed opinion given in these Reports that such ships erroneously alleged to be those prepared by your petitioner, would, if adopted, ‘have led to wholesale loss and disaster’ in Her Majesty’s Navy, as subsequently happened by the capsizing of the ill-fated Captain. That your petitioner finds that greater quantities and heavier weights were wrongly substituted for his own; in fact, greater quantities and heavier weights than were adopted in and for similar sized ships for Her Majesty’s Service, in consequence of which overloading by increased and unnecessary weights the freeboard of the ships, as proposed by your petitioner, was greatly reduced, and the stability dangerously diminished, as similarly took place in the construction of the Captain. That the freeboard of the design submitted by your petitioner in 1866, embodying a patent invention, No. 472, 1866, of the well-known eminent engineer, Mr. Robert Napier, of Glasgow, was 11 feet in height above the water, which design was for one of the medium-sized line-of-battle ships, but in the following year (1867) your petitioner sent in a design for one of the larger ships, the Duncan, and in this design, finding that the necessary stability could be obtained with a freeboard of 4ft. 5½in., he dispensed with the patent plan of Mr. Napier. That the stability of the Duncan, as designed and proposed by your petitioner was at the least 11,232 ‘foot tons’ (meaning moment of stability), with a freeboard of 4ft. 5½in. That the design represented to the Admiralty as that proposed by your petitioner for the Duncan had a freeboard of 3ft. 6in., with a stability of only 7,222 ‘foot tons,’ such being practically as dangerous a ship as the Captain. That the stability of the Captain, as completed and sent to sea with a freeboard of 6ft. 4½in., was not more than 7,100 ‘foot tons,’ although had that ship been built as designed she would not have capsized, inasmuch as she would have been possessed of 60 per cent greater stability than as actually constructed. That it has been publicly urged as against your petitioner’s plans that if the Captain, with 6ft. 4½in. of freeboard, was a dangerous ship, the Duncan, with only 4ft. 5½in. of freeboard, was a much more dangerous ship, the other facts being suppressed—viz., that the Duncan had 9ft. greater breadth of beam than the Captain, and that the stability of the Duncan, as designed and proposed by your petitioner, was just 60 per cent greater than that of the Captain as constructed and sent to sea. That your petitioner further finds in these Reports groundless allegations, from what cause he knows not, against his professional ability and character—viz., ‘that it was impossible to attach any confidence to the judgments or calculations of your petitioner,’ and further, ‘that it would be madness to undertake the conversion in accordance with Henwood’s plans,’ meaning the plans with 3ft. 6in. of freeboard, and 7,222 ‘foot tons’ stability; and that ‘these plans’ ‘had no weight whatever from the known antecedents of their author,’ thus insinuating that your petitioner’s antecedents were so bad as to render any plans of his worthless.”

[The hon. and gallant Member here read the opinion of Mr. Isaac Watts, formerly Chief Constructor of the Navy, as to the competency of the petitioner as a naval architect. Mr. Isaac Watts’ testimony was of a most complimentary character. He also read a number of documents, including certain recommendations sent to the Institute of Naval Architects, of which the hon. Member for Pembroke was the then Secretary, to prove that Mr. Henwood was a gentleman of high reputation and eminence as a ship-builder.] The hon. and gallant Member then continued:—Since he (Colonel Beresford) had taken up the case, all persons connected with the shipping interest with whom he had conversed said with one voice that Mr. Henwood was a man of integrity and honour; but the result of this misrepresentation was that the Board of Admiralty, to whom Mr. Henwood was favourably known, was misled, and induced to believe that his plans were “so faulty and ill-considered” that no satisfactory conversion of ships could be made on the plans he had suggested. The petitioner then stated—

“That in consequence of the adoption of figures and calculations alleged to have been submitted by your petitioner, but which were never submitted by your petitioner, which he is in a position to prove by official documents, the reputation of your petitioner as a naval architect was, and still is, seriously injured in the eyes of foreign Governments, shipowners, and others, who previously to the Reports upon your petitioner’s plans had the greatest confidence in his ability, whereby your petitioner has suffered most seriously; and further, that in consequence of the said Reports comparisons have been made officially and otherwise with your petitioner’s designs and that of the Captain, with which your petitioner had had nothing whatever to do; and, finally, that your petitioner still continues in the belief, confirmed by the disaster which happened to the Captain, that your petitioner’s designs were sound, and that had his figures been used conclusions so ridiculous and unfeasible could not have been arrived at.”

The petitioner then asked the Admiralty for an inquiry, and quoted the case of Mr. G. H. Bovill, in 1853. That case was, briefly, that Mr. Bovill, having constructed some improved machinery, the officials connected with the Department for which it was intended, so damaged that machinery by putting stones and rubbish into it, that it was rejected. Mr. Bovill was fortunate in having in the House a brother who was a lawyer of great eminence, and who afterwards became a Judge, and, on his Motion, a Committee was granted, and the result was that the master miller was discharged, and two subordinates were reprimanded. The reference to that case was, perhaps, fortunate; at any rate, in this one all inquiry was refused. He would impress upon the House that in the Petition, and in discussing the case, it was necessary to remember that the indictment was not so much against Sir Spencer Robinson, as he was a non-professional man, and obliged to accept the Reports made to him. The petitioner wound up by stating—

“That your Petitioner, by reason of the matters herein alleged, all of which he is prepared to prove by official documentary evidence, has suffered, and still suffers, great prejudice and injury in his reputation and profession, and consequent loss of practice.

“That your Petitioner’s sole means of livelihood is his professional character and reputation, which in the manner aforesaid have been wrongfully assailed, prejudiced and injured.

“And your Petitioner prays that your honourable House will be graciously pleased to cause a full and impartial investigation to be made into the matters hereinbefore alleged, in order that your Petitioner may have an opportunity of establishing the truth of the same, and that justice may be done, and your Petitioner relieved from the prejudice which has been created against him by the reason of the aforesaid circumstances.”

The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, in seconding the Motion, confessed he knew nothing of Mr. Henwood or of his case. He felt, however, that the right of Petition to that House was one which ought not to be tampered with, and that when a question arose between a powerless individual and a powerful Government or Party, it was the duty of independent Members, however unpopular the course might be, to vindicate that right. In this case, here was a Petition presented in the exercise of that right, making a distinct charge of wrong against certain officials connected with the Admiralty, and claiming a distinct inquiry. The House, he might add, had received the Petition and ordered it to be printed. The charge was, that those officials had purposely misrepresented certain calculations and plans at a critical period of our naval history. If true, it was a grave charge indeed; if untrue, in his opinion, Mr. Henwood not only deserved severe censure, but ought to be punished for making accusations of so false and scandalous a nature. The House itself had a right to demand that the First Lord of the Admiralty should vindicate his Department by a full inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman ought to be sans peur, sans reproche, and on this occasion show that he was sans peur by consenting to this inquiry, and he would then also be sans reproche.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of Mr. Charles Henwood,”—
(Colonel Beresford,)

—instead thereof.

After a pause—

MR. HUNT said, he had not risen at the moment because he thought the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed), who had been personally alluded to, might have deemed it right to address some observations to the House in reply to the remarks of his hon. and gallant Friend behind him. As, however, the hon. Gentleman had not done so, he (Mr. Hunt) wished to state himself his views on the subject. The circumstances to which the attention of the House had been called were briefly these—In 1866, it being the desire of the Admiralty to convert some of our old men-of-war into more modern instruments of war as iron-clads, Mr. Henwood sent in proposals and plans for that purpose. Those proposals were seriously entertained, and had considerable attention given to them. It was the duty of the then Controllers of the Navy, Messrs. Reed, Barnaby, and Sir Spencer Robinson, to consider those plans and to make Reports upon them, and they reported upon them accordingly to the Department. Now, those Reports were always confidential Reports, and it was desirable that they should always remain so, for proposals submitted to the Board were frequently very numerous, and it was important that they should be investigated and reported upon freely without fear of consequences. The petitioner stated in his Petition that copies of the Reports in question were furnished to him by the Solicitor to the Admiralty, and he (Mr. Hunt) had no means of contradicting the statement, as that Gentleman (Mr. Bristow) was now dead. He, however, thought it to be a very strong statement, and had therefore directed search to be made in that department, and it was only right to say that no trace could be found of any such document having been furnished. It was impossible for him to say the statement was not true, but it certainly was an extraordinary one. He was of opinion that it must have got out through the inquiry made into the loss of the Captain; but whether so or not, it would be very unfortunate if these Reports were ever allowed to be made public. His hon. and gallant Friend, in dealing with the case, had entered into a great deal of technical matter, of which he (Mr. Hunt) made no complaint; but the main charge was, that Mr. Henwood had submitted certain designs to the officers of the Admiralty, and that they had reported on plans which were not his, and had thus deceived the Board. But what was the nature of the passage from the Blue Book which he had quoted in support of the charge? It was to the effect that the quantities and weights rested upon by Mr. Henwood were not those which their experience told them ought to be estimated, for they supplied those weights and quantities which alone would give the plans any value. That was the answer to the charge. Mr. Henwood said that certain quantities and weights should form the basis of the calculation, and the Controllers said that, according to Mr. Henwood's own plans, those quantities and weights would not suffice. They therefore put before the Admiralty the quantities and weights which would be necessary if his plans were adopted. It had been alleged that these weights and quantities had been put forward by Mr. Henwood. But that was a mistake, as was clearly shown by a printed Minute on the subject issued by the Admiralty, and which he (Mr. Hunt) held in his hand. To it was appended a note by the gentleman who made the calculations, explaining that the investigation had been made independently of the weights and quantities given by Mr. Henwood, his plans only being followed. Thus, in point of fact, the officials in the Constructor's Department adopted the weights and quantities which they thought ought to be taken instead of those proposed by Mr. Henwood. They represented that, with those weights, the immersion of the ship would be greater than Mr. Henwood thought it would be, and they advised the Admiralty not to adopt his plan. This was the main matter complained of by Mr. Henwood. With respect to the question of freeboard, Mr. Henwood had himself altered his proposals. First, he proposed a freeboard of 3ft. 6in., and subsequently freeboards of 4ft. 4in., 4ft. 5in., 4ft. 3½in., and 4ft. 6in. The last freeboard proposed by Mr. Henwood was, he thought, one of 4ft. At different times he had also proposed different weights. He (Mr. Hunt) confessed that he was perfectly satisfied with the explanations furnished to him by the heads of departments in the Admiralty, and for that reason he saw no public grounds for the appointment of a Select Committee. He had great faith in the present head of the department, who had joined in the representations made to the Admiralty, as well as in those with whom he was associated. He therefore saw no reason whatever, on public grounds, for inquiry into a matter which had been conclusively settled, but if the hon. Member for Pembroke thought that such an inquiry was necessary to vindicate his character he would not oppose it, though he must add that it was not at all required, and he trusted that if the hon. Member took the same view his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw his Motion.

MR. BAXTER thought the First Lord had exercised a wise discretion in opposing the Motion. He had listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), and he submitted to the House that no case whatever had been made out to justify their interference. Nay, he would even go further, and say that in his opinion Mr. Henwood had no substantial grievance of which any Court or public Assembly could take cognizance. It was perfectly true that these designs, which on the face of them did not appear very likely, were disapproved and condemned unanimously by the officers of the Admiralty, but successive Governments had upheld the action of those officers; and the question which the House had to consider was not whether the officers acted wisely, but whether the House itself was prepared to act as a sort of Court of Review in a matter of this character. The House was not an Assembly of naval architects, and was not in a position to investigate a question of the kind. Inventors must expect their designs to be criticized, and if every critic was to be brought before the House of Commons, or before a Court of Law, the House and the Courts of Law in this country would have very little time to attend to anything else. The hon. and gallant Member for Southwark kept out of view altogether the fact that Mr. Henwood had endeavoured to vindicate his reputation elsewhere, he having first taken legal proceedings against the Admiralty printer and against the hon. Member for Pembroke. The Courts of Law, however, would not entertain the matter, and now Mr. Henwood asked the House of Commons to waste its time in making an inquiry. Mr. Henwood in the first page of his pamphlet accused his (Mr. Baxter's) gallant friend Sir Spencer Robinson and his hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) not merely of making mistakes, but of dishonesty and corruption. What the Motion really demanded was, that that House should declare its conviction that it was true; but did any hon. Member of that House for a moment believe charges of that sort? He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke would not think it worth his while to take any further notice of a pamphlet which was one of the most bombastic, foolish, and offensive documents he ever read.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose for the purpose of confirming the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baxter), and to express his regret that the subject had been brought before the House. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark would withdraw the Motion, for in his opinion, the character of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Pembroke did not require vindication.

MR. E. J. REED said, the pamphlet which had been referred to was undoubtedly one of the most offensive and scurrilous documents ever published about public men. For that reason he had never taken any notice of it. The officials at the Admiralty, as guardians of the public interests, altered Mr. Henwood's weights, not improperly, but properly. They did their duty in accordance with their sense of responsibility, and he did not think a single Member of the House believed that the officers of the Admiralty improperly altered figures in documents. The case, in short, was entirely unworthy of that Assembly, and for that reason he would not take up their time. It was stated in the Petition that Mr. Watts, the former Chief Constructor of the Navy, spoke strongly in favour of Mr. Henwood's plan. It appeared, however, on inquiry, that Mr. Watts had only expressed a general opinion and had made no calculations. Consequently, that gentleman's opinion was as unsubstantial as that of any other person. His own reputation he felt, did not need the vindication of a Select Committee, and the reputation of the officers at the Admiralty stood quite as little in need of such investigation to prove that they had acted correctly.

MR. SAMUDA only wished to add that he recollected being present at a former discussion upon the question, when the same allegations were made, and when the noble Lord the present First Commissioner of Works, then the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) gave precisely the same satisfactory statement and reply as that which had now been put before him by the First Lord of the Admiralty. The calculations as to weight and quantities sent in by Mr. Henwood had, of course, to be submitted to proof by professional officers, and in their judgment they were found deficient in strength. When the defects were remedied the ship was found to be too much immersed, and hence the conclusions they arrived at that the proposal was bad; but that was a very different thing from altering and falsifying Henwood's figures, but of submitting them with what they thought indispensable corrections, and he did not think that the House was called upon to judge whether the professional advisers of the Department were right or wrong in the advice they gave to the Admiralty on this head. To do so would be to take away the responsibilities of public officers and public Departments, and lead to great mischief. He could not help thinking that if the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark had been better advised he never would have been induced to bring forward a motion which he (Mr. Samuda) hoped, after the explanation made, would be withdrawn.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he would, by leave, withdraw the Motion. ["No, no!"]

UNREFORMED MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—YARMOUTH AND BRADING, ISLE OF WIGHT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the corporations of Yarmouth and Brading, in the Isle of Wight, said, he did so with the view of correcting some exaggerated and incorrect statements made with respect to these corporations by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in a speech which he recently made on unreformed corporations. The hon. Baronet had asserted that the town hall of Brading had an area of only 8 feet by 10 feet, and that the whole of the corporation funds were expended upon dinners. The real facts of the case, however, were that the town hall measured 30 feet by 15 feet, and that the expenses of the corporation only amounted to £9 13s., of which sum only £5 10s. was spent upon an annual dinner, the remainder of the funds of the corporation being expended in an unexceptionable manner. The hon. Baronet's statements with regard to Yarmouth were also altogether without foundation, and were indignantly denied by the corporation. The annual income of that borough, which amounted to £237, was applied to the repayment of a large debt which had been incurred for the construction of a breakwater, a large quay, and a pier, and it would be 200 years before the principal was paid off. Instead, therefore, of the members of the corporation embezzling or misappropriating monies which they held in trust for the public, the interest of the debt absorbed the whole of the available income from all sources, as was shown by Returns which had been made to the House since the speech of the hon. Baronet had been delivered. The actual expenses of the corporation did not exceed £15 per annum, and although there was an annual dinner, it cost the corporation nothing, the mayor having the privilege of paying for it himself. He trusted that he had clearly shown that the observations of the hon. Baronet with regard to these boroughs were not justified by the facts, and that the members of these ancient and loyal corporations were not guilty of the charges that had been brought against them. He also trusted that other corporations might be able to disprove some of the charges which had been made against them by the hon. Baronet in his recent speech to the House.

MR. CLIFFORD humorously complained of what he described as a "ferocious attack" which the hon. Baronet made upon an hon. Member who carried the Yarmouth bridge scheme—he (Mr. Clifford) being himself that hon. Member. It was very ungrateful in people to find fault with that bridge, seeing that it saved them a walk of several miles, and was otherwise a thing of great public advantage. He merely wished to corroborate the statements of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight with reference to the proper disposal of the funds of the corporations in question, the members of which had been charged by the hon. Baronet with what amounted to little short of embezzlement.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE was sorry that the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight had thought fit to bring the question before the House of Commons, instead of advising the members of the two corporations in whose interest he had spoken to rebut by evidence, if possible, before the Royal Commission which had been appointed the statements he made when moving for the appointment of the Commission in question. The Members of the Commission were, for the most part, Conservatives, and therefore presumably would have a due regard for the rights of property and the interests of ancient corporations, so that Yarmouth and Brading would probably have been safe in their hands. Matters affecting these corporations were important in and to the localities concerned, but the House could not be expected to give much time or attention to them. He had, therefore, embodied his statement on the subject in a written document, which he intended to lay before the Commission, and it would then be competent for the corporations of Yarmouth and Brading to bring rebutting evidence. Briefly, his statement would contain stronger allegations as to the way in which the corporations in question conducted their business than he was in a position to make when moving for the Commission. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight, while defending Yarmouth, had entered at some length upon a defence of the corporation of Brading, but nothing had been said as to the disposal of the corporate funds or the management of the corporate business, save what was, in his view, perfectly easy of disproof. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) denied they paid all the expenses of the town. The town hall had certainly been rebuilt, but it was still ridiculously small, and there was no evidence to show what had become of the revenues of £500 or £600 received during the last eight years. [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE reminded the hon. Baronet that they had built a new town hall.] They had, however, got into debt. He also denied that he had said that any portion of the revenue of Yarmouth was embezzled, although he was ready to allow that persons with very tender consciences might think that his words were liable to that construction. What he had said was that a large sum of money seemed to have mysteriously disappeared every year, and he now repeated that statement. The evidence he intended to lay before the Commission would prove that the corporate officers were elected by private meetings; that the members of the Court Leet were cautioned on election not to make public statements as to the business that might come before them; that no authentic evidence was forthcoming as to the way in which the corporate funds were expended. The borough accounts were never seen, except by the members of the corporation, until they were presented to that House on the Motion of an hon. Member, and it was incorrect to say that they had annually audited and published their accounts. All the unreformed corporations printed their accounts for the use of the members, but in Yarmouth he had been unable to obtain a copy. The accounts might be audited by a member of the corporation, but certainly there was no public audit. But he was now forced, in consequence of the defence offered by the hon. Member, to make a more serious charge against the corporation of Yarmouth, which was that their accounts were fictitious. The accounts contained in the Return ordered by the House represented that during the last six years they had spent about £700 upon repairs of the harbour, and £146 in 1875 on new works, improvements, and maintenance. He had the evidence of persons well acquainted with Yarmouth harbour, and they declared that in the year 1875 nothing was done to the harbour beyond placing 100 tons of rough stone on the breakwater—the cost of which was £26. That was the only set-off he could find to the £146. The breakwater cost originally £560, and yet the corporation made out that they had spent £120 per year on an average of six years. Considering the defective condition of the breakwater, that, on the face of it, appeared to be a monstrous expenditure. Evidence would be forthcoming before the Commission to prove these facts, and, he believed he should be able to show the Commissioners a very much worse state of things than any one would gather from the remarks of the hon. Member. As, however, that evidence would involve points of detail which could not conveniently be discussed in the House, he could only again express his regret that the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight had raised the question in its present form, instead of bringing it in some shape before the Royal Commission.

PARLIAMENT — ORDER — REFERENCE TO DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL PERCY rose to call attention to the practice of referring, in the course of debates in this House, to debates in the House of Lords, and proposed to move—

“That it is highly desirable that the rule of this House that ‘no Member may allude to any debate in the other House of Parliament’ should be strictly observed.”

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the Amendment of the noble Lord could not be put, as the House had already negatived the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), but the noble Lord could address the House upon his Amendment.

EARL PERCY said, that he addressed the House with some hesitation, because he had been accused the other night of "lecturing the House;" and while he did not think he had been amenable to that charge, he was aware that in proposing to deal with a question affecting the Rules which guided their proceedings he might be considered guilty of presumption. He could only say that had any other hon. Member seemed disposed to undertake the matter he would gladly have left it in his hands. As to the terms of the Motion he had placed on the Paper, he trusted it would not be thought that he had been wanting in any respect to the Speaker, who enjoyed the confidence of the House so fully that it would be a suicidal act on the part of any one wishing to engage the attention of the House to expose himself to a suspicion of that character. He wished it also to be understood that he had no idea of proposing any modification of the Rule to which he specially alluded, and he had brought it forward simply because he felt that the practice of referring in the one House to the debates in the other House of Parliament was a most inconvenient practice, and might have perhaps serious consequences. It was an ancient rule, the value of which had been recognized by many eminent Members of the House. But it had been evaded in the spirit, if not in the letter, several times during the present Parliament, and the consequence had been a great deal of undesirable agitation both within and without the walls of Parliament. The instance which was uppermost in his thoughts occurred two years ago, when the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) told the House that a noble Lord in "another place," a Member of the Government, had spoken of "the blustering majority in that House." The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) then characterized the practice of discussing the speeches of the Peers as "most objectionable," and said the hon. and learned Member had given "the most conspicuous and objectionable example" of the practice which he had ever known. The result was, that they were led into a long and painful wrangle, which he thought unworthy of that House; and, after all, it turned out that the noble Lord had never used the words attributed to him. When such things were possible, the danger of the practice was evident. In the recent debate upon the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), with regard to the Royal Proclamation, copious quotations were made from a report of the Lord Chancellor's speech in "another place." The report contained an important mis-statement, which, it so happened, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was able to correct at the time; but other speeches were also referred to, which could not be corrected in the same manner, and the House had no means of ascertaining what mis-statements might have been made with reference to them, because those who had uttered them were not present to defend or explain what they had said in "another place." That was the most serious fault of the whole matter; because, in commenting on such speeches, they were attacking those who had no power of defending themselves. It was important to observe the Rule that no debate of the current Session in the Lower House of Parliament should be referred to; but if the House saw cause to suspend that Rule, the Members concerned would have it in their power to be present and defend their utterances. That was, of course, not the case with regard to Members of the other House, who were consequently attacked behind their backs. Such a course, he submitted, was unfair to those who were the objects of it, and unworthy of that House; while it was not likely to promote the good understanding which all must desire to see maintained between the two Houses. If noble Lords elsewhere copied that example, and exercised their talents in criticizing speeches made in that House, could hon. Members consistently resent it? He need not say more to show that the evasion of the Rule was a serious matter; and much regretting its occurrence, would leave it to other hon. Members of greater experience to say whether some change should not be made in order to prevent it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he agreed with the noble Lord in condemning the practice in question, but thought it was more frequently followed in the House of Lords than in that House. Some noble Lords even went the length of naming the hon. Member whose speech they quoted. As an instance, he might mention that in the other House recently, during a discussion respecting Dover Harbour, allusions were made by name to another hon. Member and himself, who had opposed the expenditure of public money there. The hon. Member named was the Member for Burnley who at all times and under all difficulties did his duty in protecting the public money, and was entitled to their respect. Believing that the expenditure was wasteful, he had simply done his duty in trying to prevent it; and he thought it was not right for a Peer thus to name Members of this House who were discharging what they believed to be a public duty. He might also mention another feature in the speeches in "another place," and that in connection with the Dover Harbour project. Last year he had himself done his best to obtain information with regard to that expensive project, but it was so hidden in the dark chambers of the Treasury and Cabinet that no details connected with the project could be obtained, yet he found that within the last few days the very information which he wanted, and which he was unable to get had been given by a noble Lord in "another place."

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. and gallant Member that in referring to a debate in the other House of Parliament during the present Session, he was himself breaking the Rule now under discussion.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR bowed to the decision of the Speaker.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the hon. and gallant Member who has just spoken managed, in the course of his short speech, to violate the rules of both Houses of Parliament. He has not only succeeded in the indiscretion to which my noble Friend the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) wishes to call attention—namely, that of referring to proceedings which took place in the other House of Parliament—but in the next place devoted a portion of his speech to a question which was not before the House at all, the large expenditure incurred in reference to the pier at Dover

—a matter as to which we know that he has great experience. I think, Sir, that the House is much indebted to my noble Friend for bringing the question before the House for its consideration. Of late years there has been, perhaps, an excess of licence on the part of both Houses respectively in alluding to the proceedings of the other House of Parliament, and I should be sorry to vindicate any error of our own in that respect by alleging the existence of a similar indiscretion in the other House. That would not vindicate our course, but would rather show the injurious consequences of the example we had set. I think it ought to be known upon what basis the right of interference rests if such conduct is to be further pursued. It is not a Sessional or Standing Order of this House that we should make no reference to the debates of the other House of Parliament; it is, I think, part of what we call the Common Law of Parliament, and I hope before this conversation closes that Mr. Speaker will favour us with his authoritative opinion on that point. But then, if it be, as I suppose, part of the Common Law of Parliament, there may yet be, I think, occasions on which, with, of course, some adroitness, it may be absolutely requisite and for the advantage of discussion that some notice should be taken even of expressions that may be used in the other House. But that must be done with the utmost deference and diffidence, and I hesitate not to say as my own opinion—and I believe it is not an uncommon one—that there has been of late too much licence in that respect. It is a proceeding which every one feels must be full of inconvenience and unfairness. It is not merely that we criticize the words of those who are absent, but that unfortunately we may criticize words which were never spoken. Although it is very true that the newspaper reports of what occurs in both Houses of Parliament are, considering the great difficulties and the pressure of time which the reporters have to encounter, remarkable productions, still there is no doubt that if you come to verbal criticism no speech can bear supervision in that respect. I merely wish to express my sympathy with my noble Friend in the observations he has made. I believe a useful and beneficial result may arise from the attention he has directed to the subject but, at the same time, I desire to call attention to the fact that it is not a rule which depends upon a Standing Order; and the matter is so important that I shall take the liberty of asking your opinion, Sir, on the subject, so that we may have some authoritative declaration as to the basis on which the Rule rests.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he had referred to the work which was always consulted by hon. Members when any question arose as to the rules of the House—namely, The Law and Practice of Parliament, by Sir Erskine May—and he found it there stated that allusion in debates to proceedings in the other House of Parliament were out of Order, because they were necessarily made in the absence of the person whose statements were referred to, but mainly because the proceedings of one House were not known to the other. They all knew the Resolutions which were agreed to, but there was no official record of the debates, and in the absence of such record what could be more inconvenient than the criticism of language the accuracy of which there was no means of testing? The practice of hon. Members alluding to debates which had occurred in that House was increasing, and he regretted to say that some of the greatest offences against the rule had proceeded from some of the most distinguished Members of the House. He had also always understood it was a part of the common law of Parliament, which tended to the decorum of their proceedings, that the Member in possession of the House should address himself to the Speaker, and yet that rule was frequently broken. It was probable that, as time went on, the House would become more democratic, and therefore it became of more importance that the strict rules of Order should be observed, and he deprecated the observations which were made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), when he said that Members ought to be allowed to refer to speeches made elsewhere, and that any Rule to the contrary ought to be put an end to. It would be well that the Rule on the subject brought under their consideration by his noble Friend should be known and observed as far as possible.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he had listened to debates in "another place," eight out of ten of which were marked by the gravity and by the excellence of the tone and temper of the speeches; but he believed that the irregularity deprecated by the noble Lord the Member for Northumberland (Earl Percy) was oftener committed "elsewhere" than it was in the House of Commons. He should be sorry to commit a breach of Order by referring to any particular instance, but he might be allowed to say that he had recently heard a debate which arose in that House criticized in "another place," and, having heard the original debate, he must say he could hardly recognize it. Surely a better example ought to be set to them. In the other House of Parliament there was no one occupying the position which Mr. Speaker occupied in that House to call Peers to Order. Noble Lords were masters of their own behaviour, and it behoved them to be the more careful in each respectively governing his own conduct. He remembered witnessing a most unruly scene some years since, when a question arose whether a Peer who had given a proxy, and who was leaning with his arm on the Bar, was in the House or out of it. ["Order!"] He was not alluding to any specific occasion.

MR. DODSON thought there could be no doubt that the Rules which governed their debates, both as to that and the other House of Parliament, were of great importance, and that it was desirable they should be observed. It was also for the interest of all that whenever there was a disposition to depart from those Rules hon. Members should be recalled to the importance of observing regulations so useful to themselves and the other House of Parliament. He had not, however, observed that there had been any special tendency to laxity of late, or that in former times the Rules of debate were more strictly adhered to than during the present or recent Sessions. An hon. Member who preceded the last speaker alluded to those unauthorized reports which, although not recognized by the House, they all knew the convenience and advantage of. He said that, as the House had no authorized record of its debates, it was inconvenient to refer to former debates. That was perfectly true, but he would remind that speaker that such an argument must not be too strictly pressed.

MR. J. R. YORKE rose to Order, and reminded the right hon. Gentleman that it was irregular to refer to him as "that speaker."

MR. DODSON wished to know whether he was out of Order in referring to the speech just made by the hon. Gentleman?

MR. J. R. YORKE said, it was out of Order to allude to any hon. Member as "that speaker."

MR. DODSON had no objection to describe the hon. Gentleman as "the hon. Member who had just spoken from the Bench" if that would be more satisfactory to him. In the successive stages of a Bill preceding debates were constantly referred to. No doubt the strict Rule of the House was if a subject had been disposed of by Bill or Resolution, that it should not be brought up again in subsequent debates. He presumed, however, that the difficulty, and with it the Motion of the noble Lord opposite (Earl Percy) had arisen upon the Proclamation issued under the Royal Titles Bill. But the discussion on the Proclamation had been treated as only a sequel to the debates upon the Bill, and it would have been impossible to discuss the issue thus raised, unless the House had allowed different speakers to refer to what had been said on the different stages of the Royal Titles Bill. The House could only, in fact, deal with the previous debates as constituting former stages of the same measure. The House was called upon to compare the Proclamation with the promises given, or alleged to have been given, when the Bill was before Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government generously and properly interposed in order that the necessary latitude of debate might be allowed. The same debates were alluded to in the other House, and for the same reason—that it was impossible to discuss the coincidence of the Proclamation with the promises with which it was said to conflict or by which it was sought to be justified, unless Members were permitted to refer to what had been said by the Members of the Government, and the same latitude had been required by, and had been granted to, Members on both sides of the House. That, however, was an exceptional case which was not likely to arise again, and the latitude, of which complaint had been made, was conceded on that understanding. The noble Lord opposite had done good service by calling attention to the necessity of a general adherence to the Rules of the House, and he (Mr. Dodson) trusted he would be satisfied with having done so, and with having entered a protest against what had taken place being construed into a precedent.

MR. SPEAKER: Before this discussion closes it is right I should state that it is part of the unwritten law of Parliament that no allusion should be made in this House to the debates and proceedings in the other House of Parliament during the current Session. There is no Standing Order on the subject, but the unwritten law of Parliament is of equal, if not greater, force than any Standing Order of this House. I collect from the discussion which has now taken place that it is the desire of this House that the law of Parliament in this respect should be strictly observed and enforced. That is my own view, and I am thankful to have my hands strengthened in this matter by the observations that have been made this evening. As the House is aware, this law is occasionally evaded in a manner which, with every desire to be strict, I am not always able to correct. At the same time it will be my duty on all occasions, as far as I can, to enforce that Rule strictly. I am persuaded that it is of great importance to our debates in this House, especially with regard to our relations with the other House, that no allusion should be made to debates in the other House; and that the unwritten law of Parliament herein should be strictly observed.

ARMY RECRUITING.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL — who had given Notice of his intention to move—

"That in the circumstances of the Country, it is necessary that sufficient provision should be made for two classes of soldiers, viz., men to enter the reserve after a short service at home, and long term men for general service including India," said, that the Rules of the House would not allow him to move his Resolution, but he wished again to refer to the subject in the hope that he might receive a satisfactory answer from the Secretary of State for War. The right hon. Gentleman told him on a former occasion that he (Sir George Campbell) had brought the question forward several times before, and he confessed that he had done so, for the reason that he could not get any answer to his question from the right hon. Gentleman. He was satisfied from the inquiries that he had made that the present mode of enlisting men for the Service was not successful. The right hon. Gentleman formerly said the subject was under consideration; and he (Sir George Campbell) hoped that some satisfactory conclusion had by this time been arrived at. The present mode of recruiting was not successful, and was not likely to be successful, either for the purpose of obtaining an efficient Home Army and Reserve or for providing an efficient Army for India and the Colonies. The Home Army was not, either in regard to number or quality, what the country would wish to see it. Next year the short-service men would begin to go out of the Army, and there would then be a double flow from its ranks with an increased demand for men, and he did not see where the supply was to come from. He was told, and he believed truly, that they would not get a sufficient flow of men into the Home service, and thence into the Reserve, if they were liable to be sent to India. That point deserved the careful consideration of the Government. Another question was, whether the present system would supply a sufficient number of men to answer the requirements of the Indian Army. He was of opinion that it would not. He thought he was, under the circumstances, right in saying that the service of each individual soldier in India under the six years' enlistment system would not, on an average, exceed three years, which was not by any means a sufficient time to acclimatize him or to supply the wants of our Indian Empire. The fact was, that the six years' system was, he believed, good neither for the Home nor for the Indian Army, and that, besides men for Home service, sufficient inducements must be held out to men who were willing to make the Army their profession, which it was abundantly proved by official documents, were not now offered. A supply of long-service men was necessary for the purposes of India, and he thought India both ought and could bear the expenses which might be required in consequence. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would be able to inform the House that he was prepared to carry out that which was set forth in his own Regulations, which directed that one-half of those who were recruited for the Army should be long-service men, and to explain how it was that he proposed to obtain long-service men for India. He (Sir George Campbell) had found the system the right hon. Gentleman was so anxious to recommend was neither more nor less than that already set forth in the Army Regulations, although he regretted to say they were not acted on, and that they were practically a dead letter. He had questioned his constituents as to whether they would be able to get artizans and men of that class, to join the Army under the existing system, and they always replied in the negative; but it might be possible to do so if men might enlist for Home service only.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was not at all surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have reverted to the subject of his remarks, for it was one of great interest. He himself had already informed the hon. Gentleman that he was quite aware that it was extremely desirable that there should be a longer service in India than could generally be procured from short-service men. It was a subject which was under discussion between the War and India Offices, but he did not think he should be justified in stating at present what were the propositions which he had made with respect to it to the latter Department, although they were such as would, he believed, secure an adequate service of men who went to India. The object sought, he thought, would be obtained by the following provision—that those men who had already enlisted would not, of course, be held to any bargain but that into which they had entered, but there might be a system under which no man should serve less than five years in India, and as a general rule not more than eight; for medical evidence was emphatic on the point that that was as long as a man ought to be kept there if he were to be fit for the Reserve when he returned to this country. The hon. Gentleman, as an outsider, thought he saw more of the game than those who were immediately mixed up in it, and, indeed, almost everybody was ready to furnish him with a plan to make an Army; but he could not see how a long-service Army for India was to be provided from a short-service Army for England. He believed the connection between the Army in England and the Army in India was essential to the character of both, and assisted mainly in keeping up the glorious associations of the Service, in which sentiment was found to have very great effect. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the Army of boys they were getting, and he (Mr. Hardy) could only say he was extremely glad to get them. He should be very glad to get a superior class of men, but he could not get them by compulsion; he could only get them by their volunteering, and they did not volunteer, and he was afraid they would not get very much for the Army except from the class which did usually volunteer. They might call them boys; but, looking back to the description given by the Duke of Wellington, they would find that they were no worse, at all events, than those the noble Duke described. Indeed, they were much better, if reference was made to the Duke's letter to Earl Bathurst. But having, in the discussion of the Estimates, arrived at the Vote for matériel, it was, perhaps, a little incongruous that they should revert again to the men. He could only assure the hon. Gentleman, who was as sensitive on this question as he himself was, that, having taken great pains to arrive at a proper conclusion with reference to India in this matter by a system of longer service, he had submitted to his noble Friend a plan which he trusted would be satisfactory. He was, however, not prepared to give up the Reserves, but he was about to test them almost immediately, though he could not say with what result. Surely he could not give them up without testing them, and he would do it in perfect fairness, not with the view of bolstering up a system which was not his, but to bring it to the test of real efficiency; and if he found it fail, he would be prepared to act accordingly, for his object was to have an efficient Army.

COLONEL MURE pointed out that the last Medical Reports had omitted to state the number of men in the regiments quartered in India who, owing to youth, and debility arising from youth, were unable to do duty with their regiments in the hotter stations. In all former Reports these statistics had been given. It must be remembered that we were the only nation in Europe which was obliged to maintain a comparatively large Force on a war footing—namely, our Army in India. It was admitted that for the safety of our Indian Empire every man in the Army in India ought to be prepared to take the field at any moment. That could not be said to be the case, if a large proportion of the rank and file were so young and weak as to be unable to perform the ordinary duty of peace time, and if it was necessary to send them to be nursed in Hill stations. The Report of 1872—the last which had been issued containing this information—showed what a large proportion of some regiments were, for the above causes, absent from their ordinary duty in Hill stations. He trusted that future Reports would give fuller information on this important point, as from it alone could a fair opinion be formed upon the efficiency of our regiments, which, under the short-service system, were necessarily composed of very young soldiers. With regard to short service, he feared they did not sufficiently consider to what a large extent the duties of the Army lay in India and the Colonies. The class from which the Army was drawn, like all mercenary armies raised without conscription, was the poorest class. In Germany and in the French Army there were very few who had not got something, owing to the great division of property; but in our Army the possession of any property, if anything at all, was quite infinitesimal in amount. Their Armies were very rarely called to distant countries, and their Reserves would never be sent out of Europe; whereas the duty of our Armies lying in distant countries and often in pestilential climates, our Reserves would be called out for foreign service and for long periods. The result therefore of calling out a large Reserve of such men as had been in our Army would be to ruin them. The working classes were most improvident, and it would be a most serious thing to call out 10,000 of them for service in India at a short notice. He hoped that the Secretary for War would carefully consider the responsibility which would devolve upon him calling out a large number of men from civil life. He was very glad the right hon. Gentleman, sensible of all the difficulties of the case, was taking into his careful consideration what was required for the Army in India as well as at home and in the colonies.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that we chiefly wanted a short-service system so as to get Reserves. He thought that six years' service was too long for an Army with Reserves, and that the term might be shortened to two or three years. His own opinion was, that in ordinary cases when they sent men to India they must give up all idea of getting them into the Reserve. Men out there should have the option of completing a long service of 15 or 20 years.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, according to all the evidence on the subject it was not at all desirable, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway seemed to think, that the soldier should remain in India more than nine or ten years at the outside, for if he were to remain longer he would come back an exhausted man, not fit for the Reserve or anything else. What we ought to aim at was to keep the soldier in India such a time as to give us a sufficient service there and to bring him back a useful member of society. His hon. Friend who had brought forward the subject (Sir George Campbell) had misunderstood the present rules with regard to long and short service. His hon. Friend did not understand that there should be a certain proportion of long-service and short-service men in each regiment, the long-service men being intended to act as non-commissioned officers and in other capacities. The reason why so few men had been taken for long-service of late was that there had been no short-service until a few years ago, and it was necessary to enlist for short-service in order to bring the two classes of men to something like a level. What his hon. Friend really proposed was that we should have a separate Army for India. But any one who had to apply principles and theories to such a complicated machine as the British Army must know that there would be the greatest difficulty in altering the constitution of regiments in the way which his hon. Friend's plan would necessitate. For his own part, he would be sorry for the Secretary of State who had to divide the British Army into long-service and short-service regiments, the latter only for this country. Another objection was, that if our Reserve was to be of any use it should have some experience of India. His hon. Friend had spoken of his interview with his constituents, and had given their opinion as to recruiting; but it should be remembered that his countrymen in the country districts of Scotland were too canny to enlist in the Army in any great numbers. There was a great reluctance amongst the agricultural part of the community to enlist, but he did not think it had anything to do with the long or short-service question. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the matter was before the Secretary of State for India at present. He was sure it would be satisfactory to the House if some arrangement, such as was indicated in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in introducing the Army Estimates, could be come to, whereby a man enlisted for short service might be allowed to extend his service in India, while securing to us the benefit of his presence in the Reserve when he returned to his own country.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £370,400, Commissariat and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c.

(2.) £2,997,000, Provisions, Forage, Fuel and Light, Transport, &c.

(3.) £800,600, Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,229,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT said, the Committee would remember that he had on various occasions called attention to the question of the Martini-Henry rifle, believing that it was not the best weapon with which to furnish our Army. The difficulties of repairing the complicated lock in case of accident were so great that in actual service it would be perfectly impossible to overcome them. In 1871 he asked for a Committee to inquire especially into the construction of the lock, but a Committee was refused, though not by a very large majority. He admitted that a very competent Committee had chosen this arm, as in their opinion the best that could be procured; but he was fortified by the opinion of some of the best military authorities, that the lock was so complicated that in case of emergency it would fail, and of course the weapon would become perfectly useless. Since the present Government came into office he had to ask questions of his noble Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance, and had got some very curious statements from him. His noble Friend would not deny that the arm, at least as far as the lock was concerned, had been almost reconstructed since it was introduced into the Service. He contended that we ought never to have been called upon to expend such enormous sums to remedy the serious defects in the lock. His noble Friend had spoken of the amount as inconsiderable—3s. at one time and 3s. at another; but £75,000 was a very large sum to expend on each separate improvement. Independent Members in this House could not give the names of the various officers whom they had consulted; but there was hardly one who could not tell them that the present action of the Snider-Enfield was superior to that of the Martini-Henry. There were many persons who said that at Wimbledon and elsewhere the Martini-Henry shot admirably. He was not going to dispute it; but at Wimbledon and elsewhere there was always a man at hand to put the lock into repair at a moment's notice. But in a campaign in India or somewhere else, could a common soldier take the lock to pieces and put in a new spring if the old one got bad? With the rarest exceptions, every one who tried this rifle found some fault more or less. It went off when it was not asked to go off. It was true that attempts had been made to remedy its defects. Those attempts had been very costly. He believed this weapon would absolutely fail if it came to the practical test of war. At Perak it was reported on unfavourably, and it was said that after being fired a certain number of times it became too hot to hold, and the cartridges got jammed. Moreover, it was 4 inches shorter than any weapon used by Continental regiments, and that, he ventured to say, was a very great drawback. If you crossed bayonets—and that was done in the late war between France and Germany—what an advantage it would be to you to have a bayonet longer than that of your foe. The drawback could not be remedied by having a longer bayonet, for in that same war the elongated bayonet or sword bayonet was found to be practically useless, and was discarded. If the Secretary of State for War would only have an ordinary soldier up before him and ask him to repair the spring he would then find how useless the weapon was, and at what a disadvantage the British soldier would be placed in time of war. He believed the old Snider-Enfield rifle was a far better weapon than the Martini-Henry rifle, and that it would be utterly impossible to repair the latter weapon when on service. With the view of affording the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of giving the Committee an explanation on this subject, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £85,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £1,143,146, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive.”—(Sir Walter Barttelot.)

MR. MUNTZ supported the Amendment. He believed that after all the alterations and modifications which had been made, the great defect still existed—namely, that the weapon was so complex that in anything like a real campaign it would be unserviceable in the course of three months. The complicated character of the lock was so great that when it got out of order it was so difficult to repair it that it was almost certain in serious warfare to become useless. This, in combination with its shortness, were serious defects, and in a bayonet encounter would probably cause demoralization among the troops who were armed with it. They had had constant chopping and changing in that matter, and he did not see why they should be in so great a hurry. It was all very well to try experiments, but they ought to arrive at some definite conclusion as to what was the best rifle before they went on manufacturing it in any large quantity. As to rifles with the Whitworth barrel, he had fired 100 rounds with them in less than four minutes. The Snider was good for 800 yards. That being so, he thought until they had got something better that they could rely on, they might have kept it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the present Government was not responsible for the introduction of the Martini-Henry rifle, which had been taken up in a great hurry-scurry by a former Government. He had hoped that they would have had 750,000 Snider rifles stored in the arsenals, in excess of those in use, before they made any change of their weapon; but he well remembered that in that House speaker after speaker had put pressure on the War Office to induce it to adopt that change in the kind of arm which was now considered to be defective. It had been so frequently represented that the country was in danger with only the Snider in use; until the Martini-Henry rifle was adopted the means of offence and defence were wanting, and these would be put in perfect order, and the nation saved by the Martini-Henry rifle being forthwith manufactured in hundreds of thousands. This was all asserted at the very time the Germans were then fighting the French successfully with a weapon far inferior to our Snider rifle; but nevertheless we were not content, and nothing but the cry for the destruction of all the efficient and expensive machinery set up at the Enfield factory to manufacture the Snider was heard of, and new machinery to make the Martini-Henry introduced. That was ordered and intended to be completed in a short time, whereas he believed it occupied the factory two years to get all the works in order for the new and greatly lauded arm, and now that the work was going on the arm was condemned. However, the important point now was to try and satisfy the Army as to the completeness of the weapon that was put into its hands; and he urged on the Secretary of State the necessity of satisfying the soldier's mind in that respect.

CAPTAIN NOLAN observed, that that was not a question of going back to the Snider, but simply of having a new rifle. He considered that it would be a great mistake to spend £1,500,000 on a new rifle when they had such an excellent weapon in the Martini-Henry, which at 600 yards was 40 or 50 per cent quicker than the Snider. Although the lock of the Martini-Henry was somewhat complicated but a very small percentage of those rifles went out of order. An American Committee sat a few years ago to consider the subject, and their decision was that they would adhere to the breechloader until they got a magazine rifle. They were confident that ultimately such a weapon would be invented; and as that was not impossible, it would be foolish in us to enter upon a large expenditure for new breechloaders, which might ultimately be superseded for a superior weapon. Experiments showed that at a range of 1,000 yards the Snider had no chance against the Martini-Henry. They could not get beyond the present calibre of the Martini-Henry on account of the men's shoulders. During the late Franco-German War the Germans impressed their men who had to meet troops armed with the Chassepôt with the necessity of coming to close quarters. The moment, however, the war was over, the Germans obtained a long-range rifle, which showed that they believed such a weapon was useful. His general opinion was that the Martini-Henry was a very good weapon, and that no Army at the present moment had a better one.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that the responsibility of the Government in connection with the Martini-Henry arm was not for its introduction, but for its continuation; for when they came into office in 1874 they found that 104,000 rifles had been manufactured at a cost of something like £460,000, besides those in course of manufacture. A great deal had been said about hurry and scurry in the adoption of the Martini-Henry, but the fact was that no other weapon had ever had a longer trial. The history of the weapon went back as far as 1866, when General Peel, then Secretary for War, issued a notice to inventors stating that it was in contemplation to choose a breechloading rifle, and asking them to send in rifles for competition. One hundred inventors sent in various rifles, and the Martini-Henry was the one chosen. The Committee that reported upon that weapon was formed, not of Artillery officers only, as had been supposed, but of five or six Infantry officers and civilians, and one Artillery officer as Secretary. Their Report approved of the Martini-Henry, as far as it went. That approval was endorsed by the Council of Ordnance, and another Committee was formed, his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) being an active Member of it. That Committee, confirming the opinion of the preceding one, declared that the Martini-Henry, so far as shooting qualities were concerned, was equal, if not superior, to any rifle in Europe. He did not think that opinion could be gainsaid. In the matter of lightness, accuracy, and cost he believed the Martini-Henry was unequalled. The Mauser, which was the German rifle, had been referred to as cheap, but he happened to know that it cost about £3 1s., while the Martini-Henry could be manufactured for about £2 13s. The latter, therefore, was not the costly weapon which the hon. Member for Birmingham supposed it to be, and so far as he (Lord Eustace Cecil) was aware, none of the regiments into whose hands it had been put had ever denied that it was one of the best weapons they had ever shot with. It was perfectly true that the Martini-Henry rifle was $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches shorter than any other in Europe, but the question of length had received very serious consideration. The bayonet invented by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) was thought of, but abandoned on account of its weight and cost. Then the Irish Constabulary bayonet was adopted to a certain extent. The bayonet finally approved for the rank and file was an elongated one, which made the Martini-Henry arm about an inch and a half longer than the Mauser and of about the same length as the Chassepôt, to the best of his recollection. At any rate, the Martini-Henry rifle mounted with the elongated bayonet was practically as long as any similar weapon in Europe. Of course, objection might be taken to the length of the bayonet, but that was a question which the military authorities were the best able to decide. Whatever opinions might be entertained on that point, the fact remained that one of the principal objections made to the Martini-Henry rifle, that of its shortness, fell to the ground. The question of balance was not one, he thought, on which any difficulty would arise. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), although admitting that the barrel of the Martini-Henry was good, took exception to the lock; and, indeed, it was only that part of the rifle which might be said to be seriously called in question. The great objection to the lock was that it was complicated, and that it required an expert not only to put it together, but to keep it in order. Well, the expert was there in the person of the armourer-sergeant, who ought certainly to be able to put the lock into proper order. But the Martini-Henry was not the only arm which was liable to become unserviceable. On the very morning of the battle of Inkermann a brother officer of his, being on picket duty, found that the nipples of the muskets of his company had got stopped up in consequence of dampness during the night. He immediately marched them to head-quarters, had the nipples put in order, and then marched back to help in the accomplishment of that great feat of valour, which had conferred so much glory on English arms. If he had not adopted that sensible course, and had not had the aid of an armourer-sergeant to put the nipples into order, his company would have been disabled on that critical occasion, and very serious consequences might have ensued. Even if they were to go back to the old Brown Bess it would be necessary that there should be some one to look after the arms and keep them in order. He thought, however, it behoved those who said the Martini-Henry rifle was an excellent weapon to look after it a little more closely than they had done. It had come to his knowledge—he would not say that it had not received fair play, for that was a strong term—but it had come to his knowledge that it had been allowed to get rusty and out of order, the result being that when people put it to any sudden test or trial they found that it did not work with that perfection that they might expect. There was no finality in these weapons; but although they had not arrived at perfection or finality, he thought it would be most unsatisfactory and most expensive to be changing their weapon every three or four years before they put it to the test of active warfare. Had they put the Martini-Henry to the test of active warfare? They had one report from Perak, which stated that after a certain time the weapon got hot and out of order, and that the men had to throw it away; but since then they had reports of the campaign, and not a single fault was found with the rifle. There had been a solitary report, and that was all. Do not let the Committee suppose—and he hoped the country would not suppose—that the Martini-Henry was the only gun in which defects had been found. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Muntz) spoke of the Snider as being a superior weapon. [Mr. MUNTZ had only said that until they got something better they might have kept it.] Before the Snider was adopted finally defects were discovered, quantities had to be returned to the stores, and reports which he had before him showed numerous defects which had been found out. Indeed, no rifle when first introduced was entirely satisfactory. There was no doubt the Martini-Henry had been put to wonderful trials, and it must be allowed that it had come out very fairly. It was not perfectly understood at present, but when it was he believed it would be appreciated. In the spiral action it was not singular, and as to the alleged great recoil of which they at first heard a great deal now nothing was said about it. He did not view the Martini-Henry as a final weapon; but he believed, as it stood, it was as good a rifle as they could possibly wish for. They had cured a great many defects. It was the best shooting rifle in Europe, and the lock, whatever might be its disadvantages, if properly taken care of, would work well.

LORD ELCHO said, his noble Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance having done him the honour to refer to him as having been on the Committee who sat on the Martini-Henry rifle, he hoped he would be permitted to say a word on the subject. Although a Member of that Committee, he had nothing to do with the selection of that arm as the rifle for the British Army. That was done by the first Committee, for there were two, and he was a Member of the second only, which had to consider the Reports from regiments to which the Martini-Henry rifle had been issued on trial. A question having been raised as to the efficiency of the breech action, he felt that it was necessary to have an experienced mechanical engineer appointed a member of the Committee. This was done, and he was bound to say that the evidence given by gentlemen most eminent in their profession of engineers, respecting the Martini-Henry rifle, was that it was a most efficient weapon; and that the spiral spring principle in another weapon was mechanically sound and reliable. Then, as regarded the shooting of the Martini-Henry rifle, it had been shown that it was an infinitely superior weapon to any foreign rifle. He did not know what was meant by saying that it was a delicate weapon. The Committee subjected it to a harder trial than it would ever get in the field, and the gun withstood it. He was, therefore, not alarmed at the gun being called a delicate weapon; but he was alarmed at hearing from the noble Lord that they must look to an improved class of soldier, who would be more fit to handle delicate weapons. As regarded finality, of course nothing was final; and although there might be better rifles hereafter, at present this was, as regarded range and accuracy, the best military arm in Europe. In Switzerland he found that something like 700,000 shots had been fired from the Martini rifle at the Tir Federal without accident; but the Swiss were not armed with the Martini rifle, but with a different weapon. It was, indeed, at one time a "toss up" whether they were to adopt it or the "Wetzler," a repeating rifle, but the latter was chosen. It had always been, he might add, a matter of great surprise to him that the first Committee should have rejected all repeating rifles in favour of breech-loaders, because it was manifest that troops armed with repeaters would occupy relatively the same position towards those which happened to be armed with breech-loaders that the latter would hold in reference to those who had only muzzle-loaders. The Swiss repeating rifle had a magazine containing 11 cartridges, and it shot with accuracy and at long ranges; but he had seen an American rifle—Green's—which had the advantage that it could be used either as a repeater or a single barrel. It was, in his opinion, one of the best rifles which had been brought under his notice, and in cases in which rapid firing at close quarters was desirable, it would be very serviceable. ad. to him, therefore, that those who were responsible for the arming of our troops would be wanting in their duty if they were to decline to give due consideration to the merits of such weapons. As to the Martini-Henry, there had at one time been an organized set made against it by some disappointed inventor; and it was very certain that, whatever rifle was adopted, it would encounter the like opposition. Allusion had been made to a sword-bayonet which bore his name. Now, he did not himself stand up in this House as a disappointed inventor—he did not claim to be an inventor. When he went on the Committee there were a rifle and a bayonet submitted to them. The Committee succeeded in getting the rifle reduced a pound in weight, and the Committee that sat previously on the subject had reduced it in their time also in weight, so that the weapon was considerably lightened and rendered more manageable. But as to the bayonet which the first Committee adopted, it was simply the old straight sword bayonet with a saw at the back, which, while it was not peculiarly adapted to be a thrusting, was a most inefficient cutting instrument. Now, what was wanted in the Army was a weapon that would cut wood readily. There were endless occasions when a soldier would find the advantage of such a weapon—in cutting wood for fuel, for making gabions, fascines, and abattis, in cutting his way through jungle, hedges, or other obstacles. Formidable though a bayonet looked at the end of a rifle, and much as was heard of bayonet charges, still bayonet wounds were almost unknown, the whole percentage of killed and wounded by cold steel, including swords, in the Franco-German War having been only 2 per cent. He therefore went to Mr. Wilkinson, of Pall Mall, the best sword cutter in Europe, and with the help of Mr. Latham, his partner, a form of sword bayonet was devised which, while most formidable as a thrusting weapon, was, as a cutting instrument, as powerful as any woodman's bill, being formed on the principle of the famous Ghoorka knife. Lord Sandhurst, when it was shown to him, in a letter which he wrote to the Committee, described it as supplying a want which had been long felt in the Army. Well, the Committee, having deliberated, adopted that form of weapon, and it having been begun to be manufactured and issued by the Government, he should like to know why its issue had suddenly been stopped in deference to the report of a departmental Committee of whom the name of a single Member was unknown to the country? Rumour said that the reason why the issue had been stopped was that the bayonet was one which fixed at the end of the rifle would not look well in Pall Mall in the hands of a sentry! At least, no better reason had been given. If the objection to the adoption of this bayonet was not a question of appearance or weight, it must be a question of expense—the matter of a shilling or two—and surely this nation was not so poor that it could not give its small Army the best weapon that could be obtained.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, his noble Friend was wrong in supposing that his services were not valued, even though the sword bayonet which he proposed had not been adopted for the Army. He had never before to-night heard it alleged as a reason for giving up the sword bayonet that it would not make a good appearance in Pall Mall. Again, his noble Friend was wrong in supposing that the expense would be very small. The ordinary bayonet which was now proposed, of a lengthened pattern, would, with its scabbard, cost 4s. 1½d.; whereas the sword bayonet, with its scabbard, would cost 15s. 6d. Rich as the country was, we could hardly be expected to pay so large a sum except for something of superlative excellence. The ordinary bayonet, he might remark, was 10 ounces lighter than the proposed sword bayonet. He need not detain the House with any observations concerning the rifle itself. Our forces were, he believed, armed at the present time with a weapon which was well calculated to meet any one of a different kind in the hands of any enemy whom we were likely to encounter; and although there might be some defects in it, those defects had been remedied by the mechanical ingenuity of our gunsmiths in such a manner as to prevent their recurrence. At all events, until we saw the superiority of some weapon of a totally different kind, we had better content ourselves with that which we already possessed.

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT said, that after the remarks of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing. It was because he believed that the lock of the weapon was defective that he had thought it right to bring the matter before the House.

CAPTAIN NOLAN wished to know how many breech-loading rifles there were in the country?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that the number of Sniders in use for the Land Forces was 323,484, and the number of Martini-Henrys 93,020, making a total of 416,504 breech-loading arms. The total number of breech-loading arms now in use, or which would probably be in store on March 31, 1877, would, it was hoped, amount to 891,061. Too much stress had been laid on his remarks about the educated soldier. All he meant to say was, that a man should be able to take care of his arms.

MR. MUNTZ said, as far as the interests of his constituents were concerned, it would be to their advantage to see the Army provided with the worst possible weapon, because they would have to manufacture a greater number of them. The present weapon, on its introduction four years ago, was eulogized and stated to be perfection, but now 20 defects in it, some of which were not yet remedied, had been admitted.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £845,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."

MR. J. R. YORKE, who had given Notice of a Motion to omit the sum of £17,000 for the re-construction of Knightsbridge Barracks, said, if it were merely a question of taste he should not have troubled the Committee on the subject, but there was the matter of convenience to be considered. There were many disadvantages attending the retention of the present site, which he had always contended was inadequate; indeed, it had been officially reported as such for the purposes of barracks, and, if so, after the road had been widened, as was proposed, it would be still more inadequate and inconvenient. As a question of convenience, therefore, as well as of good taste, he would recommend to the favourable consideration of the Secretary for War the proposal of Sir Henry Cole to erect a new barrack 100 feet back from the site of the present building, and to allow the ground which they occupied to revert to the Park in the shape of an ornamental garden. With reference to the suggestion, he believed that the best authorities were of opinion that more commodious barracks might be erected to the north of the present buildings. It had often been urged that the barracks occupied by the Household troops ought to remain in Hyde Park, because it might be necessary to employ those troops against mobs of people who had gathered in the Park for unlawful purposes. There were two answers to this argument—an argument which he utterly rejected. In the first place, they could have no object in doing so, now that the question of holding meetings there was settled; and if disorderly mobs were to gather at all, it was surely much better that they should assemble in the Parks than they should choose the neighbourhood of, say, the Houses of Parliament, or the thickly-populated districts of the metropolis; and, in the second place, if it become necessary to deal with such persons, the soldiers to be employed for the purpose should not be the Household troops, who were stationed constantly in London, but men drawn from distant garrisons for the special purpose. The last time they were employed against the people was at the funeral of Queen Caroline. Several people were then killed, and the Life Guards were long known as "the Piccadilly butchers." Troops living on the spot ought not to be so employed. The Duke of Wellington did not rely on the Household troops in 1848, and there was abundance of cavalry and infantry at Colchester and at Aldershot within an hour's rail of the metropolis. With regard to the sanitary part of the question, there was sufficient evidence on the Table of the House, in the Reports of Professor Parkes of the Royal Commission of 1863, and of the Sanitary Commission of 1861, all of which were overwhelmingly strong in favour of separating the horses and the men, and unanimous in affirming that the health of both would be improved thereby. All the evidence given before those bodies showed that it was injurious to the health of the horses to have anything except the stable roof between them and the outer air, while it was still more injurious to the health of the men to have them lodged over the horses, as their rooms were saturated with the odour of the stables. They also reported that the site of the barracks had been shown to be inconvenient; and, further, that a convenient one could without difficulty be found. The conclusion which he had come to was that in the absence of an overwhelming necessity, it would be very wrong to erect new barracks on the old site, and therefore he must ask the right hon. Gentleman at the eleventh hour to re-consider the matter and adopt the suggestion referred to; for if he did that he would give satisfaction to the people of London, and especially to the people residing at Knightsbridge. He now left the issue in the hands of the Committee, being conscious that he had left nothing undone to press what he considered an important matter on their attention.

MR. FORSYTH, in seconding the Motion, said that, though it would be in vain to hope to resist the Vote, yet, if hon. Members were willing to listen to facts, he would show that the new barracks ought not to be erected on the present site. When the barracks were first erected in 1780 at the time of the "Lord George Gordon Riots," the site was nothing but green fields, and Knightsbridge a small village. Now, they were an unsightly excrescence on one of the noblest suburbs of the metropolis, and he submitted that, if they wanted a good approach to the metropolis from the West of England, they must pull down the present barracks and leave the space vacant for the erection of good houses. So long as the barracks remained in their present position, no contractor could be found to undertake the erection of a single good house in the place of the mean and disreputable edifices which now existed. This he said, fully admitting that he had nothing whatever to allege against the soldiers who inhabited the barracks. He had hardly ever seen one of them drunk, nor had he ever seen a soldier enter a public-house in the neighbourhood. He insisted that if the barracks did not already exist there, the Secretary for War would not obtain a single shilling for their erection at Knightsbridge. It could not be asserted that no other site for them could be found, because several had been pointed out, and if all who had the improvement of London at heart voted for their removal, one of them would soon be chosen. Nor could it be said that these barracks were necessary for strategic purposes, because there had been, happily, no collision between the military and the populace of London for the last 90 or 100 years, and the difference of time in the arrival of troops from Chelsea or from Hyde Park could not be more than five or ten minutes. That delay would not endanger the peace of London, and there was, therefore, no necessity for retaining the barracks where they were.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £17,000, for the Reconstruction of the Hyde Park Cavalry Barracks, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Reginald Yorke.)

GENERAL SHUTE said, he did not think the House of Commons the place where such details as he had listened to regarding this question should be discussed. It was one to be decided alone by military authorities, and not by hon. Members of that House, most of whom knew nothing of Cavalry, or the mode in which Cavalry regiments should be accommodated. He thought the site at Knightsbridge a most valuable one, and sincerely hoped it would be retained. Our Household Cavalry were kept down to a low point, and it might happen that they would only be able, when wanted, to mount 200 horses. Every one knew the importance of not irritating the mob by a display of force, and the advantage of these barracks was that the authorities could quietly and unobtrusively concentrate in them, not only one or two battalions of Infantry, but a large force of police, who could act with the Cavalry in case of necessity. The removal of the barracks to a more northern portion of the Park has been suggested, but a road must be made, and there would be waggon loads of manure to carry from the stables. He would, however, recommend a still larger expenditure than the War Office now proposed, so as to bring the riding school nearer the men and horses. It was said that it was undesirable for sanitary reasons that the men should not sleep over their horses, and the opinion of medical men had been quoted. He did not care what medical men said, but let them ask the opinion of commanding officers of Cavalry regiments. There would be a great deal more disease through men getting wet in going to and from their stables. When he was at Shorncliffe his men were half-a-mile from their stables, and they were always getting cold and being laid up from having to go and look after their horses in the rain. Where did their grooms in London sleep but in rooms over their horses? and the Cavalry stables were much cleaner and better ventilated than private stables. It was far better that the stables should be under the barrack rooms than at a distance from them.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that this was more or less a question of economy; the War Office would be called upon to pay a large sum of money for any other site. To remove the present barracks, and build a new one would also entail large expenses which, he believed, the country might not be disposed to pay. He believed that the Government would be glad to provide new officers' houses further to the west if they were not afraid of the expense, which would amount to about £15,000. To place barracks on the right side of the road going westwards would simply ruin the appearance of the Park, and spoil the grass-plot there, without deriving any material advantage from such a position.

COLONEL ALEXANDER called attention to the disgraceful state of the huts connected with the Beggar's Bush Barracks in Dublin, which, he said, were entirely worn out, and expressed a hope that the Secretary for War would order them to be pulled down as soon as possible. They called for improvement quite as much as the barracks under consideration.

MR. ADAM supported the Amendment, contending that the elevation of the new barracks, as shown by the model exhibited in the Tea Room, was not such as would add to the beauty of that part of London in which it was proposed they should be erected, while the site was a bad one so far, as furnishing those conveniences which barracks ought to possess. He also objected to the argument that it was desirable to have troops near Hyde Park, as it were to overawe the people who might assemble there for objects which might be perfectly legitimate, observing that those who were bent on mischief would not be likely to meet in the vicinity of barracks. He suggested that a better site than that at Knightsbridge might be found near Chelsea Hospital, and that another and more healthy place might be provided for the boys by whom the schools there were occupied.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY excused himself, on the ground that the subject had been repeatedly discussed, from entering into it at any length. He denied that he had ever made use of the argument that it was desirable to keep troops in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park, for the purpose of acting against the people. So long as the meetings held there were confined to proper objects, and properly conducted, there was no wish on the part of the Government to interfere with them at all. But it was very expedient that there should be an open space in the immediate vicinity of Cavalry Barracks in order that the troops upon an emergency might be able to move in every direction without passing through narrow streets. As to removing the barracks to Chelsea, he hoped the Committee would not think he was wrong in not spending more money than he could avoid in dealing with the question, seeing that he had at hand a site which he was informed would furnish all that was requisite for Cavalry barracks, and that he was assured on the best authority that the health of the men would not suffer from sleeping over the stables. Indeed, in the most recently erected barracks—those at Colchester—where there were no other considerations at work than the advantage of the troops—the men's quarters were placed over the stables. With regard to Sir Henry Cole, when it was suggested to him that his scheme was costly, he pointed out that that was no affair of his, but to beautify London. It might be very well to propose plans admirable for their æsthetic qualities; but, at the same time, they must not be unmindful of economy. The duty of the Secretary of State, however, was not to beautify London; and as to æsthetic qualities, they were matters about which tastes very much dif-ferred. It was therefore his duty to keep economy in view, while at the same time he had to take care that nothing should be done offensive to the neighbourhoods where the barracks were. Even on that score the elevation of the new barracks would, he believed, bear favourable comparison with any of those magnificent houses to which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had referred. If the House of Commons wished to put him in possession of enormous sums for that purpose that would be an affair for them to consider. There was, however, no site which he could find which for various reasons was so advantageous as that at Knightsbridge, and he hoped the Committee would agree to the Vote without further discussion.

LORD ELCHO thought that although it might be no part of the duty of his right hon. Friend to beautify London, he should take care that barracks were not erected which would be a disfigurement to the Metropolis. He should vote for the Knightsbridge site as, in his opinion, the best; but then he should like to have an understanding with the right hon. Gentleman that he would not bind himself by any contract, until the public had been enabled to judge of the probable effect of the new buildings by means of a model on a sufficient scale.

MR. MUNTZ thought the situation of the barracks at Knightsbridge most excellent, and it would be folly to throw away money in buying another site. He should certainly vote against the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 125: Majority 111.

MR. E. J. REED wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the state of the question with reference to the Moncrieff system of gun carriages; and to ask, whether it was now carried out on the mechanical principle on which it was first introduced, or on the hydraulic principle Major Moncrieff proposed at a later period?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that Major Moncrieff last year made his final settlement with the War Office, and a Vote was taken to complete the payments due to him. Since that period Major Moncrieff had applied himself to utilizing the hydraulic principle in working heavy guns; but with that the War Office had nothing to do. They were, however, seeing what could be done in applying hydraulic apparatus to the working of the larger guns.

CAPTAIN NOLAN observed, that the Moncrieff system had, in the estimation of a great number of persons out-of-doors, been somewhat suddenly dropped by the Government without any adequate reason having been given for doing so. He thought it would have been more satisfactory had the Government brought the invention forward a little, in order to ascertain exactly what its merits were.

MR. E. J. REED said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his question. What he wished to know was, whether the Government intended mounting guns which should disappear when fired; and, if so, whether they would do it on the hydraulic principle?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, there were two systems of Major Moncrieff, one the counter-weight system, the other the hydraulo-pneumatic system; the former they had adopted, the latter had been reported against, and they had not used it.

MR. HAYTER asked for some explanation as to the proposed expenditure of £3,000 in the repair of Knightsbridge Barracks, and as to the amount to be spent upon the huts at Shorncliffe? He also wished to know, what benefit would be derived from the proposed reclaiming of part of the Long Valley at Aldershot?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the matter of the huts would require great consideration; but, in the meantime, it was necessary to make the proposed expenditure at Shorncliffe. The Horse Guards would be quartered, some at Regent's Park, Knightsbridge, and Hampton Court, during the rebuilding of the Knightsbridge Barracks.

Vote agreed to.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £144,100, Establishments for Military Education.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, he presumed, from the age for officers entering the Cavalry being extended to 22 years, there was great difficulty in getting a sufficient number to join the

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was the pension of Mr. Greig.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £144,600, Widows' Pensions, &c.

(13.) £16,500, Pensions for Wounds.

(14.) £35,400, Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals.

(15.) £1,220,000, Out-Pensions.

MR. GORST complained that many men who had served for many years in the Army meritoriously had not those pensions paid to them to which they were entitled.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON also referred to cases of a similar nature, and asked why pensions to soldiers of 18 years service were not awarded according to the terms of the Royal Warrant of 1870?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the subject of pensions was under the consideration of the Government, and he hoped it would be arranged satisfactorily in a short time.

(16.) £164,200, Superannuation Allowances.

(17.) £34,300, Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS V.—COLONIAL, CONSULAR, AND OTHER FOREIGN SERVICES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £181,663, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad.”

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Dr. Cameron.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(18.) £33,164, to complete the sum for Colonies, Grants in Aid.

(19.) £2,590, to complete the sum for Orange River Territory and St. Helena.

(20.) £3,282, to complete the sum for Commissions for Suppression of the Slave Trade.

(21.) £12,007, to complete the sum for Tonnage Bounties, &c. and Liberated African Department.

MR. RYLANDS said, that these tonnage bounties were additions to the pay of the naval officers employed on the East Coast of Africa for the capture of slave dhows. They were entitled to the bounties if no slaves were on board the captured dhows, and he believed that dhows were occasionally seized which were engaged in lawful traffic.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that all captures had to be regularly condemned by a Prize Court, and when that Court issued its orders, the Treasury had no option but to find the money. These bounties were paid under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and if the hon. Member was dissatisfied, the proper course for him would be to bring in an amending Bill.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £4,017, to complete the sum for Emigration.

(23.) £1,600, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

(25.) £28,900, to complete the sum for the Merchant Seamen's Fund, Pensions, &c.

(26.) £27,000, to complete the sum for the Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

In reply to Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that it was not found expedient to give the Legations abroad a general power to send home distressed British subjects. They were not always the most deserving persons, and such a power might lead to considerable and embarrassing charges. Occasions, however, did arise when it was right to undertake such duties.

Vote agreed to.

(27.) £3,738, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable Allowances, &c. Great Britain.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

WILD FOWL PRESERVATION BILL.

[BILL 42.]

(Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Rodwell.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY having given Notice of a Motion to reject the Bill,

MR. CHAPLIN explained that the Act of 1872, which was brought in for the same purpose, was rendered useless by an Amendment which Mr. Auberon Herbert succeeded in passing by a majority of 5 in a thin House, and which made the penalties so small that the Act had ever since been worthless for the purpose for which it was intended. The present Bill merely proposed to give protection to wild fowl during the breeding season.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was on the Committee to which the subject had been referred, and he would express his opinion that the Bill ought to be allowed to pass.

Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

ELECTION OF ALDERMEN (CUMULATIVE VOTE) BILL.—[BILL 46.]

(Mr. Heygate, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Morley.)

FURTHER PROCEEDING ON SECOND READING.

Further Proceeding on Second Reading resumed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the Bill would have the effect of rendering municipal elections political, while at present they were non-political. He should, therefore, move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Mundella.)

The House divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 41: Majority 8.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ROWLEY HILL moved the Adjournment of the House, urging that it was most unfair that it should be proceeded with now, when it was understood that the Bill was not to come on, and most of its opponents were absent in consequence.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Rowley Hill.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had voted for the Adjournment of the Debate because he felt that there was a great diversity of opinion on the Bill; but the House having expressed itself upon that point, he did not feel that he ought to interfere further with the discussion of the Bill at that stage.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that the Bill involved a most serious and important change in the conduct of municipal elections, and required hours for its thorough discussion. That being so, he thought it most improper that an attempt should now be made to force on the discussion of the Bill, when, contrary to what had been the expectation, it was called on only fifteen seconds before half-past 12 o'clock, after which, by the Rule of the House, unopposed Business could not be taken.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 47: Majority 26.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. RAMSAY said, that justice had not been done to hon. Members on his side of the House in pressing on this discussion at so late an hour, and he therefore moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that perhaps after what had occurred it would be better to adjourn, and he, therefore, assented to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

CUSTOMS DUTIES CONSOLIDATION BILL.

ARMY CHAPLAINS—COMPENSATION.

QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is prepared to recommend that compensation should be made to Army Chaplains compelled to retire under the age clause of the Warrant 1st April 1875, similar to that made to Medical Officers retiring under similar circumstances under the Warrant of 1st May 1876?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had made a recommendation upon the matter referred to to the Treasury, but he must dispute the statement in the Question that the circumstances under which the chaplains retired were the same as in the case of the medical officers. The conditions under which the chaplains held their offices were different from those under which the medical officers held theirs, and therefore he could not make a similar recommendation.

METROPOLIS—ST. JAMES'S PARK.

QUESTION.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY (for Mr. J. G. TALBOT) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has been able to take any measures for the lighting of the enclosure in St. James's Park, to which the Secretary to the Treasury promised his attention in August last?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury he had made a careful examination into the question whether it would be possible or advisable to light the enclosure in St. James's Park, and he did not find that he could make any satisfactory arrangement for carrying out that object.

ARMY—1st SOMERSET MILITIA.
QUESTION.

MR. A. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the case that the application of the First Somerset Militia for ammunition to fire a feu de joie on the Queen's birthday was refused, and if there is any objection to state the reason for that refusal?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the regiment had drawn its full supply of ammunition for the year, and under the existing regulations no more could be issued.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.
QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Post Office Savings Banks system might not be beneficially extended by giving leave to depositors to lodge larger sums than they can now do both in each year and in the aggregate; and, whether he will consider the desirability of all Telegraph Stations and Money Order Offices taking deposits?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The question whether large sums may not be lodged by depositors in one year and also in the aggregate is already under the consideration of the Government. Savings bank deposits are taken at all money order offices throughout the United Kingdom. There are only 195 post offices in the United Kingdom at which telegraph business is transacted which are not open for money order or savings bank business, and these are situated in localities where savings bank business is not likely to arise. There are about 1,800 telegraph offices at railway stations, but these offices are under the control of the railway companies, and could not be made available for savings bank business.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.
QUESTION.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of the scheme known as the "Channel Tunnel" scheme being attempted to be carried into effect, the Government will provide that the consent of Parliament be first obtained?

MR. BOURKE: In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I am able to assure him that in the event of the scheme he has referred to being attempted to be carried into effect, the Government have already provided for authority to conclude a treaty—and a treaty will be necessary—and that treaty must receive the sanction of Parliament before being carried into effect.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, looking to the condition of the "personnel" of the Mercantile Marine, he will afford any facility for the early consideration of the Training Schools and Ships Bill and the Mercantile Marine Hospital Service Bill, now waiting the Second Reading, these Bills having been before the House all last Session as well as this?

MR. DISRAELI: My first duty is, of course, to carry, if possible, those Bills which have been introduced on the part of the Government, those Bills dealing with subjects which we think are of most pressing importance. When they have been carried, or are in a position which is equivalent to their ultimate success, I shall be very happy on the part of the Government to place any time which is at our disposal at the command of hon. Members, and to apportion that time among those subjects which are most interesting to the House. The measures noticed by my hon. Friend no doubt refer to subjects which no one can deny are interesting; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the manner in which those subjects are treated in those Bills to give any definite opinion on the course which should be taken with them. But the first engagement which the Government have in regard to time, independently of that which must be devoted to the passing of their own measures, is with the hon. and learned Member who introduced a debate on Irish Land Tenure, and which I promised, on the part of the Government, an opportunity of continuing.

MALTA—CIVILIAN GOVERNMENT.
QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If Government has considered the policy of acceding to the desire of the Maltese for the appointment of a civilian governor on the retirement of the military governor next year, and for such reform in the constitution of the Council that it may have more of a representative character than it now has?

MR. J. LOWTHER: No official communication, Sir, upon this subject has been recently made to the Government, but the question has been brought forward from time to time. The conclusion at which we have arrived is that, having regard to the position of Malta as an important fortress, it would not be advisable to take any step in the direction indicated by the hon. Gentleman.

ARMY—LOCALIZATION OF THE FORCES.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any difficulties have been experienced in carrying into effect the scheme called the "Localization of the Forces," as regards the relief of battalions abroad by their linked battalions from home; and, if so, what steps have been taken in consequence?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the Localization Scheme was not intended to be in full operation before the year 1879 or 1880. At present no difficulties had been experienced in this matter, but, if they should arise, it would, of course, be necessary to modify the scheme accordingly.

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES—THE NOBILITY OF MALTA.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What information has been received by the Government regarding the complaint of the Maltese nobility on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales to Malta?

MR. J. LOWTHER: A letter has been received from the honorary secretary of the Committee of the Nobles of Malta repeating the complaint referred to by the hon. Baronet. This letter has been forwarded to the Governor, whose explanations have not yet been received. We have, however, received a despatch written by the Governor—in consequence of his attention having been drawn to a Question put to me a short time back by the hon. Baronet—in which he explains that it had been originally intended that a number of addresses should be presented to the Prince of Wales, and that a high place had been assigned to the Nobles, which accorded with their desires as to the order of precedence. His Royal Highness, however, was unable to receive more than one address in person, and consequently the arrangements in question fell through. It was then suggested that the Nobles should take a prominent part in a procession formed in honour of the Prince, but this plan they declined to carry out, as the hon. Baronet is aware. He will, however, be glad to learn that several of the Nobility dined at the Palace to meet His Royal Highness, and others were present at an evening reception, and were presented by the Governor to the Prince. I need hardly add that Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to accord all proper respect to the Nobility of Malta so far as is consistent with their obligations to the rest of the community.

UNITED STATES—EXTRADITION TREATY—CASE OF EZRA WINSLOW. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a Despatch from Mr. Fish, dated May 22nd, 1876, in relation to the extradition of Ezra Winslow, was received at the Foreign Office on June 6th; and, whether there is any objection to lay the same upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, a despatch of the nature referred to had been received at the Foreign Office, and it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government ultimately to lay it upon the Table of the House; but it would be premature to do so before the Government had given an answer to it, which they had not yet done.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Return, ordered on the 21st February, respecting steps taken under the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Acts of last Session, is likely soon to be presented, and what has been the cause of the delay?

Mr. Anderson

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that Returns on this subject had been received from the metropolis; but the reason why there had been a delay in the matter was, that they had not yet arrived from the sanitary authorities in the country.

PARLIAMENT — PRIVILEGE — POLITICAL COMMITTEE OF THE REFORM CLUB.—RESOLUTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: Sir, a letter has been received by an hon. Member of this House which I hold to be a gross breach of Privilege. It is in the following terms:—

“Reform Club, Pall Mall, May 26th, 1876.

“Sir,—I am desired by the Political Committee to inform you that a statement has been laid before them (copy of which I enclose) showing the Party votes given by you during the Sessions 1874, 1875, and 1876, to which they would invite your serious consideration, as they are of opinion that it would be unfortunate if any proceedings should have to be taken under Rule 29 of the club.

“I am, Sir,

“Your obedient Servant,

“LEWIS MORRIS,

“Acting Secretary pro tem. of the Political Committee of the Reform Club.

“H. W. Ripley, Esq., M.P.

Sir, I hold that to be a menace to a Member of this House, and a breach of the Privileges of this House, and as such I wish to address you on the point. No one looking at that letter can doubt that it contains a menace, although the menace may not be of great importance itself; but I think that as addressed to a Member of Parliament and a Member of this House it is of great importance to us. Had it not been for the opinion of others of greater experience than myself I should not have presumed to bring the matter forward; but it is our duty to protect Members of this House, and I think that I am justified on that ground in bringing it before the House. I can quite understand why it should not be brought forward by the hon. Member himself, who would naturally be loth to bring forward the names of the members of the Club who are his associates. I have had no communication with the hon. Member on the subject, as I have not the honour of his acquaintance; but I thought it right that the question should be brought under the notice of the House, and I accordingly intimated to him that it was my intention to do so. It has been ruled for more than two centuries that interference with a Member of this House, so far as regards not only his votes, but also his speeches, is a breach of Privilege. In the reign of William and Mary it was so ruled; and a unanimous Resolution of the House was passed in 1733 pronouncing anything in the shape of an obstruction to Members coming to the House or a menace to them in consequence of their behaviour in this House, to be a gross breach of Privilege. I hold that that letter contains a distinct threat to a Member of this House. With the rules of the Reform Club I have nothing to do. If a club chooses to make rules, and a Member joins it, and subscribes to its rules, he must abide by them; he must abide by them so far as to submit to the pains and penalties which they impose. With that I have no right to interfere; but it is a very different thing when Members of this House are written to in this manner, and the privileges of this House are invaded. If an hon. Member be expelled from his Club, which a great writer has said is “the only vengeance of modern society,” if he be expelled for his votes, that is a question for him: but when it comes to a threat with respect to specific votes, then I hold that that involves a question of the Privileges of this House. In the case of Sir Robert Peel, who has been described by a great living authority as the greatest Member of Parliament that ever lived, a writer who had made offensive remarks on his speeches was brought before the Bar of that House. Now, Sir, I have merely this to say, and I will endeavour to be brief. If this letter now before us had come into my possession in any manner which was not the most formal, I should not have brought it forward; but the matter has been brought before the House, it has been brought before the public; it has been put into The Times newspaper, not at our suggestion, but by a Gentleman sitting opposite; and I think, under any circumstances, it is absolutely impossible to pass over this matter unnoticed. I have undertaken a disagreeable duty, and in doing so I may have omitted arguments; but I wish to consult the dignity of the House, I wish to follow the precedents of the House, and, if I have done what I have done from a mistaken sense of duty, I hope the House will forgive me. I believe, as an observer and humble student of the law and practice of this House, that I have only done my duty. I have avoided all approach to personality: and as I fear that in what I have done I may have caused political discomfort to some Members of this House, I hereby personally and humbly beg their pardon. I wish to know, Sir, how far I shall be in Order in concluding with a Motion, not that this House do now adjourn, but on the matter on which I have addressed you?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet having brought before the House a question of breach of Privilege, he is bound to submit to the House a Resolution; and he is also bound to produce for the consideration of the House the very letter which is said to have been written.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: I think, under the circumstances, I will give my reason for not moving the opinion of this House upon this letter now, because I think it is desirable that more extended consideration should be given to it. I will therefore move that the writer of that letter, Mr. Lewis Morris, do attend at the Bar of this House on this day week.

MR. RIPLEY having risen to speak—

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member produce the letter himself which has been written? The letter from Mr. Morris should be produced and laid upon the Table of the House. At present there is no Question before the House; but I am prepared to submit the Question to the House if the hon. Baronet, in accordance with the ordinary practice of this House, having made a complaint, produces the document upon which he founds his complaint.

Letter given to the Clerk at the Table, and read accordingly.

MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Baronet be so good as to hand me the terms of the Resolution which he desires may be put from the Chair?

SIR WILLIAM FRASER advanced to the Table, and, having written the Motion, handed it to the Speaker.

Sir William Fraser

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that Mr. Lewis Morris, the writer of the letter now read, do attend at the Bar of this House on Monday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Lewis Morris, the writer of the said Letter, do attend at the Bar of this House on Monday next, at a quarter past Four of the clock."—(Sir William Fraser.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON: Is not the letter that has been produced marked "private," as I believe it is; but, if not, will the hon. Gentleman produce the envelope to show whether that is marked "private?" ["No, no!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Before this matter is discussed, it is right, that I should state to the House that the hon. Baronet, in the exercise of his discretion, has thought it right to bring before the House a matter which he regards as a breach of the Privileges of the House. No doubt any menace addressed to any Member of this House, in such a manner as to interfere with his freedom of action as a Member of this House, is a breach of Privilege. Whether the menace which has been stated by the hon. Baronet is of such a character, it is for the House to decide.

MR. RIPLEY: When I came down to the House this evening, I was not aware that this Motion was to be brought forward by the hon. Baronet. It was by mere accident that the letter happened to be in my pocket, a friend of mine having asked me to show it him this morning. I should have been glad to lay before the House the list of my votes upon which that letter has been written, because, in my opinion, most of these votes have been stated, first by one side and then by the other, not to be Party votes. A great many of these votes have been repudiated by hon. Members on both sides of the House as Party votes. I am very sorry that a matter of a personal character should have been introduced into the House, and I will endeavour in dealing with it to be as short as I can. But I did feel that when that letter was sent to me it was something more than a question of a personal character, and I did send that letter to The Times newspaper, so that hon. Members of the House might be able to judge as to the character of the question at issue. I am not here to express any opinion on the subject. I can only say that whatever the intention of the writer was, and whatever the influence of the letter upon me might be supposed to be, it never would weigh one straw or atom with me in any vote I might give. With reference to the letter, I may just further say that on the day following that on which those letters were published, I saw in The Times a letter purporting to be from a member of the Political Committee, in which he stated—of course, I speak from memory, but I believe I am correct—that my proposer and seconder, when I was elected to the Reform Club, had signed some document involving me in a certain political position. I immediately wrote to the Secretary of the Club, asking for a copy of that document, and the only reply I have received is that my request shall be laid before the Committee. But I may add this, that although being a Reformer, an honest Reformer, in the event of those gentlemen who proposed and seconded me being compromised by any action of mine, of course I should feel it my duty to retire from that Club.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he, also, had received one of these letters, in the same terms as the letter which had been read to the House. He had also been furnished with a list of the votes he had given during the last two or three Sessions of which the Political Committee of the Reform Club disapproved, and they had called his attention to the votes, holding up the penal consequences which would follow if he persisted in his wicked and perverse course. He had given no answer whatever to that letter, not from any want of courtesy or respect to the Political Committee of the Club, or the Club itself, but because he did not see how he could answer it without compromising the Privileges of that House. The hon. Baronet opposite said that when a man became a member of a Club he was bound by the rules of that Club; but if he felt that becoming a member of that Club, he must vote according to the dictates of the Whig Whips, he should have felt it his duty to retire from the Club. But on a careful examination of the rules of the Club he found the only thing required was for a member to be a Reformer. What was a Reformer? He believed they were all Reformers. That was to say, they all desired to reform what required reform. If the Reform Club said to a man—"You do not belong to our Party, therefore we wish you to withdraw," nobody would wish to object to that; but when a Political Committee of a Club ventured to send to a Member of Parliament a list of votes given in this House, and called his attention to those votes, making him responsible to the Club for them, it was quite a different thing. If they allowed any authority but their constituents to call Members of that House to account for their votes, they could not tell where it would stop, and it was the beginning of a system which might prove extremely dangerous. He therefore thought that a Member was bound for the safety of the Privileges of the House to deny the right of any one other than his constituents to question his votes or to interfere with his action. The Party votes in his case included a vote as to the Royal Titles Bill. Could that be said to be a Party vote? Another vote was something about the Church of Scotland, in regard to which he voted in deference to the wishes of some Scotch friends. ["Order!"] He should not enter any further into that matter; but he maintained that it behoved the House to put a stop to any interference with the free exercise of the judgment of a Member of Parliament in that House. No doubt in some cases a man's comfort might, to some extent, depend on his belonging to a particular Club, and if he were exposed to expulsion it might exercise some influence on him; but the question was really one of Privilege, and the House ought not to allow the Privileges of its Members to be interfered with.

MR. DISRAELI: It is very difficult to define what is a menace which may influence our votes in Parliament. Now, for example, suppose there is an article in a newspaper finding fault with your votes and saying that you have to give an account of them to your constituents, is that a menace? If so, it is a menace we receive almost every day of our lives. Therefore, the House will see that in questions of this kind they must not decide too hastily. I should have been very glad if you, Mr. Speaker, with your high authority, had at once settled the character of this question. My own opinion is, that if you take a technical view of the interpretation of our Rules, you may lay down certainly that this is an interference with our Privileges, as many things are which we pass over, and wisely pass over. But with regard to the act itself, it appears that a Club of much distinction in the political world has a Political Committee as well as a General Committee. I do not know that I belong to a Club that has a Political Committee; and if I did I should view it with some alarm. I believe that Political Clubs form the machinery by which a great deal of money is spent and great offence is given to our friends in the country, with whom they are supposed unnecessarily and improperly to interfere. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Kidderminster was certainly authorised in bringing this matter before the House; but I am bound to say that he did not consult me on the subject. The letter in question has been written to a Member who certainly is much respected in this House; and I have always understood that the hon. Member for Bradford—who, if he has a bias in his political opinions, is decidedly Liberal—exercises his judgment as independently as any Member of the House. I should say that in the present instance it would not be wise to press this matter. A great indiscretion has, in my opinion, been committed by the Political Committee of the Reform Club, and I think this public notice will prevent its repetition, or that, if repeated, it will probably prove harmless. I should be glad, therefore, if my hon. Friend the Member for Kidderminster did not proceed with his Motion. If he does, I shall, without giving any decided opinion on the issue before us, meet it by moving the Previous Question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have very little to add to the very sensible advice which, in my humble opinion, has been offered to the House by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kidderminster (Sir William Fraser) appears to be anxious to emulate the distinction gained in this House last Session by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis), and to induce the House to follow him in the same not very profitable discussion on questions of Privilege. But I think the House, although it was last Session entrapped by the hon. Member for Londonderry into this rather difficult and delicate question, from which it has not emerged with very great credit, will on this occasion be wiser, and will, without much further consideration, decline to follow the hon. Member for Kidderminster into the course he proposes to lead them. There is only one observation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Prime Minister as to which I find it necessary to offer a word of protest. The right hon. Gentleman considers that an act of great indiscretion was committed by the Political Committee of the Reform Club. Now I certainly do not feel myself called upon to defend the conduct of that Political Committee; but I believe that political Clubs are institutions which are of very great convenience and advantage to Members sitting on both sides of this House; and I do not feel convinced, without giving this matter further reflection, that it may not be necessary, under certain circumstances, for these institutions to take steps for preserving their political character in the way that has been done in this instance. It is perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, that, viewed in a certain sense, this may be a breach of Privilege; but the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford has, I think, taken a very sensible view of the case when he said that he quite admitted the right of the Reform Club or any other Club to indicate to any Gentleman that, as he no longer shared in the opinions which the Club was instituted to promote, they would prefer that he should tender his resignation. I am quite sure from what I have heard of that letter that there was no intention on the part of the Political Committee of the Reform Club to do more than that. The divisions in which the hon. Member for Bradford had taken part were pointed out to him in as polite a manner as possible, in order to show him that his political opinions were no longer in unison with those of the majority of the Members of the Club. I do not know that any more agreeable way could have been taken of communicating to the hon. Member the desire of the Committee that he should no longer remain a member of the Club. Breaches of Privilege like this are committed every day. ["No, no!"] I do not know that a Member's constituents have any more right than anyone else to call him to account; but I fancy there are very few hon. Members of this House who do not receive on many occasions in the course of their Parliamentary career expressions of opinion either of approval or disapproval from the constituency they represent. I trust the hon. Baronet the Member for Kidderminster will not think it necessary to persevere and put the House to the trouble of a division on the question he has raised. If he does I shall vote for the Previous Question, which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has announced his intention to move.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he could not help thinking that the consciences of some noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen on the front and Opposition benches were rather severely pricked by the transaction of last Session to which they were so continually referring. He might say with respect to questions of Privilege generally, if the persons who broke the Privileges of the House were a little more careful of their own conduct they would not have occasion to complain of those who took notice of those breaches of Privilege. That was not the first time the noble Lord had thought it proper to refer to the course which he (Mr. Lewis) had taken last Session. It was only right, however, that he should remind the House, in defence of himself, who had been so unnecessarily drawn into that discussion, that many hon. Gentlemen in that House, and many public authorities out of the House, forgot the ground on which he ventured to bring the matter forward. It was in defence of individual private character of an hon. Member which was dear to Members on whichever side of the House they sat. But it was thought proper by hon. Members on the other side of the House to throw a cloud over the question he raised by introducing the question of interfering with the liberty of the Press, while the motive that was actuating him was the defence of the liberty of the subject and private character. He was not going to interfere in the present debate, but he did humbly protest against being made the butt of the noble Marquess, and that upon every occasion when the House got into a difficulty as to a question of privilege he should bring him (Mr. Lewis) forward. He ventured to say further, although the noble Marquess, with reference to the particular subject under discussion, had ventured to inform the House that that sort of thing was done every day, he had had the honour and pleasure of belonging to Political Clubs for 20 years, and he had never known it done in his own case, although he was a great sinner on the point of independence. If the political independence, which the Liberal Party claimed to have initiated, was to exist, the noble Marquess would find in the time to come that it was likely to find several exponents in his own ranks, and the noble Lord, as the Leader of a great and distinguished Party—the Liberal Party forsooth—would not be promoting Liberal principles generally by enunciating such views as he had that day, especially if he maintained that that action on the part of the Committee of the Reform Club, which was only taken once in half-a-century, was taking place every day. He maintained that in that Reformed House of Commons, elected under universal household suffrage, they might look, day after day, and year after year, for more independence of action on the part of Members of that House instead of less. He should feel himself an unworthy Member, with regard to his constituency, if he were afraid of being called in question by the Committee of the Carlton Club, because he had voted against Her Majesty's Government on several occasions. He should feel sorry indeed—and he thought the House and the Government would think less of him than they did—if he were to trail his vote in the dust behind any Government, despite the suggestion of the noble Marquess who might think that such a thing was done every day. The noble Lord could hardly have meant what he said. If such things were done they must have been done in secret and not in public. He thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Kidderminster had done a great public service to both Parties in the House by exposing this action on the part of a Political Club, which, however useful it might be in filling up vacancies in the representations of constituencies, was not the proper tribunal to go through the division lists, and to call Members to account for the votes given in that House.

MR. HERSCHELL, as a private Member of the House, wished to express his regret that the question had been brought forward, and to say that he did not think there had been any breach of Privilege at all, or even a menace, otherwise it would seem to go forth that whenever

if I have done what I have done from a mistaken sense of duty, I hope the House will forgive me. I believe, as an observer and humble student of the law and practice of this House, that I have only done my duty. I have avoided all approach to personality: and as I fear that in what I have done I may have caused political discomfort to some Members of this House, I hereby personally and humbly beg their pardon. I wish to know, Sir, how far I shall be in Order in concluding with a Motion, not that this House do now adjourn, but on the matter on which I have addressed you?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet having brought before the House a question of breach of Privilege, he is bound to submit to the House a Resolution; and he is also bound to produce for the consideration of the House the very letter which is said to have been written.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: I think, under the circumstances, I will give my reason for not moving the opinion of this House upon this letter now, because I think it is desirable that more extended consideration should be given to it. I will therefore move that the writer of that letter, Mr. Lewis Morris, do attend at the Bar of this House on this day week.

Mr. RIPLEY having risen to speak—

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member produce the letter himself which has been written? The letter from Mr. Morris should be produced and laid upon the Table of the House. At present there is no Question before the House; but I am prepared to submit the Question to the House if the hon. Baronet, in accordance with the ordinary practice of this House, having made a complaint, produces the document upon which he founds his complaint.

Letter given to the Clerk at the Table, and read accordingly.

MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Baronet be so good as to hand me the terms of the Resolution which he desires may be put from the Chair?

SIR WILLIAM FRASER advanced to the Table, and, having written the Motion, handed it to the Speaker.

Sir William Fraser

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that Mr. Lewis Morris, the writer of the letter now read, do attend at the Bar of this House on Monday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Lewis Morris, the writer of the said Letter, do attend at the Bar of this House on Monday next, at a quarter past Four of the clock."—(Sir William Fraser.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON: Is not the letter that has been produced marked "private," as I believe it is; but, if not, will the hon. Gentleman produce the envelope to show whether that is marked "private?" ["No, no!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Before this matter is discussed, it is right, that I should state to the House that the hon. Baronet, in the exercise of his discretion, has thought it right to bring before the House a matter which he regards as a breach of the Privileges of the House. No doubt any menace addressed to any Member of this House, in such a manner as to interfere with his freedom of action as a Member of this House, is a breach of Privilege. Whether the menace which has been stated by the hon. Baronet is of such a character, it is for the House to decide.

MR. RIPLEY: When I came down to the House this evening, I was not aware that this Motion was to be brought forward by the hon. Baronet. It was by mere accident that the letter happened to be in my pocket, a friend of mine having asked me to show it him this morning. Members of this House who do not receive on many occasions in the course of their Parliamentary career expressions of opinion either of approval or disapproval with the question, he found the utmost excitement. He found there was great opposition, proceeding not merely from his own Friends, and not confined to his own side of the House, but also including many of his habitual opponents. A feeling was expressed on the part of the House of Lords which made it impossible to doubt that the fate of the Bill would be different from what it was in 1874. Outside the House that sentiment was, I may say, even stronger. Influential classes, supposed to be particularly capable of offering an opinion upon this question, had made themselves heard. Ireland and Scotland had expressed their sentiments in a manner which could not be misunderstood; and in every way in which a Government can learn what opinion is, we found that we were on very dangerous ground if we contemplated settling the question of Judicature Reform, and of carrying this considerable change in a manner which would recommend itself to the unanimous feelings of the country. The result was, that Her Majesty's Government withdrew the Bill which they had brought forward in 1875, and which had passed through the House of Lords in 1874. There certainly did, from that proceeding, at one moment appear to be a disastrous and dismal chance of the great changes which had to be accomplished being postponed for a considerable time; but, as it was, we succeeded in passing a short Bill, which delayed for another year the operation of Lord Selborne's Act. Well, we felt it our duty this year to consider what we ought to recommend to Parliament on this subject, for it appeared to us that it could no longer be neglected. The delay which had occurred in the formation of the High Court of Justice, provided for by the Bill of Lord Selborne, being in itself a grievous calamity. We had to consider, in the first place, what were the principles upon which the High Court of Final Appeal should be established, and we had to reconcile, if possible, the establishment of such a Court with its remaining in the House of Lords. We laid down four considerations—I believe I may call them principles—for our regulation. First of all we were of opinion that the Final Court of Appeal should be similar for the United Kingdom—namely, that it should be the same for England, Ireland, and Scotland. Secondly, we felt that we must provide that it should be an adequate Court—adequate in learning and trained intelligence, and in the high authority and character of its members. Thirdly, we felt that the Court ought to be a continuous Court—that its sittings ought to be continuous during the whole period of the legal year; and, fourthly, it was our opinion that we ought to regulate the expenditure of the Court and to obtain as economical an administration of justice as was possible. These were the points which we had before us, and these are the points which we have endeavoured to provide for, among other matters, in this Bill. With regard to the first point, what we propose in this Bill is that the Court of Ultimate Appeal shall remain in the House of Lords. We propose that a certain number of the Members of that House shall be Lords of Appeal. The Lord Chancellor will, of course, be one, and all Members of the House who have filled that exalted position will be Members of the Court, as will all other Peers who have filled judicial posts of a high character. Besides this, we propose that there shall be two Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, chosen from the Bench or from the learned Bar, who shall be summoned to Parliament as Barons, who shall exercise their privileges as Barons while they hold these offices, and who when they have ceased to hold them will still possess the rank. We propose that they shall receive a salary superior to that of a Puisne Judge, but inferior to that received by the Chiefs of the Benches. We believe that in this way we shall certainly secure a tribunal similar for the United Kingdom. We believe, also, that we shall secure an adequate Court—a tribunal which, by its learning, skilled intelligence, and weighty character, will command confidence and respect. We further propose that at no time—although there will doubtless be many instances when the attendance will be greater—shall any cause be heard by fewer than three Lords of Appeal. We believe that these proposals will secure a similar Court and an adequate Court: and now I have to consider the question of the continuity of the sittings. We have provided in this Bill that that continuity shall be secured by enacting that the Lords of Appeal shall sit during the Prorogation of Parlia-

a transaction of the sort took place the time of the House might be taken up with it, and an attempt of a Political Club to enforce its regulations would be made the subject of discussion in that House. He would state why, in his opinion, the matter now complained of was no breach of Privilege. If it appeared that this letter had been written for the purpose of compelling a member of the Club, who was also a Member of that House, to vote in a particular way in future, that would be a breach of Privilege; but it must be perfectly obvious to everyone that what was intended was to call attention to the fact that this was a Political Club, and that if a member of it had ceased to belong to that political Party he should also cease to belong to that Club, as his views were no longer in accordance with the views of the members or with the fundamental purposes for which the Club was founded. The Committee, therefore, only said — “Judging from certain evidence with which we supply you”—which could have been the only purpose in sending the votes—“that you are no longer in accord with the political views of this Club, we leave it to your consideration whether you will retire or leave us to take such steps as the situation and the constitution of the Club requires us to take.” If that was what was meant, and nobody could doubt that that was meant, how could it be said that this was a breach of Privilege? He must protest against the notion that calling the attention of a Member of that House, who was also a member of a Political Club, to the fact that his political views had changed, and asking him whether he could remain any longer a member of the Club, was a breach of Privilege. He trusted that would be the view taken by this House, and that they might not have such discussions in future.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he could not agree with the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. He (Sir William Fraser) maintained that that was not a parallel case with that brought forward by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) last year. He thought it a special question, and one well deserving the consideration of the House. It did not refer to anything which had been written in a newspaper.

Mr. Herschell

He was anxious to avoid a precipitate expression of opinion by the House on the subject, and that was the reason he had not moved that it was a breach of Privilege. He was satisfied with the discussion that had taken place, and, with the permission of the House, would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

[Lords.] [BILL 111.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DISRAELI, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said:—It may be, Sir, for the convenience of the House that I should state briefly the circumstances which have preceded the introduction of this measure. Some four years have passed since the Government of the day, in the person of Lord Chancellor Hatherley, brought into the other House of Parliament a Bill transferring the Appellate Jurisdiction then in the House of Lords to another tribunal. Upon that occasion my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) felt it to be his duty to oppose that Bill. Lord Cairns, I need not remind the House, at the time had given the best and strongest proofs to the country of his earnestness and sincerity in the cause of Judicature Reform, and he was one of the most eminent Members of the Judicature Commission. He was perfectly sensible of the anomalies and inconveniences which attended the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords as it existed four years ago; but, although he was prepared to make every sacrifice for the better administration of justice, which must ever be looked upon as one of the principal concerns in political life, he wished to secure that object without losing the traditionary influence which exercises so strong, and, I believe, so salutary, an influence on the conduct and character of the English people. He met Lord Hatherley's measure by moving, as an Amendment, that a Select Committee be appointed, and having succeeded in that Motion, he took the opportunity, before that Committee, of giving an exposition of his views and the means by which the combination which he desired to see carried out might be attained—namely, the combinations which would secure a satisfactory administration of justice so far as an Ultimate Court of Appeal was concerned, without losing the great weight and authority which the House of Lords possessed. I am bound to say that on that occasion the most candid treatment was experienced by my noble and learned Friend from the late Government. Lord Hatherley and Lord Ripon, who represented that Government on the Committee, finding there was no chance of carrying their original measure, gave to the plan proposed by Lord Cairns their earnest and, I believe, unexceptional support; yet, notwithstanding all that support, the consequence was that in a Committee formed of the most eminent men—men the most distinguished for their knowledge of the subject—there was ultimately great division of opinion. Now, the House must be perfectly aware that under such circumstances there is but little chance for legislation on any subject. It is hardly possible in this country to carry any great change, unless you have the support of powerful public opinion; and when the most eminent authorities seem to differ and be discordant, public opinion is perplexed and becomes inert. The consequence was that in the years from 1870 to 1872 nothing was done on this subject, although there were great complaints in the public mind of the anomalies and deficiencies of the system of Judicature, so far as the question of a Final Court of Appeal was concerned; while, I believe, justice was never done to the great learning, ability, and authority of the House of Lords. In the following year, Lord Selborne succeeded Lord Hatherley as Lord Chancellor, the latter noble and learned Lord retiring on account of his infirmity, the same Government still remaining in office. Lord Selborne had for a long time been one of the most distinguished Members of this House; he and Lord Cairns were both Members of the Judicature Commission, and I think we must say whether we regard their abilities, their great experience, and learning, or the profound sentiment which influences them with respect to the great question of improving our Judicature, they certainly must be regarded as not the least eminent Members of the celebrated

Judicature Commission. Well, Lord Selborne introduced, in 1873, a comprehensive measure, in which he attempted to deal with all the main recommendations of that Commission. He thought it necessary—and so far as his original idea went I believe he was right—to deal at the same time with the question of Final Appeal to the House of Lords, so that his measure, if carried, would have produced a great change and have embodied altogether those views of the famous Judicature Commission on which he had laboured so long, and with whose recommendations the public mind had become, to a great extent, familiar. Lord Cairns was then placed in a very delicate and difficult position. He was as anxious as Lord Selborne that a great reform of our Judicature should be effected; but his opinion on the proposition of that noble and learned Lord for transferring final appeals from the House of Lords to some other tribunal remained the same. He was opposed to that proposal, and there were other points in the measure of Lord Selborne which he did not view with extreme favour. At the time I am speaking of—1873—the most complete apathy prevailed in the House of Lords on a question which was intimately connected with its Privileges; nor was there out-of-doors any particular feeling on the subject. Any opposition at the time to the measure of Lord Selborne, had it been successful, would naturally have inflicted a severe blow upon Judicature reform. His Bill was not a complete measure; it required supplementary legislation, and any display of hostility or Party feeling excited on a subject which of all others demanded the expression of temperate opinions and of convictions swayed by no other considerations than those arising out of the learning and policy and justice of the case, would have created such a feeling that it is very possible that any measures intended to complete the scheme of Lord Selborne would encounter considerable difficulties; and Lord Cairns, perceiving that the cause of Judicature reform generally might be imperilled, and, in fact, at the moment was imperilled, determined to sacrifice the opinions he entertained on particular points, in order to facilitate the carrying of Lord Selborne's Bill. That measure, so far as it dealt with the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, was confined to appeals in this country. Appeals in England were transferred to another tribunal; but the Bill did not touch on that occasion on the case of appeals from Scotland or Ireland. They were left to be dealt with in a Bill which was to be introduced the next year. The Bill of Lord Selborne was passed unanimously by the House of Lords; there was certainly, I believe, no division upon it, and it became the law of the land. It dealt, as I have said, only with appeals from England; it did not include a tribunal for intermediary appeals, which was advocated by Lord Cairns, and it left some points in the recommendations of the Judicature Commission untouched from motives of convenience. It became, as I have said, the law of the land; but, although it passed in 1873, it was not to come practically into operation until November, 1874. Meantime, at the beginning of 1874, a Dissolution of Parliament occurred, which resulted in a change of Ministry, and the first consideration of the new Government was how they were to deal with this great question of Judicature reform, which was not completed by the measure of Lord Selborne, and certainly not in one of its most important parts—that of establishing a tribunal of Ultimate Appeal. The opinions of his Colleagues with respect to the authority of the House of Lords were entirely in accordance with those of Lord Cairns. They believed, as he believed, that if the due administration of justice could be combined with a traditionary influence, such as that exercised by the House of Lords, it would be desirable to secure that object. There was, however, the immense incongruity to be taken into account of having one tribunal of final appeal for England and a different one for Scotland and Ireland. After due consideration, therefore, and with a full sense of the responsibility of their position, they felt it to be their duty to introduce a measure on the same lines so far as related to the Court of Ultimate Appeal as those which had been laid down by Lord Selborne, and consequently Lord Cairns, in 1874, introduced a measure into the other House of Parliament which proposed to transfer the Irish and Scotch appeals from the House of Lords to the new tribunal which had been devised by Lord Selborne, and which was to come into existence in the November of that year. Lord Cairns, at the same time, introduced provisions for the establishment of a tribunal of intermediary appeal, and dealt with points in the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, which had been purposely omitted for the sake of convenience by Lord Selborne in the previous year. Hon. Gentlemen will remember that the Session of 1874 was curtailed of its fair proportions. A Dissolution of Parliament, a General Election, and the formation of a new Ministry are circumstances which, I think, must diminish the Session by nearly one-third of its duration. In addition to that, one of those questions which are not introduced by a Government, but round which the feeling and passion of a nation occasionally and almost periodically cluster was introduced into the other House by a distinguished Prelate, the Public Worship Regulation Bill; which being sent down to this House was moved by a private Member, so engrossed the attention and time of the House that it would have been impossible to introduce the measure sent down from the House of Lords, which measure, if it had been then passed, would have concluded the question of the whole fabric of our Judicature, and entirely settled the issue of Ultimate Appeal. When Parliament met at the beginning of last year we had to consider what course we should take with regard to this question, which had not been settled owing to the circumstances to which I have referred. We could not help remembering, in coming to a decision, that the Bill introduced by Lord Cairns in 1874 had passed through the House of Lords almost unanimously, and that the Appeal was already taken from the House of Lords as regarded all English cases. We, therefore, felt it was our duty, and at the same time only respectful to the House of Lords, that the same Bill which they had unanimously passed in 1874 should again be presented for their consideration. But it so happened that in the interval a considerable revolution had occurred in the opinion of the House of Lords itself and of powerful Parties outside that House. The subject had been deeply considered and acutely felt, and instead of that state of perfect apathy which was originally found to prevail by the present Lord Chancellor when he had to deal with the question, he found the utmost excitement. He found there was great opposition, proceeding not merely from his own Friends, and not confined to his own side of the House, but also including many of his habitual opponents. A feeling was expressed on the part of the House of Lords which made it impossible to doubt that the fate of the Bill would be different from what it was in 1874. Outside the House that sentiment was, I may say, even stronger. Influential classes, supposed to be particularly capable of offering an opinion upon this question, had made themselves heard. Ireland and Scotland had expressed their sentiments in a manner which could not be misunderstood; and in every way in which a Government can learn what opinion is, we found that we were on very dangerous ground if we contemplated settling the question of Judicature Reform, and of carrying this considerable change in a manner which would recommend itself to the unanimous feelings of the country. The result was, that Her Majesty's Government withdrew the Bill which they had brought forward in 1875, and which had passed through the House of Lords in 1874. There certainly did, from that proceeding, at one moment appear to be a disastrous and dismal chance of the great changes which had to be accomplished being postponed for a considerable time; but, as it was, we succeeded in passing a short Bill, which delayed for another year the operation of Lord Selborne's Act. Well, we felt it our duty this year to consider what we ought to recommend to Parliament on this subject, for it appeared to us that it could no longer be neglected. The delay which had occurred in the formation of the High Court of Justice, provided for by the Bill of Lord Selborne, being in itself a grievous calamity. We had to consider, in the first place, what were the principles upon which the High Court of Final Appeal should be established, and we had to reconcile, if possible, the establishment of such a Court with its remaining in the House of Lords. We laid down four considerations—I believe I may call them principles—for our regulation. First of all we were of opinion that the Final Court of Appeal should be similar for the United Kingdom—namely, that it should be the same for England, Ireland, and Scotland. Secondly, we felt that we must provide that it should be an adequate Court—adequate in learning and trained intelligence, and in the high authority and character of its members. Thirdly, we felt that the Court ought to be a continuous Court—that its sittings ought to be continuous during the whole period of the legal year; and, fourthly, it was our opinion that we ought to regulate the expenditure of the Court and to obtain as economical an administration of justice as was possible. These were the points which we had before us, and these are the points which we have endeavoured to provide for, among other matters, in this Bill. With regard to the first point, what we propose in this Bill is that the Court of Ultimate Appeal shall remain in the House of Lords. We propose that a certain number of the Members of that House shall be Lords of Appeal. The Lord Chancellor will, of course, be one, and all Members of the House who have filled that exalted position will be Members of the Court, as will all other Peers who have filled judicial posts of a high character. Besides this, we propose that there shall be two Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, chosen from the Bench or from the learned Bar, who shall be summoned to Parliament as Barons, who shall exercise their privileges as Barons while they hold these offices, and who when they have ceased to hold them will still possess the rank. We propose that they shall receive a salary superior to that of a Puisne Judge, but inferior to that received by the Chiefs of the Benches. We believe that in this way we shall certainly secure a tribunal similar for the United Kingdom. We believe, also, that we shall secure an adequate Court—a tribunal which, by its learning, skilled intelligence, and weighty character, will command confidence and respect. We further propose that at no time—although there will doubtless be many instances when the attendance will be greater—shall any cause be heard by fewer than three Lords of Appeal. We believe that these proposals will secure a similar Court and an adequate Court: and now I have to consider the question of the continuity of the sittings. We have provided in this Bill that that continuity shall be secured by enacting that the Lords of Appeal shall sit during the Prorogation of Parliament, and that they shall hear every issue which has been entered on their record previous to that Prorogation. The fourth point—namely, the attainment, if possible, of a more economical administration of justice—is a subject more difficult to deal with. In the first place, the expenditure on a cause before the House of Lords arises mainly from three causes. First of all, it arises from the fees of the Court; secondly, from the great expenditure incurred by every document being printed which is placed before the Lords of Appeal; and, thirdly, from the cost for professional remuneration. With regard to the fees of the House of Lords, as far as I am informed and can learn, they in no way differ from the fees which are levied in our other important Courts; and certainly no reduction in them would sensibly influence the cost of the suit. With regard to the second point, there is no doubt that the expenditure occasioned by printing all the documents which are placed before the Lords of Appeal is very great. But when we remember how the clearness of a man's judgment is assisted when he reads a printed instead of a manuscript document, and how much the perspicuity of his intellect and his quickness of perception are promoted and assisted by such conditions; and when we remember the great—I might almost say the awful—responsibilities that attends a Judge who is deciding in Ultimate Appeal, I think we should hesitate before we sanction, for the sake of economy, the recourse merely to manuscript documents. Hon. Members can judge from their own experience when they have to read Blue Books and Reports of Evidence before Committees how their studies are facilitated by having printed documents. Therefore, I cannot hold out any expectation that there will be a reduction of expenditure by altering the existing system. I will now say a few words about professional remuneration, although it is a subject beyond legislation. A suitor will obtain, if he can, as his advocate the man most distinguished for eloquence, learning, and acuteness. He will have the best representative and the best adviser, and in order to have them he will take care that the remuneration which he offers is at least not inferior to that which would be offered by another suitor. That will go on, notwithstanding any sumptuary laws respecting remuneration which we might pass. We might as well attempt to pass a law that a portrait painter should not receive more than a certain sum for his portrait, and then suppose that Vandyke—I will not mention any living artist—would always receive, in consequence of that law, the same remuneration. This is a subject of expenditure which, of course, we must leave to the House of Parliament in which these proceedings take place; but it is due to the House of Lords and to the Bill which I am now asking the House to read a second time to state that no effort has been omitted to diminish the cost of these proceedings. A Committee of the House of Lords met to consider the question generally, and a permanent Appeal Committee, of which the Lords of Appeal will be Members, has been appointed to, continuously during the Session, review the expense and observe the course and progress of these proceedings. My own opinion, if I may presume to give it, is that after all the best security for cheap justice is prompt justice. It is not the amount of the fees of the Court; it is not the costliness of the proceedings, even if the documents are printed; it is not the professional remuneration that causes the extraordinary expense sometimes incurred by those who are suitors: but it is the delay—it is the fact that arrears are perpetually accumulating. I have now placed before the House the outline of the scheme which they will find in this Bill for the formation of a Court of Final Appeal. It will consist of many ex officio Members, the Lord Chancellor, those who have filled the office of Lord Chancellor, men who have filled high judicial offices, and of two Lords of Appeal in ordinary. A Tribunal adequate in learning will always be secured by making three a quorum. The sittings will be continuous during the whole of the legal year, and every effort will be made to reduce and regulate the expenditure. When we lay it down as of great importance that the Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal should be similar to the whole of the United Kingdom, the House I know will feel the incongruity that, while you are making great efforts and great sacrifices to attain this result, there are still millions, and many millions, of Her Majesty's subjects, in her Indian Empire and in her other numerous Dependencies, who when they appeal to Her

Majesty do not appeal to Her Majesty in either of the Houses of Parliament, but appeal to Her Majesty in Council. And there seems at first some inconsistency in our making sacrifices to obtain a similar tribunal of appeal for the United Kingdom, and leaving the appeals from India and the colonies to be addressed to another tribunal. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that it is a matter of great importance that some connection should be established between the House of Lords as regards the subject of final appeal and the Committee of Privy Council. The Committee of Privy Council consists of many ex officio Members, of men of very great learning and distinction. It also consists, under a comparatively modern Act, of four salaried Members, who are, of course, Privy Councillors, and who generally decide the appeals in the Privy Council. When a vacancy occurs by death or resignation among these four salaried Privy Councillors no successor can be supplied to them by Her Majesty. It is provided by the Act that we must come again to the Legislature upon the subject; and, therefore, when we are dealing with this question, that is a consideration which the House should bear in mind. What we propose is this—that, whenever there are two vacancies among the four salaried Privy Councillors, a third Lord of Appeal in the House of Lords should be appointed, and that when, either by death or resignation, there are again two vacancies among the salaried Privy Councillors, a fourth Lord of Appeal in the House of Lords should be appointed. And when that is consummated, we propose that the appeals in the House of Lords and in the Privy Council shall be decided by the same individuals, and the duties of the four Lords of Appeal will be in both Courts, if I may use the expression. It will be a Tribunal divided into two Courts. After that statement the House will naturally like to know what chance or rather what certainty there is if such a change is agreed to, that we shall be able to provide sufficiently for the administration of justice, and yet terminate those arrears of which we have heard so much. As far as I can learn, the average of the cases in the House of Lords and in the Committee of the Privy Council together may be taken at 250. Certainly 300 would, I think, be a safe, but at the same time a somewhat exaggerated calculation. But we will take the number of 300. The legal year consists of 200 days, and the House will, therefore, see that if this arrangement is acceded to the four Lords of Appeal, assisted frequently, of course, by the ex officio Members, will easily, I might say completely, transact the business of appeal of the country in the year, so that we may look forward to a state of affairs which will not admit of arrears. It may be asked, if this will be a desirable arrangement and an effective one, as I believe it will be, why do you not propose that it should at once come into operation? Well, no doubt, logically that ought to be our course, but I believe it is a rule of Parliament never to be logical in legislation. The Committee of Council has a high reputation. It possesses, deservedly, the confidence of the Empire and of the suitors. It transacts at this moment its business with unrivalled efficiency, while in the House of Lords there is no want at the present moment of men of great learning who act as ex officio Lords of Appeal. Probably there never was a time in which the House of Lords has been so distinguished as at present for its legal accomplishments and erudition. And, therefore, we have thought it would be better to leave this great change to the course of time rather than to make a violent alteration which might perplex and alarm those who are accustomed to look with confidence to the Committee of the Privy Council. Besides, there is a great disadvantage in forcing a sudden change upon the Bench or Bar. So far I have confined myself to the main business of this Bill, and have explained to the House its purport, as far as regards the institution of a Final Court of Appeal. If the House will consent to pass this measure, we shall have secured what we always look upon as a great object—namely, similarity of appeal for the whole of the United Kingdom, and ultimately for the whole Empire. We shall have provided a Court adequate for the transaction of the business that will come before it, and inferior, probably, to none that ever existed in learning and character; we shall have terminated one of the just causes of complaint in this country—namely, the sudden termination of otherwise satisfactory labours by a prorogation of Parliament; we shall have pro-

the view that the House of Lords should retain its power as an Appellate Court, and that there should be a Court of Intermediate as well as of Final Appeal. When the Measure of 1873 came before the House, the right hon. Gentleman himself had most clearly expressed opinions with reference to it which coincided with those held by Lord Cairns. In fact, the whole responsibility of the measure of 1873 must be shared by Lord Cairns as well as the Government of that day, and by the right hon. Gentleman. If Lord Cairns's views were such as were then described, he had a majority in the House of Lords which could have given effect to them, and there was no reason why he should have yielded his opinion. It was strange, therefore, that the House should be now told that Lord Cairns and the right hon. Gentleman himself had always been opposed to depriving the House of Lords of its Appellate Jurisdiction, and in favour of the establishment of an Intermediate Court of Appeal. But not only were the views to which he had referred entertained by the Lord Chancellor and by the right hon. Gentleman in 1873, but they were embodied in the Bills introduced, upon the responsibility of the present Government, with the same majority as they now have, in 1874 and 1875, which provided for the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords to a new Court of Final Appeal, and made no provision for the establishment of an Intermediate Court of Appeal. Now came the influences to which reference had been made. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), having nothing else to do in the Long Vacation, concluded an alliance with the hon. Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer), and forming a Committee in St. James's Place, they brought into play that amount of public opinion which influenced Her Majesty's Government in coming to a decision. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear, hear!] Of course, it was satisfactory to the hon. Baronet to find he was able to change the opinions of Lord Cairns and of the Prime Minister, and so to effect a change in the character of their Bill. He (Sir Henry James) was not prepared to criticize what had in this case been called public opinion. It was not the first time the influence of St. James's Place had been felt in this House.

Sir Henry James

There appeared to be about St. James's Place a sort of stagnant atmosphere, producing on the minds of those who gathered there a feeling unfavourable, at all events, to reforms of a revolutionary character, or to such as were proposed without full consideration. He therefore contended that it was St. James's Place influence, and not that of public opinion, that had brought about this change in the minds of the noble and learned Lord and of the right hon. Gentleman. They had now, however, to deal with that as a practical question, and knowing the power which Her Majesty's Government possessed in that House, of carrying out their views when they had once determined upon them, it would, in his judgment, be well for the House to accept this Bill, and to permit it to be read a second time, subjecting it, of course, to a fair amount of criticism. Assuming, however, that the measure was a good one, he thought that the credit for suggesting it should be given, not to Her Majesty's Government, but to the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams), who, names being changed, had suggested its main provisions in a letter which he had written to The Times on the 25th of March, 1875. That letter was as follows:—

“ 1. That, in place of Lord Selborne's High Court of Appeal the existing Court of Lords Justices of Appeal, with an increased number of Lords Justices, should be retained, and form a Division of the High Court of Justice of the Supreme Court of Judicature.

“ 2. That there should be an appeal from all Divisions of the High Court of Justice to the Lords Justices of Appeal, and from the latter Court to the Imperial Court of Appeal of the House of Lords.

“ 3. That the Crown should have power to confer a limited number of judicial Peerages upon Judges during their holding office, either as Chief Justices or Lords Justices of Appeal, or paid Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that these Judicial Peers, together with all other Peers who hold, or have held judicial office, should hear and dispose of all appeals in the Imperial Court of Appeal of the House of Lords, and that Lords Justices thus appointed Judicial Peers should be relieved from attendance in the Intermediate Court of Appeal.

“ 4. That, by Order in Council, all appeals to Her Majesty in Council might be referred to the Imperial Court of Appeal of the House of Lords.

“ 5. That the appellate business of the House of Lords should be disposed of at such times, and in such places, and in such manner generally as to the number of Judges and other matters as may from time to time be directed by Standing Orders of the House."

That letter was, in fact, the Bill before the House. He now came to consider the question whether, in fact, the great principle of the retention of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, for which the St. James's Place Committee had struggled so manfully, had in reality been maintained. The great evils which Lord Selborne and the Government of 1873 were anxious to remove were these—that, in the first place, the House of Lords was a political, and not a judicial body; that it sat for judicial purposes only at those periods of the year when it sat for legislative purposes; that the time it devoted to judicial purposes was inadequate to enable it to discharge its duties properly; and that its judicial strength was insufficient. He maintained that in what was proposed to be done by this Bill, the whole of the substance of what had been contended for by the Committee of St. James's Place had been given up, and that the name, and nothing but the name, of the House of Lords, had been retained—a rather barren victory on their part. Those who had suggested the measure of 1873 ought to be well satisfied with the present measure. True it was that in future the causes would be determined in the chamber in which the House of Lords sat, but the Judges who would determine them would be altogether distinct as a body from that House. Experience taught that where there were paid Judges and Judges who existed only in an ex officio capacity, the whole of the duties would eventually come to be performed by the former alone. In this case as soon as the four paid Judges of Appeal existed in the House of Lords, they would be really the persons performing the duties. They would be Peers—and again they had the name—but they would be Peers because they were Judges, and not Judges because they were Peers. Another object they sought—namely, that there should be a judicial tribunal sitting not only when Parliament was sitting, was given under this Bill. The House of Lords, when Parliament was not sitting, would be sitting as a Court of Appeal by the provisions of this Act. If all that was satisfactory to the Gentlemen who fought for what they called a great principle, they who had obtained the substance of what they fought for, would not be behaving properly if they offered any unfair opposition to the Bill. On the whole, therefore, those who had struggled for the substantial reform ought to be fully satisfied with the success they had gained, and might leave those who were opposed to the change to console themselves with the triumph they had obtained in retaining the empty name of the House of Lords as the title of the new Final Court of Appeal. With regard to the second portion of the Bill which dealt with the continued existence of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it involved a practical question, and one of serious importance when considered in reference to the subject of the Intermediate Court of Appeal. As regarded the Intermediate Court of Appeal, it was true there was no direct legislation, but indirectly there was much, and if the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the second reading of the Bill assumed that the existing Intermediate Court was to continue because up to the present it had been found satisfactory, he set out with a very erroneous impression. The general public could not know very much on a subject of this kind; but if the right hon. Gentleman would seek the opinions of those connected with the practice of the law, he would, with few exceptions, hear the existing Intermediate Court described in terms of disapproval. The opinion of the Lord Chancellor might be opposed to this view, but the noble and learned Lord was scarcely in a position to take a perfectly accurate view of the subject. He could only speak of the Court as it was when he was sitting as a Member, and on those occasions it was vastly different from others when he was not present. The Court would be satisfactory, no doubt, when made up of the Lord Chancellor, Judges borrowed from the Primary Courts, and further strengthened by the Master of the Rolls, who, when hearing appeals was, from no fault of his own, neglecting the business of his own Court in Lincoln's Inn. But when constituted under other conditions it was not possible to regard the Court as satisfactory, and it should not be formed in such a manner. It was clear from the proposals of the Bill that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government reforms were necessary, but no prompt remedy was proposed. Surely, in a case of this kind, if it was considered important to alter the constitution of a Court, that alteration should not be dependent upon the length of time to which the life of a member or members of the present Court might extend, but should be made at once. If satisfactory, the existing Court should remain as at present; if unsatisfactory, it should be remedied without delay. Another objectionable feature of the Bill to which he wished to refer was that, for the first time, it gave to the Minister in power patronage of a combined nature, for it would enable him to appoint as Judges lawyers whose presence would not strengthen the Court, but might either increase the influence of the Government in the House of Lords, or enable it to reward services other than legal which had in times past been rendered to the political Parties with which they were connected. He, however, thought the public would desire to see every safeguard imposed, so that the appointment of these Judges should be for their merits, and not for their Parliamentary support. The only suggestion which he could make would be that the provision of the Bill that allowed the appointment of barristers of 15 years' standing should be struck out, and that the appointment should be confined to those who had for a certain number of years sat in the Primary or Intermediate Court. They would thus be Gentlemen who had been removed from the action of political favour, and would have given some proof of their ability.

MR. MARTEN said, he was clearly of opinion last year that the course then taken by the Government tended strongly in the direction of a satisfactory solution of the great judicial problem before them. In the fusion of procedure in the administration of the two great principles of Law and Equity they had a basis of operation which, in judicious hands, could not fail to result in the satisfactory determination of many questions of judicial re-construction which had long occupied them. Whatever the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) might choose to say to the contrary, so far from the Lord Chancellor having changed his mind in reference to the Court of Appeal, as had been supposed, his course had been entirely consistent throughout, and in accordance with the opinions of those with whom he generally acted—that was, a most evident and most earnest desire to produce a system of Judicature which should have the advantage of the most perfect economy of judicial power. What was mainly desired was that satisfactory Courts of Intermediate and Final Appeal should be constituted, and, as far as he could judge, the measure under consideration would achieve these objects. The House of Lords had always discharged the judicial functions intrusted to it in a manner which commended itself to the approval not only of England, but of Scotland and Ireland also, and he thought it would be unwise rashly to interfere under the circumstances. He, however, believed that our most distinguished Law Reformers, headed by the Lord Chancellor, were desirous of creating and maintaining a Court of Ultimate Appeal, in which the Profession and the public would have the utmost confidence. With reference to what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton on the subject of the Intermediate Court of Appeal, he must say that, so far as he could learn, the decisions of that Court had given unqualified satisfaction. He was altogether unaware of the existence of any feeling of dissatisfaction as to the constitution of that Court, except as to its fluctuating and casual character, as to which he concurred with the hon. and learned Member that it was desirable the Court should be a permanent one, and that its Members should not be casually selected. Then, as to the appointment of additional Judges, the proposal of the Government that two additional Judges should be appointed for the express purpose of strengthening the Court of Appeal was at first virtually agreed to and adopted by the House, during the discussion on the Judicature Bill last Session, but the proposal was abandoned—as he understood—in consideration of the opposition it met with from a high quarter at the other side of the House. The question was not a new one, and if the hon. and learned Member for Taunton would propose that there should be two additional Judges in the Court of Appeal, it would no doubt receive favourable consideration. The House should remember this fact in reference to the Court of Appeal—that unquestionably its work was accumulating very rapidly, notwithstanding the circumstance that two Courts of Appeal had usually sat.

Sir Henry James

In January last there were 69 appeal cases; in March, 86; in April, 107; and on the 12th June, 120 cases waiting for hearing. There were 43 Chancery appeals now waiting for hearing, whilst in Easter Term, 1875, there were only 11, and in Trinity Term 13. As to the business of First Instance, his own opinion was that it was impossible that in the Chancery Division the number of Judges could be reduced; for the increase of the arrears of business had been rapid, and he might say alarming; the number of causes awaiting hearing in Easter sittings last year being 288, while in Easter sittings of the present year the number amounted to 412. In the Court of the Master of the Rolls and the three Vice Chancellors' Courts the increase was also great and progressive, there being in Trinity Term, 1875, 328 causes waiting for hearing, whilst now the number was 502; and there was no hope that these four learned Judges could keep down the arrears, more especially as the necessary absence of the Master of the Rolls from his own Court in order that he might sit in the Court of Appeal involved a great diminution of judicial strength, as well as the closing of that noble and learned Lord's Court. In the Easter Sittings, 1876, which comprised 34 working days the Master of the Rolls sat only 14 days in the Rolls Court, and was absent from it and sitting on appeal for 20 days. So far, then, from there being a likelihood of the House being able to reduce the number of the Judges, it appeared to be obvious that the appointment of another Vice Chancellor would be absolutely requisite for the discharge of the business with anything like necessary speed. The examination of witnesses vidé voce in Chancery under the new practice tended much to prolong the hearing of new causes. With respect to the limitation of the Lords of Appeal to those who for a certain time had discharged judicial functions, he could only say that no doubt it was most important to get men of high eminence for Judges of Appeal, but that was no reason for restricting these appointments to those who were already Judges; for men appeared from time to time who might well be appointed to the Court of Appeal in the first instance; and it would be somewhat strange that a barrister might be called to the highest legal office—that of Lord Chancellor—and yet not be eligible for the office of Lord of Appeal. Then, with respect to the right of appeal, he would, so far as England was concerned, suggest that that right might be extended by allowing an appeal not only from the Intermediate Court, but from the Divisional Courts direct, without the necessity of appealing to the Intermediate Court. An Intermediate Court of Appeal was often useless, because when it had once decided a point, it was much better to take a similar case straight to the House of Lords to be reviewed, without the expense and delay of an argument before the Intermediate Court. There was nothing novel in the principle of the propositions contained in the Bill, and he hoped the House would give it a second reading.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging the debate; but he felt bound to say, that if the Government had pursued a consistent course from first to last upon the subject, it was one of a most remarkable character. Let the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) recur to the authentic records of Parliament, and he would find that the real state of the case was very different. It was certain that in 1873 the Members of the present Government supported the proposal to do away with the House of Lords as the final Appellate Tribunal, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the present Government entered into an able argument to induce the House to support that proposal. The right hon. Gentleman then stated that the subject had been long considered by the Profession, the suitors, and the Government; that the principle had been perfectly settled, and that there was to be only one Court of Appeal. In 1874 the present Government came into power, and they made the same proposal. They were then masters of the situation. That House was not permitted to refer to the debates of the House of Lords, but they might refer to the Journals, and he found that Lord Redesdale, being extremely anxious to prolong the judicial existence of the House of Lords, moved a Resolution to the effect that it was admitted that the House of Lords was preferred by Scotland and Ireland as a Final Court of Appeal to any other, and that as a satisfactory Court of Final Appeal had not yet been established for England, it was expedient that time should be allowed for making such improvements as might perfect the constitution of the House as a Final Court of Appeal. That Resolution said, in effect, that the legislation of 1873 was not satisfactory, and that it was not desirable to abolish the judicial authority of the House of Lords. The first name in the division which negatived that Resolution was that of the Lord Chancellor. Lord Derby also voted against it, and how, then, could it be said that the conduct of the Government had been entirely consistent? In 1875 an Intermediate Court of Appeal was certainly constituted, but it was a merely provisional measure in order that the proposal to prolong the judicial existence of the House of Lords might be re-considered, and now in 1876 it was proposed to retain the House of Lords. But apart from the controversy as to consistency there was the graver one as to whether they were to have an adequate tribunal. Of course there was no use arguing against the many legions who supported the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. All he said was that it was deeply to be regretted that the policy those legions now enabled the right hon. Gentleman to maintain was not the policy they enabled him to maintain in 1874, but an exactly opposite policy. He deeply regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have changed their opinions on this matter. He would not attempt to discover the motives which had induced them to support Lord Selborne's Bill in 1873, a similar Bill in 1874, and the same principle in 1875, and afterwards to change their views. They all remembered the memorable scene in the House of Lords, when the Lord Chancellor of a Government commanding a large majority, to his own great regret, withdrew a Bill approved by the Cabinet, supported by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, and sanctioned by both sides of that House. It was, however, necessary, as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had said, to make the best of a bad bargain. For himself, he admitted, he had always desired that there should be only one Court of Appeal, instead of an Intermediate Court of Appeal, because these perpetual appeals were a great grievance to the poorer subjects of Her Majesty, and ended in favour of the suitor who had the longest purse. These principles, however, after having been thus accepted for three years, and after being supported, as he had said, by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, was now thrown over, and an Intermediate Court of Appeal was to be retained. He thought every member of the Profession would agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton in his criticism upon the existing Intermediate Court of Appeal. He (Sir William Harcourt) thought what his hon. and learned Friend said was very true, that the last person to form a correct estimate of the Court was the Lord Chancellor, for it was quite a different Court when that noble and learned Lord was present. The Bar were then treated with courtesy, and his presence gave a weight and a dignity to the Court which he was afraid it did not always possess in his absence. He must confess that if anything would reconcile him to the continuance of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal, it was that that judicial dignity which was so important a part in the administration of justice was always found there, although it was sometimes missed elsewhere. He still, however, regretted that the highest Court of Judicature in the country was to be left a political body, and that had always seemed to him to be the greatest objection to continuing the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. It was all very well to say that that objection had no practical operation, because the Court would not have to deal with Constitutional questions, for it was at the moment it should not operate that the political character of the House of Lords became dangerous. Cases might recur like that of Mr. O'Connell, involving grave political questions which would have to be determined by persons who were actually engaged in the struggles of politics, and the public would think that in the main they were decided upon political considerations, as that of Mr. O'Connell was. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: No, no!] The hon. and learned Member for Wexford was perhaps the only man who doubted what others believed from the first, that all the Liberals voted on one side and all the Conservatives on the other. Besides political questions, others that were more or less class questions might arise, as in the Bridgewater case, the decision of which, it had always been considered, was influenced by other considerations than those relating to principles of conveyancing and real property which ought to have guided the decision. These were the main reasons why it must always be objectionable to leave the final Court of Judicature in the hands of a political body, and these objections the Bill would not remove, but, on the contrary, it took Judges and made politicians of them, as it made them Peers because they were Judges. He had always deemed it desirable that in founding a new system it should be kept free from politics; but they had practically no alternative but to accept the Bill as it stood. No doubt it removed many practical objections to the jurisdiction of the House of Lords by constituting a Court to sit when the House itself was not sitting, thus severing the tribunal as a judicial body from the House as a legislative body. The jurisdiction of the House was practically terminated and transferred to a body of gentlemen with judicial authority; but he was anxious to know what would be their social status when they ceased to be Judges?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: The Bill states it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: But what was to be their status in life?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: They will become Irish Peers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, then what a farce it was, for it seemed that when one of them ceased to be a Judge he would cease to be a Peer in the ordinary sense of the word; and that suggested that in order to improve our Judicature we should be compelled to separate it from the hereditary Peerage. It was understood that this final Court would satisfy Scotland and Ireland because it was to be the House of Lords, which implied a supposition that the law was to be administered by an hereditary Peerage; but that was not so, and therefore there was a severance of the Judicature from the House of Lords in the proper sense of the word. That seemed to be an indirect way of doing that which he desired to do; and he preferred the plan of 1873, because it involved total separation. It was not worth while for the sake of preserving the name of the House of Lords to create a Court of this hybrid character.

MR. CHARLEY congratulated Her Majesty's Government on their having introduced a statesmanlike measure acceptable to both Houses, and, if proof were wanted of the unanimous opinion of the legal Profession and of the country generally, it was to be found in the fact that no Notice had been given of opposition to this Bill. Last year hon. Members who were favourable to preserving the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords were denounced as a clique and a coterie meeting in an obscure place, but that could not be said now, in the absence of opposition to the Bill. Neither could it be said that the Government were afraid to depart from the policy of their predecessors; they had done so, and the country had supported them. With regard to the division referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten), he (Mr. Charley) was one of the Tellers, and, as 14 Members of the present Government voted in the minority, it was certainly an emphatic protest against the policy which was then being pursued. The present Government had been quite consistent, because what was said in 1873 by Lord Cairns and the Prime Minister was, that if an Intermediate Court of Appeal were dispensed with it would be necessary to abolish the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, as the number of appeals would be too large for it to deal with them. As Lord Selborne's Act had destroyed the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords for England, the question was whether the same should be done for Scotland and Ireland, the primary object of Lord Cairns being to establish one Court for the Three Kingdoms. A great change of opinion occurred in 1874, and the Government were quite consistent in recurring, not, as had been stated, to the suggestions of the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams), but to the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords of 1856. The Bill was, in fact, founded on their unanimous recommendation. In their Report they said—

“Although during certain periods the number of Law Lords in regular attendance on the Appellate Business has been inadequate to meet the requirements of the public and the Profes-

stead of the House of Lords, a Court of four salaried Judges as Lords of Appeal in Parliament, sitting alternately in the House of Lords and in the Privy Council. In conclusion, he regretted the necessity of making these criticisms on the Bill, for it was a measure which, taken on the whole, showed the constitutional wisdom of the Government; and he, for one, wished to bear testimony to the admirable manner in which they had stemmed the torrent of prejudice which had been awakened by a certain portion of the Press against the House of Lords, and to congratulate them on having preserved an important part of the Constitution. The opinion of the Bar was strongly in favour of maintaining the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and the Bill carried out that principle.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, had the Court proposed to be established been purely English, he should not have troubled the House. The Committee of Privy Council, however, was becoming more and more an Indian Court, and as he had some knowledge of Indian affairs, and this was a subject on which he had great experience, he ventured an opinion. In the main, both from a Scotch and an Indian point of view he was favourable to the Bill of the Government. His only complaint was, that the Government had not followed out what the head of the Government described as a logical sequence of his statement, that the Bill would not take immediate effect, would not come into operation during the lives of the four Judges recently appointed. He reminded the House that last year he had suggested that they should not borrow Judges only from the regular Courts as proposed by the temporary Bill, but from the Privy Council also. The suggestion, however, was not listened to, and the result was that the regular Courts were still accumulating arrears, while the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was quite under-worked. In his opinion, the public interests were being sacrificed to an excessive punctilio for personal consideration. Good as the present Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was, it did not command the respect that had been commanded by the old Committee of Privy Council which was constituted somewhat as the present Bill proposed. If some of the Judges of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council could be transferred to other Courts, immediate effect might be given to the Bill, and they might have that form of Judicial Committee which would be preferable to the present, while the other Courts would be rendered efficient. But, as the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had shown, the Bill could not take effect until four of the present Judges who were not all old men, and who they hoped might live many years, should have disappeared in the course of nature. The present Judicial Committee of Privy Council comprised two paid Judges on full salaries, and two Indian Judges not receiving full salaries, but only the difference between liberal pensions and the salaries of Judges of Appeal. He suggested that the fully paid should be transferred to one of the other Courts, but he was told that this was impossible, from personal considerations. He thought these ought not to prevail as against public interests. He was afraid the result of maintaining the present system in the Judicial Committee would be that, having the present large Court, they would think it necessary to find work for it. In his opinion, appeals from India were already too numerous. These appeals came from 10 or 12 different tribunals, and though, no doubt, that was favourable to English lawyers, the expense and loss of time were very prejudicial to the interests of the Native as well as to public justice. Appeals from India to the Privy Council should be confined to cases of importance involving important points of law, and should not be permitted in petty cases or those involving mere facts. Therefore, he appealed to the Government to say whether they would not enable their Bill to be immediately carried out by the transferring of two of the Judges of the Privy Council.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, when he looked back upon the time when he was an undergraduate at Oxford, and compared Oxford of the present day with that time, he saw how great had been the changes which resulted from the Act of 1854, and the Commission by which that Act had been preceded. He did not intend, however, to go into what had happened in former days. He only wished to call attention to the fact that the Oxford of the present day had a much larger number of undergraduates than it had at that time, and that there was every prospect of the number increasing. Not only were the Colleges filled, but there were a large number of unattached students; and he thought he might say that both Oxford and Cambridge were taking a place in the consideration of the country which was not only felt within the Universities themselves, but by those who were acquainted with their worth in all parts of the United Kingdom. As to the measures which it was proposed to take to enable them to extend their usefulness still further, the Commission of 1854 practically settled the question of the government of Oxford University; and there was no intention in the Bill to alter the conditions or circumstances of the University authorities or Colleges so far as that Government was concerned. There had been two Commissions since then; one on scientific research, and the other, which had recently sat, on the revenues of the Universities and Colleges. With respect to that which sat on scientific research, it went into questions which had excited a good deal of attention. He spoke more from his knowledge of Oxford than of Cambridge; and he would pass by the Commission, with the remark that what it recommended was that the Universities should address themselves more to research than they had hitherto done, and one of the proposals of this Bill was to enable the Commission to deal with scientific research. He came next to the Commission upon the revenues of the Universities and Colleges, and everybody would concur that that Commission clearly made out that while the Colleges were comparatively rich, the Universities were poor; the Universities not having sufficient means for the extension which was required of them, whilst the Colleges were in a position to enable them, without any interference with their working, to contribute still more liberally to their assistance than they had done hitherto. No doubt, it was true that there had been a great many disputes as to the results of this Commission and the conclusions arrived at. Anybody, however, who would take the trouble to look into the Blue Book would find that there was a vast increase, present and perspective, in the College revenues, and that the Universities had gradually become deficient in the means of carrying out those things which were, in his opinion, as essential for the Colleges as for the Universities themselves. He had observed some time since a statement in an able letter, which appeared in one of the public journals, that the Universities had urgent claims upon them for libraries, museums, schools, Professors' rooms, more Professors, and increased remuneration for their teaching, and that they had not money to meet those demands. In that letter it was pointed out that the difficulty might be met by levying additional taxation on the members of the Universities; but that, he thought, would bear very hardly on the poorer class of students, and was entirely out of the question if they wished to encourage people to resort to the Universities. If, then, the members were not to be taxed sufficiently to meet the objects in view, were they prepared to ask for a grant of public money, and was the House prepared to tax the country for that object? For his own part, he did not hesitate to say that that might legitimately be done to aid a national University under certain circumstances, but not while there were other resources at command which could be taken without injury to others and devoted to the same kind of objects for which, if applied to Colleges, it would be devoted. The present Bill, therefore, was a Bill for enacting that there was an interdependency between the Universities and Colleges from which the latter derived stability, which rendered it just and fair that the Colleges should contribute towards the funds of the University from which they derived their character, with the view of increasing its usefulness and making it re-act on the Colleges to their advantage. The matter would not, he might add, inasmuch as several of the Colleges had already been shown to have contributed largely to University purposes, be left to the voluntary action of the Colleges, because there might be an indisposition on the part of some and an overwillingness on the part of others to contribute; but the Commissioners under the Bill would, he hoped, look upon the needs of the Universities and the means of the Colleges as a whole, and endeavour to deal out justice to each, not attempting to deprive the Colleges of the funds of which they stood in need, but, when their wants were supplied, taking care that the funds at their disposal should be made available for improving the condition of the Universities. The Bill had been characterized by some as a revolutionary measure; but there was nothing, he contended, to be found within the four corners of a revolutionary character. If, as was said, it would tend to destroy the College system, he for one should not have brought it forward. All that had grown up at both Oxford and Cambridge had been dependent on the Colleges in connection with the Universities, and it was that system which was peculiar to those two Universities, which had done so much to establish them in the affection of the country, and which, he, for one, would do nothing to endanger. It was far from his intention to destroy the independence and self-government of the Colleges, or affect them injuriously in any way; but, on the contrary, he should wish them to be so thoroughly connected with the University that they would assist it as if it were a part of themselves. There was no disposition, so far as the Bill was concerned, to alter the system of study in the University, and he trusted that whatever might be done for science or research nothing would be done to sacrifice that literary teaching which had always been connected with the Universities. Classical, historical, philosophic, and, in fact, all kinds of learning would, he hoped, still be maintained to the same extent as at present, and, if it were found necessary to introduce new studies or give increased facilities to students, it would be done without the destruction of existing systems, and he trusted the foundation would always remain of a good, sound, classical education. There was, at all events, no intention, so far as the Bill went, to destroy any of those studies. What was wanted was that the Bill should be what he might call an academical Bill, and he hoped it would not be considered either in a theological or a political point of view. It took the University and Colleges as it found them, and its object was to give them increased life and energy, and tend to the improvement of both. In order to do that a Commission such as that appointed under the Bill should not, in his opinion, take isolated cases. A great many people said—"When you have seen so much done, why not leave the matter to the continuance of voluntary action?" At present there were great differences of opinion as to the mode in which the funds should be applied with the view of increasing the usefulness of the Universities, and that House, would, he thought, be singularly ill-qualified to discuss the details of the subject. It was only by means of a Commission which could examine and test all the operations of the Universities and Colleges that any satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at as to the manner in which the relations between them should be varied. If the whole thing were left to voluntary effort, the burden could never be equalized, and therefore it was desirable to have persons who would inquire into matters on the spot. There were, he might add, many who were anxious for a greatly enlarged Professorial system. Whenever he went to Oxford now he found some 600 or 700 men at the schools being examined. All those intermediate examinations were wholly unknown in his time; but there was now a perpetual state of examination. When, however, the present Bill was being brought forward with the means of increasing the Professorial system, he hoped no extravagant or exaggerated extension would be made in that respect without full consideration, for in his opinion nothing should be done in the way of Professorial extension which would extinguish the tutorial system. Professorial teaching would never meet the examination requirements of the present day. The tutorial system, by the mere action of the Colleges themselves, was at present taking a very different form from that which it did formerly. It was used economically and advantageously, and he held a statement in his hand which pointed out that the teaching of the tutors was by no means confined to their own Colleges. At present different Colleges associated themselves together for the purpose of general mathematical or classical teaching, and the existing system should not be interfered with rashly, neither should we deprive the Colleges of the funds they required for those purposes in order to institute what was called Professorial teaching in the University. He did not wish to disparage that kind of teaching which, no doubt, had an advantage in giving a large and general view of great subjects; but it could not impress special parts of subjects on the minds of pupils as well as individual teaching did. He now came to a question which had raised some feeling—that of residence. Far be it from him to say that a non-resident Fellow was an idle man, for he knew much of the reverse. At the same time, he might remark that, as far as his immediate bearing on his College and University was concerned, there could be no doubt that he did not render any special services for the income which he enjoyed either to the College or the University. He might take a considerable part in the improvement of the Colleges and the University, but being non-resident, he did not give any assistance to education going on therein. Besides, it seemed to him remarkable that life prizes should be given for a single examination, whether he rendered services or not. At present a man went in for an examination, and if he obtained it and continued celibate he was entitled to hold the Fellowship for the rest of his life. That was a position which, in his opinion, justified the declaration in the Preamble that provision should be made for limiting the tenure of Fellowships. He could not help feeling that on this point the House would have an almost unanimous opinion. He had, however, seen many poor men who would hardly have been able to go to the Bar at all if they had not had at the beginning a small Fellowship to begin with. With regard to the condition of celibacy, it was worthy of consideration whether it might not be relaxed in the case of Fellows who devoted their time and talents to educational work in the University. Now what was the University to get from those who were able to assist it? Everybody was most anxious that the grandeur and magnificence of the Bodleian Library should be extended. For that purpose additional buildings would be required, and no one could doubt that a great central library like the Bodleian, which admitted the whole world, might fairly expect not only to be supported by the University, but to receive assistance from the Colleges also. He next came to the question of what was called research. Sometimes he did not quite know what was meant by those who made use of the word. If it were meant that we should give an income to a gentleman for pursuing his classical, historical, or scientific investigation, there was not a sufficient guarantee to justify the employment of a fund in that way. Nothing, indeed, would require more attention on the part of the Commission than the endowment of research properly so-called. With regard to research on physical subjects, in which investigation was most required, how were we to treat a man? Was he to be treated like Tycho Brahe, who was placed in a large mansion and left to study the stars. That great astronomer did so, but it was doubtful whether everybody who was placed in an equally comfortable position would follow the example. Therefore, provision ought to be made that the research should be for definite objects and for a definite period, and that the results should be ascertained before the salary originally given was continued. He also trusted it would be of that kind which was essential to teaching, and which would be for the advantage of the Colleges and the University that supplied funds for it. He thought, however, that was a matter that might be fairly left to the Commissioners. In some of the Petitions it was suggested that there should be a preliminary inquiry, but he supposed that meant a preliminary inquiry on the part of the Commissioners before they laid down any definite rules. They would no doubt look at the question as a whole before coming to any definite conclusion. He took it for granted that no information would be withheld by the University or any of the different Colleges; and he had not the least doubt that the Commissioners would obtain all the information which they might require. The question had been so thoroughly investigated that there was enough of information at present available to enable them to come to such a conclusion as to render them immediately able to enter upon action. With respect to the Amendment on the Paper of his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan), he believed it was not hostile to the Bill, but it pointed out the necessity of obtaining some definition of what was intended to be done. In regard to the point, he might observe that the Preamble of the Bill laid down certain principles in general terms, while the 15th clause gave to the Commissioners as much guidance as could be given, considering that they would have to inquire before they formed their conclusions. Beyond that the Bill itself was framed on the principle that a University should contain within itself every art and science necessary for use that men should know—that there should be some one or other able to teach any one of those great subjects which influence the destinies of the world. It provided that the Commissioners, in statutes made by them for the University, might make provision for affording further or better instruction in any art or science, for consolidating any two or more Professorships or Lectureships, for erecting and endowing Professorships of, or Lectureships in, any art or science, and for increasing the endowment of any Professorship of, or Lectureship in, any art or science. Another object for which the Commissioners might make provision was “for altering the conditions of eligibility and mode of election to any Professorship and public Readership.” Some amendments of this nature might certainly be made with advantage. Another object was “for providing retiring pensions for Professors and public Readers.” This would be a beneficial provision, for what could be more undesirable than that men in such a position should cling to it to the last, wishing to teach, but without the ability to teach, because no retiring allowance could be given to them? The next object was to provide new or improve existing buildings, libraries, collections, or apparatus. He was told that in the Museum at present there were 60 or 70 students where there was only room for 20. Even upon the ordinary principles of demand and supply such an object as this must be provided for. The next purpose mentioned was “for diminishing the expense of University education by founding scholarships tenable by unattached students not members of any College, or by paying salaries to the teachers of such students, or otherwise.”

This provision was introduced at the instance of the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury. He (Mr. Hardy) was certainly of opinion that ability combined with poverty should receive assistance, but it might be worth considering in Committee whether the limitation here expressed was not too narrow. In the Halls there were some men quite as poor as the unattached students, without many of the advantages which the unattached students enjoyed; and therefore the limitation in the clause might probably be extended with advantage. Then came the Colleges, and the general principle laid down was that the University and the Colleges were a whole; that the University ought to be in a position to meet the wants and wishes of the Colleges, and must be put in a state to meet all demands for instruction in science and art which properly formed part of University education; that there should be a central power in the University; and that the Colleges should feel themselves so bound up with the University that they should not hesitate to give of their abundance towards it. If this feeling were elicited, he was sure that there would be a reaction of benefit to the Colleges themselves. Oxford and Cambridge had had an existence prolonged beyond that of most such institutions. There were older ones elsewhere, but there were none more famous or to which the heart of England was more thoroughly attached. For years the two Universities had been endeavouring to meet the educational wants of the country. They came now to Parliament, and he might say that they came almost unanimously, for, whatever might be the differences of opinion upon certain details of the Bill, there was an almost unanimous opinion in the University that the time had come when the relations of the Colleges with the University and of the University with the Colleges should be re-considered; that the time had come when the great and growing funds of the Colleges should be made applicable to the purposes stated in the Bill. He trusted, therefore, that the House would concur with the University in obtaining some of the great results which were foreshadowed in the Bill, and which he had ventured, though so feebly, to describe. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving as an Amendment—

"That in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Oxford Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the Colleges therein,"

said, he hoped it would be unnecessary to disclaim any intention on his part to obstruct the Bill or embarrass the Government. On the contrary, he desired to thank the Ministry for the promptitude with which they had grappled with this difficult question, and particularly to thank the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy), for the conciliatory and reassuring speech in which he had introduced his measure. Approaching, as he wished to do, the subject from an academical rather than from a political point of view, he would endeavour to avoid any topics which might divert the attention of the House from the objects they all had in view—the real improvement of the University. Before discussing the Bill, let him say one word as to that which was the most important part of the Bill—he might almost say it was the Bill—the Commission itself. It might seem presumptuous for a private Member like himself to criticize even from a favourable point of view so distinguished a body of men. At the same time their names were now public property, and one necessary consequence of entrusting such exceptional powers to any body of men was to make the Bill a question of men rather than of measures, and to make any discussion which made no reference to the personnel of the Commission necessarily incomplete. Fortunately, of the majority of that body nobody could speak except in terms of unqualified commendation. Every one who had known Lord Selborne in that House or at the Bar, who remembered his brilliant University career, and who had witnessed his recent indefatigable efforts in the cause of legal education, would feel that no better person could be found to preside over such a Commission. The names of Mr. Justice Grove, of Mr. Montague Bernard and Sir Henry Maine, were names of wide and deserved reputation, and as to his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Ridley) he hoped he might be allowed to say to his face what he had often said behind his back, that no more worthy representative of young Oxford could be found on those benches. Of Lord Redesdale he wished to speak with the respect due to the bearer of a great name and a most useful and able public functionary. But it had occurred to others besides himself that Lord Redesdale's large experience and great talents had been acquired and displayed rather in discovering objections than in surmounting them—rather in picking holes in the schemes of others than in framing such schemes as those to which the Commission would have to address itself, and he might be pardoned for expressing a doubt whether an intimate acquaintance with the Standing Orders of Parliament was the very best education for a University Reformer. Of the Dean of Chichester, he could speak with less reserve, for so strong was the objection entertained to him in "another place" that his name was actually challenged, not only by a debate, but by a division. Surely, if it was necessary to place on the Commission some representative of Dr. Burgon's school of theology, some less ostentatiously aggressive—he might almost say pugnacious—champion of that school might have been selected. Oxford men had not forgotten—they could not forget—how only a few years ago Dr. Burgon had endeavoured to exclude from the University Pulpit one of the best and ablest men who had ever adorned the English Church or any other Church—the Dean of Westminster. He thought the noble Lord the Marquess of Salisbury must have forgotten this episode in Dr. Burgon's career, when he placed him upon a Commission which ought to command, and which he believed was intended to command, the general confidence of the University. But whatever might be thought of the personal qualifications of each Commissioner they were, as regards the University itself, an outside body. Only one of them, he believed, had ever been connected by residence with the University since he had taken his degree. Two of the Commissioners, and those certainly not the least distinguished, had been for the greater part of their lives among the busiest members of the busiest Profession in England.

of his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan), he believed it was not hostile to the Bill, but it pointed out the necessity of obtaining some definition of what was intended to be done. In regard to the point, he might observe that the Preamble of the Bill laid down certain principles in general terms, while the 15th clause gave to the Commissioners as much guidance as could be given, considering that they would have to inquire before they formed their conclusions. Beyond that the Bill itself was framed on the principle that a University should contain within itself every art and science necessary for use that men should know—that there should be some one or other able to teach any one of those great subjects which influence the destinies of the world. It provided that the Commissioners, in statutes made by them for the University, might make provision for affording further or better instruction in any art or science, for consolidating any two or more Professorships or Lectureships, for erecting and endowing Professorships of, or Lectureships in, any art or science, and for increasing the endowment of any Professorship of, or Lectureship in, any art or science. Another object for which the Commissioners might make provision was “for altering the conditions of eligibility and mode of election to any Professorship and public Readership.” Some amendments of this nature might certainly be made with advantage. Another object was “for providing retiring pensions for Professors and public Readers.” This would be a beneficial provision, for what could be more undesirable than that men in such a position should cling to it to the last, wishing to teach, but without the ability to teach, because no retiring allowance could be given to them? The next object was to provide new or improve existing buildings, libraries, collections, or apparatus. He was told that in the Museum at present there were 60 or 70 students where there was only room for 20. Even upon the ordinary principles of demand and supply such an object as this must be provided for. The next purpose mentioned was “for diminishing the expense of University education by founding scholarships tenable by unattached students not members of any College, or by paying salaries to the teachers of such students, or otherwise.”

This provision was introduced at the instance of the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury. He (Mr. Hardy) was certainly of opinion that ability combined with poverty should receive assistance, but it might be worth considering in Committee whether the limitation here expressed was not too narrow. In the Halls there were some men quite as poor as the unattached students, without many of the advantages which the unattached students enjoyed; and therefore the limitation in the clause might probably be extended with advantage. Then came the Colleges, and the general principle laid down was that the University and the Colleges were a whole; that the University ought to be in a position to meet the wants and wishes of the Colleges, and must be put in a state to meet all demands for instruction in science and art which properly formed part of University education; that there should be a central power in the University; and that the Colleges should feel themselves so bound up with the University that they should not hesitate to give of their abundance towards it. If this feeling were elicited, he was sure that there would be a reaction of benefit to the Colleges themselves. Oxford and Cambridge had had an existence prolonged beyond that of most such institutions. There were older ones elsewhere, but there were none more famous or to which the heart of England was more thoroughly attached. For years the two Universities had been endeavouring to meet the educational wants of the country. They came now to Parliament, and he might say that they came almost unanimously, for, whatever might be the differences of opinion upon certain details of the Bill, there was an almost unanimous opinion in the University that the time had come when the relations of the Colleges with the University and of the University with the Colleges should be re-considered; that the time had come when the great and growing funds of the Colleges should be made applicable to the purposes stated in the Bill. He trusted, therefore, that the House would concur with the University in obtaining some of the great results which were foreshadowed in the Bill, and which he had ventured, though so feebly, to describe. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving as an Amendment—

"That in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Oxford Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the Colleges therein,"

said, he hoped it would be unnecessary to disclaim any intention on his part to obstruct the Bill or embarrass the Government. On the contrary, he desired to thank the Ministry for the promptitude with which they had grappled with this difficult question, and particularly to thank the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy), for the conciliatory and reassuring speech in which he had introduced his measure. Approaching, as he wished to do, the subject from an academical rather than from a political point of view, he would endeavour to avoid any topics which might divert the attention of the House from the objects they all had in view—the real improvement of the University. Before discussing the Bill, let him say one word as to that which was the most important part of the Bill—he might almost say it was the Bill—the Commission itself. It might seem presumptuous for a private Member like himself to criticize even from a favourable point of view so distinguished a body of men. At the same time their names were now public property, and one necessary consequence of entrusting such exceptional powers to any body of men was to make the Bill a question of men rather than of measures, and to make any discussion which made no reference to the personnel of the Commission necessarily incomplete. Fortunately, of the majority of that body nobody could speak except in terms of unqualified commendation. Every one who had known Lord Selborne in that House or at the Bar, who remembered his brilliant University career, and who had witnessed his recent indefatigable efforts in the cause of legal education, would feel that no better person could be found to preside over such a Commission. The names of Mr. Justice Grove, of Mr. Montague Bernard and Sir Henry Maine, were names of wide and deserved reputation, and as to his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Ridley) he hoped he might be allowed to say to his face what he had often said behind his back, that no more worthy representative of young Oxford could be found on those benches. Of Lord Redesdale he wished to speak with the respect due to the bearer of a great name and a most useful and able public functionary. But it had occurred to others besides himself that Lord Redesdale's large experience and great talents had been acquired and displayed rather in discovering objections than in surmounting them—rather in picking holes in the schemes of others than in framing such schemes as those to which the Commission would have to address itself, and he might be pardoned for expressing a doubt whether an intimate acquaintance with the Standing Orders of Parliament was the very best education for a University Reformer. Of the Dean of Chichester, he could speak with less reserve, for so strong was the objection entertained to him in "another place" that his name was actually challenged, not only by a debate, but by a division. Surely, if it was necessary to place on the Commission some representative of Dr. Burgon's school of theology, some less ostentatiously aggressive—he might almost say pugnacious—champion of that school might have been selected. Oxford men had not forgotten—they could not forget—how only a few years ago Dr. Burgon had endeavoured to exclude from the University Pulpit one of the best and ablest men who had ever adorned the English Church or any other Church—the Dean of Westminster. He thought the noble Lord the Marquess of Salisbury must have forgotten this episode in Dr. Burgon's career, when he placed him upon a Commission which ought to command, and which he believed was intended to command, the general confidence of the University. But whatever might be thought of the personal qualifications of each Commissioner they were, as regards the University itself, an outside body. Only one of them, he believed, had ever been connected by residence with the University since he had taken his degree. Two of the Commissioners, and those certainly not the least distinguished, had been for the greater part of their lives among the busiest members of the busiest Profession in England.

provision for religious instruction and worship, and at the same time disabled them from imposing fresh clerical restrictions, but as they had already power to suppress any Fellowships they pleased, the restriction became of less value, for they might, if so minded, suppress all the lay Fellowships in a College and leave all the clerical ones. It might be said that the question of clerical Fellowships might safely be left to the discretion of the Commissioners. But this was a question of all others upon which Parliament ought to speak out, and ought not to shift the responsibility of legislation to other shoulders. The condition of taking Holy Orders, which applied either as a condition precedent, or a condition subsequent to the great majority of Headships and to more than one-third of the Fellowships, was, to his mind, the greatest blot on the University system, and it was one, unfortunately, which the Tests Abolition Act had left untouched. It was, in fact, the test system revived in its most mischievous form. Could there be a doubt, from an academical point of view, that all restrictions which tended to fetter the discretion of the electing body and to narrow the area of selection were radically vicious? What would be said if it was proposed to confine Fellowships to laymen? The memorial recently presented to the Marquess of Salisbury showed how strong was the feeling of the residents on the subject. Of course, he knew the argument by which the maintenance of these restrictions was supported. It was said that there was a great deal of floating infidelity at Oxford, and that a certain amount of orthodox leaven was necessary to leaven the heterodox lump. But they forgot that the kind of leaven which was procured by bribing men to adopt a sacred profession, was but a bad kind of leaven after all. Surely it was but a poor compliment to Christianity to suppose that it required to be kept alive by such expedients as these. Surely Christianity was strong enough to take care of itself, without these paltry subsidies. The effect of these restrictions was to keep away good men, and to saddle the Colleges with an inferior class of tutors, who were, in many cases, neither a credit to the Church nor an advantage to the University. Then, as to these so-called checks. The 28th section, which allowed three Commissioners to be selected from the Colleges to be reformed, would produce an ill-assorted union, and necessitate the submission of schemes of College reform to a non-descript and ever-changing body. When the majority in the College went with the Commission all would go smoothly; but a recalcitrant College would appoint recalcitrant Commissioners, who might paralyze the efforts of the Commission. It was like giving a great momentum to a body and then applying a powerful break. If the break acted it brought the engine to a standstill; if it did not, it took you heaven only knew where. Thus even in the case of the limitations on the powers of the Commissioners, it was a matter of haphazard when and to what extent they might be brought to bear. The 26th and following sections, which gave a right of appeal to the University Committee of the Privy Council and to either House of Parliament, really meant nothing. Such a body might feel itself called upon to interfere, if the legal powers of the Commissioners were exceeded, or in cases of individual injustice—contingencies, he need hardly say, most unlikely to occur. But he was much mistaken if the Privy Council or either House of Parliament would feel called upon to step in and lay down a principle where Parliament laid down none. He came lastly to the Preamble, where for the first and last time they discovered something like the glimmer of a principle. The Preamble pointed to two definite objects—the taxation of the College for the benefit of the University, an issue which was directly challenged by the Motion of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Francis Harvey), and the extinction or limitation of non-resident or, as they had been called, “idle Fellowships.” Without saying that something might not be done in both these directions, he maintained that the utmost caution was necessary. By absorbing the Colleges in the University they might create bad imitations of a Leipsic or a Göttingen, but they would certainly destroy Oxford and Cambridge. He quoted a letter of Mr. George Brodrick to The Times to show that the regeneration of the Universities at the beginning of the present century was due to the activity of some of the Colleges, and that, at a time when Oxford and Cambridge were asleep, Balliol and Trinity were awake. It was the energy of the College heads and tutors, and the stimulus which they had given to University education, which had roused the Universities from that fatal period of lethargy—

“When Isis elders reeled their pupils sport
And Alma Mater lay dissolved in port.”

Besides, it should not be forgotten that it was easier to appoint Professors than to fill their class-rooms, and that richly-endowed Chairs would be of little service if confronted by empty benches. Then, as to these so-called “idle Fellowships.” That, he thought, was a very unfortunate epithet, for it created a prejudice among non-University men against a system which had borne good fruits. If “idle” meant “non-resident” an “idle Fellow” might be a man who was collating manuscripts in Italy or carrying on astronomical surveys at Greenwich. Few persons knew how many men who had risen to the highest offices in the State would never have emerged from obscurity but for these “idle” Fellowships. Why, the noble Lord the Marquess of Salisbury himself was an “idle Fellow.” Nearly every Member of the Commission, beginning with Lord Selborne, and ending with the hon. Gentleman opposite, had been “idle Fellows.” Both the Archbishops, both the Chief Justices, and a large proportion of the occupants of the Episcopal and Judicial Bench had been “idle Fellows,” and so had a host of men famous both in literature and science. He might be asked what benefit did their success in life confer on the Universities, but it must not be forgotten that the Universities existed for the benefit of the nation, and not the nation for the benefit of the Universities. These non-resident Fellowships were most valuable links between the Universities and the outside world, and such prizes were really the strongest incentives to exertion. It was not merely the pecuniary value of the Fellowships, though a desire for an honourable independence was a perfectly legitimate object of ambition. It was the position and connection with the Collegiate Body which they brought with them. Few persons who had held a Fellowship would exchange it for double the amount of money which it brought in. It was easy to say that men ought to study for an abstract idea, and the absence of any such inducement in German Universities had been referred to. But the German Universities had practically a monopoly of the civil offices of the State, and the learned Professions in that country could only be entered by an academic gate. No doubt, there were some glaring abuses of the present system; but if the Acts were to limit the duration of these non-resident Fellowships, and abolish the condition of celibacy—that monstrous relic of monkish times—these abuses might be got rid of by a stroke of the pen. The right hon. Gentleman had said that such matters of detail might safely be left to the discretion of the Commissioners, guided as they would be by public opinion. But what public opinion? As to public opinion at Oxford, though it was generally favourable to the Bill, it was, as to changes which were expected to follow from the Bill, hopelessly divided. Take the endowment of research, about which it was supposed that there was so strong a feeling among the residents. Only yesterday at Cambridge he asked the opinion of one of the most distinguished men at the University on the subject, and the only answer he got was that the “endowment of research meant the endowment of half the humbugs in England.” The fact that on its way through the House of Lords almost every clause of the Bill had been entirely remodelled was a proof that they had started on their voyage without a chart or a compass. If all such matters were left to the discretion of the Commissioners one of two results would follow. Either, as not unfrequently happened when men were entrusted with irresponsible powers, they would shrink altogether from exercising them, or having, so to speak, had to drive separate bargains with separate Colleges, they would produce a heterogeneous scheme without a principle or a plan. This danger had been pointed out by Professor Bryce in a recent article in The Fortnightly Review, in which, after showing the absurdity of dealing with each College separately, he wound up by saying—

“Into whatever department of the projected reforms we look narrowly, it will be found that the same necessity exists for obtaining facts and opinions, and for basing upon these some large and connected plan, whose principles may be applied in the case of each and every College.

A piecemeal reform which attempts to deal with each College by itself will be no reform of the University at all, and will only pave the way for renewed discontent and a renewed cry for legislative interference."

He hoped that this danger might be averted if the Commissioners were required by the Act to do what they had found it necessary to do in 1854—to hold a preliminary inquiry, to publish the results of that inquiry, and, after laying down some definite and comprehensive scheme of reform, to invite the University and the Colleges to fall in with it. If they did so, no difficulty would arise; or if it did, Parliament might find out some mode of solving that difficulty. Other objections might be suggested, but they were matters of detail. The objections to the Bill which he had pointed out were objections not of detail, but of principle, and as such he had thought it right to raise them on the second reading, and he would rejoice to see them removed. Upon this question they had all the same goal in view, though they might strive to arrive at it by different roads. They on that side of the House were as little inclined to revolutionize these ancient seats of learning as their opponents. On the other hand, they were willing to credit hon. Gentlemen opposite with a desire, as honest and genuine as their own, to deal with them in a spirit of sound but temperate reform. And certainly no one on these benches would grudge to the Conservative Party the praise which would be justly theirs if they could succeed in bringing these old Universities, round which the hopes and memories of 30 generations of Englishmen had entwined themselves, into harmony with the requirements of modern society, without destroying their strongly-marked individuality or impairing their time-honoured prestige. He would conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Oxford Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the colleges therein,"—(Mr. Osborne Morgan,)
—instead thereof.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY thought his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had done well in calling attention to the very extensive powers proposed under the Bill to be given to the Commissioners. Those powers struck him as being very vague, very vast, very unusual, and greatly in excess of those conferred upon the Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1854. But as he was not prepared to say that the powers now proposed to be conferred were, having regard to the circumstances of the case, actually excessive, and as this branch of the subject involved a vast amount of detail he would not on the present occasion enter upon its consideration; nor would he follow his hon. and learned Friend into the question of Clerical Fellowships, further than to suggest the importance of the House being put in possession of accurate information as to the number of Fellowships which were hampered with the qualification referred to. Some of the Fellowships now held by clergymen might be Fellowships, which when they were next vacated, would cease to be held under clerical restrictions. Passing from the speech and the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend he wished to call attention briefly to a proposal which he had himself put upon the Paper, to the effect that the revenues of the University had not been shown to be inadequate to the discharge of the duties incumbent on it. It was a remarkable fact that the University should come before the House and before the country and parade itself as a pauper. It came to Parliament in forma pauperis and said "We have no revenues adequate to discharge the duties of the University, and the Colleges must give up a portion of their revenues." This proposal was one involving what must be regarded as a confiscation of property, and he thought the University ought very clearly to make out its case as against the Colleges before Parliament could be expected to accede to its demands. In addition to the income of the University arising from its property an important source of revenue was to be found in the taxation of its members. The University took fees from them on going in for examinations and on taking degrees, besides receiving for each of them a sum of £1 per year. He had never heard that that was an excessive charge or one that the members of so ancient, honourable, and illustrious a corporation could complain of, and he was not aware that the University had ever taken into consideration the propriety of augmenting its revenue by increasing the taxation of its members. But it had another and important source of revenue in the funds of the University Press. The University possessed one-third of the monopoly of printing and publishing Bibles and Prayer Books in this country, and a more valuable or important endowment it was impossible to conceive. Besides having that monopoly the University Press was endowed with the handsome capital sum of £70,000, and until a few years ago there was annually transferred from the profits of the Press Fund to the University Chest a considerable sum of money. Fourteen years ago that sum amounted to £13,000. In 1866 it had dwindled to £4,500; in 1870 to £1,037, while in the following year he found in the Commissioners' Report a blank under the head, "Profits transferred to the University Chest from the Press Fund." How had the University contrived to deal with this important revenue of £13,000 a-year? The subject was involved in mystery. He had obtained an Address for a Return on the subject, and had learned only that evening from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the University of Oxford had not vouchsafed any Return whatever to the Address. In fact, he found on looking at the Commissioners' Report that every means had been taken to suppress the account of the Press fund, and no information of any practical value was given. They knew, however, that a net revenue which in 1862 amounted to £13,000 had dwindled to nothing in 1872. Yet the University came to Parliament and said that they were paupers, and that the Colleges must be fleeced to enable the University to carry on its business. But, although the House had had no explanation of the circumstances, he thought he had discovered the manner in which the money had been spent. For some time the directors of the University Press had been so facile in their management of the concern that there was no scribbler in Oxford who could not come to them with his note-book and say—"Publish the contents of my book, pay me a handsome sum of money, and take the risk on yourselves." And that was what they had, he believed, done in scores of cases. If they had done so in meritorious instances, the expenditure would not be grudged, but what was the character of the books the University had been printing all this time? It was not very long since the whole Liberal Party went mad over the thought of an elementary lesson book which had been referred to. What must have been their feelings when they learned the purposes to which University endowments had been applied and squandered of late years? He held in his hand a list of the works which the University had published, and among them was "A Series of English Classics," with the note "It is especially hoped that this series may prove useful to ladies' schools." That was where the money went to; and then there came all sorts of nice little books which cost the editors no trouble, while they gave them the inestimable pleasure of picking other men's brains. There was "Spenser's Faery Queene; Books 1 and 2, Designed chiefly for the use of Schools." "Specimens of Lowland Scotch." "A First Reading Book;" "Oxford Reading Book for Little Children;" "Oxford Reading Books for Junior Classes." Then he came to the head of "Mathematics," where they would expect to find some abstruse works. But no; they were merely such as "Figures made Easy, a First Arithmetic Book." Lessons in "Bookkeeping," by an Assistant Secretary to the Board of Trade, and so on. It was in the publication of these series that he suspected much of the money went, and yet in the face of it all, the University came and said to Parliament and the country "We have no money, we must have money, and the Colleges must give it." So much for the alleged deficiencies of income. Now, he would look to the side of expenditure which was said to require so great an increase that the funds of the Colleges must be confiscated so as to enable the University to get along. In order to do so he had examined the Report of the Committee of the Hebdominal Council on University requirements, and he found that the requirements were very numerous indeed. There were estimates for buildings and institutions which came to something like £100,000, which at 5 per cent—including a sinking fund as the University could probably borrow at 4 per cent—would entail a temporary charge of £5,000 a-year. He gave them in the £2,000 for the benefit of the Bodleian Library, of which his right hon. Friend had spoken, and that would make £7,000. But that was barely half of what the University made out of the Press fund when the Press was conducted in a proper way. Why, then, did not the University avail itself of the resources it possessed, instead of trying to lay its hands upon the money of other people? Then there was £2,300 for the roof of the Museum, which was “in urgent need of repairs”—a Museum which had only recently been built and which was one of the greatest disfigurements to Oxford which the present Gothic age had set up. Then it should be borne in mind that included in the £100,000 above-mentioned was a very considerable sum, to the amount of £30,000, demanded as the “roughly estimated” requirement of three heads of departments, those of Biology, Chemistry, and Physics. But the University did not say that the expenditure was necessary. Heads of departments wanted it and asked for it, and that was a very different thing from its being really wanted. Further on in the Report they heard of an increase in the Professoriate. They, however, had in full operation the inter-Collegiate system, which had worked admirably, and what did they want with an indefinite extension of the Professoriate? In 1854 an extension was contemplated, but in that year Parliament expressed itself pretty plainly on the conditions of such extension. Provision was first to be made for the wants and improvement of the Colleges or Halls; and, secondly, but only secondly, for the establishment of the Professoriate on an enlarged basis “in the several main branches of science and letters”—not in Slavonic and Chinese as now was suggested, and “with adequate duties and emoluments.” Now, nothing was heard of duties in the present Bill, and it only made provision for emoluments and pensions. In his opinion an indefinite extension of the Professoriate meant a number of luxurious residences, children in perambulators wheeled about the Parks, picnics in

Bagley Wood, carriages, champagne, and the abandonment of celibacy and of culture. There was a good deal of that already, and complaints were rife of the luxury of Oxford, and of the great expenditure incurred at Commemoration time. Did they think when they had a number of married men living in luxurious leisure that their wives would not be wanting to enjoy the pleasures of society? Of course they would, and he feared they would find education at Oxford a different thing in the future from what it was in the past. Instead of having it conducted by celibate teachers, they would have an increased staff of married Professors, who, of course, would be paid out of the suppressed Idle Fellowships. Then, as to the “idle Fellows,” an expression which was repudiated by the author of the epigram on Idle Fellowships, he supposed Lord Salisbury had been reading a book that he (Lord Francis Hervey) had been looking over the other day, written by a distinguished French architect, M. Viollet-le-Duc, who said that the Fellows of Colleges were men who preserved for the whole of their lives the privilege of lodging in the College, keeping a horse, and drinking beer. He supposed that this was the idea which Lord Salisbury had formed of the non-resident Fellows. He (Lord Francis Hervey), however, should regard it as a great calamity if the Commissioners exercised the power of extinguishing and exterminating all the Fellowships to which no particular duties were attached. If this were done, and if no concern in the management of academical affairs were to be allowed except to resident Fellows, such a fit of stagnation would come over the University that it would be necessary before long to have another extensive Reform Bill. He wished in the next place to warn the House against any proposals for turning adrift the revenues of Oxford, and applying them to the purposes of Leeds, Leicester, Nottingham, Bradford, and other large towns, which ought to be able to pay their own way. He should regard with great jealousy any appropriation of academical funds to provide large towns with lectures, classes, and examinations. There was another point to which he wished to refer—the extreme brevity of the time during which the magnificent buildings at Oxford were open for the purpose of study. How long did education go on? Not for six months. Indeed, he doubted whether the work of study and research went on at Oxford for more than five months in the year. He should like to see some powers given to the Commissioners whereby the leisurely gentlemen who managed the academic affairs of Oxford should be forced to do more for the money they received and make better use of their magnificent foundations. There was not an elementary school receiving a Government grant that was not open for 40 weeks in the year, while the University of Oxford was open at the outside for three terms of eight weeks each in the year. The right hon. Gentleman had made only a passing allusion to a provision not contained in the original Bill, but inserted at the suggestion of the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury. The learned Professors and magnates of Oxford in their paper of suggestions never thought of the poor unattached students. It seemed to him that they were only thinking of their own salaries. These students were coming to Oxford with a desire for instruction worthy of the 13th century, but the University of Oxford never dreamt of assisting them. It was reserved for the mellow wisdom, the consideration, and thoughtfulness of the most rev. Primate to plead their cause; and it was much more worthy of the Legislature, instead of multiplying the number of useless Professors, to assist the unattached students. In conclusion, he must thank the House for the kind attention with which they had listened to the remarks he had made on the subject.

MR. CLIFFORD wished to say a few words, as he was the only actual College Fellow in the House; indeed, he had the misfortune to be the "idle Fellow" par excellence. He believed the College to which he belonged (All Souls) was considered by some as the greatest abuse in Oxford, and he was the greatest abuse of that College. It would be only proper, therefore, that he should break a lance in favour of the idle Fellow, and, in doing so, in favour of those Fellows who were elected for their attainments and their learning he must observe that the term "idle Fellow" had only been used in a Parliamentary or Pickwickian sense. He was not going to speak against the Bill; indeed, he thanked the right hon.

Gentleman for the very moderate speech in which he had moved the second reading, but he wished to point out some of the difficulties which might impede its progress. Last year and the year before the Address on the opening of the Session had been moved by two hon. Members with an ability which had won the highest praise from the Prime Minister, and both those Members had been in the category of idle Fellows. In the College to which he belonged they were happily exempted from those clerical restrictions that the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had referred to with regard to birthplace and profession, and now the last restriction as to headship had gone, and the Fellows of the College were elected solely on their literary merits. It used to be the poorest College in Oxford, and was now nearly the richest. The Fellows passed a sort of self-denying ordinance and allowed their leases to run out, so that their estates were now let at rack rents, and their revenue was, perhaps, greater than ought to belong to any College. For the last 10 years proposals for reform had been brought forward in the College itself. There seemed to be nothing so fascinating to the human intellect as attempting to draw up new constitutions, and every one of them connected with the College had been attempting to draw up a constitution. He therefore trusted that the Government would strengthen the hands of the Commissioners, and give them stronger powers than they now possessed of coming to a practical conclusion. A plan had been proposed of founding a second Law Professorship at Oxford, but an idea prevailed in some quarters that the University was already too much saturated with Professorships. Other objects in connection with which the surplus funds of the College were expended were the Bodleian Library, middle-class education, the Civil Service in India, and scholarships for the study of the Telegu language. The whole of the members of his College were agreed that some portions of its revenue might be diverted to aid the University, but, unless the Commission to be appointed had more definite instructions than were laid down in the Bill, he was afraid the College would go on floundering in the vague and uncertain way it had done hitherto. He could not understand the morbid hatred which seemed to inspire the clause directed against the junior Fellows, and, as it involved an unjust slur upon them, he hoped it would be withdrawn. So far from there being any factious opposition to the Bill from the body to which he belonged, he believed that they would do all they could to enhance the position of their famous University, and for himself, his only desire was to increase the usefulness of the College and the University to which he was attached.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he did not desire to speak with any hostility to the Bill. He did not entertain any objection to the University asking for assistance from the funds of the Colleges, but he did look with a certain amount of dread upon the power to be given to the University over teaching Fellowships and other emoluments of Colleges. That would be a most serious power to vest in the Commissioners, though so far as Cambridge was concerned he believed that a better Commission could hardly be devised. He could not, however, reconcile to himself the Commissioners having the power to impose upon a College a Fellow who was not of their own election. It was impossible to say that under the Bill a theological Professor might not be imposed as a Fellow upon an essentially lay foundation, such as Trinity Hall, for instance, which would thereby lose a great deal of its lay element. He objected to the great powers that were proposed to be given to the Commissioners by the 13th clause to deal with the designs and original intentions of the founders, thinking that the practices of the several Colleges, many of which had endured for generations, ought to have some weight. He did not think it desirable to abolish all "idle" Fellows, if by that term it was meant to include all Fellows who were not engaged in the work of University education, because these Fellowships had always been highly prized as stimulants and encouragements to industry and ambition, and had been of the greatest benefit to the Colleges and the Universities.

MR. LOWE said, that when the House approached the subject some 22 years ago, it did so with great advantages, because one of the ablest Commissions ever appointed had conducted a thorough investigation into the position of the University of Oxford, which, besides, had changed very little for 200 years. The system was settled and well understood. Everybody who had been there knew what it was; and, assisted by the labours of the Commission, which poured a flood of light upon every matter with which they had to do, the House came to the consideration of the subject with a knowledge of the minutest details. He was sorry to say that on the present occasion these advantages were wholly wanting. At that time we made up our minds by the assistance of the Commissioners and our own knowledge of the circumstances as to what was good for the University, we embodied the views we entertained with great particularity in a Bill, laying down distinctly the objects we sought to accomplish, and we appointed a Commission which faithfully carried out those views. The work was done in a manner which reflected the greatest credit on the House. It was done with the greatest care and circumspection, and every security was taken that the object in view should be attained. That was the history of the measure of 1854; and now contrast that with the measure now before us. We were now asked to pass a second measure on the subject, but what was the knowledge we possessed of the present state of Oxford? We were told that an enormous change had been wrought by the Bill of 1854. Everybody said Oxford was now a very different place from what it was, but what evidence, what knowledge had we as to the nature of the change? We had none whatever. We knew nothing about it. We knew that great changes must have occurred, for it was impossible to introduce into the University such a change as that made by the measure of 1854—that of throwing open the Fellowships to literary competition without making a great change; but as to the nature of the change and whether it had worked for good or evil we had no information whatever. Now that was a state of things extremely to be regretted. He should like extremely to know—but he had no means of knowing—how this great change had been effected and in what direction it had worked, because that information would guide them most materially on the question of dealing with the matter they were asked to deal with that evening. His information on this point had been derived from a letter printed in The Times some few days ago from the Dean of Wells, a very high authority, that the change which had been made was most beneficial. The Dean said the result of what had been done was to breathe a new life into many Colleges, and make them superior to what they were before. When he had sent up pupils he considered himself fortunate when out of six first classes four fell to his pupils; but not only did the Dean of Wells get a double first-class himself, he got double first-classes for others. He sent three into the school at the same time, and all three obtained a double first-class. No man, then, was better entitled to give his advice on this matter than the Dean of Wells, and he (Mr. Lowe) attached great weight to what he said on the subject. He stated that what had been done had answered wonderfully well, and a melancholy day it would be for Oxford when it was sought to alter it. That was all the information they had—information supplied by a most competent witness—that what was proposed to be done was in a wrong direction. That was how the matter now stood. If the question was to be decided on ordinary principles of common sense—he might say on Conservative or on traditionary principles—he should have thought that on a matter of this kind Government would say to them one of two things, either it was desirable to allow the experiment of 1854 to be worked out—for from the nature of things it had not yet been worked out—or if for some reason or another they were of opinion that it was necessary to break up, shatter, and destroy the experiment the House of Commons then made, at any rate, they should say—“We will enter into an inquiry and let you know how matters stand, in order that you may see whether any remedy is needed, and what the nature of that remedy should be,” so that it might be dealt with as the House did in 1854. He should have thought either one or the other of these courses was inevitable in the state of things in which they found themselves. But such was not the course they were now asked to take. The experiment had not been worked out; no charge was laid before them that the experiment had failed, and yet the course they were asked to take was to appoint a Commission, without any groundwork of information being laid for that Commission, without proving the least grievance or any reason for appointing it—they were to appoint this Commission and entrust to it the power of entirely revolutionizing, destroying, and re-constructing the University of Oxford. Why were they to do so? He had not heard the slightest suggestion of a reason why the policy which the House solemnly adopted in 1854 should not fairly be worked out—why it should be interrupted in its course and why they should undo all the benefit which had been done. He hoped before the debate closed some grounds would be given why they should act without inquiring, without investigating the subject—why, above all things, they should take the particular line of reversing the very policy adopted in 1854. That was what he had to say to the Bill as it was proposed—in fact, to any Bill on this subject proposed under present circumstances. He thought they had a right to demand that something should be laid before them in the shape of a ground for the action which they were asked to take. It was not because the noble Lord (the Marquess of Salisbury) told them that there were some “idle Fellowships” that such an experiment was to be arrested in midcourse, and that they should be asked to adopt proposals which in 1854 the House entirely rejected. What were the Commissioners to do? They had given to them a power such as had been given to no Commissioners before, for they were to take an ancient and venerable institution into their hands—to make statutes for it such as they pleased, to do what they liked with it, to re-mould and re-cast it, without advice or direction in what way they should act, except simply this—that they were to go against the whole principle of the Act of 1854, and whereas it was thought necessary then to create idle Fellowships the Commissioners might cut them down, destroy them, and apply the proceeds to other purposes. Only a few nights ago the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of London, argued, not without applause from certain Gentlemen, that Parliament had no right to ask for an account of the manner in which the London Livery Companies spent their money. He could not agree with that doctrine, but now the doctrine was pushed much further. Because these Colleges possessed a large sum of money, it was to be seized to any extent without any ground of offence being laid, and devoted to other Corporations and to purposes totally alien. He wanted to know, not merely for the sake of the University of Oxford, but for the security of the institutions of the country—of everything founded and held sacred—upon what grounds this property was to be attacked. He was not at all one of those who laid too much stress on the sanctity of corporate property, if they showed a good ground for interference and applied it to better purposes. But to take it from one corporation, as they were asked to do by the Bill, without any ground at all; merely because they chose to do it and had the power to do it, and bestow it on other corporations—to give such an arbitrary power to Commissioners—was so wild, so utterly unusual and unknown in this country and Parliament, that he had a right, not as regards the Universities merely, but as a matter of precedent, to ask the Government to give them some reasonable grounds for such a proposal. The Commissioners had powers almost without limit, powers which he would not give to any one under heaven; and the question was, what confidence could they repose in them? It was a disagreeable and invidious thing to analyze the intentions of a body of Gentlemen, every one of whom was highly respectable; but where the powers given were so large he would not shrink from that duty. He would state his opinion with regard to each and every one of them, for, as he had said, he would object to any men under heaven having such powers delegated to them. Who was the first Commissioner? Lord Selborne. He had had the happiness of knowing him for more than 50 years. He esteemed him highly—no man more so. But what was his characteristic? He was extremely devoted to High Church views. That was his peculiarity. He was also the first Lord Chancellor, he believed, who ever published a book of hymns. Take the next name, Lord Redesdale. As Chairman of Committees of the House of Lords, he had done admirably good service to the country. He was a very able man in all respects, but he had a sort of super-human power of obstruction. The measure they had been discussing that night

—namely, the melancholy mutilation of the plan for abolishing the jurisdiction of the House of Lords—was entirely owing to Lord Redesdale, and yet he was put forward as one of the Commissioners to re-organize so complicated an institution as the University of Oxford. Let them take another name—the Dean of Chichester, whose pretensions were of such a nature that even the House of Lords could not stand them. He spoke with great respect of the Dean of Chichester, but he believed he had been properly described as a “jocose fanatic”—a character he had built up for himself and maintained with such consistency during life, that if a case were put before him with the Church interest on one side and every interest on the other, it would be impossible for him, with every effort, to give an impartial judgment. The next Commissioner was Mr. Mountague Bernard. He might speak of him freely, because he was a relative of his own. He was a most excellent man, of great ability, and, he thought, he was Liberal in views, but he was the editor of a High Church newspaper. Then came Sir Henry Maine. No one could admire him more than he (Mr. Lowe) did. He was an ornament to the century. His investigation into the ancient laws, customs, and manners of mankind raised him to the highest renown as a literary scientific investigator, but everybody knew that he was a sort of Ministerial agent, an alter ego, of Lord Salisbury in the Council of India, and nobody could suppose that in this matter of the University of Oxford he would not act in accordance with the views of Lord Salisbury. Another objection to him was that he was a Cambridge man, and not conversant with the affairs of Oxford. The next was a gentleman whose discoveries had done the country the highest honour, and mankind the greatest benefit. He referred to Mr. Justice Grove. No one respected him more than he (Mr. Lowe) did, but we could not expect that, with his judicial duties, he could give time to the working out of the details of the Commission, or be anything more than an ornamental Member. The last name was that of the hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. M. W. Ridley), of whom he had nothing to say except that he believed him to be a perfectly good Commissioner, and he had no doubt he would give valuable assistance. But he asked the House, if the Commission was such as he had described it to be, was it the sort of Commission to which they would entrust almost absolute power over the re-modelling of that great institution? Was it fair, because they had a majority in that House, that they should impose on them that arbitrary and unconstitutional Bill, and then place the working of it in the hands of such a Commission as he had described? He hoped in that respect it might not be too late to have some amendment. If the House would follow his counsel it would not be to attempt to strike out any names—for that would be invidious—but he hoped the Government would allow him to add some Members to the Commission who would temper the extreme views of the present Members. Why should three or four very High Churchmen be put on the Commission without any counterbalancing element? If they would have the poison, they ought to furnish the antidote by adding two or three raging Low Churchmen. Those things appeared to him to be very well worth consideration. There was not a single Member of that Commission who at present resided in Oxford. He did not know that there was any Member of the Commission unless it was Mr. Bernard, who, he thought, was Professor of International Law, that had ever taught in Oxford or had anything to do with it. It would be wise to put into the Commission some persons who had a knowledge of what was now actually going on in Oxford, who were familiar with the business of the place, and could give advice and assistance. The Government were taking a most unusual course from first to last on this subject. They knew that the feeling at Oxford with regard to this Bill was entirely different from the feeling at Cambridge with regard to the University of Cambridge Bill, although both were identical, and the reason was that Cambridge had confidence in the persons who were to be appointed Commissioners, but Oxford had not. With regard to the proposal to do away with what was called “idle Fellowships,” and to spend money in learning, in research, or in religion, he ventured to say this—that the point of view in which Oxford was regarded by the people of this country was as an educational institution. They thought it was a place to which young men were to go to be educated, and their view, if consulted, would be to make it a place best fitted for the education of young men. The word “University” was used in a double sense—sometimes merely as a general noun of multitude, instead of enumerating all the Colleges of Oxford, and sometimes, and more properly, it was used to denote the corporate body which conferred degrees. In the sense of corporate body, he ventured boldly to make this assertion, that it was hundreds of years since the University of Oxford educated anybody, and that there was not the slightest chance that any number of hundreds of years hence it would educate anybody again. Since the time of the Reformation and the dawning of learning its office had been limited very much to examining, and very badly it examined, because it selected as its examiners persons who were also tutors, and who were interested, therefore, in the passing of their pupils. The result was that the standard of the examinations was disgracefully low, and, instead of it being an honour to pass, it conferred no honour on any one. The education was carried on not in the University, but in the Colleges, and it was carried on in the Colleges by the tutors and others who were not necessarily connected with the University. Now, so far from their endowments going to improve education, they would tend distinctly to injure and destroy it. The money paid to people to teach other people was money thrown away, unless they introduced in some way or other the principle of competition, so that they should be paid in proportion to their success. But the money spent in prizes to induce young men to qualify themselves to obtain such rewards and a start in life, which might be the making of them, was the very sinew and life of education. The more money they expended in that way the more their Colleges would flourish, and the less they so expended the more their Colleges would decline. But what were they asked to do? To abolish all “idle Fellowships”! They annexed a duty to a Fellowship, and it was no longer a prize. It was no prize to be paid for doing a work; the prize was to be paid for doing no work at all, so that one might have time and means to qualify himself for a rise in life. Although there was no doubt they would still obtain the services of able men, they should not destroy the great stimulus to industry that existed in those prizes. They were asked to take away from the Colleges those sums that really were the things which filled their Colleges at Oxford and gave them the able and eminent men who went there. They were asked to starve those men, and to bestow those sums on the University, which never had done and never would do anything for education. When a man was incompetent he was to be salaried or pensioned off as a retired or an emeritus Professor. He said that their principle was radically wrong and bad; and as one who had had experience of Oxford for 11 years, he did not hesitate to say that every penny they took from these Fellowships in order to endow the University was so much taken from the encouragement of learning in order to propagate laziness and ignorance. Those were his views. He thought they merited more consideration than they had received. He thought they ought to be told what was the necessity to make the great change now proposed, and why they were not to have a Commission constituted with fairness towards all parties; and why, when there were two bodies at Oxford—the University, that did nothing, and the Colleges, that did all the work—the Government proposed to take money away from the Colleges and spend it on the University.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Debate be now adjourned.”
 —(Mr. Grant Duff.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought it was scarcely reasonable to adjourn the debate at so early an hour.

MR. GOSCHEN presumed that his hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) had moved the Adjournment because no one had risen to reply to the speech of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe), and also because some hon. Members opposite had probably been taken by surprise, and were not then prepared to bring the discussion of so important a matter to a conclusion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, who undoubtedly was in that House one of the highest authorities with respect to the University of Oxford. But if Her Majesty's Ministers did not intend to reply to that speech, the remedy must be in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman himself, who could propose such Amendments as he thought requisite when the Bill went into Committee. He (Mr. Newdegate) had always thought it was a mistake to entrust the control of education in the University to Convocation, and this Bill appeared to him to be a sequel to that great mistake.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) complained that nobody had answered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, but there was, to a certain extent, an explanation of that—namely, that the speech of that right hon. Member answered itself. In the first place, with regard to the reasons why the Bill had been brought forward, it had not appeared to the present occupants of the Treasury Bench that it was at all necessary for them to give an explanation of the reason why something further should be done in respect to University Reform after the measure of 1854. The proposal to reopen the settlement of 1854 originated not with the present, but with the late Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman himself was a distinguished Member. Surely the right hon. Gentleman could not have forgotten that the Commission of Inquiry was appointed by the late Prime Minister, who was himself the author, or, at all events, had charge of the original Bill of 1854. When, therefore, the Government were asked why they did not give the original measure a longer trial, their answer was that its responsible parents were themselves dissatisfied with it. [“No!”] Well, what was the Commission of Inquiry appointed for? [Mr. Lowe: The Commission was appointed to inquire into the pecuniary resources of the Colleges.] But was the Commission appointed for the purpose of gratifying idle curiosity, or in order to lay a foundation for some proposals of a practical character? If his memory served him right, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, when he made his appeal to the country two years ago, expressed his intention, if he had a majority, of dealing with the question of those endowments; and every one who had the most superficial acquaintance with public affairs knew that that question was being constantly agitated. Was it, then, unnatural that the Government should come forward with proposals on the subject? If the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) wished to give the present state of things a longer trial, he ought logically to have moved the rejection of the Bill. Then the Government would have felt themselves bound to meet him. But the right hon. Gentleman pointed out a great many things to which he thought objection might be taken, and he certainly seemed to indicate the necessity, at all events, of ascertaining what improvement could be made. Now, one of the principles of the Bill was that the endowments of Colleges should be made as useful as possible for the purposes of the University, which, surely, was a very reasonable and legitimate proposal. If hon. Gentlemen opposite said they were prepared to consider the question, but that they objected to the Government scheme, then the matter might very fairly be discussed in Committee; but he did not see why the Government should be called upon either to defend the bringing forward of measures which were initiated by their Predecessors, including the right hon. Gentleman himself, or that they were bound to meet objections which the right hon. Gentleman himself had already answered. The right hon. Gentleman, in his trenchant and graphic style, gave a description of the Commissioners, whom he highly praised, but every one of whom, with a single exception, he found unsuitable for the position he was to occupy. Well, it might have been supposed that some of them were to be objected to and struck out. But no! the right hon. Gentleman did not ask for that, he wanted some others. Well, as he could make his proposals on that point in Committee, it was surely unreasonable at the present time to ask for an Adjournment of the Debate. The object of the Government was to proceed with the measure in a serious and business-like manner. If there were objections to it they could certainly be discussed on the second reading; but seeing there was no serious indisposition on the part of the House to read the Bill a second time, it certainly seemed to him advisable under the circumstances to let it proceed without delay to its next stage.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) was perfectly justified, although at an early hour, in moving the Adjournment of the Debate. The debate was about to close in a somewhat unexpected and unsatisfactory manner. No Member of the Government had spoken except the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy), and neither of the hon. Members representing the Universities, except the right hon. Gentleman, had expressed his views. If it were understood that the discussion on the Oxford Bill could be resumed on the Cambridge Bill, he did not know that there could be any objection to the second reading of the Oxford Bill being now assented to; but he should like to have a clear understanding that a further stage of the Oxford Bill would not be taken until the Cambridge Bill was read a second time.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought this proposal was most fair and reasonable, and would accept it at once.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed that really no answer had been given to the objections that had been taken to the Bill. The whole debate, since the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had sat down, had been one way. Member after Member had attacked the Bill in a most dangerous way, and no reply whatever had been made to those speeches.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished it to be clearly understood that on the second reading of the Cambridge Bill any hon. Gentleman interested in the Oxford Bill should be entitled to express his opinions about the Oxford Bill. At the same time, he wished to point out that the operation of the two Bills would be very dissimilar, as the Commissioners were so very different. When would the second reading of the Cambridge Bill be taken?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if nothing unforeseen happened, the second reading of the Cambridge Bill would be taken as the First Order next Monday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

ARMY CORPS TRAINING BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 182.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was simply to enable the necessary arrangements to be carried out for the manœuvring of troops in the several localities where it was intended they should take place during the ensuing autumn. In conclusion, he would say he trusted that any discussion that might be considered necessary would take place on a future occasion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Hardy.)

MR. J. HOLMS, who had a Notice of Motion on the Paper that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, his object was not to prevent the assembling of the forces, but he thought the House was entitled to more substantial explanations than it had yet been put in possession of. The real fact was that the object of the Bill was to provide further training of two Army corps, which was part of a scheme for the mobilization of troops which had not yet been submitted to the House.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was out of Order in referring to the subject he proposed to discuss, which did not come within the scope of the Bill. He would have an opportunity of doing so on the Report of Supply, but in the present debate his doing so would be out of Order.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN thought the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman required careful consideration. The term "Army corps," was a term not known to Parliament, and this was practically the first formal introduction into Parliament of the Localization Scheme, upon which he should have thought, subject to correction, that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney might have discussed the question.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that this year the troops were allowed to encamp within the area of all lands specified in the Schedule, while last year they were only allowed to occupy uninclosed lands, and such as were pointed out by a Commission. This year there were nine areas, instead of one area, and the consequences would be very serious to many occupying private property. He asked that a copy of the Army Corps Training Bill, showing the alterations, might be laid on the Table before the second reading of the Bill was moved. There were not 10 Members in the House who knew what they were asked to assent to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, upon the point of Order, it was well to bear in mind that the Preamble of the Bill referred to "Army corps," a term quite new in legislation. He would like to know what it meant.

MR. STANLEY said, although it ought to be pretty well known by this time what an Army corps was, he was willing to gratify the thirst of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite for all kinds of military information. It consisted of the three arms of the Service—namely, the Infantry, the Cavalry, and the Artillery combined. It was divided into divisions and brigades, the latter consisting of two or more regiments. He trusted that this information, and the assistance derivable from The Army Lists published since last December, would enable his hon. and learned Friend to approach the subject with more information than he had hitherto displayed to the House. This year private arrangements had been made with the owners of property where the troops were to be encamped; but it might happen that short distances of occupation, roads, and of ground otherwise inclosed might require to be marked out. Unless such cases were provided for, a great portion of the Act of last year would be practically nugatory, and therefore it was necessary to modify its provisions. He thought the question might be more opportunely raised on the discussion of the Motion of which the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had given Notice.

CAPTAIN NOLAN hoped that the important change which had been made in the organization of the Army would be fully discussed, and expressed his belief that the manœuvres did not injure private property anything like so much as fox-hunting.

MR. HAYTER asked whether the Government would give the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) the opportunity of raising the question on the Report of Supply?

COLONEL MURÉ thought it would be better to defer a discussion until the experiment had been tried. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on the attempt which the Bill would make of placing the Army on a more satisfactory footing.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had been imperfectly understood. What he desired to do was to call attention to the fact that the term "Army corps" was for the first time used in the proposed legislation, and he desired to ascertain whether the passing of the Bill would be construed into a Parliamentary recognition and sanction of the new mobilization scheme while there were Notices of Motion in the Order Book which impugned the whole scheme.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would admit that the expression "Army corps" was for the first time used in a Parliamentary measure, and it had been used in The Army List only since December last. The Bill would not commit the House to an approval of that particular mode of dealing with troops which was known as mobilization; all that it would do was to authorize what was necessary to be done in calling out a body of troops whom it was proposed to form into two Army corps. With regard to another point, this mobilization scheme appeared in The Army List of December; it was commented upon in a pamphlet and in speeches by the hon. Member for Hackney; it was mentioned in the speech when the Army Estimates were brought in; there were four discussions upon them, and it remained to be discussed in connection with the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. He did not think therefore he need enter into further explanations on the subject now.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

JURORS' QUALIFICATION (IRELAND)

BILL—[BILL 127.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Act of 1871 instituted a certain rating qualification, which after a short time, it was found necessary to raise by the Act of 1873. A Select Committee sat on the Irish Jury system for two sessions, and they reported unanimously that the rating qualification fixed by the old Act was too low, and that it should be raised somewhat higher than it was by the temporary Act of 1873. When he came to look into the question it occurred to him that it might be settled by adopting a household qualification as better than one derived from holding a certain number of acres of land. He had, therefore, adopted the principle based on the rateable value of houses, and had supplemented it by a qualification arising from occupation of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, but upon a higher basis than under the existing law. He also proposed to add freeholders to the value of £10, and leaseholders to the value of £20 per annum. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that as there were several alterations which ought to be made, he trusted that an opportunity would be given for discussion at the next stage of the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON said, having sat on the Committee, he wished to state that the right hon. Gentlemen the Chief Secretary for Ireland had fairly embodied in the measure the unanimous recommendations of the Committee, and he would be sorry to see any difficulties thrown in the way of the passing of the Bill. In his opinion it was a just and fair measure.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

(IRELAND) BILL—(Lords).—[BILL 161.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that a full opportunity would be given at a Morning Sitting for discussing the measure on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. The main object of the Bill was to extend to Ireland the great and beneficial change already effected for England—namely, that Equity and Common Law should be concurrently administered. There were peculiar facilities for carrying out this reform in Ireland, as all the Judges who adorned the Bench in that country had, when at the Bar, practised both in the Common Law and Equity Courts; and all those Courts were already gathered under one roof in the same building. As to the main objects of the Bill there could, he believed, be no controversy; that could only arise as to the machinery intended for carrying them out, and such questions could best be discussed in Committee. He would, therefore, at present simply move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. LAW said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion, for in his opinion it was desirable that the changes made in the system of Judicature in England should be introduced without further delay in the Irish Judicature also. There were, however, some points to which he wished to call attention. It was in Ireland of even more importance than it was in England that there should be a strong Court of Intermediate Appeal, and he therefore objected to the exclusion from it of the Master of the Rolls. He objected also to the proposal of making the Probate Judge a merely nominal Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. They should, he thought, transfer not only the Judge, but also the Probate jurisdiction to that Court, and leave it to the Judges to arrange among themselves for the transaction of that as well as other business. A similar objection lay to making the surviving Bankruptcy Judge a merely nominal Judge of the Court of Exchequer; to which he might add the observation that the jurisdiction was one which belonged more naturally to the Court of Chancery. The Treasury, too, he found, was not only to fix the salaries of officers, but was also to interfere in the internal arrangement of their duties, as if the Irish Judges could not be entrusted to perform that business for themselves. This had not been attempted in England, and he objected to its being done in Ireland.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN objected to certain details of the Bill, more especially to the provision relating to the proposed re-construction of the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice. More Judges ought to be secured for it, especially seeing it had to do Election Petitions.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the Judges of the Landed Estates Court would be placed in an unfair position by the Bill. All the Judges ought to be in the same position with regard to all matters, as they were all members of the Supreme Court.

SUPPLY. REPORT.

Resolutions [8th June] reported.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF called attention to the transfer of Votes involving increase of expenditure from Class 5 to Class 1. The complaint was that this year, for the first time, the house-rents for some of our Ministers abroad had been transferred from the Vote for the Diplomatic Service to the Vote for the Office of Works, and that some of these votes had been "surreptitiously" increased without any sufficient reason and without explanation, and this change, he contended, was contrary to the practice of the House and to a formal Resolution, if not, indeed, in contravention of an Act of Parliament. He would conclude by moving, on account of the lateness of the hour, that the House do adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir Henry Drummond Wolff.)

MR. W. H. SMITH denied that there had been any attempt on the part of the Government to take the House by surprise and smuggle the Estimates through. The Vote he referred to, that for the Legation House at Brussels, was No. 25, and the particulars of it were fully set forth in the Estimates. The facts were these—The lease, which had been held by the Government and not by the Minister, had expired. It was proposed that the Government should purchase the house: but on the report of an officer of the Board of Works, who was sent over to make inquiry, it was determined to take another lease for a period of years at a rent of £720. They might have been wrong, but they acted on the best authority, and the course taken with regard to the Votes was taken on the advice and at the request of the Controller and Auditor General. He would not notice the tone of his hon. Friend, but so long as he held his present position he would always endeavour to give to the House, and to every hon. Member the fullest information on every Vote in his power. He hoped the House would acquit him of the charge of evasion which the hon. Member had brought against him.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF explained that he made no charge of evasion against the Secretary of the Treasury; but he did against the Foreign Office, and that charge he repeated.

MR. RYLANDS thought the hon. Member for Christchurch had done good service by calling attention to a total increase of £2,000 in the Vote for the Brussels Embassy, of which there was no trace in the Votes.

MR. BOURKE defended the course which had been taken, and which, he said, had been taken at the instance of the Auditor and Controller General. As regarded the Legation House at Brussels, he would remind the House that rents had gone up all over the Continent. It was now for the House to decide upon whether they were to follow the course recommended by the Auditor General or revert to the old one.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER denied that there had been any attempt at evasion. It would be easy to show by a note in Class 5 what changes were going on. If, however, the House desired it, the whole of these expenses should be set forth under Class 5 in the Estimates.

In reply to Mr. C. B. DENISON,

LORD HENRY LENNOX stated the Supplemental Estimate for the new road at Hyde Park Corner could not be brought forward until about the 9th of July; but the model and plans of the road would be deposited in the Library of the House; and though he could not order a census of the traffic at that point to be taken, the Commissioners of Police would no doubt be ready to undertake it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

SUEZ CANAL (SHARES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Bill for making provision respecting Shares in the Capital of the Universal Company of the Maritime Canal of Suez, acquired on behalf of the Crown, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

COLLIERY ACCIDENTS—THE WIGAN COLLIERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in the "Colliery Guardian," of date May the 26th, which gives a brief account of a coroner's inquest which was held on the 16th of May, in respect to the death of one Francis Bohan, who was injured in the Moss Pit, near Wigan, on the 1st of April, and died on the 11th of that month; if he has seen it is there stated by Mr. Hedley, Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for that district, that—

"when he visited the place he found the ventilation very weak, and that the edge of the gob showed a good deal of gas," and to which he subsequently added—

"If people would continue to use gunpowder near gobs full of gas they might be pretty sure to have accidents;"

and, if in the circumstances he had directed that a prosecution should take place against the person who designates himself the owner of the mine for having had the mine at that date in a state "reasonably calculated to endanger the lives" of those that were employed in it? Also, if his attention has been called to an inquest touching the death of one William Radford, who, with five others, was injured by an explosion in the Bryn Hall Colliery, Wigan, on the second of May; if he has been informed by the inspector of the district, Mr. Hall, that the owners, or others for whom they ought to be responsible, so changed the condition of the mine that he the inspector was unable to tell how the explosion had occurred; and, whether he is about to order, or has ordered, proceedings to be taken against the owners of the mine for placing it beyond the power of the inspector to tell the cause of the disaster?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the accident occurred at the Moss Pit mine, near Wigan, on Saturday, the 1st of April, and the manager's report of it reached the Mines Inspector on the following day. The Mines Inspector went and visited the mine on Tuesday, the 14th, having had an engagement which prevented his doing so on the Monday. With the assistant Inspector he then examined the mine, and they both then agreed that the ventilation was inadequate, and that gas was visible at the edge of a gob near which a shot had been fired. One man was injured, who died on the 11th, and an inquest was held, at which the Inspector attended, when, on carefully cross-examining the witnesses, he failed to elicit any evidence as to the gas being present at the time of the accident. The jury returned a verdict of manslaughter against the person who discharged the shot. Previous to the inquiry the Inspector looked on the case as one that would furnish good cause for a prosecution; but the evidence given before the Coroner convinced him that a conviction could not be obtained. Another accident occurred at the Bryn Hall Colliery, Wigan, on the 2nd of May. The manager's report reached the Inspector on the 4th. It was then stated that six men had been slightly injured, and the Inspector inspected the mine on Monday, the 8th. On the 9th one of the injured men died, and an inquest was opened, which was adjourned. At the adjourned inquiry the evidence went to show that the mine was well ventilated and clear of gas, and the verdict of the jury was that neither the foreman nor the workmen were to blame, but they recommended greater precaution in working the mine in future. The Inspector said the result of his inspection of the mine was satisfactory, and he found no gas; but that, unfortunately, through a mistaken estimate of the injuries sustained at the time, and the expectation that no injury would be necessary, the shot hole from which the powder was stated to have been blown out was not left untouched, which would have afforded definite evidence of the character of the accident. It was a question whether under the Act the mine owner was required to retain the mine in the position in which it was left by the accident until the Inspector had made his visit. The Inspector's opinion was that the circumstances did not seem to warrant the institution of proceedings in that case. It was, however, to be regretted that the Inspector did not put off any other engagement to go and inspect the mine immediately he heard of the accident, and the Home Office had given instructions to insure that that course would be taken in future. He believed that the Inspector did make use of the words—"If people would continue to use gunpowder near gobs full of gas, they might be pretty sure to have accidents."

LOSS OF THE "AGRIGENTO."

QUESTION.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement in the "Times" of the 20th May is correct, that "In the matter of the loss of the "Agrigento," the proceedings are most unsatisfactory; indeed the Court of First Instance, before which the inquiries both as to the loss of life and as to the question of damages are being made, has violated the existing Treaty between this country and England; for England being on the footing of the most favoured nation under a recent Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Greece and Spain, it was necessary that a citation should have been served upon the English Consul, in order that he might attend the examinations; So far, however, was this from being done, that both the Consul and his agent were refused admission when they applied personally at the court, Although the tribunal, after an investigation of four weeks duration, has not yet been able to determine whether there exists a case for the higher Court; and although the responsibility of the affair is thus still undecided, the Italian captain has been allowed to leave the country, while the captain of the "Hylton Castle" is detained;" and what steps the Government have taken in the matter?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the question had received, and was still receiving, the earnest attention of the Government. That ship was still under arrest, but the captain had never been in confinement. It was the opinion of the Government that the Consul or his agent ought to attend the examination. It was not desirable to state more than this now, because the matter involved a delicate question of International Law and also an important question of policy; but he had no doubt the course which the Government would adopt would be one that would recommend itself to the hon. Member and the House.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—PERSE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he can inform the House of the cause of the dismissal of Mr. F. C. Maxwell from the situation of Assistant Master of Perse Grammar School, Cambridge, by the Head Master, Mr. J. B. Allen; and, whether he can lay any Correspondence on the subject upon the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I have no knowledge whatever of the case to which the Question refers, and I have no jurisdiction whatever over Grammar schools. The control of the masters of those schools rests generally with the Governing Bodies of those schools. I have referred the Question to the Charity Commissioners, and they inform me that no correspondence has passed with them on the subject of the dismissal of the second master; so I am afraid I can give no further information on the matter.

NAVY—MR. HENWOOD'S PETITION. QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in reference to the fourth paragraph of Mr. Charles Henwood's Petition, in which he states that the so-called "confidential" documents were "furnished to him by the Solicitor of the Admiralty," he is satisfied and now prepared to state, notwithstanding "Mr. Bristowe the gentleman referred to was dead," that no grounds whatever exist, nor can it be remotely inferred, that the so-called "confidential" documents were surreptitiously obtained by Mr. Henwood; and further that the printing of those documents and the publication of the confidential reports of Sir Spencer Robinson and the honourable Member for Pembroke, were the acts solely of the Admiralty and their officers in the years 1870-71?

MR. HUNT denied that he had ever stated that Mr. Henwood had obtained confidential documents surreptitiously. Subsequently to the publication of the Papers relating to the Captain, Mr. Henwood, who commenced an action, he believed, against the printer, obtained a subpoena against the Solicitor of the Admiralty to produce the documents in question.

ARMY CORPS TRAINING BILL. QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon Table of the House a copy of the Army Corps Training Bill, showing, by Clauses in juxta position, the alterations proposed from the Military Manœuvres Act passed last Session, before he moves the Third Reading of the Bill in question?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the object of the Army Corps Training Bill was entirely different from that of the Military Manœuvres Act. It only proposed to take very limited powers in respect to nine different places, and he did not think that any good purpose would be answered by placing the clauses in juxta position.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL. [BILL 78.] (Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt.) COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Poor Law Amendments.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

Clause 15 (The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 25, extended).

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply to a question, stated that the object of the clause was to render a married woman living separate from her husband responsible for the maintenance of her children who might become paupers.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 19, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Trustees may pay cost of pauper's relief out of annuity payable to such pauper).

MR. MELLOR moved, in page 5, line 30, to leave out from "him" to "such society," in lines 35 and 36, and insert—

"As a debt, or from his executors, administrators, or assigns, in case of his death the sum so expended by them as aforesaid, and the managing body of such society after notice from the clerk, served previously to the money being paid over, shall be required to pay the same and shall be exonerated on payment thereof from any further liability."

The hon. Gentleman said, he knew the case of a woman who was for 18 years kept as a pauper lunatic in the County Asylum, and it turned out that she was entitled to a considerable sum of money, and the relatives were compelled to recoup the parish the whole cost of her maintenance. Another and a similar case occurred last year. Had those paupers died in the Asylum the cost of their maintenance would have been borne by the Union, and the money which was recovered would have been lost to the ratepayers. By the alteration he proposed the Board of Guardians, under such circumstances, could recover any such advances with great facility and certainty.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 27, inclusive, agreed to.

Provisions as to the Law of Settlement and Removal.

Clause 28 (Settlement for Irish persons by residence).

MR. PELL moved, in page 7, line 30, to leave out "born in Ireland." Nothing could be more unfair to the poor of this country than the present Law of Settlement, the remnant of a monstrous code designed to prevent the industrial classes seeking their bread where they could best obtain it. Any attempt of the poor man to leave the poor parish, to exchange low wages where his labour was not required for higher terms where he would be welcome, was jealously impeded and interfered with by the various Laws of Settlement. Of late years these and the Laws of Removal had been somewhat modified, and further advance in the right direction was suggested in this Bill for the Irish poor. If this proposal was fair and just towards our fellow-countrymen in Ireland it was impossible to resist logically, or with effect, its application equally to those born in England and Scotland, on whose behalf, with every confidence that the Committee would support him, he moved his Amendment to leave out the words "born in Ireland." The large book he held in his hand was the one volume of Burne's Justice which treated of the Poor Laws, and he ventured to assert that more than one-third of it was taken up with the question of Settlement, one-half or more of which would disappear from the volume if this Amendment was accepted. He prayed the House to reflect on the condition of a widow and her children whose husband coming, perhaps, from the extreme North to settle, marry, and earn his bread in the South, left her unprovided for and dependent on poor relief. If removable, though after many years' association with local friends and employment, she might find herself transported to the midst of new scenes and new faces, without a friend to stand by her, while the litigation on this head was continual and most costly. He trusted the Government would accept his Amendment.

MR. RATHBONE said, he felt it his duty to oppose the Amendment. The question of Settlement was one which ought to be dealt with as a whole, and dealing with it in a partial way would simply tend to create one injustice instead of another.

LORD ESLINGTON contended that as the subject of Settlement had been introduced into the Bill, it was only common justice that the advantages enjoyed by Irishmen should be extended to others.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped the Committee would not enter upon a discussion of the general Law of Settlement. He pointed out that the grievance complained of by Irishmen was that a poor person who came over here from that country without any animus revertendi was liable, nevertheless, when he became a pauper, to be sent back to his native place, and that considerable hardship was thus often inflicted. He did not think, however, that anything would be gained by the adoption of the proposed Amendment, while he admitted that the question which it involved was one which was rapidly ripening in the public mind, and one with respect to which legislation could not be long deferred.

MR. STANSFELD supported the Amendment. He objected to exceptional Poor Law legislation in regard to Ireland, which he declared did not commend itself either to Irish or English Members. He regretted that his right hon. Friend should have thrown away so good an opportunity of introducing a very important and valuable change in the English Law of Settlement.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the people of Ireland did not act upon a principle of reciprocity in cases of removal of English paupers. The Irish did not send the English poor who became chargeable to the Irish back to England. In Ireland they had no Law of Settlement. He should certainly support the Amendment.

MR. FLOYER was of opinion that considerable difficulty would arise if they adopted the Amendment of his hon. Friend. The object of the clause was in the interest of the poor, and with regard to the Irish, he thought a great many Irishmen would be glad if they could be sent back to Ireland. He approved of the principle laid down in the clause by his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, who had charge of the Bill, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would hold by it.

MR. LAW said, he was prepared to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. It would go further than the Bill did at present towards abolishing the Law of Settlement by extending the same boon to the English as was proposed for the Irish pauper. A Committee of this House in 1847 strongly recommended the abolition of the Law of Settlement; but now, 30 years afterwards, we found ourselves just as we were, and if the House was not now prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member the probability was that we should in a quarter of a century be exactly in the same position. It was not desirable that there should be any difference between the laws of England, Ireland, and Scotland; and certainly the workpeople from one part of this United Kingdom should not be treated as aliens in another. It was time to adopt a uniform system in dealing with paupers born anywhere within the Kingdom, and he should therefore support the Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON also supported the Amendment, though he thought the better course would be to omit the clause altogether, leaving the question of the Law of Settlement to be dealt with separately.

MR. MACDONALD said, that the Amendment, so far from being an injury, would confer a benefit on the English labourer. He condemned the Government proposal as nibbling with the question.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH held that the Amendment would not be a boon to the English pauper, because he might often prefer to go to his three years' residential settlement rather than to his natural settlement. The advantage of this clause was that it gave, for the first time, the Irish labourer in this country a settlement. The English labourer had a settlement already, and if he wished to improve that, he should wish, not to confine it to three years, but to make it a two years' or one year's settlement. The Bill would get rid of some of the scandals which now existed in the Law of Settlement; but he had not dealt with this question as a whole, partly from want of time, partly because he thought it ought to be treated in a separate measure, and partly because opinion was not ripe; but he admitted that public opinion was growing in the direction of abolishing settlement, and as soon as he could find time to do so he would endeavour to deal with the question.

MR. CLIVE asked the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider the Amendment, with a view to its adoption, which would be a step towards the abolition of the Law of Settlement.

MR. CLARE READ considered the preferable course would be in the framing of the Bill to strike out the whole of the clauses relating to Settlement. It was simply nibbling with a great question. It was a great hardship that after a man had left his native county and secured a settlement in another part of the county, where he had lived for many years, perhaps married and brought up a family, he should be sent back to the place in which he had originally secured his settlement. At all the conferences he had attended the law as it at present existed had been condemned in toto, and its abolition would be but just and right.

MR. MUNTZ thought they ought to be content with the promise given by the President of the Local Government Board, and adopt the Bill as now proposed on the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government would, as soon as possible, take the whole question of Settlement into consideration.

MR. CARPENTER-GARNIER submitted that the Government would be wise to accept the Amendment, or else withdraw the clauses relating to the Law of Settlement. He should be glad to see the existing Law of Settlement done away with, and supported the Amendment as an important step in that direction.

MR. M'LAREN thought this clause should be altogether withdrawn. If it were not, he should certainly vote for the Amendment. He could not see that there was any principle to authorize the introduction into an Act of Parliament of anything about nationality. He objected to putting into any Act of Parliament that an Englishman, a Scotchman, or an Irishman was to have some privilege which was not accorded to the other nationalities. They were all British subjects, part and parcel of the United Kingdom. It appeared to him that the main difficulty had been scarcely referred to in this discussion. The main difficulty, he apprehended, was this, that Irish paupers crowded into England and Scotland because there was no Law of Settlement in Ireland. Until they made a Law of Settlement for poor Irishmen in their own country, like that existing for poor Englishmen and poor Scotchmen, they would do no good. As to the clause now before the House, its only effect would be to facilitate a greater number of Irish paupers being settled in England, whilst the proposed Amendment would give the same facilities in regard to Scotland. He denied that there was at present any difficulty in Irish paupers getting a settlement in England or Scotland. On the contrary, great facilities were afforded them, and in consequence of those facilities England and Scotland were unduly burdened by the Irish paupers they had to support, but who ought to be supported by rates levied on the lands of Ireland.

Lately there had been laid on the Table a Return bearing on this matter. It showed that there were 36,000 Irish paupers in one half-year in England and 40,000 in the other half of the same year. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had stated that in Ireland there was no power to return English or Scotch paupers. That was quite true, and he would be delighted to give them every facility for doing so. How many, however, would they be able to return as against the 40,000 Irish paupers maintained by England? Why, there were only 153 English-born paupers maintained in Ireland, so that, if clauses were put into this Bill to send those 153 back to England, it would be a very small matter. A still more expensive class was the lunatic paupers. There, again, the difference was enormous. There were 15 English-born lunatic paupers maintained in Ireland in one half-year, and 23 in another, but there were 1,280 Irish-born lunatics maintained in England. He would be quite willing to give his Irish Friends power to return the 15 or 23 to England, but if they did that, how could they ask England to maintain their 1,280? The case with Scotland was still worse, the proportion of ordinary paupers and pauper lunatics sent from Ireland being much larger. Whatever evil England suffered in the matter Scotland suffered it at least doubly. He repeated that the only effect of this clause would be to give additional facilities to Irish paupers to settle in England, whilst by an Amendment to the next clause it was proposed to give them the same facilities in Scotland. He thought they should make a Law of Settlement so as to make it to the interests of poor men to stay at home instead of forcing them to come here. At present it was no secret that lunatics were sent over from Ireland, landed at Liverpool, and sent direct to the lunatic asylum. They were sent over for the express purpose of being maintained out of the English rates. He was not asking any privilege for Scotland. He wished all three countries to be on the same footing; but to confer this special privilege on Ireland by Act of Parliament seemed to imply that the Irish labourer was much more valuable than the English or the Scotch. He found that the number of Scotch paupers who became chargeable to England was very trifling, and that whilst in Lancashire there were 251 Irish-born pauper lunatics, there were only 13 Scotch-born, showing that Scotland was not in the habit of sending her paupers over the Border in order to get rid of the burden. He hoped the clause would be withdrawn, or postponed.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH might stop that discussion by stating at once that he saw plainly it was the feeling of the Committee that the proposals of the Government should be extended to all paupers, whether English or Irish. He had been afraid to make that proposition, because he did not wish to enter on the general question of the Law of Settlement. He therefore proposed now to adopt the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), and then he hoped the clause might pass. He would next suggest that the five following clauses should be struck out, with the understanding that, if necessary, he should be entitled to strike out this clause also when the Report was brought up.

MR. PELL thanked the Government for accepting his Amendment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that if this clause was struck out altogether, as recommended by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. McLaren), the right hon. Gentleman would break faith with the Irish Members altogether, because last year he promised that he would insert the clause as it stood.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RATHBONE moved, in page 7, at end, to add—

"Provided, That a settlement acquired by a person under this section shall cease if, since the acquisition thereof, the person has for a period of twelve months ceased to reside in England; Provided also, That an order by which a person may be removed to or become chargeable upon a parish under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of such person only, without such corroboration as the justices or court think sufficient."

Clauses 29 to 33, inclusive, struck out.

Clauses 34 to 36, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. McLaren

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, after Clause 14, to insert the following Clause:—

(Superannuation allowances not affected by services as registrar of marriages or sanitary officer.)

"If any officer seek a superannuation allowance from the guardians of any union or parish, or from the overseers of any such parish, under any statute applicable to such allowance, his service as a registrar of marriages, or under any of the provisions of the Sanitary Acts as defined by "The Public Health Act, 1875," or of that Act, shall not operate to prevent him from obtaining the same."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, after Clause 24, to insert the following Clause:—

(Boys in receipt of relief, who are desirous of it, may be forwarded by the guardians for examination for the naval service.)

"If any boy not already an apprentice in the merchant service who, or whose parent or parents, shall be receiving relief in any union or parish, be desirous of serving in the naval service of Her Majesty, and be forwarded for approval by competent authority for such service, the guardians of the poor of such union or parish may enable any such boy to be so forwarded, and may pay out of their funds such sum, if any, as may be required by the regulations of such service for providing outfit or otherwise, and also such expenses as may be necessary to be incurred for the conveyance of such boy in charge of a proper person to and from the port or place in the United Kingdom at which he may be required to attend for examination, and, if accepted, for entry into such service."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE suggested that there might be a difficulty with regard to the consent of the parents.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the Local Government Board would narrowly watch these cases and see that no injustice was done.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, after Clause 27, to insert the following Clauses :—

(Justices to make allowances to clerks of justices in respect of jury lists.)

"The justices of the peace of every county in quarter or general sessions assembled shall from time to time make such allowances as to them shall seem proper as compensation to the clerks to the justices in the several divisions in the county for their services in relation to the revision and allowance of the jury lists.

"Every such allowance shall be charged upon and be paid out of the county stock or fund."

Clauses agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH then proposed a new Proviso to the effect that—

"The managers of any district school may appoint and pay any officer or other competent person to visit and report upon the condition, treatment, and conduct of any poor child under the age of sixteen, who shall have gone into service from the district school."

MR. PAGET thought that it was the Guardians who should have this power. He moved to amend the clause by leaving out "the managers" and inserting "The guardians of any union or"

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, after Clause 33, to insert the following Clauses :—

(Proviso for pending orders of removal.)

"Those provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any pauper in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act."

(Rates made by overseers not now audited made subject to the audit of district auditor.)

"From and after the twenty-fifth day of March next, when an overseer shall make and levy any rate of assessment which is not now subject to be audited by the district auditor, such rate or assessment, and the accounts relating thereto, shall be submitted by him, and by the collector thereof, if any, to the said auditor, in the like manner, and with the like incidents, consequences, liabilities, and power of appeal as in the case of the poor rate made by him; and every other audit of such rate or assessment, if any, shall cease.

And the Local Government Board shall have the same power to make orders to regulate the keeping of such accounts as they have in regard to other local rates."

(Auditor's decision upon a joint account may be reversed or remitted in favour of one or some only of the parties.)

"When an auditor shall have allowed, disallowed, or surcharged a sum in any account rendered to him jointly, and an appeal shall be made against the same, the decision of the auditor may be reversed, and the disallowance or surcharge may be remitted by the court or the Local Government Board, as the case may be, in favour of one or more of the persons appealing only without discharging the other person or persons against whom such decision of the auditor was pronounced."

Clauses agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD moved, after Clause 11, to insert the following Clause :—

(Local Government Board may authorize election of guardians to hold office for three years.)

"The Local Government Board may by their order, whenever they may think fit, authorize and direct the ratepayers of any union or parish to elect guardians for such union or parish who shall remain in office for a period of three years, subject to such provisions regulating the annual retirement of one third of such guardians as the Local Government Board may think fit."

He said, that in many parts of the country there were complaints of the expense of annual elections, and there would be convenience in certain cases in having the election for three years.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said that he had received representations upon this subject from various parts of the country, and there was a good deal to be said for it. If the Committee were disposed to place such a discretion in the hands of the Local Government Board there would be security that it would be satisfactorily exercised.

SIR ANDREW LUSK thought that annual elections answered very well.

MR. PAGET drew attention to the wording of the clause, which would give power to the Board to direct the mode in which the election should be held. This would be a very great power to entrust in the hands of any Board.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY also thought it would be objectionable to give to the Board so large a power.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he could not undertake to bring up a clause to meet the object in view. He had received deputations from populous places in favour of such a change. He recommended the withdrawal of this clause, and that the hon. and learned Member should propose another on the Report more adapted to the object in view.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PELL moved, after Clause 12, to insert the following Clause:—

(Notice to parishioners of persons relieved.)

“The clerk to the guardians of every union or parish shall at the close of each half year at Lady Day and Michaelmas, prepare from the accounts of the union or parish separate statements for each parish or township, the accuracy whereof shall be certified by his signature of the names of the persons relieved in the half year, as shown by the in-door and out-door relief lists, and shall, within one week from the close of each half year, cause the same to be delivered to the overseers of each parish or township respectively, and the overseers shall forthwith cause the same to be fixed on or near to the doors of their respective parish churches, or if there be no church, then at the usual place for affixing notices of parochial business.”

He stated that as by this Bill paupers were disqualified from voting on the election of any officer whose appointment was determined by statute, it became a matter of necessity, if not of convenience only, that ready opportunities should be afforded for information as to who might be disqualified and who not. These lists were already in many districts generally affixed to the church doors with much advantage to the better administration of relief, and as a guide to those who might be charitably disposed in the distribution of their alms, and there seemed much reason and good reason for ensuring the universal publication of this information.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY opposed the clause, as it would be cruel to the persons relieved, and would give no information of the kind of relief given. It would involve great expense without any corresponding benefit.

DR. LUSH said, it would be a species of branding most objectionable, and he hoped the Committee would not recognize the principle involved in the clause.

MR. WALTER said, this very suggestion was made not long ago, on some occasion when a question arose as to the right of persons receiving relief to vote, and the proposal was received with great disapprobation by the House. It might as well be proposed that lists of the prisoners in gaols should be put on the church doors. He trusted the Committee would not entertain the proposal.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped his hon. Friend would not press this clause, at all events, in its present shape. The question as to whether sufficient publicity was now given might well be considered, but it would be going too far to cause the lists as a matter of obligation to be affixed to the church doors. The clause was also objectionable on the ground of expense. He trusted his hon. Friend would not press the clause to a division.

MR. PELL said, that in making the proposal, he had no desire to affix a stigma on these unfortunate people. If any stigma attached to pauperism at all, it attached, not to the pauper, but to the neighbourhood in which he lived, and to those who, by their false views of what real charity consisted in, encouraged the existence of pauperism, connected as it was known to be with out-door relief and inadequate wages.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said that, according to the present state of the law, husbands and wives, if both were above 60 years old, could not be separated in workhouses; under that age, however, they were separated. He moved, in page 4, after Clause 14, to insert the following clause:—

(Husbands and wives in workhouses.)

“When any two persons being husband and wife shall be received into any workhouse such two persons, although they shall not both be above 60 years of age, shall not be compelled to live separate and apart in such workhouse; and any rule, order, or regulation, and any provision of any Act to the contrary is hereby rescinded and repealed.”

He had received one letter from a working man 63 years of age, who said he had brought up a large family without parish relief, but who was now unable to work. His wife was 56 years of age; and would it not be wicked, he (the writer) asked, if he were compelled to enter the Union, to separate him from the wife who had borne the toils and hardships of life along with him? It was said that the law was based on economic considerations, and that the workhouse was not a place for the purpose of breeding paupers. He hoped, however, that the House of Commons would not adopt this hard and cruel doctrine, which was meant to exclude the worthless and the undeserving, and apply it to well-conducted, industrious persons, reduced to poverty probably from no fault of their own. The workhouse should not be made a place of punishment for such persons; and if his clause were rejected on a division, he hoped that the President of the Local Government Board would at least consider whether there might not be some relaxation of the existing rule.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that without any disposition to undervalue the importance of the question, he must deprecate any lengthened discussion upon what, if carried, would be vital to the principle of the New Poor Law. It would not be proper to introduce so great a change in administration in this casual way. He did not think that the objection to the rule was general throughout the country, and to abolish the rule would be to break down one of the securities which the ratepayers now had against an undue application for indoor relief. The workhouse, of course, was not to be regarded as a place of punishment; but he saw no reason for so serious a change in the working of the Poor Law as that now proposed. He might observe that no special store was to be set upon the age of 60. All he contended for was no alteration should be made in the principle which now prevailed.

MR. MACDONALD supported the clause. The working people of England looked upon the House of Commons as an assembly of Christian gentlemen, and he exhorted them to justify that character by supporting the Christian principle that those whom God had joined together no man should put asunder. He could say that the working classes of the country felt very strongly on the subject. He would warn hon. Gentlemen opposite and the House generally against the continuation of a principle in the Poor Law that he ventured to affirm was abhorrent to the feelings of the great body of the people—namely, the separation of husband and wife of the aged poor. A time might come in the history of this country when the masses might consider by way of retaliation how far such a principle might be applied to all. He implored them not to provoke this issue being raised. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Dewsbury he concluded ought to receive the support of everyone who laid claim to possessing in any way the feelings of humanity.

MR. HAMOND deprecated the practice of the hon. Member who had just sat down of presuming to speak as the special mouthpiece of the working classes. No hon. Member represented them more than another; and he claimed, for his own part, to represent the working classes as much as anyone else in that House; for of his constituency of 22,000 electors about one-third were working men. In his opinion, they ought to adhere to the present system, and the clause as it stood went as far as it ought to go. They little knew what would be the result if married persons of all ages were allowed to live together in the workhouse—the idle and dissolute would exist at the expense of the hard-working and industrious artizan. He should have much pleasure in voting against the clause.

MR. WALTER felt bound to say he did not think the existing law so very unreasonable. He was, at all events, not prepared to vote with the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury for its indiscriminate repeal, and he hoped the matter would not be pressed to a division. The hon. and learned Member could not but see that if the law were repealed in the unreserved language of the clause it would be competent for any two young people of 20 or so, who had no means whatever, to marry one week and go into the workhouse the next, to remain there as long as they liked. As it stood, therefore, the clause was unreasonable. At the same time, he would not object to a certain amount of discretion being allowed to the Guardians in the matter. In certain cases, where, for instance, the husband was 75 and the wife 55, the present regulation might very well be relaxed, and if the right hon. Gentleman introduced an Amendment to permit of that being done he should be glad to see it adopted. He had never been a particular admirer of what was called the New Poor Law, although it was passed 40 years ago. It was a piece of legislation which it would be impossible for him to discuss then; but it was passed at a period of what he might call general panic with regard to the amount of pauperism and its dangers. He believed that that panic was unreasonable and unfounded, and that the Act was conceived and passed in haste under a wrong impression and had led to great evils. It was passed, moreover, in a day when there was no free trade, no emigration, and when population had largely spread in every part of the country. He remembered the time when the man who built a new cottage was thought to be an enemy of the parish. So far from wishing the workhouse system to be made more stringent, he was decidedly in favour of relaxing it; and therefore he would go a certain length with the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury, but he could not support the clause as that hon. and learned Gentleman had framed it, and he hoped it would be withdrawn.

LORD ESLINGTON felt satisfied that the manly speech of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) expressed the sentiments of many Gentlemen in that House. For himself, he wished to obtain from the President of the Local Government Board an authoritative declaration as to whether or not the Guardians had the discretionary power by law of relaxing the restriction in cases where they thought hardship would result from separating aged married couples? His own impression was that such a discretion was vested in the Guardians; but if it was not, it ought to be. It would be impossible to accept the naked proposition now presented to the Committee; but it should be remembered that cases of excessive cruelty had excited in the breasts of the people such a dread of the workhouse that they would rather starve than enter it.

MR. MUNTZ thought it was impossible to deny that there had been a strong feeling all over the country during the last 40 years as to the separation of man and wife in the workhouse. Guardians ought to have a certain latitude allowed them in dealing with cases of emergency. He put it to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) whether on the Report he would not bring up a clause giving Guardians a discretionary authority in that matter if they did not possess it already.

MR. PELL said, that his experience as a Guardian, now extending over 30 years, convinced him that this separation of man and wife in the workhouse in the case of the sick and dying was not put in practice, and in the Union with which he was connected in London

if a young husband in a workhouse was sick, dying possibly of consumption, cancer, or some other incurable disease, he would be found in the infirmary under the best possible care and not separated from his wife. Only last week he had been at the bedside of a man who was dying under such circumstances, whose wife was not only not kept away from him by the Guardians, but for whom, in reply to his (Mr. Pell's) inquiry of her he found every possible care had been taken and arrangement made for her comfort and presence at the sick bed of her husband in the workhouse infirmary.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON could not conceive of the case put by the hon. Member for Berkshire occurring in any well-managed Union—namely, that of two young people marrying in one week and going into the workhouse the next, and remaining there in their connubial felicity at the public expense. Though his clause was based on the broad principle of humanity, he would not press it if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) would give him an assurance that he was ready to meet his views in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Berkshire and the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH observed, that though the Guardians were not empowered to allow young married people to live together in the workhouse, they could always in a hard case give them out-door relief, and it was inconceivable that such cases of hardship as had been described could occur. If a destitute young husband or wife was sick, they would not be taken into the workhouse, but would receive out-door relief.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 205: Majority 146.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON then gave Notice of his intention to propose a clause on the Report.

MR. AGG-GARDNER moved the following Clause:—

(Statement by owner pursuant to statute 7 and 8 Vic. c. 101, s. 15.)

“No statement by an owner pursuant to the seventh and eighth years of Victoria, chapter one hundred and one, section fifteen, shall be valid, or shall entitle him to be placed or retained in the registry of owners entitled to vote for the guardians of the poor of any parish, unless such statement contain an address for service within the parish in respect of which such owner shall claim to vote, and all objections and notices left at such address shall be deemed to be sufficiently served on such owner."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH consented to the clause, provided the words "or retained" were omitted.

[BILL 182] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said he wished to call the attention of the Secretary for War to what he regarded as a defect in the Bill—namely, the omission to associate civilians with the officers in command for the making of regulations with regard to cattle, &c. It was most important that the landowners and farmers should not be under the impression that they were liable to be roughly treated on the occasion of these Autumn Manœuvres. Should any such apprehension go abroad the most serious consequences might ensue. In the previous Acts relating to the Autumn Manœuvres it was provided that a commission of local gentlemen should be associated with the commander of the forces, to act jointly with him in doing certain arbitrary acts, such as the shutting up of cattle and sheep. This gave confidence both to the landowners and the farmers, and he regretted, therefore, that the present Bill was not similar in that respect to the previous Acts. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would introduce a provision such as he had suggested.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought it most important, in the interests of the Army, that the suggestion should be acceded to. The popularity of the Army depended very much upon associating the civil element with the military in all transactions with the civilian. The change proposed this year would tend to render the Army unpopular. The Bill proposed to place in the hands of the military men entirely the decision of questions affecting cattle and crops. One of the instructions of the Bill was that the officers should make a regulation for the protection of cattle and sheep. Probably not one of the officers employed to command those stations mentioned in the Bill ever had a cow or sheep in their possession.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that on the Report of the Bill he would propose an addition to the 5th clause which would introduce the civil element which the hon. Gentleman required. There would be nine separate areas for training troops, and he would propose that the Lord Lieutenant of the county should appoint a person to act with the commanding officer in the drawing up of regulations to prevent damage being done to cattle or crops. He hoped that proposal would satisfy his hon. Friends.

BURGHES (DIVISION INTO WARDS) (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL. (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

[BILL 166.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had been very anxious, indeed, to obtain from the Lord Advocate some statement of what this Bill really was, but he had entirely failed. The Lord Advocate was now present, and he should therefore move that the third reading of the Bill be postponed in order to afford an opportunity for the Lord Advocate explaining the object of this Bill. He must protest against the way in which Scotch business was done. Scotch Members had no means whatever of ascertaining what was the meaning of the Bills brought in, owing to the uncertain and irregular hours of the night when Scotch business was taken up; and as regarded the Bill now before the House, he defied any man to ascertain from the Census Returns how boroughs were divided. It was different with the Returns of the English Census. There information was obtainable about the divisions of towns, and even useful information about Scotch towns which the Scotch Census did not furnish. By these omissions Scotch Members were entirely without the information which they ought to have. The Bill ought not, therefore, to be read a third time without more information than they had at present. He had done his best to get information from the Lord Advocate, but had failed to.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, it was no part of his duty to take the part of the Lord Advocate; but he might remind the House that the Lord Advocate, in moving the second reading of the Bill, did state the full nature of the Bill, and was understood to say that it had reference to the burgh of Wick. He only wished to say that the Lord Advocate did make a statement.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL REGISTRATION (BOROUGH) BILL.

(Mr. Alfred Marten, Mr. Torr, Mr. Birley,
Mr. Dodds.)

[BILL 108.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that it was intended to amalgamate the lists of voters for municipal and Parliamentary elections, so that one list would suffice. By that means there would be a large saving in the 168 boroughs which would be affected by the measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Alfred Marten.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not oppose the second reading, but said it was probable he might have to suggest a modification in some of the clauses.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY objected to proceeding in the absence of a body of Members largely interested in the Bill. They had had some experience of this kind of legislation in Scotland, and he was inclined to think this Bill was one of still greater stringency. He moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. J. W. Barclay.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought the hon. and learned Member who had brought in the Bill (Mr. Charley) was hardly dealt with, as he understood there was no real opposition.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, the hon. and learned Member had no reason to complain. Why did he not bring his Bill forward at a reasonable hour? It was 10 minutes to 7 o'clock, and the last time the matter came before them it was past 1 o'clock in the morning. He understood that a great many Members had conscientious objections to the Bill, though he did not know what they were.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

LONDON MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

RESOLUTIONS.

LORD ELCHO, in rising to move the following Resolutions:—

"(1.) That the reform of the government of the Metropolis, with a view to its more efficient, uniform, and economical administration, is a question of primary importance, and deserves the early attention of Her Majesty's Government. (2.) That such reform should be based on the establishment of one municipal administration for the whole Metropolis."

said, that a few years ago the right hon. Gentleman now President of the Local Government Board said that "London was the best governed city in the world." That declaration, which was made in an after-dinner speech at Willis's Rooms, must, it need hardly be said, be taken cum grano salis. Indeed, it was only necessary to apply certain gauges to it to show that the statement was not correct. He would join issue with the right hon. Gentleman on this subject, and apply to his assertion the test of pure air, the gas and water supply, and the arrangements for extinguishing fires. The tests of good municipal administration were that the air should be made as pure as possible by good sewage and the removal of effluvia and impurities; that the water should be pure and the supply constant, and not intermittent, and sufficient for keeping the streets cleansed. There should also be the ready means of speedily extinguishing fires. There ought, moreover, to be an abundant supply of gas, pure, and at a reasonable price. The streets should be well lighted; the markets should be readily accessible and in convenient localities; the police should be efficient; the poor should be properly taken care of, while vagrancy and mendicity were suppressed; and the houses should be well constructed. Finally, there should be unity of administration and direct representation—that was to say, those who spent the money should be directly responsible to those whose money they spent. Well, it would be well for them to consider how far these great and important objects were carried out under the present system. No doubt, if they compared the present state of the metropolis with what it was in 1855, when the Metropolitan Board of Works was established, a great improvement had been effected. There were at that time no less than 150 local corporations levying rates and tolls. The Metropolitan Board had carried out a great scheme of main drainage, but the Vestries were still responsible for the minor sewers, and there was not sufficient controlling power on the part of the Metropolitan Board to insist on the minor drainage being carried out. There were now 6,000 miles of sewers constructed, but there was still a divided authority. The Thames Conservancy, which made the regulations relating to the river, were a different body from the Metropolitan Board, and they complained that the outfall of the main drainage had not been placed lower down the river, and that it interfered with the navigation. Last year he put a Question to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which showed the want of control on the part of that body. In hot and dry weather all macadamized streets had an intolerable smell; and he asked his hon. and gallant Friend whether he would take care that the streets should be properly watered and uniformly cleansed. The hon. and gallant Member replied that the Board had no power to compel the Vestries to wash and cleanse the streets. Take, again, the supply of water. Various Commissions had reported that it was essential that water for drinking purposes should be taken from springs, and not from rivers. They declared that there was no river in England of sufficient length to free the water from the impurities of any sewage that might be poured into it, yet the sewage of 1,000,000 persons entered the Thames above the point from which the water for the supply of the metropolis was taken. Notwithstanding the Report of the Rivers Pollution Commission, the metropolitan water supply was taken from the river, and the system of supply was intermittent instead of being constant. Whenever the supply was intermittent the water must be stored, and the London water was kept for the greater part in open butts, where it contracted impurities very hurtful to health. The poor suffered more than the rich from this system; but, although Manchester and other towns had adopted the system of constant supply, the Metropolitan Board had done nothing to secure it for London. It appeared from the Report of the Metropolitan Board for 1872 that it had abstained from calling upon the water companies to give a constant supply. The question had come before the Committee now sitting on the means provided for the extinction of fire in London, and it appeared that the non-existence of constant supply and of hydrants in London involved three deaths, three cases of personal injury, and three bad fires, to one of each in Manchester, which was provided with hydrants and had a constant supply. It was essential that water should be made immediately accessible for the extinction of fires, because the difference between obtaining it in five minutes and waiting 15 minutes made all the difference between extinguishing a fire in the building in which it originated, and simply preventing its extension to surrounding structures. Of course hydrants would be of no use without constant supply. If the Metropolitan Board had power to compel the provision of both, why did it not exercise it? and if it had not power, why did it not seek to obtain it? We ought to have in London, in respect both of water for drinking and water for extinguishing fires, advantages equal to those enjoyed by Manchester and other towns. It had been represented that the introduction of constant supply into the whole Metropolis would involve a total cost of £4,000,000; but the experience of Manchester and other towns, as collated by the Committee of the Society of Arts, showed that the cost of the necessary changes need not exceed 10s. a house. He trusted the House would consider that expense ought not to stand in the way of a prime necessity for the health of individuals and the safety of life and property. He trusted the Committee that was considering the question of the extinction of fires would pay some attention to the cognate question of the construction of houses in reference to which the Metropolitan Board was the local authority. In reference to the supply of gas there was no local authority, and it was the opinion of Mr. Fitzjames Stephen and others that in what the Metropolitan Board had done for the benefit of the public it had allowed its zeal to outrun its powers. In winter many streets were ill-lighted when the shops were closed, and recently the pressure was so weak that the lights went out in his own house—an occurrence involving the risk of danger everywhere, through the escape of gas where it was not relighted when the pressure was renewed. The practical action that was first taken, and that resulted in the legislation of 1860 and 1868, was taken at the instance of individual ratepayers; and there was reason to hope that now the amalgamation of gas companies would facilitate the purchase of their works by a local authority. The Corporation of Manchester made a profit of about £50,000 a-year out of the supply of gas, and had altogether made a profit of £1,000,000, and this was devoted to the reduction of the rates and the making of local improvements—a fact which should suggest to the ratepayers of the Metropolis not only what they might gain in efficiency of lighting, but what they were losing by the continuance of the companies. As regarded streets, the Metropolitan Board could not make new ones without special Parliamentary authority, which had been obtained for the Northumberland Avenue, the Embankment, and Queen Victoria Street; and the only control the Board had over the Vestries was to prevent them taking up both sides of the streets at once. Subject to this slight control the Vestries could pave them or not, or tear them up as they pleased; and the time usually chosen for covering the macadam streets with metal some inches deep was when Parliament met, and there were more carriage wheels and horses' feet to reduce it to a proper state than there would have been when town was empty. He wondered that the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals did not interfere. The greasy condition of the streets, besides being unhealthy, involved a destruction of life greater than that attributed to the car of Juggernaut, for Returns showed that 200 people were killed, and 2,885 persons were maimed in the Metropolis in the course of a year. Statisticians calculated that so long as the streets remained in the same slippery state the destruction of life would be undiminished. But there could be no hope of improvement while there was divided jurisdiction, and they had the Vestries overlapping, interlacing, or antagonistic. Here he had a map of London, showing the different divisions for parochial purposes of the Metropolis. It presented the appearance of a kaleidoscope; Joseph's coat of many colours could not have had more than there were in that map. Perhaps the most objectionable of the City privileges was that relating to the markets. Many years ago medical reform was recommended to the House by the consideration that eminent medical men coming from Edinburgh or Dublin, such as Sir James Simpson or Mr. Corrigan, who practised within seven miles of Charing Cross, would be subject to prosecution. Well, at the present moment, without the sanction of the City, no market could be established within seven miles of Guildhall, and the effect was to raise the price of provisions and diminish the supply. It was on that account that in walking along the best streets of the West End they were liable to brush against carcasses hanging up at the butchers' shops. Such a sight could not be seen in any other European city, and it was a disgrace to our civilization. The state of our markets was another reason why it was desirable that there should be an improvement in our municipal administration. As regarded the Police, he was far from complaining, but the police were a divided authority. If they were united they would be more efficient, and thieves would be less so. There was no municipal local authority for dealing with the poor. The sturdy beggars and vagrants were turned off the streets, not by the action of any municipal authority but by private societies—the Charity Organization and Mendicity Societies, which were doing a great deal of good in the Metropolis. For building purposes, the Metropolitan Board was the local authority, and their power extended over the City. No doubt there had been a great improvement in the Metropolis in respect of buildings; but there still were what his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) called the "rookeries" in which the poor were left to rot in many parts of London. Their existence supplied a forcible argument in favour of having one municipality. The Act which did so much credit to the Conservative Government, and especially to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, did not entrust its powers to the local divisions he had shown on the map, the parish vestries, but to a much wider body, the Metropolitan Board of Works; so that the House of Commons was in this matter aiding in getting, so far as it could, unity of administration. He now came to what lay at the foundation of all satisfactory municipal administration. Without unity there must be inefficiency and waste; with unity and control came efficiency and economy. He found from an excellent work by Mr. Firth on Municipal London, that the Metropolis was divided for various purposes in the following manner:—There were 56 separate divisions for the purposes of the Building Act; 39 for local government; 37 for the Metropolitan Board and presentations; 39 for the Poor Law; 28 for districts of superintendent registrars; 29 for burial boards; 20 for the police force; 16 for district schools; 15 for Militia purposes; 15 for police courts; 10 for school boards; 10 for the boroughs; 10 for the gas companies; 10 postal divisions; 8 for water companies; and 3 separate County Court jurisdictions. As an instance of costliness of administration under the present system, he would compare Marylebone and Westminster. These two districts were about equal in size, and each raised £200,000 a-year from the rates. In Marylebone the borough and the Vestry districts were conterminous; but in Westminster there were five Vestries, five Vestry clerks, and separate sets of officials, as compared with one set of officials and one clerk in Marylebone. The result was that the money was raised in Marylebone at one-third of the cost at which it was raised in the rest of Metropolis. This led to the question of direct representation. There was direct representation in the case of school boards, but not in the case of the Metropolitan Board or local administration generally. That was essential, especially when they considered the enormous sums these local boards had to deal with. For example, the total income of the Metropolis was £15,806,668, and the expenditure £15,117,749. He had seen it stated that the annual loss to the Metropolis for want of better administration was something like £250,000, and if the same management as to gas and water were exercised in London as in Manchester, the saving might be £500,000 per annum. It could not be said that the financial affairs of London were economically administered. In Leeds, Manchester, and Bradford they saw a very high development of municipal government. Liverpool profited by its docks in a way which London did not. Manchester managed gas and water with good results. Leeds and Bradford had, or was about to have, their gas and water in their own hands. They all had direct representation, which showed the wisdom of the Act of 1835, so far as Provincial municipal government was concerned; but from that Act London was excluded. The contrast was not less striking in the case of foreign cities and towns. Every one who had been in Paris must have observed that their system of lighting, paving, and cleansing the streets was greatly in advance of that which obtained in London. What a contrast did these capitals present in a snowstorm. They all knew how the streets of London might be blocked up for weeks. Paris had hydrants in all directions, an abundant supply of water, and large openings corresponding with good subways, so that as soon as snow fell jets of water were brought to bear, and the result was that the streets were kept clear both of snow and slush. He would next turn to the opinions of public men and the action of Parliament in this matter, and also to the expression of the Press and of public opinion, and it would not be drawn from them that London was the best governed City in the world. He would enunciate, as shortly as possible, what view Parliament and public men had taken of this question. In 1837 the Royal Commissioners of 1835 made a special Report on the Corporation of London, and recommended that there should be one municipal authority for all London. The Corporation undertook then to bring in a Bill to expand its jurisdiction over the whole Metropolis, but never did anything. The Commissioners of 1854 left the City undisturbed, but recommended the division of London into municipal boroughs, each with a local council and, over all the Board of Works. In 1855 they had Sir Benjamin Hall's Bill, which established the Board, but did not adopt the borough municipal boundaries. Next they had Mr. Ayrton's Committees, which proposed a centralization system, ignoring the City Corporation and appointing a Board of Works (the Government having a voice), with control of gas, water, poor law, police, &c. In 1837 Lord John Russell had promised a Bill on this subject, but parties were nearly balanced, and the City threatened opposition. Some years afterwards the City elected Lord John Russell as one of its Members, and the Bill was dropped. In 1856 there was a Police Bill introduced, but Sir George Grey yielded to pressure. In 1858 there was another Government Bill, which was ultimately withdrawn. In 1859, again, a Government Bill was introduced and withdrawn. In 1860 one more Bill was introduced and withdrawn. In 1863 another Police Bill was introduced, but without practical effect. In 1867 and again in 1868 there were the Bills of Mr. Mill, which were withdrawn. There was also the Bill of Mr. Buxton, which was introduced and read a second time. This brought the question down to the time when he had endeavoured to deal with it. Such were the attempts at legislation on this subject. Then, with reference to the views of public men, they had the strongly-expressed opinions of Lord Russell, Lord Brougham, Sir George Grey, the present Home Secretary, and of Lord Chelmsford, a Conservative Lord Chancellor, who, when he received the Lord Mayor, in 1867, impressed upon him the necessity of moving with the times and the importance of improving municipal government in the Metropolis. He might also refer to the opinions expressed by Lord Chief Baron Kelly, Lord Aberdare, the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole), the present Secretary for War, and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who gave the reform of the government of London a prominent place in his famous Greenwich address. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), also, at a public dinner of one of the Guilds, lamented the hardness of the fate which condemned him to vestry government on one side of Temple Bar, when on the other side there was a comparatively small population in the enjoyment of excellent municipal government. On that occasion the present Lord Mayor, replying to the toast of his health, said he was no friend of vestries, and he did not believe in the Metropolitan Board of Works, regarding it simply as a vestry in itself; whereas the Corporation of London, he added, had never lagged in the pursuit of social progress, and in that respect it had always been upheld by its ancient Guilds. If the right hon. Gentleman were present he should have claimed his vote in favour of this Motion. On no public question that he knew had there been such an universal consensus of opinion with a view to obtain an improved system of government for the Metropolis. He, therefore, in full confidence, would invite the House to assent to his first Resolution; that this was a question of primary importance and deserved the early attention of Her Majesty's Government. He came now to the second Resolution — that "reform should be based on the establishment of one municipal administration for the whole Metropolis." It was upon that basis, and on that alone, that we could safely and effectually build; and we must do so now, if it should be necessary to build, like Nehemiah and his followers when restoring Jerusalem, with a trowel in one hand and a sword in the other to slay the lions and the giants in the shape of self-interests and abuses which stood in our path. It was a Bill on that basis which he introduced last year. An outcry had been raised against the Bill. It was said that its promoters were making an attack upon the vestries, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the City Corporation, whose funds they intended to appropriate. Never were charges more unfounded. He did not stand there to say that the vestries had not individually done good work. He did not find fault with the Metropolitan Board of Works, but gave them all honour for the new streets and the noble Embankments which they had created, for the Parks which they had made, and for the open spaces which they had saved for the people of the Metropolis; neither did he stand there to decry in any way the City Corporation in its administration. Far from it. No one more readily than he and those with whom he was acting respected and admired that ancient historic corporation of which we had all, as Londoners and Englishmen, so much reason to be proud. We knew that in early days the office of Lord Mayor was one of almost sovereign authority; but even now, though shorn of much of its ancient dignity and authority, yet Sultans and Suzerains, Princes, Peers, and commoners alike gladly partook of his splendid hospitality; and in such estimation was the office of Lord Mayor of London held abroad that on the occasion of the visit of the last Lord Mayor to Paris he and the Lady Mayoress had an escort of 100 dragoons. Further, we knew how readily the City took the lead in all national subscriptions for the relief of suffering humanity, whether at home or abroad. But whatever might be the estimation in which the City of London was held, whatever might be its merits and defects, as well as those of the Metropolitan Board of Works, of vestries, and other public bodies charged with the administration of the affairs of this vast Metropolis, they were all, as at present constituted, and with divided authority, incapable of rightly, efficiently, and economically administering the concerns of what would soon be 4,000,000 of men. It was only in unity of authority that efficient local government could be found, and that he sought to obtain by extending the jurisdiction of the City, which now extended over 700 acres only, over the "greater London without," which covered over 78,000 acres. How that should be done, what the exact form of the constitution of such an extended municipality should be, what position in it the Metropolitan Board of Works and other existing administrative bodies should occupy, that was not the time or place to consider, as those were matters of detail which could only be satisfactorily worked out by responsible Ministers in communication with the City and local authority. All he asked the House to do was to affirm the principle of unity of administration in any scheme that might be adopted for the improved local government of the Metropolis. In doing so he was supported by the Report of the Municipal Corporation Commissioners of 1835, by the Registrar General, and by the Metropolitan Board of Works, who in their Report upon Mr. Buxton's Bill in 1869-70 said that they had come to the conclusion that there should be one central municipal government with jurisdiction over the whole of the Metropolis. The Press also had been throughout unanimous that something should be done, and that that something should take the form of unity. The leading journal, when last year's Bill for establishing one municipal government for the whole Metropolis was before the country, said—

"The first condition of a complete remedy is the creation of a municipality for the whole town. The provisions of Lord Elcho's Bill seem to meet the case very completely, and at the same time to pay all due regard to the very stubborn claims of the vested interests of the old City Corporation. We hope only that the main principle it embodies will be accepted by the great interests which it will affect; that all Londoners will agree heartily in putting an end to the anomaly and inconvenience of the present artificial divisions of power within the single area of the Metropolis: and that the whole of London may thus be at length united into one great municipality—the richest, the most intelligent, and the most powerful in the world—and fitted, therefore, to be, as we may confidently trust it will be, a model to all others."

He knew that he should be met by the argument that by establishing a colossal London they would have an Imperium in Imperio; but this was no new fear. In 1602 Queen Elizabeth issued an edict, when London contained 145,000 inhabitants, that not more than one family should live in a house, and that no more houses should be built in London, because such a great aggregation of human beings could not be constrained to "fear God and honour the Queen." In the time of James a similar edict was issued, and that Monarch added a scientific reason in reference to the maintenance of health; and even at the time of the constitution of the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1855 some people were afraid of the establishment of so great a power in the State. He (Lord Elcho) had no fear of a corporation for London being dangerous to the State. The Paris Commune might be referred to; but his answer was that London was not Paris. No doubt Paris had governed France, but London had not yet governed England, and he did not think that it was likely it would do so. In this country, Birmingham and Manchester, instead of taking their cue from the metropolitan city, flattered themselves that they shaped the policy of the Empire. Further, they had confidence in the good sense and love of order possessed by the people of this country, who had been trained in an atmosphere of municipal and local government, the conduct of which would afford full employment for the energies of the most active and ambitious of its citizens. If the worst came, it must not be forgotten that the police would be under the supreme control of the Government. He thought, therefore, it would be safe gently to re-organize their local administration in the form that appeared best and most effective without fear of the Lord Mayor of the period, however extended his jurisdiction, coming to the House of Commons and substituting his mace for the Royal "bauble" which lay on the Table. He had no means of knowing the course which Her Majesty's Government would take in reference to this question; but as they could not deny the truth of his first, he hoped they would not look with disfavour on his second Resolution. The good and economical local government of the Metropolis and the health of its inhabitants, which might be so cared for as to reduce in a model city the death-rate to eight or even five per 1,000, were social benefits that should commend themselves to a Conservative Government that had adopted sanitas sanitatum as the key-note of its domestic policy. As far as the present death-rate was concerned he was not quite certain; but, whatever it might be, his general argument that it could be considerably reduced was not affected by the fact. The question was one not merely affecting the health and well-being of the millions who resided permanently in London, but of the Sovereign, who possibly might some day again reside in London; of the Peers and Members of the House of Commons who annually assembled in London for the performance of Parliamentary duties; of the many suitors and witnesses who thronged the Law Courts and Parliamentary Committees, and of the thousands of persons whom business or pleasure annually brought to the capital of the British Empire. In the name of all these, and for the credit of Anglo-Saxon municipal administration, he called upon the Prime Minister boldly to grapple with the urgent question of London Local Government. As far as his personal connection with the question was concerned, he could not hope at once to prove successful; but, treading upon ground already broken by Mill and Buxton, he should at any rate possess the satisfaction of having contributed to the ultimate success of the great necessary work in the accomplishment of which they were able pioneers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the reform of the government of the Metropolis, with a view to its more efficient, uniform, and economical administration, is a question of primary importance, and deserves the early attention of Her Majesty's Government."—(Lord Elcho.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, no one can fail to admire the perseverance of the noble Lord, or to appreciate the force of the general principle which he has laid down, but it does not follow that everyone must admire that principle. It might have been hoped that the noble Lord would have shown more sympathy with the spirit which has made the great improvements of London in late years. While one listened to the noble Lord, it seemed more than doubtful whether the Thames had been embanked, and how the other improvements around this House and other parts of the Metropolis could have been effected. Who could believe that this is the London which the noble Lord describes as the worst governed municipality of anything like the size in the world; could this assertion be consistent with the fact that this great Metropolis is the most peaceful community of the kind in the world? The noble Lord appears to be possessed by the one dominant idea, that there can be no good Government unless the governing body be elected on the principle of direct representation, and be combined on a uniform system. I have had some experience in reference to this matter, for I am the survivor of the Members of this House who took an active part in the passing of the measure for the incorporation of Birmingham. While that Bill was passing through Parliament I became uneasy as to its probable effect, because it was founded upon the system of uniformity of franchise, and upon the principle of direct representation. I have lived to see that measure result in the domination of a single faction. Any one who is acquainted with the Corporation of the City of London and its history must know that it deserves to be considered one of the perennial sources of the spirit of free self-government. The immense variety, nay, the apparent incongruity of the representative system of the London municipalities, secure that all sections of the people shall be represented. I defy the noble Lord to apply the principle of direct representation and of uniformity of election to any large municipality, and to save the Corporation, which he would thus create, from the domination of a single faction, the greatest imperfection that can attach to the organization of any Corporation. I speak with regard to this matter after anxious thought upon this subject, long since brought home to me, and after an experience of some years. That which I admire most in the form of government that has grown up in London—for it is a growth, the produce of the popular intelligence and of the popular will—is the variety of representation it exhibits; the variety of social position and interests which it represents; and again I defy the noble Lord to produce that combination of interests, which is the essence of true representation, by any system of direct representation and uniformity.

In the course of his speech the noble Lord adverted several times to his Bill of last year. I have here an extract from his speech, when introducing it, and, with the permission of the House, I will produce it in justification of the observations I have made. A Bill, not the Bill of the noble Lord, had been circulated. The noble Lord, and I suppose the Association with which he is connected, determined to alter, and, as they thought, improve upon it; and the noble Lord said—

“What he held himself to be individually responsible for was the Bill as it had since been altered. The changes introduced must render it more acceptable to the Government, to the House, to the Corporation of London, and to the Metropolis in general. They might be stated in a very few words. In the first place, the changes would secure Imperial authority if they created a great united municipal government over 5,000,000 of people. This would be done by giving a veto to the Secretary of State, or to some authority on the part of the Crown, whose approval would be necessary for the appointment of the Mayor, the Deputy Mayor, the Recorder, and the Common Serjeant.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxii. 237.]

Thus the appointment to all these important offices would have been virtually in the hands of the Secretary of State. This showed little confidence on the part of the noble Lord in the electoral and municipal system he advocated. The noble Lord said—

“Then, as regards the police, in the Bill as originally drawn they were placed wholly under the control of the Corporation; but it was manifest that the objections urged against this proposal rested on sound grounds, and it was now proposed to do nothing at all in reference to the police, but to leave it to the Secretary of State.”—[Ibid.]

Here, again, the whole control of the police in the Metropolis was to have been taken from the Corporation under the noble Lord's Bill, notwithstanding their present efficiency, and handed over to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

“But (continued the noble Lord) to leave it to the Secretary of State and the House of Commons in Committee to decide how they would deal with the Imperial question of the police of this vast Metropolis.”—[Ibid.]

Therefore, all that the noble Lord ensured by his Bill was the taking away the control of the police from the Corporation of the City of London, though it is well known and admitted on all hands to be well managed, in order that he might place it in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department: but so little conscious was he of what regulations might be needed under the altered circumstances, that he left the whole of these undescribed, to be fashioned according to what might be called the chance decisions of this House. I trust, Sir, that the House will decline to enter upon the vast scheme of the noble Lord, and will remain satisfied with the progress London is making in the way of improvement. Every foreigner who has visited London in former years and has returned hither of late admires the extensive changes which have been made and are now making. Some foreigners may, indeed, prefer the municipal constitution of Paris, or of some other Continental city: but the foreigners I have met with express their great satisfaction at the steady progress which has been made in the improvement and adornment of the English capital. Deprive the Corporation of London of its ancient authority and dignity, and I put this to the House, would the Corporation then occupy a position that would enable it to relieve the Sovereign of the burden of receiving and entertaining the distinguished guests, who visit this country from time to time, in the becoming manner it now does? Moreover, I would ask the House, whether any of us really desire to increase the patronage already possessed by the Ministers of the Crown? Has not the patronage of the Ministers of the Crown already increased to such an extent as to threaten the independence of this House? Is not that patronage still increasing to such a degree that it has become a subject of jealousy to every man who values the Constitution of this country? "No, no!" Hon. Members may object; but I venture to say that there is great impatience growing up in the country at this vast increase of patronage; and that, if anything could increase that impatience, it would be the robbing of its patronage, its responsibility, and its independence, such a Corporation as that of London, which has for centuries enjoyed the confidence of the country to such an extent that it is not only the model for, but is becoming the centre of, municipal action throughout the Kingdom. The noble Lord made an attempt to prove that the death-rate of London is high; he blun-dered in doing so, and when he was told that instead of 30 per 1,000 the death-rate was 10 less, he replied that really it did not matter, as so small a difference could not lessen the force of his argument. Why, Sir, the whole ground for legislation, if there be any ground whatever, is based upon sanitary considerations: and I ask the noble Lord whether sanitary measures are not in progress in London? Further, are they not in progress without any violation of those great principles of self-government which constitute so chief an element of the strength of this country? Why is I say that they constitute the strength of this country and of the Empire? Because it is through them that the thought, the intelligence, the will of the nation, throughout all the variety of its social phases, is brought into harmonious action with the Government of the Queen and finds expression in this House. In respect to this question, the noble Lord certainly appears not to be a Conservative. His speech was that of a Radical, and a Radical not of very high type. And when I look at the mechanical character of the means upon which the noble Lord relies for producing an improvement in the municipal government of London, and I remember the great social and political results to which the Corporation of London and its surrounding municipalities have contributed, I cannot help thinking of what was once said by a rival artist of a great portrait painter, but who was deficient in historical power: his rival described him as "a mechanic who was called an artist." In my humble opinion, it is not the function of a Conservative or a Conservative Government rudely to tamper with institutions through which the education, the intellect, and the wealth of the country find expression. But at the present moment we have several Bills before the House too much of that character: two Bills which deal in a somewhat arbitrary spirit with our two great national Universities. We have also a Bill before us to deprive the Justices of the Peace of the care of the prisons both in counties and boroughs. I hope that Her Majesty's Government will think it consistent with their Conservatism, which, if it is worth anything, should preserve the elements which constitute the strength of our Constitution, not to sanction an interruption of the wholesome improvement, the steady progress of which we witness in London, for the sake of depriving the chief municipality of England of a charge it has so well fulfilled for centuries. Would it, I ask, please the noble Lord the Member for Haddington, in his Imperialistic temper, to deprive the visits of those foreign Potentates who are now from time to time received at the Mansion House of the splendour which accompanies those receptions? Or does the noble Lord wish to add to the burden of the Sovereign by depriving her of the assistance she derives from the Corporation of the City of London in their magnificent hospitality? Would the noble Lord deem it appropriate that some high official should be fitted out to undertake this task, or would he commit it to some nobleman? There are obvious objections to either idea. Let the House remember that mere wealth, without responsibility and authority, could not fit any man or set of men to discharge the functions of such a Corporation as that of the City of London. If mere wealth undertook to offer hospitality to such personages as the City of London receives, its doing so would at once be stamped as inappropriate and impudent. It is the usage of centuries which sanctions the hospitality which the City Corporation tenders through the Lord Mayor to the Sovereigns of Foreign States when they visit this country. I believe that the municipality over which the Lord Mayor presides ought not to be unduly extended beyond its present limits, because, among other reasons, the Lord Mayor might thus become too great a man for England.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, he rose with a deep sense of responsibility to discuss this subject, when he remembered that the health and happiness of nearly 4,000,000 people depended upon the good government of the Metropolis. He was rather surprised at the prominence given by the noble Lord to a dinner given by him as Chairman of the Board of Works, but he cordially endorsed the assertion made on that occasion by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Selater-Booth) that London was the best governed city in the world. He asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the works carried out within the last 20 years by the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works would vie with any works of ancient or modern time. The noble Lord himself had expressed his approval of some of their efforts—such as the drainage works, the Thames Embankments, the widening of various streets, and the making of new thoroughfares where they were needed. Many hon. Members must recollect the state of the Thames one summer before the Metropolitan Board of Works was constituted, when cart-loads of chloride of lime and other disinfectants were thrown into the Thames. Now the sewage of London was carried so far away that it was impossible it could become offensive to the people of London. The noble Lord had referred to the death-rate, which had been reduced to 21 in the 1,000. There might be local considerations which made the mortality of other towns greater; but he believed that the death-rate in Manchester was 30 and in Liverpool 35. The noble Lord had also referred to the system of representation in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and said it ought to be direct. He had been a member of the Board of Works for 10 years, during six of which he had been Chairman, and he would assert that the system of indirect representation to the Metropolitan Board worked remarkably well. The members elected were the ablest and most prominent men in the different Vestries and District Boards, and they came to the Metropolitan Board of Works well acquainted with their work and with the wants of their localities. His noble Friend had referred to the hydrant question, which was now before the Committee upstairs on the Metropolitan Fire Brigade. The reason why the Metropolitan Board had not adopted these hydrants was that they were not prepared to spend £1,000,000 in this way without satisfying themselves that the pipes were of sufficient magnitude and the pressure of water sufficiently great and constant to extinguish fires. These hydrants had, however, been placed in Northumberland Avenue and other new streets, and he trusted that in time they would be introduced into every suitable place. By the Building Act the construction of houses was placed under the regulations of the Metropolitan Board. After some experience of the working of this Act it was found that it contained many defects which it was desirable to amend. He had accordingly brought in a Bill to consolidate and amend the law, and although he failed to pass it, he trusted that he should before long be able to carry a measure which would improve the law on this subject. His noble Friend had talked of the zeal of the Metropolitan Board having outrun their discretion in the matter of the Gas Companies. The Bill brought in and read a second time had, however, already borne fruit. All the Gas Companies, with few exceptions, on the north side of the Thames had become amalgamated, and negotiations were going on for the amalgamation of the companies on the south side, who had accepted the conditions imposed by the Bill. He did not see how unity of administration or the amalgamation of the Vestries would prevent people being run over in the streets; and as his noble Friend had not given any figures to show how unity would be attended with economy it was impossible to attempt any reply to that part of his speech. He had seen the streets of Paris in a worse condition than those of London, and as to the sewers of Paris they were constructed upon different principles from those of London. Ours were designed to carry off only a limited quantity of effluent water, and the refuse of the streets was not permitted to be swept into them, but it was swept into those of Paris, and the solid matter was carried away in barges and deposited on the banks of the Seine to diminish the risk of inundation. He could not imagine it would be at all agreeable that the contents of the sewers of London should be used to embank the Thames above London. Late at night in the streets of Paris there was often a procession of carts of a most offensive character. If an agitation for the reform of the local government of London had been going on since 1837, if it had enlisted the sympathies of Mr. Mill and Mr. Buxton, and if, after several Bills had been unsuccessfully introduced, the matter could be carried no further than it was by the proposed Resolution, the result would appear to be that the inhabitants of London did not want a change, and in those circumstances it would seem to be better to leave things pretty much as they were, because they satisfied those who lived under the existing conditions. He did not deny the possibility of reforms of a moderate character; but he could not admit the necessity for the sweeping changes suggested. He must defend those who as vestrymen devoted their time to the public service; and, if in some instances the higher classes did not participate in the work of local management it was entirely their own fault. Any differences in the supply of gas or water depended upon the districts being supplied by one company or another, and not upon the districts being within or beyond municipal jurisdiction, and as to the relation of the Metropolitan Board to the Corporation, he might refer to their harmonious co-operation on the gas question to show that the jealousies which once existed between them had entirely disappeared, and that they acted together for the public good. His noble Friend had alluded to the Press, and he quoted the observations of the leading journal with reference to his own Bill of last Session. He might also have quoted another celebrated newspaper—he meant The Saturday Review—only a fortnight ago, which was not quite so favourable in its comments. He, on the other hand, might quote the testimony of a leading journal comparing the state of London now with what it was 20 years ago, and showing the obligations under which it lay to the Metropolitan Board. But he did not think it necessary to do so. It was enough to show his noble Friend that the Press was not all on one side upon this question. His noble Friend said the Metropolitan Board were not equal to their work. He maintained that they had proved themselves to be so. It was not correct to say that the Metropolitan Board had not powers over the Vestries as regarded the making of sewers. They had powers over the Vestries in that matter. In case they wanted to make new sewers they must come to the Metropolitan Board for their sanction; and those sewers were always made in connection with the main drainage, which had been entirely confided to the care of the Metropolitan Board. He did not know that there were any other points in his noble Friend's speech which required an answer, and he had only now to thank the House for the kind hearing they had given him.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not agree with his noble Friend when he said that the municipality he described would have quite enough to do to prevent them engaging in anything political. Everyone who knew history knew that the City of London had exercised great political influence. That influence had always been exercised on the side of freedom and good government. It was a model for municipal freedom and good government; but when his noble Friend proposed that the police of the whole Metropolis should be under the Secretary of State, that the Chief of the municipality, the Lord Mayor, or other chief officer, should be appointed by the Crown, or with a veto in the Crown—the Recorder and the Common Serjeant being also appointed by the Crown—the municipality would be no municipality at all; it would have no municipal liberties; it would be merely a body subordinate to the Government of the day. It would be very much like the body which governed Paris. The Prefect of the Seine, when he visited London, was complimented as the head of a great and, perhaps, model municipality. But he was not the head of a municipality at all. He was appointed by the Crown. The Lord Mayor under the scheme of his noble Friend would be a Government officer, and instead of a great Corporation intimately connected with the history and liberties of England, a model of self-government, they would have a body under the Minister of the day. His noble Friend did not seem to have realized the immensity of his conception, a municipal body comprising a population of 4,000,000. With a population greater than that of Scotland, equal to that of Belgium, this Municipal Council would be a Parliament in itself; it would have a Minister, a Budget, and the organization which belonged to a kingdom. Such a thing was unexampled in history, and would be so unwieldy it would be impossible to manage it. Without the City of London, there was no doubt that the splendour of this country would be much diminished; because there was no other body which could properly entertain any Potentate whom it was desirable to conciliate, or adequately express the hospitable feelings of the country on important occasions. If those who wished to suppress the City of London would but look at the matter in that light they would see the absurdity of their attempt. His noble Friend seemed to forget that if he succeeded in carrying out his object he would destroy the historic identity of the Corporation and put in its place a body whose line of action no one could foresee. The new Corporation would probably be very different from the old; he was sure it would not fulfil so well its duties of hospitality and good government. No doubt it would fall under the influence of some democratic faction and become the arena of political contention. Involved in Party strife, it would be drawn away from its proper duties, and in all likelihood become an example to avoid instead of being a model of good government and municipal liberty.

MR. LOWE said, he was anxious before any Member of the Government spoke on the Question to recall the House to what was really the question before it. Hon. Gentlemen naturally considered this matter to be simply a question as to the dignity of the Lord Mayor of London, but they should really remember the statistics of this subject. The inhabitants of municipal London, allowing for the increase that had taken place since the last Census, might possibly amount to some 80,000 persons, and its area one square mile and ten acres. The size of non-municipal London might pretty fairly be reckoned at 3,600,000, and its area at 75,000 acres; and the question was what was the right and proper thing to be done with those 3,600,000 who had no share in the government of London. The question was whether they were now governed in a manner satisfactory to themselves and in accordance with the lights we now possessed on this subject, or whether it was possible to devise something better for them. Putting aside the Corporation of the City of London, to which he wished no harm, let them look at this question as it would confront them and demand consideration if there were no such Corporations in existence. Hon. Members argued as if there was nothing in this country excepting the Corporation of the City of London, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and Vestries, and to forget that this larger portion of London was an exception to the rule which provides for every large town, and even for some very small ones, a particular kind of municipal government established after great deliberation in 1835. The establishment of this system of municipal government he regarded as a larger and more important step than the Reform Bill itself, and it had worked on the whole with great satisfaction, and great benefit to the people of this country. On what ground of reason or good sense should these 3,600,000 people inhabiting the principal city of the country be excepted from this otherwise general rule of municipal government, and left, so to speak, almost without any municipal government at all? That was the question to which he hoped any Member of the Government who replied would direct his attention, without being led aside from it by a fear of hurting the feelings of the Lord Mayor on the one side, or of the hon. and gallant Gentleman on the other who came forward and represented himself as something like a sovereign over those 3,600,000 who had no other shepherd than himself. The experience of such places as Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and innumerable other places, had established certain rules and principles with regard to municipal government, which rules might be summed up in a single word—"consolidation." The great advantage of municipal government was that it enabled us to get rid of an infinity of small departments, which, being apportioned to look after some particularly small matters, were elected with little care and consideration, and consisted of inferior persons; and that there was established instead one large Board in the form of a municipal council, which undertook the charge of all these small matters, and being elected once for all, every year attracted attention, and was held as important enough to make persons take pains to get the best persons to sit upon it that could be found. No one could doubt that if the duties discharged by the different committees of a Corporation like that of Manchester, for instance, were divided between Boards, for each of which there was a separate election, they would have an inferior set of men to administer affairs than those who were annually elected to such a Corporation, and who, having those duties divided between them, were subject to be over-ruled by the general body if they did anything wrong. Applying the tests he had mentioned to the 3,600,000 persons who lived under the jurisdiction of Vestries, they would find that Vestries had comparatively small powers over small areas, that their election did not attract any consideration, and that it was not difficult for any fussy and incompetent person, who chose to take the trouble, to place himself in one of these bodies. From the very nature of the case, and the small extent of the area, they were precluded from taking a large and comprehensive view of anything which came before them. There was a constant system of doing and undoing. A road was laid down to be afterwards picked up. Each of these bodies must have a Staff of Assistants to do its work for it. Imagine the waste that went on in having 20 or 30 sets of persons to do the work, where, by having one body, the work would be devised at the fountain-head after the best consideration that could be given. He did not wish to speak disrespectfully of the vestrymen, but the Vestries were generally composed of small tradesmen, to whom money and time were of great importance, who had a narrow education, and who were not fitted to discharge duties of this kind. The affairs of the Metropolis had quite outgrown the system which prevailed. It was absurd to call the Vestries municipal government; but he thought it was greatly to be wondered at that the system was not worse than it was. They were continually told of the direct election of the Vestries: but the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir James Hogg) and his colleagues were elected by Vestries who were appointed nobody knew how or when. To the Vestries elected as he had described were entrusted the municipal functions of the Metropolis. Now, if this was the right principle, why not apply it all over the United Kingdom? Why were not Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Birmingham, and Liverpool governed in this manner? Why did little Vestries swarm in the Metropolis? In what respect were the people of the Metropolis inferior to the cities he had named that they should submit to this system of government, which was contrary to English notions and feelings? Why, were 3,600,000 people here to be made an exception to the whole kingdom? That was really the question, and it was a question of the utmost importance, demanding an answer different from any that had been given to it. London had a Thames Conservancy discharging a duty which would belong to the municipality, and a School Board, whose duties would fall on the municipality, and so on with the Boards for different purposes throughout London, all of which might be concentrated in one municipality with good effect. He had fairly described, he believed, the condition of the outside district of the Metropolis, and if the statement was anything like fair, they could not be surprised that the fruit was very much like the tree. The Board of Works had borrowed £15,000,000 and raised £5,000,000 by taxes, and it would be strange if, having £20,000,000, they did nothing with it; but they illustrated one thing clearly—and that was the source, the system, in which they had their being. He thought that the system under which they were elected was about as bad a form as could be devised by human ingenuity. Yet, in spite of these disadvantages, the Board was able to perform considerable public work and service. Nothing was more remarkable than the want of public spirit and of the power of defending themselves possessed by the 3,600,000 inhabitants of London. If there was any Bill affecting the Metropolis before a Committee of that House, and the City did not oppose, the rest of the Metropolis was absolutely helpless. They could not send Vestries; they could not send the Metropolitan Board; they were continually trampled on in the most ignominious manner because they had no organization by which to assert their rights. There was plenty of political life among them, but the absence of a municipality had produced its natural effect, just as the loss of an organ in the human body led to a corresponding want of energy and sensation; and now there was no body so small or petty which could not trample upon those 3,600,000 people—

“Point but a rush against Othello’s breast
And he retires.”

Take the case of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who was the present monarch of this part of Her Majesty’s dominions, who told them he had settled the gas question. Well, there was not a town in England that would have submitted to be treated as London submitted to be treated on this gas question. Ever since he had been a householder in the Metropolis—now 25 years—he had found the quality of the gas year by year getting worse. That did not arise from anything in the nature or production of gas; but because the gas companies had more power in the House of Commons to carry their Bills than all the 3,600,000 inhabitants had, and that because they had no municipal organization to bring against any power. Nothing had struck him more when he had been in the country—at Glasgow and Sheffield, for instance—than the extraordinary beauty and brightness of the gas as compared with the darkness visible of the London gas. He contended that no people who had proper means of representation would have submitted so long to have been trampled upon by a gross monopoly as London had done in connection with her gas supply. Then take the case of water. What was the greatest insult which one human being could offer another? If one man compelled his neighbour to drink his sewage, the latter was put about as low as he could be put. Yet this was precisely the position of most of the inhabitants of London. He enjoyed the blessings of a water supply from the Chelsea Water Company, and could hardly take up a newspaper without reading about the large proportion of animal organisms in the water so supplied to him. This meant that all the towns on the banks of the Thames above the Metropolis were discharging their sewage into the river, and that the people in London were forced to drink the water so defiled. Did anybody believe that if the Metropolis had a proper municipal organization it would be subjected, he would not say to such an insult, but to such a danger and such a disgrace? Yet the people of the first city in the world were subjected to an insult which no decent master would offer to his slave. These were two instances of the want in London of that which all the rest of the large towns enjoyed—representation by a municipal council. The question was what remedy should be applied? It was clear that no case was made out for leaving these 3,600,000 people any longer to the tender mercies of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, or of those of the Vestries. London was not less unanimous, not less wealthy than other cities. It was the fountain head of information, and when it asked to be placed on a level with other cities, it made at least a modest request. But then it was said—“Oh, London is too large for one municipality. We must split it up." Such a process would be a mere mockery, because the interest throughout the whole town was really one and indivisible. The experiment of allowing such a population to exist without a municipal centre was a most dangerous one. In quiet times, when the people were satisfied, it might do well enough; but if a time of popular tumult and of riots came, was it not a fearful thing to reflect that here was a population equal to that of a moderate sized Kingdom, with no one to look to for direction and guidance in case of danger? He always felt the greatest apprehension whenever he heard of any great celebration which called the people of London into the streets; for the least accident, or panic, or difficulty, might cause the most dreadful evils, on a scale which could not be contemplated without alarm. The fact that people were at present quiet and well-behaved, was just the reason why precautions should be taken, and why London should now have what all other towns in the Kingdom enjoyed—some municipal form of government, and somebody to be their adviser in case of trouble and danger. This advantage would be entirely lost if the municipality were frittered away into a number of different districts. The interests of all being the same, this would be division merely for the sake of division. Nothing would result from that but jealousies and squabbles between these different municipalities, which would consequently be prevented from adopting measures that would really tend to benefit the Metropolis. We ought to get the best class of men, who would devote their attention to the noble task of securing and regulating the daily life of so large a portion as 3,600,000 of the human race. Unless we were to confess that everything all over the country in the way of municipal organization was entirely wrong, such an organization as existed in Liverpool, Manchester, and other great towns, ought to be granted to the Metropolis. The case he had made out would not be consistent with the maintenance of the dynasty of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was not necessarily fatal to the continuance of the Corporation of the City of London. It would be for the Corporation to consider whether they would not act wisely in placing themselves at the head of this great movement, and in occupying the position which they ought to have occupied long ago, instead of confining their attention to a single square mile of ground. It was for the Corporation to consider whether it would not be most wise and dignified to assume this position which would be most worthy of their antecedents. They had done good service to the people in their struggles with the Crown, and they might now inaugurate the cause of the municipal government of the Metropolis. They might consider whether it was right that the large funds, public buildings and property which had been given them by different Sovereigns, partly under the idea that they were giving to the whole Metropolis, and partly because of the foolish dread they had of the increase of the Metropolis, that those large funds should be limited to one single square mile of land. That was for their consideration. He did not speak in antagonism to them; but if they chose to stand apart, it would be for Parliament to consider whether that circumstance should be allowed to stand in the way of granting what was right and just to the rest of the Metropolis. All he urged was that the adoption of this Motion did not pledge the House to any course which was hostile to the Corporation of the City of London; but the inhabitants of the rest of the Metropolis had a right to be placed in the same position with their fellow-subjects in all the other parts of the Kingdom, and to be enabled to manage their own affairs in the same way as they did.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The noble Lord has taken great interest in this subject, having studied it for some years, and has introduced to me the first Lord Mayor of the new Metropolis in the person of the Duke of Westminster. The first of the noble Lord's Resolutions may be taken in two senses. It may be taken in the sense in which ordinary Parliamentary Resolutions are taken—namely, that the matter is of such importance that the Government should at once take it up. In that sense I do not propose to deal with the first Resolution. But there is another sense in which it may be taken—namely, that Englishmen have a right to grumble over the inconveniences to which they are subjected, and in that sense I agree with the noble Lord. With respect to the second Resolution, that is a question which cannot be so easily disposed of as the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down imagines. The question is not whether things are as perfect as we should like them to be. I grant they are not. None of the arrangements with regard to gas, water, or sewage are perfect. But I think I have heard a great many grumble in the municipalities which have been so much praised. I have heard just the same grumbles about gas, and precisely the same about water, great grumbles about sewage, and still more about a matter which I am surprised has not been raised here—namely, about the rates. And when you talk of taking the water out of the hands of the great companies I must remind the House of two things. In the first place, in almost all the municipalities throughout the length and breadth of the land, the water is in the hands of the companies at the present moment; and in the second, while it is easy to say you will place the management in the hands of a body which will prevent all grumbling, you will have to pay the companies compensation. I will not enter into the question whether it would be wise that one body should have the control of the water supply. It is open to argument. But I say it is not fair to omit the consideration of cost. I would say the same with regard to gas. The gas supply is not, as a general rule, in the hands of corporations. Manchester has made a profit out of it; but in Liverpool and other places the supply is still in the hands of the companies. If at the outset the supply both of water and gas could have been arranged on a regular system, a great amount of money would have been saved and you would have much purer water and gas; and in the same way you would have got a better railway system. But, unfortunately, that is not the way in which we work things in England. We work rather in the dark at first, and then we say it is all wrong and try to put it right. I am far from saying it will not be right to put the water companies or the gas companies under one power; but you must not suppose that you can do this without great expense, which will eventually fall upon the rates; or that you can make such an arrangement at anything like such a cheap rate as if you had a tabula rasa, and were starting on the most economical principles. I am aware there is a great deal of grumbling about the streets, and I should be glad to see steps taken to put these matters on a more satisfactory footing. But do not suppose it is an easy thing to do; and, although we have heard this great corporation which is proposed praised up to the skies, do not be certain that when you have got it, you will be much nearer perfection than you are at present. The noble Lord quoted from rather a wonderful book which has been published about the administration of London, and amongst the divisions of the Metropolis he mentioned the postal districts. But they have nothing to do with the government of London, and if there is one thing centrally governed it is the Post Office. Therefore, I think it was unwise for the gentleman who wrote the book to mention that as a matter for re-consideration. With regard to the police, that is centrally administered, and I believe the police, as a whole, is satisfactorily managed, and will bear comparison with that of any other municipality in England or Wales. I think I should not be justified at this time of night in going further into details. As to the question of grumbling, I am aware there are reasons for grumbling, and I should be glad to do all in my power to see them removed, but that is another question. In the Motion of the noble Lord you cannot distinguish the grumble from the remedy; and I apprehend that his first Resolution is simply the foreground upon which he wants to take his stand in order to obtain that which he puts in the second place—namely, the formation of one great central authority for the whole of the Metropolis. As the noble Lord brought in a Bill last Session for that purpose, we may take it that it is really the foundation of the whole matter which we have to consider, whether it is wise that there should be one great central authority for the whole of London. Now, upon that there is a great deal more to be said than has been suggested either by the noble Lord or the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. The right hon. Gentleman asked what was to become of the 3,600,000 people who could not help themselves, and why were they not put on the same level as the population of our other great towns?

I only want to throw out suggestions; but I would put it to the House that when municipal government is proposed the first question which arises is—Have you a municipality to govern? I do not think we ought rashly to jump to the conclusion that these 3,600,000 people form practically a municipality. London has been well said to be not a town, but a province covered with houses. You cannot compare it with any other city in England or abroad. There is not the same community of interest about it which there is in local municipalities. The people in the East and the people in the West are two different sets, and the people in the North are in like manner different from the people in the South. They have different interests and habits, and do not form one body as in Liverpool or Manchester. In a central authority you must have intimate local knowledge of the interests whom that authority is to represent and govern. If you had one central authority here, and divided London into wards, do you think you would get the same class of people to carry on the municipal government that they have in the other municipal bodies in the kingdom? In such places as Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester the aldermen and councilmen are generally men born and bred in the particular locality in which they dwell, and who, though elected for particular wards, know the circumstances of the whole town. Would that be the case in London? It would be extremely difficult to get persons with local knowledge of the whole of the 3,600,000 inhabitants of the Metropolis. This question is not considered now for the first time. We have had a great many schemes brought forward. In the first place, we had the scheme of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Vestries were to be made; there were to be no municipal boroughs, but the Metropolitan Board of Works was to be the supreme authority. That scheme the City naturally would not accept. Then there was what was called Lord Fortescue's scheme, according to which there were to be various bodies which were to undertake different duties—one that of lighting, another the water supply, and so on. There was also the scheme of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), which, at all events, had one great merit—that of simplicity; but if it had been carried out I do not know what would have become of the City. Then there is the plan of a grand municipal council with subordinate bodies scattered all over London, but to be gathered together now and then. These schemes have been brought forward at various times, and now we have the scheme of the noble Lord. The House should consider practically whether that scheme would work in the case of a population unlike that of other large towns, and without the same knowledge which other populations possess of the municipalities in which they dwell. I would suggest to the House whether in London these two great principles are not wanting—unity of interests and absence of the needful amount of local knowledge. The question is, whether you would not practically destroy the Corporation of the City of London by such a scheme as this. Would the Corporation of the City of London preserve its character if this scheme were carried out? In the local municipalities of England and Wales one thing is observable, that they are becoming more political, and it is unfortunate that municipal elections should be treated politically. That does not exist in the City of London at present. I do not know anything which more detracts from the advantage of municipal government than associating it with politics, and before we make any change in the government of London we must take care that we do not fall into the error of making it political. The City of London possesses some of the most ancient charters and privileges possessed by any body in the kingdom. You cannot suppose that the City of London is going to surrender those charters, and deprive itself of these privileges, but you cannot suppose that you can extend all those rights the City possesses under charters to a larger area. The noble Lord asks what the Government means to do in this matter. I fear the only answer I can give him is, that the Government have not the intention of following the example of a great many of their Predecessors, and of bringing in a Bill and then letting it drop. Certainly they would not follow the example of their Predecessors in that respect. If Her Majesty's Government ever thought this question ought to be taken up, they would bring in a Bill and endeavour to carry it. The noble Lord referred to the Report of the Commission of 1837. Many other Committees and Commissions have sat since then, and I am surprised that neither the noble Lord nor the right hon. Gentleman have referred more to them. Before the Metropolitan Board was constituted a Commission sat which was composed of men of great eminence—Sir John Patten, Mr. Labouchere (afterwards Lord Taunton), Mr. Dudley Baxter, and Sir George Cornwall Lewis. They reported that a change of this magnitude would not only alter the whole character of the City Corporation, but defeat the main purpose of municipal institutions. London was, in fact, a province covered with houses, the persons living at its opposite extremities had few interests in common, and minute local knowledge and community of interests would be wanting if the whole of London was placed under a municipal government. This, added the Commissioners, led them to abstain from recommending that the whole of London should be placed under one municipal body without having regard to other considerations, and if any attempts were made to give such an organization at the expense of the City the utility of the present Corporation would be destroyed. This question was considered again in 1861 and 1867, but without practical result. I do not say that the House is to be bound by the Resolutions or Reports of Committees or Commissions; but I do say that it behoves the House earnestly to consider what has been put forward by these bodies, which have carefully and solemnly weighed the matter. Very important evidence was recently given against the plan proposed by the noble Lord. It requires something more than a discussion of three or four hours before we can assent to a measure which would revolutionize the condition of a population approaching 4,000,000—a population larger than that of Scotland and growing near to that of Ireland. The great point to be considered is this—How can you induce the best men in a place to take part in the government of the municipality? I do not think you now get the best men in your Vestries. These are questions well worth discussing. The House ought to consider what improvements can be made in the existing system, and it should not come hastily to a conclusion on a question like that before us to-night, but pause with grave consideration before assenting to any such changes as are here suggested.

MR. CHARLEY said, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had very skilfully divided his subject into two parts. That a reform in the government of the Metropolis was needed, few, he thought, would deny. The Metropolis was vestry-ridden. The City, however, was not. It had municipal institutions: he wished to see these municipal institutions extended to the Metropolis, but not in the way which the noble Lord proposed in his second Resolution. He wished to see a distinct municipality established for each of the Parliamentary cities and boroughs of the Metropolis. Hitherto, when Parliamentary and municipal government had existed side by side, they had been as nearly as possible co-extensive, and the boundaries conterminous. But the noble Lord proposed to group, for municipal purposes, towns which were separated for Parliamentary purposes. What constituted the peculiar advantage of preserving our present borough system? Why, that it perpetuated the esprit de corps of the inhabitants of the particular locality. They were united in sympathy, and acted as one individual for their common interests. The vestries of the Metropolis very faintly reflected this esprit de corps in the localities which they represented. But destroy the vestries, and create instead one vast municipality for the Metropolis, and you destroyed this esprit de corps altogether. In his belief, it was their duty, in the best interests of the country, to deepen that feeling—they should try to infuse into each Metropolitan constituency a sense of its individuality, of its interests quâ constituency, municipally as well as Parliamentarily. That could only be done by calling into existence as many municipalities as there were Parliamentary constituencies in the Metropolis. Let them substitute for each vestry a town council. They would thus extend the benefits of municipal self-government throughout the Metropolis, without in the slightest degree interfering with the time-honoured constitution of the Corporation of the City of London.

LORD ELCHO expressed himself satisfied with the admissions made by the Home Secretary and would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.

RESOLUTIONS. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate thereupon [30th May].

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, it was of great importance that the Question should be decided whether this Order was to be regarded as permanent during the present Parliament, or as existing only during the Session in which it was passed. He thought it certainly ought to be decided at an early day, and ought not to be adjourned to a later day than to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be further adjourned till Tuesday next."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the House was kept up to a very late hour this morning discussing his Motion, and he therefore begged to move that this House do now adjourn.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

Question put, and agreed to.

NAVY ESTIMATES—REPAIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, before the Navy Estimates are taken, the estimated cost (including per-centages for Establishment and Dockyard charges, of repairing the "Lord Warden," the "Royal Alfred," the "Lord Clyde," the "Urgent," and the "Liffey," stating also for what purposes such vessels are to be used?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had attended the House to answer the hon. Member's Question, but he wished to observe that it was not usual to put Questions to Ministers on Wednesdays, as it was a great interruption to the public service that they should be required to attend the House at 12 o'clock. He would at once state that the Lord Warden, would be finished next month, and that the estimated costs were £40,000 odd for repairs. The Royal Alfred would, it was estimated, cost £81,000 odd; but it was not finally decided whether certain other repairs would be taken in hand or not. The Lord Clyde would, it was estimated, cost £26,000 odd; the Urgent £17,000 odd, and the Liffey £17,000 odd. The Lord Warden and the Royal Alfred would be repaired for regular sea service; the Lord Clyde would be fitted as a gunnery-ship, and the Urgent and the Liffey would be prepared as receiving and depot ships for Jamaica and Coquimbo to replace the ships worn out. These charges were exclusive of the established commission charges, which perhaps would amount to 30 per cent in addition.

MR. RYLANDS regretted that he had put the right hon. Gentleman to the inconvenience of coming down to the House at 12 o'clock by putting the Question on the Paper for that day. He had done so through inadvertence.

ARMY RESERVE FORCES—THE STAFFORD MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DYOTT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether two battalions of the 1st Regiment of Stafford Militia have been ordered under canvass without notice instead of into billets at Lichfield, as previously ordered, by reason of a Report made through the Local Government Board by the district medical officer, totally unsubstantiated, and notwithstanding proof having been afforded by the urban sanitary authority of Lichfield that the allegations contained in such Report of the medical officer were entirely without foundation?

[Mr. HARDY not being present in his place, no Answer was given to the Question.]

PERMISSIVE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR BILL.

(Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Thomas Bazley, Mr. Downing, Mr. Richard, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Dalway, Mr. William Johnstone.)

[BILL 19.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. He regretted very much the necessity of doing more than following the example set by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, who had moved the second reading of the Bill without remark. He was as anxious as the hon. Member himself could be that, so long as the necessity existed, there should be a full and complete discussion of the question at issue between them, which was raised by what was called the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill. But when he knew that his hon. Friend, after merely raising his hat to signify that he desired to move the second reading of the Bill, would have the advantage of waiting quietly, as he was fully entitled to do, until the speeches were delivered on the one side and the other, and then using (quite fairly) his right of reply, he certainly felt some difficulty in coping with the hon. Baronet on his own ground. Still he would try to do the best he could under the embarrassing circumstances under which he was placed. That difficulty, however—and he said it in no spirit of compliment to his hon. Friend, but in all sincerity, most earnestly and and from his heart—was considerably relieved by the fact that no man could have a more honest, more kindly-hearted an opponent than he now and always had in the hon. Member for Carlisle. This was not a discussion of a personal character, but one of principle—one in which his hon. Friend thought that he (Mr. Wheelhouse) was wrong, and one in which, if it was permitted him to say so, he was quite sure that the hon. Member for Carlisle was in error. In dealing with the second reading of this measure it was most desirable at the outset that he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. His reason for asking the House to adopt that course was that, so far as the Bill itself was concerned, he apprehended no person could take the measure into his hands and, having read its provisions carefully, could form any but one opinion and come to no other conclusion than this—that the proposed measure, if by any accident it were adopted by the Legislature, would cause not only a furor throughout the length and breadth of the land, but would be found so impracticable as to keep every part of Great Britain in one continual scene of turmoil and hot water. Dealing, then, with the principle of the Bill, if indeed it could be said to have any principle at all, which he very much doubted, what did he find? In spite of the Preamble, to which he might possibly refer by-and-by, the measure was fraught with coercion in its worst form, and could only lead to tyranny in its most objectionable character. What did the hon. Baronet propose to do by its provisions? Why, by a majority of two-thirds of the ratepayers, not of the inhabitants or of the residents of any district, but by a majority of two-thirds of the owners or occupying ratepayers, to provide that the rest of the inhabitants, whether owners, occupiers, residents, or simply casual visitors, as well as the ratepayers, should be precluded not merely from getting a glass of beer or spirits when they felt they required one, but also from taking any alcoholic or fermented liquor at any time or in any form. Nay, the hon. Baronet would go further than that. It was his aim and endeavour to shut up or sweep away every single brewer, every single distiller, and, in short, every place where articles of drink were manufactured or sold; so that if the Bill passed, no one should, by any chance, be able to obtain that which he considered one of the necessities of life. No one disliked intemperance more than he (Mr. Wheelhouse) did in all its phases and forms. He disliked intemperance not merely in drink, but intemperance in language, and indeed in every form and every shape; but however much they might dislike or be disgusted with intemperance, there was a great difference between intemperance and total abstinence, especially being made to abstain by compulsion. This Bill, however, it would be found, not merely asked people to be temperate; it did not really seek to make them so, but the Legislature was invited to pass a measure which would enforce compulsory abstinence altogether. Now, he desired to know whether a Bill which would enforce total abstinence by compulsion could be called a reasonable measure? It could not be, and he was satisfied that the issue of this debate would be, as on previous occasions, to reject the Bill altogether by an overwhelming majority. The division might be larger or smaller, for there were well-known circumstances going on elsewhere to-day which would probably affect the numbers, for instance, of this division; but whether there was any increase or diminution in the majority against the Bill, he protested most emphatically against its being regarded as any evidence of the feeling of the public with regard to the measure itself. Whether the numbers were larger or smaller, the course of the debate and the votes to-morrow morning would show that the repugnance of the House was the same, and that there was as strong a feeling and as great an objection to this measure as ever. In dealing with the question of the Permissive Prohibitory Bill he spoke with very considerable feelings of regret, seeing that he had to lament the death, within the last 48 hours, of one who was most active in his opposition to the measure—a gentleman of rare ability, whose clear-headedness and power with reference to this matter had been well known for years—a man through whose able advocacy much had been done to place the subject in its true light before the world at large. He need hardly say that he referred to Colonel Richards, the late lamented editor of The Morning Advertiser. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) wished as earnestly and as strongly as possible to point out that teetotalism, as it was called, or total abstinence, as he would prefer to call it, was not in any way connected with this Permissive Bill movement; for whilst teetotalism was a matter which anyone could practise in himself voluntarily, the Permissive Bill and everything connected with this movement was as widely removed from that which might be denominated teetotalism by moral suasion as it could be. He held in his hand a letter which showed how far the real principles of temperance, or, if they would, even those of teetotalism itself, were separate and distinct from all connection with the United Kingdom Alliance, the Permissive Bill, and the supporters of either. Here was an extract from that letter, addressed to a friend of his—

“I have been a teetotaller 39 years on the principle of moral suasion. If you have an opportunity will you be kind enough to state that the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle has nothing whatever to do with the Temperance Society? For one shilling a-year any person may be a member of the Alliance, and there is no restriction upon what he drinks, while he may all the time retain his membership. The temperance man upon the principle advocated is always consistent, while that cannot be said of the Alliance and its followers. Temperance societies of either the earlier or more modern form have nothing to do with the absurdities of the Permissive Bill.”

Now, he was old enough to remember a man who was happily still among them—a man than whom no one had done more for the cause of popular sobriety by establishing temperance societies, and who was loved and respected throughout the whole of the North of England—Joseph Livesey, the founder, he believed, of the first association for the promotion of temperance. To that philanthropist he felt thoroughly warranted in saying more was due in this matter than to any other man in England. Joseph Livesey did not support the principle of the Permissive Bill; on the contrary, he set his face most strongly and completely against this movement, and his views were most emphatically against the measure. He knew, as most of them did, that temperance carried on within reasonable limits was a great good, but he was anxious to be disconnected as far as possible from the promoters of the movement which culminated in this Bill. No doubt the hon. Baronet would tell them that the people of this country desired to see the Permissive Bill become law, but what evidence was there of this fact? At one time, Petitions had been presented in favour of the Bill, but these Petitions were the work of a careful organization. The agents of the Alliance sent them up in rolls and batches. He was glad, for the sake of the House and of all persons concerned, that the old fashion of petitioning, so far as regarded this Bill, had been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. The United Kingdom Alliance had a large fund for this purpose, but they might save their money or spend it more usefully than in getting up Petitions of this kind. If his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle allowed him very humbly to suggest, there might be idealized a plan by which a large portion of the Alliance funds so gathered together could be appropriated after the fashion of the noble charitable institutions connected with the licensed victuallers' trade and other societies—namely, in providing asylums for the aged and the poor, establishing schools for the children of distressed members, and founding orphanages. Thus good use would be made of the money which flowed so copiously into the coffers of the United Kingdom Alliance. The hon. Baronet no doubt would further tell them that the measure would make the people sober by taking away from them the means of temptation which were so rife on every side. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) wished most sincerely that that doctrine had been taught when the Wine Licensing Act was pressed forward—when the grocers' licences were granted—and especially when the legislature first broke through the rule of the old licensing system, and imported a new class of public-houses into the country. Let there be no mistake about the matter. While anxious not to say a word against any existing interest, it was most unjust, unfair, and unreasonable to charge the licensed victuallers of this country—as respectable and honest-minded a body of men as could be found in the community—with the sin of affording increased facilities for drinking, when everybody knew under what circumstances those facilities had been granted, and how those other houses had been opened. Let them hear no more, then, of these charges against the licensed victualler. Again, they were told that drunkenness was on the increase. He ventured to say without fear of contradiction that it had not increased in Great Britain, certainly not in England relatively to the enormous increase of the population; and he hoped and trusted that the time was coming when every man, whatever his station in life, from the veriest pauper to the Peer of the realm, would regard drunkenness as a disgrace, and would in his own proper person deal with it as a thing to be avoided by every respectable man. He believed that that result would be accomplished infinitely more by moral persuasion, by real teaching, of which there was now no lack of means, than by any measure of a compulsory character, whether secular or legislative. If they could not succeed by these means, depend upon it they never could hope to make men sober by Act of Parliament. He agreed with that high authority, who so well said that he would rather see men free even than made sober compulsorily. He by no means under-estimated sobriety; but, above all things, he valued as the highest possession of Englishmen that freedom from coercion and tyrannous legislation which was his absolute birthright, and which under all circumstances he should be prepared to defend. What was the object sought by the Bill? Was it freedom? Nothing of the kind. It provided that if two-thirds of the ratepayers, gathered together anyhow, in any hole-and-corner meeting—under the authority it might be of a teetotal mayor, or possibly a teetotal chairman of a vestry—should declare that the Permissive Bill should be brought into operation within that district, then it would become ipso facto the law of the land for the next three years. Why was he to be told when he was to take a glass of wine or beer? Who were those who were to interfere with his freedom of opinion with regard to what he should eat and drink? They might as well interfere with the kind of clothes he wore, or the language he used. No man had a right to make him a slave, coerce him in the opinion he held, or say this or that was wrong, and especially wrong for people in a lower class of life. Perhaps, according to the opinion of these gentlemen, it might not be so far wrong for him or those who brought forward this Bill. Perhaps it was right that he should go to the dining or smoking-room of his club, drink there in reason and moderation, play billiards as long as he liked; but, while that was right for a man of his class, they were told they should take care that a poor man should not go to his club (the public-house) and play billiards there any longer than they liked. When he heard things of that kind, and knew, moreover, that there were places in London, places of high repute, not a thousand miles from Pall Mall, where, when a proposition was made that their billiard-room should be closed on Sundays, the club ruled to the contrary, he thought it very hard that, if that could be done in Pall Mall at any one of the large houses on either side of the street, the corresponding houses for the poor should be hermetically sealed, by the very same class of people who were called upon to legislate for Chandos Street or Drury Lane. That which was reasonable and fair for him ought to be equally reasonable and fair for the poor, and if they were to begin at all let them begin where it was sometimes said that charity began—"at home." When he found the clubs for the rich were shut up on Sundays, or that they had nothing but water-bottles on their tables, then he should be inclined to say there was something more than mere profession in all these attempts to legislate for the poor. When he found that not far from the spot on which he was standing there was nothing stronger than lemonade and coffee to be had, he should begin to think that the Lower House of the Legislature might by accident have some idea that their talk was right and that their practice might be amended. During the last Easter Recess, which he spent in the North of England, he was enabled to go over some of the large towns, and during the Whitsuntide Recess he stayed in London, in order to make, so far as he could, an investigation of a concurrent character to that which he had been pursuing in the country. During the whole of the Easter festivities, which were not so fully attended as he should like them to have been, in consequence of the inclemency of the season, but still very largely attended by all classes, not only in the borough which he had the honour to represent, but throughout the length and breadth almost of the whole North of England from Kendal down to Derby—while about the streets and going into almost every place where it might be thought drunkenness would be found after those festivities and merrymakings, he was pleased beyond measure to be able to say that he did not think he saw three drunken men in the whole North of England, and he did not believe that the returns of the stipendiaries, the magistrates, and the police would tell them of a dozen cases of apprehension for drunkenness. But thinking it was only just and right that he should as far as possible test what London was like during the Whitsuntide festivities, when there was finer weather—and he only wished it had been finer still on the day when the hon. Baronet led so many of his followers into Hyde Park—looking at what he saw, he challenged the hon. Baronet to come into Court and say how many of his own followers, or those who differed from him, were brought up for drunkenness after these festivities. And then, forsooth, they were told that drunkenness was increasing—that people did not keep as sober as they ought to do. There would and must be in all communities persons who would exceed what was good for them, but they were comparatively few and far between; and as day by day time got older, if he might use the expression, these men were converted from the evil of their way. He did not hesitate to say that, as regarded London and the large towns, the allegation that drunkenness had increased had no foundation whatever in fact, if considered, as it ought fairly to be, in relation to the increase also of the population. Unless they could show him that a man by the moderate use of stimulants broke the law, social or Divine, he would never believe that that which had been created for the benefit and use of mankind could or ought necessarily to be stopped by the poor, the puny efforts of human legislation. No proposition could be more absurd than, because here and there some few men abused the good gifts of Almighty God, those gifts should be actually prohibited from general use. But there was another view of this question. Why was he to be subjected to that which was very like punishment, practically, because some men, or some few men, could not keep themselves as sober as it was desirable that they should do? They were told in a paper which he held in his hand that this Bill was to be passed—

“Because it supplied the means of enabling the people to indicate with legal effect to the licensing authority whether the traffic in their midst was desired by the inhabitants of a district, and was therefore quite compatible with any measures of licensing reform which might commend themselves to the judgment of hon. Members.”

In that were involved two of the greatest fallacies which could possibly be advanced. First of all, he denied that the Permissive Bill “supplied” in any way—

“The means of enabling the people to indicate with legal effect to the licensing authorities whether the traffic was desired by the inhabitants of a district.”

Not a bit of it. The ratepayers and owners were the persons who were to declare, if they could be got to declare—and a great many of them would not take the slightest trouble about making any such declaration or answering any such inquiry—upon a sort of paper “Yes” or “No” whether this Bill was to be enforced or not. As to occasional residents or anybody except the rated inhabitants or owners there was not a word in the Bill; and therefore to say it enabled the people—he liked that idea of “the people”—to indicate whether the traffic was desired or not was altogether fallacious. This Bill took care to exclude everybody except the ratepayers and owners of property in a district. If there was anybody who ought to be excluded from having a voice in this matter it was the owner of property, because he might have an interest wholly and entirely apart from that of the general inhabitancy and the general residency of the district. He had heard of districts where one gentleman, possessing the whole of the property, had chosen to exclude public-houses from the place; but did any human being imagine that anybody living in that reserved area could not get and did not get drink if he wanted it? Why, of course he did. Just round the edge of any one of those reserved districts there were public-houses, and within the district itself they would find grocers’ shops and secret illicit dealing here, there, and everywhere. Did not they know perfectly well that in the sister country there were places where whiskey was said to be made up in the hills merely to defraud the revenue? And was it to be said that in England, when men wanted to satisfy their appetite, they would find any difficulty in doing it? Hon. Members knew better than that. In any reserved district the owner of the property might even find it desirable not to get rid of actual drinking if he could, because it would be interfering with the freedom of the people. Then they were told that—

“Therefore it was compatible with any measures of licensing reform which might commend themselves to the judgment of hon. Members.”

He apprehended that, so far as that House was concerned, hon. Members by a majority could pass anything they thought good, whether it was really wise or unwise. He was happy to think that in this matter there was not much chance of the Bill being passed; but when the statement went beyond that, and told them that they might pass a measure like this so as to be compatible with the licensing laws of this country, he said that was as broad a fallacy as could possibly be stated. Nobody knew better than the hon. Member for Carlisle that, if by accident a reserve district was made, either through the instrumentality of the owner or of the ratepayers, so far from that being compatible with any measure of licensing reform it would run in the very teeth of such reform and, he ventured to think, would put it back for at least 50 years. And for this reason. Outside that district there would be people who would say, “This must not be;” and there would be from end to end of that district and neighbourhood continual dissatisfaction, and, he ventured to think, everlasting turmoil and annoyance. Then the paper went on to say—

“Because in no other way could Parliament remove the injustice of perpetuating the liquor traffic in any district against the will of the community, for whose convenience licences were granted, and for no other alleged reason.”

Again, in reference to that assertion, Parliament must be very much weaker than he took it to be—it must be almost effete—if this measure was the only way in which it could—

"Remove the injustice of perpetuating the liquor traffic in any district against the will of the community."

He denied there was anything like reasoning in an allegation so broad as that. But the proposal went on to say—

"Because a majority necessary to its operation could prevent its adoption, except in localities or districts where the traffic was regarded as being accompanied by advantageous results."

That statement was utterly baseless, except that a certain number of gentlemen, headed by the hon. Member for Carlisle and some few others, held it to be sufficient to convince the wide world that they were right and the rest wrong. So long as majorities ruled, whether they were majorities of two-thirds, or majorities pure and simple, the people of England would never follow the lead or believe in the allegation of those who had chosen to make that statement. Then the next assertion was—

"Because it applied to a trade which was admittedly within the province of the law, the constitutional decision by a majority; so that to oppose it was virtually to assert that the minority should rule the majority upon a question which was confessedly one for the wants and wishes of the inhabitants."

He ventured to think if, upon the principle of a very famous head-constable of whom we read in Shakespeare, there had been any requirement as to what should be written, it was pretty strongly put forth in that statement. "Because it applied to a trade which was admittedly within the province of the law," "the question was admittedly one for the wants and wishes of the inhabitants." Not at all. By this Bill the inhabitants as such had nothing to do with it, unless they happened to be owners or ratepayers. Who was to define the district? Was the ratepayer on this side of the border to be placed in one position and the ratepayer on the other side in another? And by whom? Not by the majority of those within the district sought to be legislated for, but by certain irresponsible persons in the general community, who never consulted the wishes or feelings of the great mass of the people in any way, and who in nine cases out of ten, in a question such as this, had interests diametrically opposed to those of the great body of the people. When they came to consider the provisions of this Bill they found that at the end of every three years, if they got the Bill, and at the end of every one single year if they did not get it, there might be elections following elections, and feelings of the strongest possible antagonism would be aroused on all hands. Why, the country would be kept in a constant state of turmoil if the advocates of the measure did not get their way. We had now elections for municipalities, for Poor Law Guardians, for School Boards, for Local Government Boards, for Vestries, and for Vestry and Local Board wards; and still these gentlemen wanted to give us not only another election, but one which would be fraught with the greatest possible principles of antagonism, according as they were laid down by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle himself. [Sir WILFRID LAWSON: No elections.] No elections? Perhaps not, in name; but did his hon. Friend mean to tell him that, so far as the provisions of this Bill were concerned, although there might not be elections, with banners, and drums, trumpets, fifes, and hughes, such as his hon. Friend headed the other day towards Hyde Park, there would not be elections which, without any such paraphernalia, would still produce feelings of dislike and antagonism throughout the whole of a district? The hon. Member had only to go back to the days of the hustings in any one of the large towns in the North of England, leaving that free Alsatia of his at home, to realize the kind of elections which would take place if the Bill were brought into operation. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) wanted to avoid everything of that kind. If the Bill did not mean election—if the filling up of the voting papers "Yes" or "No," declaring that the operation of the Bill should or should not be brought into play, was not an election, he really did not know what an election meant. He did not mean to say that an election under the provisions of the Bill might not be more quietly done than under the old plan of elections, with blue or yellow colours, and drums, fifes, and what not. But the election, being so conducted, would only tend to raise the antagonism of feeling greater and more intense in a matter of this kind. Again, referring to the paper from which he had quoted, it was stated that this Bill ought to pass—

Mr. Wheelhouse

"Because it was not justly chargeable with class partiality, for those who would be more immediately affected by its operation were the persons who would be most benefited directly or indirectly by the effect of public order and domestic sobriety."

Now, he would rather leave the question of domestic sobriety to our own households. He did not need anyone to deal with his domestic arrangements. He had never asked them to interfere with his legitimate wish as to a glass of wine or beer, and did not know what right they had to do so, any more than they had to interfere with his stables or any other matters so far as his personnel was involved. They might deal with the question of "public order" if they would, but nobody had a right to deal with his "domestic sobriety," as they called it, or domestic anything else, unless he broke the law. Then they were told that this Bill was not chargeable with class partiality. Why, what in the world was it but class partiality from beginning to end? It would allow him and his hon. Friend to go where they knew they could get what they wanted, but would deny the same right to others who were not so well off. This Bill was the greatest attempt at class legislation that was ever idealized by mortal man. He was told that the people who would be more immediately affected by its operations were those who would be most benefited directly and indirectly by its effect, but he objected most strongly to anybody telling him he must be a good boy. He had come to a time of life when he thought he knew what was good for himself, and most other people who had come to years of discretion were also able to judge for themselves. The gentlemen who had put these statements forward had their own dining-rooms and drawing-rooms and cellars, and were generally in a better class of life than the workers, toilers, or, to use a Yorkshire word, the "moilers" in our workshops and manufactories. When these gentlemen, with all their comforts surrounding them at home, with everything they wanted, told them that somebody else would be benefited to a very large extent by adopting what they wished to enforce upon them, he should like to know whether they had mixed amongst the class of people they would teach, whether they had been by their bedsides, in their cottages, and whether they had not applied to them the circumstances of their own comfortable hearths and surroundings. It was the kind of personages who did not understand the wants and requirements of the working classes who got up this agitation. The general body of the people of this country thoroughly and most emphatically repudiated it. Before they were told what was beneficial for any class of society, let those who thought they knew go where he could take them. Let them go down to Limehouse, to places in the neighbourhood of that House, to the North of England, to the great manufacturing districts of the Midlands, and see what the workers really were—see how they lived, know their work, study their requirements; and then perhaps such an allegation as that they would be directly benefited by the operation of the Bill would not be repeated. If people wanted to be benefited by the operation of temperance and sobriety there was nothing to prevent them. They could abstain from going into public-houses. Nobody compelled them to go there. But he did object to persons in an elevated position in life looking down upon a class so far below them, and whose wants they did not understand, and saying, "We are doing this for your benefit, good people;" and, with a sort of "Bless you, my children," patting them on the back as if they were very babies. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. MORLEY: I have never had an opportunity of speaking on this Bill before, and as I intend to vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, I should like to say a few words of explanation. I should be very glad if anything could be done to divest this subject of the bitterness which attaches to it. A great deal of the antagonism, I believe, arises from an idea which is abroad that there is a large body of determined persons, the advocates of the present Bill, who have made up their minds to interfere with a trade in which large sums of money have been invested. While I believe in the principle of leaving it to the inhabitants of a district to decide as to the number of public-houses in that district, I would be no party to any proceeding which would abolish the trade without some fair system of compensation. I say this at the outset, because the law having recognized this property, just as 40 years ago it recognized a property in slaves, and the nation refused then to do away with the slave system without making compensation to the owners of slaves, so I say the public-house keepers having conducted their houses in a proper manner, and having received licences which, though only given for a year, are supposed to be continuous, I would be no party to destroying or extinguishing the public-houses without some reasonable compensation. With regard to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), if I understand him correctly, he demurs to our interfering with men at all until they become criminal. I think that was clearly the line he took with reference to the habit of drinking producing crime. I believe it to be a legitimate object for this House, however—if there is any system which is full of danger in connection with the habits and proceedings of the people, I hold it to be a legitimate thing for the House of Commons to interfere and say—"We must restrict liberty in certain proceedings because there is possible danger for the future in connection with such habits." Whether we like it or not, we have handed over the government of this country to the working classes of the country. No doubt the changes that have been made in the electoral system have given to numbers the power of deciding what shall be done. I am unwilling that great national subjects shall be discussed and decided upon over beer in public-houses to the extent to which that goes on at present. I do not believe in interfering with the liberty of the people. I believe in permitting everything legitimate in the way of personal liberty as well as in the amusements of the people. I quite agree with that part of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Leeds—and that is about the only part in which I do agree with him—where he said that we need to interest ourselves more in the amusements of those who are now attracted to the public-houses. We do need to do something that shall act as a legitimate competition with the public-house. I have had a great deal to do with the working classes, and I have mixed with them and been very deeply interested in them, and I know that there is a growing feeling on their part that legislation on this subject is needed. That is emphatically so in Ireland, and in many places in England also, where you will find great public meetings—the admission being without ticket—filled by working men, who, with almost entire unanimity, are calling—not exactly, it may be, for this Bill, which needs seriously looking at in some of its provisions—but for distinct legislation in the direction of the curtailment of the facilities for drinking. I confess that I look with terror at the future of England, unless something is done. I am thankful that this cannot be looked upon as a Party question, for although, no doubt, a large proportion of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House support the present system, there are some honourable exceptions who believe that some remedy for the present state of things is needed. I will not trouble the House with statistics, but there is one fact which I read yesterday in an authoritative document which I must mention, and that is, that in the year—I think it was 1869, but the precise date does not much matter—the amount consumed in drink in this country was £100,000,000, and that last year it had risen to £150,000,000. If that goes on we must find some remedy, or else there is exceedingly great danger to the order and well-being of society in the future. As a citizen of London I speak the sentiments of thousands of earnest men in London—we complain bitterly of the additional half-hour's drinking which was forced on the people by the present Government, for the convenience of theatre-goers. I am sure that that half-hour is the worst half-hour of the whole day, and I think a great wrong was done to London, with its 4,000,000 of people, when that was done by the Government. I shall vote for this Bill because I wish to see progress in this direction. I do not believe the Bill is perfect, but I vote for it because I am satisfied that something is wanted. I have to do with many movements in London to save juveniles from crime and lessen misery and destitution, and I know that nine-tenths of those evils are traceable to this curse of drink. Therefore it is that I support this Bill. One of the most important things we could do would be, to secure a reduction in the number of houses, for there is hardly a place in which there are not at least twice as many public-houses as the people need. The inducements to build such houses are great, and they are built without any consideration as to the necessities of the people. Another fact is incontrovertible. In Liverpool the year before last, there were 23,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and only three publicans were brought up in consequence of that state of things. That shows a laxity on the part of the magistrates which should be looked to by the Home Secretary, with the view of seeing whether the existing law is stringent enough. Public opinion is strong on this subject. There is a deep conviction on the part of the people that something is needed. While I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) with all my heart for his earnestness in this matter, I yet differ from him as to the practicability of some of his proposals. At the same time, I give my hearty support to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. A. MILLS protested against the practice of hon. Gentlemen charging those who sat on the Ministerial side as if they were influenced only by consideration for the interests of the publicans. He should be sorry if by any vote he might feel it his duty to give he did injury to any tradesman; but his vote would not be influenced by any considerations of that kind—he opposed the Bill solely on public grounds, and because he believed that if carried it would not effect the object the hon. Baronet, its proposer, had at heart. It was a coercive measure, and wherever coercive measures of that kind had been tried they had failed. Stripped of all verbiage the Bill proposed to disestablish public-houses and thereby to disestablish drunkenness. He had noticed that the supporters of the Bill did not like some allusions he had made on a former occasion to the United States, and he would therefore only say that, having had real opportunities of observation, the Maine Law was utterly fruitless as a means of checking drunkenness. He would, however, come nearer home, and speak of the constituency which he had the honour to represent—that of Exeter. Owing to recent restrictions, there had been established six or seven proprietary clubs—working men's clubs—which were in reality unlicensed public-houses. He held in his hand the rules of some of them, and he knew what they were. In one case, where a man had very properly been deprived of his licence by the justices, he converted his house into a proprietary club; he kept it open at all hours and on all days; he was not subject to the licensing laws or the supervision of the police; he was no longer liable to have soldiers billeted upon him, and, although he sold liquors without restriction, not only to gentlemen but also to lady members, the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle would not touch him. The Bill would, in fact, disestablish licensed public-houses, and establish unlicensed public-houses under the name of working men's clubs. The Bill might be effectual to close the public-house; it would fail of its object if it left the club-house open—instead of diminishing the temptation to drunkenness the Bill would increase both the temptation and the opportunity. They were told that there was a strong feeling out-of-doors with reference to this Bill. No doubt there was a general desire to check intemperance; but the speech of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) was more in favour of the Bill of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) than that now before the House. But the great thing to consider with regard to outdoor feeling was whether it was spontaneous or not. He had within the last few days received a great number of letters from his constituents—and no doubt other hon. Members had been favoured in like manner—pressing him to support the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle. He regretted to say that many of these letters were not post-paid, and it would be well if from their large funds the Alliance would send out with their missives a few postage stamps. A circular had fallen into his hands which was important as affecting the spontaneity of this ebullition of feeling. It was to the following effect:—

“United Kingdom Alliance.—The Committee beg to inform you that the second reading of the Permissive Bill is fixed for Wednesday, June 14, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson will be glad if the electors, non-electors, and even ladies, would write to your City Members a few simple, earnest words from their hearts on this important question, asking them to vote for the measure. The names and addresses of your Members are appended hereto."

He did not find fault with the action of the hon. Member for Carlisle, but it was now clear that what appeared to be a spontaneous ebullition on the part of the citizens was in fact the simple and heartfelt suggestion of his hon. Friend. He did not wish to treat this question with levity—it was a question of the highest importance; but he could not help thinking that the hon. Baronet and his friends were going beyond the legitimate province of the law. He did not seem to be aware that this kind of penal legislation was very likely to provoke a reactionary feeling against the cause of temperance. His belief was that temperance would be more advanced by providing suitable dwellings, wholesome water, and pure air for the people, than by enacting penal laws, which were sure to provoke a just reaction. It was a transgression of the limits of legislation to interfere with the morals of the people in this manner. The province of legislation was simply to maintain law and order. If a reduction in the number of public-houses was essential let it be effected in some other way. Do not grant new licences where they were not required. If they closed the houses in one district what was to prevent the inhabitants from sliding into another, and providing themselves with what they required? In the United States this was the effect of the Maine Liquor Law. The best remedy for the evil, which all right-minded men deplored, was so to elevate the character of the people as to make them ashamed of drunkenness, and to expel this vice from the lower ranks of the community by the ennobling influence of Christian education.

DR. KENEALY concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) that the opposition to the Bill was not actuated by so vile a motive as the publican interest. From his observation of the Government Party since he had the honour of a seat in Parliament, he was convinced that they were as sincerely anxious for the welfare of the humbler class of the community as any Party could be. He had listened anxiously to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Leeds

(Mr. Wheelhouse), because, although he believed in the propriety of passing this Bill into law, still, he was eager to hear what the champions of the Intoxicating Power of the country would be able to say in opposition to the measure. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds had astonished him by declaring that the Bill was impracticable; but although he had listened very attentively to the hon. and learned Member's speech, in order that he might learn in what particular respect it was impracticable, he had failed to find any proof given. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds had also declared that he could see no principle in the Bill; but surely it must be apparent that the great principle involved in it was the principle of Temperance, and that it laboured to carry out on an extended scale a system of Temperance throughout the country which would be attended with the greatest possible blessing to the community. The hon. and learned Member had harped much upon coercion; but there was no coercion at all in an improper sense contemplated by the Bill. Every community which was subject to law consented to divest itself of some of its liberties, and coercion, to some extent, existed everywhere. We had laws for compulsory education—that was coercion. We had laws against gambling—that was coercion. The hon. and learned Member plaintively but energetically asked whether he was to be made a slave? A gambler might ask the same thing; but no one would listen to his wailings. The parent of a child might say—"Why am I to be compelled to send my child to school?" but his plea would not be entertained. If a drunkard or an ardent supporter of intemperance came forward and asked—"Shall I not be allowed to get as drunk as I please, and introduce misery into my family by my example—shall I not be allowed to bring up my children in pauperism and wretchedness?" the Law said—"No, it cannot be allowed." Such freedom as was asked for by the hon. and learned Member, was not freedom, but licence—nay, it was licentiousness. And it was against such abuse of liberty that all laws were aimed. The hon. and learned Member had found fault with the fact that there were certain members of the Alliance who did not believe in the principles of the Society, or, rather, who did not carry them out in practice. But that would be found to be the case in all great public movements. Hypocrites joined them for their own purposes, and could not well be excluded; but in what way could that weaken the force, or render us careless, of the convictions of the thousands of honest, virtuous, and earnest people whose hearts were in the cause? Then, the hon. and learned Member asked, was the Bill wanted by the people? For an answer to that question he need only ask any intelligent operative, or any man who really had at heart the welfare of his country, and knew its requirements. It was true that there had not been many Petitions in favour of the Bill, but neither had there been any against it. The people did not care to petition, seeing how Petitions were treated; but their feeling in favour of the Bill could not be denied. And that feeling was growing more powerful every day. He had last night attended a meeting at Exeter Hall in support of the measure, which was crowded with well-dressed, intelligent working men and women, persons who were an honour to the country that owned them—such a meeting as the intoxicating interest of this country could never assemble. As to the statement that drunkenness was not increasing, the statistics which had been given by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) showed that a considerable increase had been going on, if the consumption of spirits had increased 50 per cent in 10 years. What had the hon. Member for Bristol stated?—no doubt after full inquiry—why, that whereas some six or eight years ago the money expended on drink in this country amounted to £100,000,000 a-year, it reached last year the astounding figure of £150,000,000. Only think of that. £150,000,000 squandered, not in use, but abuse; and let us realize to ourselves what blessings those millions, if spent at home, would spread, instead of being wasted at the public-house. Here was the source of vast misery—the source of crime; and in view of that fact he ventured to predict that the overwhelming opinion of the country would declare in its favour, and it would be impossible to oppose that feeling. The passing of this Bill was simply, therefore, a question of time; and it must eventually appear upon the Statute Book of the Empire. He agreed fully in another respect with the hon. Member for Bristol, that compensation ought to be, and must be, given to those whose property was diminished in value, or was wholly taken away from them, by the operation of the measure if it became law. He was no advocate for confiscation, but the reverse; nor did he believe that the Alliance wished it. And he would support the hon. Member, or any other, who proposed compensation for loss sustained. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds had asked—How could the opinions of the community on the subject of public-houses be ascertained fairly? and he suggested what he called “hole-and-corner meetings” as being those in which the vote would be taken. He referred the hon. and learned Member to the vast borough of Leeds, which he represented, and asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether those words could refer to the ratepayers of such a town, two-thirds of whom would have to declare by their votes whether they were satisfied or not with the present unlimited supply of the means of drink? The hon. and learned Member had likewise complained that the ratepayers and owners of property were those in whom the power of voting proposed by the Bill would vest. In whom else ought it to vest? The ratepayers were those who, in their own persons and purses, and in the spectacles which they witnessed around them day by day, felt most bitterly the increase of taxation, which was the result of the increasing drunkenness and consequent crime of the community. He had conjured up a spectre of flags, and banners, and hustings, and all the paraphernalia of a popular election, entirely forgetting that the Bill provided for taking the votes of the ratepayers by the simple method of signing “Yes” or “No” to a printed circular. The hon. and learned Member had gone even to the length of saying that it would set every third man against his neighbour. He believed in no such result. The good sense of the English people would always lead the minority to assent to the will of the majority; the more especially as they would find out before long that the views of that majority tended only to the public welfare. The hon. and learned Member told them that the House was acting inconsistently because it had, to a certain extent, been responsible for the drunkenness of the country by the measures which it had passed. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member that the Acts which were passed by the Liberals, including the privilege accorded to grocers to diffuse the blessings of intoxication among their customers, had that tendency, but that was no argument against the Bill or against making some attempt to improve the existing state of affairs. He, although he sat upon the Opposition side, did not hold himself in any way responsible for, or bound by the crimes of the Whigs when they were in office; and he fully concurred in the observations of the hon. and learned Member, when he denounced Lord Brougham's Beer Act as the fertile source of crime. Then they were told that drunkenness was not on the increase; but that it was increasing was proved by the statistics which had from time to time been published. He believed that when the case came to be properly stated and properly understood, hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were quite as patriotic as any others, would be found supporting the efforts of the hon. Member for Carlisle; and, though he had no hope that this Bill would pass this year, he was satisfied that eventually it would do so, by an overwhelming majority. It was all very well to say they could not make men sober by Act of Parliament. Neither could they make men virtuous by Act of Parliament; but they passed laws to punish crime, and to make people as virtuous as they could; and he did not see why something should not be done to limit drunkenness. The way to do that was not to have public-houses as numerous as the gas lamps in the streets, or the beer barrel brought, as it were, to every man's door. If we could not make men sober, we ought not, at all events, to allure them into drink, as was effected by the present system. He felt persuaded that if the number of temptations to drunkenness were diminished, the amount of drunkenness would sensibly decrease. The hon. and learned Member had said—"Why do not the men abstain? Why do they want a law?" If all men were above weakness and human frailty, and never yielded to temptation, and were, in a word, infallible and perfect, that argument might apply; but in the present condition of humanity, weakness overcame the best resolutions, and men fell. As to the observations of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) that if this Bill passed the public-house interest would, as it had in the city which he represented, defy the law by establishing "proprietary clubs," he had no fears upon that head. He did not think Parliament ought to be influenced by the remote contingency of such clubs being established generally throughout the country for the purpose of setting the law at naught; but if the evil did arise to any extent after the passing of the Bill, Parliament would be willing and strong enough to deal with it. For these reasons he should support this measure.

EARL PERCY said, he regretted that he felt compelled to vote against the Bill. He entirely agreed with much that had fallen from the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), and he believed that much required to be done; nor was he without hope—although he was not certain on the point—that something might be done in the required direction by legislation. But he did not see how this could be a reason for voting for a Bill, which, in principle, was he believed unsound and mischievous, while in its result it would probably not attain the end it had in view. At the same time, he confessed he had great sympathy with the supporters of the measure, and he trusted that those who spoke on either side of the House against the Bill would express the same sentiment, for he was sure that there was much to be said for it. The evil it sought to remove was no slight one, and he did not see that much was to be gained by those who attempted to prove that it was not an increasing evil. Whether the evil was an increasing or a diminishing one, and even if it were only slowly diminishing, the fact remained that it was a fruitful source of crime, misery, poverty, and immorality; and it did not become them to take shelter under the fact that they hoped some modification had taken place, or was about to take place, in some of its worst features:—they ought rather to attempt to discover whether they could not deal with it in an adequate manner. Neither did he agree with those who considered that the agitation on this question was not so great as it was supposed to be. He was quite sure, from thought that they could not do all that was wanted by legislation. There was a great deal that must always be left undone by legislation in this matter. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), when he said that there were other steps to be taken before they could make this country sober; but at the same time he thought there was something which could be done by the Legislature; and it was because he was convinced that that they had not acted wisely on the question of drunkenness that he was prepared to give his vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle; though, with other hon. Members, he thought that the measure as it now stood, if not entirely impracticable, was one which would effect but in a small degree the object which the hon. Baronet had at heart. But it was the only measure before the House at the present time which went in the direction in which they wished to go. He did not agree with hon. Gentlemen who said the principle of the Bill was temperance; in his opinion the principle was local self-government. It was that a neighbourhood had a right to say whether they thought a particular trade was a nuisance or otherwise; and if they thought it was so, power was given them by law to remove it. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) had told them that he was opposed to drunkenness; but that he was not to be coerced, that he was not to be enslaved, that he was not to have his freedom interfered with by the advocates of this measure. Well, there was not a single word in the Bill to interfere with that opinion. What the Bill said was, that if a majority of the inhabitants of a neighbourhood found that the presence of public-houses in that neighbourhood was to them ruinous, or injurious, or offensive, they should have the right to say those houses should be diminished, or done away with. He thought the Bill failed in giving to the neighbourhood the power to say only that they would have no public-houses at all. It would work in very few districts, perhaps, but it would be of great advantage there: in most districts it would be a dead letter. The Bill, however, would establish the principle that a majority of those who had to pay the taxes—and those were the people whom they had made the power in this country, for it was they who elected the Members of the House of Commons—should say whether something should be done or should not be done, to get rid of what to them was a terrible evil. The noble Lord (Earl Percy) had spoken of a “tyranny;” but there appeared to him (Mr. Noel) a greater tyranny under the existing system of licensing than any spoken of by the noble Lord. The noble Lord mentioned a village in which it was proposed to the publicans to take out only a “six days licence,” and close their houses on the seventh, and the noble Lord said they all agreed, with the exception of “three,” who refused, and the obstinate selfishness of those three compelled the others to keep open. He should like to describe to the House a case which had come under his own knowledge, so that it might know under what tyranny some of the inhabitants of districts existed. The publican who lived in the village he was acquainted with—and there was only one at the time he was speaking of—was an honest, upright man, and the people were thoroughly content with the way in which the place was going on—might be looked upon as a little Arcadia. There was no drunkenness there, or very little. Well, a brewer of the neighbourhood looked down on them and thought they were far too happy, and he built a house fit in every way to have a licence. There was a population of 1,200 in the village, and as no magistrate would say that a second public-house in such a neighbourhood was out of place, the brewer got his licence, and the miseries of the villagers commenced. If the working man chose to have his beer he (Mr. Noel) would be the last to say that he should not, but he must complain of the tyranny to which they were subjected by being told that in his own neighbourhood he was to have no voice in deciding whether the second public-house should be set up or not. What happened in the village was this—As they were not a beer-drinking community, means must be provided for making them drink beer; and the proprietor of the new public-house instituted all sorts of things to attract the people on holidays and on Saturdays, and during those hours on Sundays that the house remained open. The result was that the good old village publican was induced by the necessity of his trade—he would not be hard upon honest legislation of the late Government—passed, as he frankly confessed, in a right direction—while it sought to remove those provisions which were unnecessarily harassing. At the same time, it was not satisfactory, because it did not really remedy to any appreciable extent the evils of the present system. It was very common in that House to speak disparagingly of the publicans, and to talk of them as looking after their own interest. This was not fair. He knew a small village—which he would not name—which had at least the average number of public-houses, and the clergy of all denominations agreed to urge upon the publicans to take out six-day licences instead of seven-day licences. The result was that all the publicans agreed to do so except three, who stood out. The consequence was that the rest of the body said it was impossible for them to take out six-day licences if the three did not, because otherwise the custom they then had would go to the men who kept open on the Sunday. This fact showed, however, what the publicans were willing to do if it were possible; for it was not right to expect, considering what human nature was, that they would suffer in their trade solely in the interests of the partial sobriety of the place they lived in. What appeared to him to be the great faults of the measures that had been proposed with regard to intoxication were these. First, they all required compulsion for the attainment of their end. Now drinking, unlike bribery or swearing, or many other things, was not in itself wrong; it was the abuse of the practice that made it an evil—and they had no right to prevent a person doing that which was harmless. If they got the consent of the people to any measure restricting the free exercise of their just and legitimate rights, they would sooner or later, he believed, perceive worse consequences than those they wished to remove. The other great fault was that too much was expected from the passing of any measure. It was perfectly futile to expect that they could reform the pronounced drunkard, or that they could restrain all of those who had already begun their downward course from completing their dreadful progress. What they must seek to do was to take away the temptation from the rising generation. He quite agreed with this proposition; but he asked how were they to do this? It was not to be done except by great sacrifice on the part of the public, and this sacrifice would only be made if the public had really the interests of society at heart. It was easy to pass a prohibitive Bill, to prevent their neighbours from obtaining liquors which they had a perfect right to get if they chose to do so:—it was easy to pass a Bill to close public-houses on Sunday, and say “the poor man shall not have a glass of beer on a Sunday;”—but what they ought to attempt to do was to find a system which should no longer allow it to be to the interest of the publican to sell the liquor he had in his possession. He believed this to be the key of the whole question. He was not about to shadow forth a Bill on the subject. He knew who it was who were said to “rush in where angels fear to tread,” and he was not so foolish as to believe that a question which had not been solved by some of the wisest heads in the country would be settled by any proposal he could make; but his belief was that if this question was to be solved at all it was to be by a provision taking from the publican the interest he had in selling the liquor he possessed. This was the principle adopted in a foreign country with much success. How far it would succeed here he knew not, but it could only be adopted at a great increase of existing burdens. He would conclude by assuring the House that he did not oppose the Bill because he was not alive to the evil it proposed to redress, but because he did not believe that the principle on which it was founded was the right one on which to proceed.

MR. ERNEST NOEL, in supporting the Motion for the second reading, said, they had been told by the noble Lord who had just sat down (Earl Percy) that they had taught the people of this country to believe that almost everything could be done by legislation, and that in that they had made a mistake, and so far he agreed with the noble Lord. And the noble Lord went on to say—and in that also he agreed with him—that as they had taught the people that they could do in this House very much for their benefit, when they came face to face with a great evil like that they were now discussing, they were bound to prove either that they were powerless to act in the way of its removal, or that they had done all they could. He, for one, thought that they could not do all that was wanted by legislation. There was a great deal that must always be left undone by legislation in this matter. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), when he said that there were other steps to be taken before they could make this country sober; but at the same time he thought there was something which could be done by the Legislature; and it was because he was convinced that that they had not acted wisely on the question of drunkenness that he was prepared to give his vote for the Bill of the hon. The result was that the good old village publican was induced by the necessity of his trade—he would not be hard upon him—to take some steps to meet his rival; and what was the result? Why, that they had dancing-rooms opened, and many other evils were introduced into their quiet village. Drunkenness then increased until it became common with them. He looked upon it as a great tyranny for him to be called upon to pay towards the support of all the pauper families created by the public-houses. Let them do away with the Poor Law, and say that drunkards' families should not be supported by ratepayers, and he would admit that at least that part of the tyranny of which he now complained would be done away with. Talk about the shutting up of public-houses being an interference with personal liberty! The Bill would merely tend to reduce the number of places where an article accursed in its consequences was consumed, to the great injury of the consumer and the community. He could not understand how it was that the hon. and learned Member for Leeds said he had visited the large towns of the North during the Whitsuntide holidays, and though he had looked for drunkards had found none. He had heard of people seeing only what they desired to see; and the hon. and learned Gentleman must have had eyes of this nature, or looked at things through very peculiar spectacles, which enabled him to see what he liked and not see what he did not like. The hon. and learned Member told them that they should go into the houses of the labouring classes and make themselves friendly with them if they wished to know their real habits and produce any needful improvement. Now, he (Mr. Noel) had for years been in the habit of going into the houses of the labouring classes, and, more than that, he had visited frequently the poorest houses in the lowest districts of this vast metropolis, and in them he saw the strongest proofs for the necessity of restraining the sale of intoxicating liquors. What was to be done in such a pressing and important matter? Something was necessary; and when an hon. Member of the House, like the Member for Carlisle, came forward with a Bill for the purpose, he believed it was his duty, even if the Bill did not proceed exactly in the lines he desired such a measure to take, to support it. He did think, however, that the Bill as it now stood was in one respect imperfect and unjust—there was no compensation clause in it; and that omission, if the Bill was carried, would be an injustice to those whose houses might be shut up by its operation. He could not vote for the Bill, therefore, without the proviso that, if it passed, either the hon. Baronet or some one else would propose in Committee a clause which would enable ample compensation to be paid to those who might have their houses closed. That, however, was a detail which need not be dealt with on that occasion. He hoped that if a private Member was not strong enough to deal with the question, either the present or some future Government would take the matter up, and do something for the removal or mitigation of the enormous evils under which the country now laboured from this cause. The loss of life alone from overconsumption of intoxicating liquors was greater in the course of a year than ever happened in great battles, or even great wars. Every year 70,000 people were killed by drink—a greater number than those killed in any single campaign in the Russian or other wars—and the numbers killed formed only an infinitesimal portion of those otherwise injured from this cause. With the reservation he had named, he felt bound to give his support to the Bill.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT: The hon. Member who has last addressed the House (Mr. Noel) tells us that he shall vote for the Bill although he does not wholly agree with it. Since I have had a seat in this House I have always voted for this Bill, and it is my intention to do so to-day. I must confess, at the same time, that I would rather have a more complete Bill; I prefer, in fact, the Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), but I shall vote for any Bill which is offered us, which is likely to give the public some control over the sellers of intoxicating drinks. It is not my intention to dwell upon the evil which we wish to remove. That evil is admitted. Nobody, unless it were the hon. and learned Member for Leeds, would deny its great magnitude. When I consider the character of that evil, fairly described, I think, by the hon. Member who last addressed us, it often appears to me that Parliament is extremely apathetic with regard to it. We have from time to time legislated upon it, but in the feeblest fashion; and I am entitled to say, that if we consider the results that have followed that legislation, we shall find that they are almost nothing. With regard to the present Government, it appears to me that it has rather gone back upon this question. One of the most advantageous provisions of the last Government has been repealed by the present Government. The Act of the last Government shut up the public-houses in the morning until the working people had gone to their occupations. Well, although the magistrates, ministers of religion, employers of labour, and, in fact, everybody defended that particular provision, the present Government, as I think, unfortunately abolished it. Now, how is it that there is so much lethargy upon this subject? It appears to spring very much from the social conditions in which we live. Members of both Houses of Parliament, for the most part, live in good houses, and frequent the best portions of our various towns. Those of them—and there are many—who have houses in the country have influence enough always to protect their own estates or their own houses from these plague spots which do so much harm to the people; and we are so seldom brought practically into contact with this evil that we take very little pains to remove it. How do those who are of the people, and who are obliged to live very much among the people, and who, therefore, are suffering from the evil which we are now discussing, look upon it? As an indication of the course which working people generally would take, let me point out what has taken place with regard to their co-operative trading associations. These associations are numerous; a great amount of capital is embarked in them, and some of them are powerful. They are anxious to sell everything on which a profit can be made; but I believe that, without exception, the co-operative associations throughout the country refuse to sell intoxicating liquors in any shape or form. That is a proof, surely, of the tendency of those who are among the great mass of the people. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds spoke of our clubs, and he said he should be disposed to consider seriously this question if he found that the great clubs of the country were willing to put themselves in harmony with such a Bill as that before the House. I may call the attention of the House at least to one very remarkable club that is in such a position. There is no more remarkable club in England than the Manchester Athenæum. A year ago the Lord Chief Justice of England took the chair at one of its annual meetings; the Prime Minister and other distinguished men have visited it, and addressed it on various occasions. That club has about 3,000 members; it has an admirable library with a circulation of 68,000 volumes per annum, it has a restaurant where it dines 500 persons every day, it has its billiard-rooms, gymnastics, in fact, everything that a club can require; but, by common consent, not a drop of anything that can intoxicate ever enters that club. The men who belong to it are, for the most part, young men connected with the business houses of Manchester—the men who are, in fact, to be our future merchants. Now, a word or two about the objections that have been raised to this Bill. The objection that it does not provide for compensation is always produced. It appears to me that that is a detail, but I admit that for the sellers of drink who might be displaced it is a very important detail. There are two things to be said with regard to it—one is that the publican interest is far too powerful ever to allow us to dislodge it without compensating it; and the other is that the public would make such infinite gains by the reduction of this traffic that they would be most willing to make such a bargain with the publicans. Then we are told that the law would be evaded. Of course it would; every law is evaded. But where you had two-thirds of the ratepayers sufficiently in earnest to extinguish this traffic, as provided by the Bill, the opinion of that district would be all-powerful in protecting the law, and I would undertake to say that the evasions would be of very small importance. Well, then we have visions of exciting periods of taking the poll. We are told that a great evil would arise, that drink would circulate, and that everything that could demoralize the people would take place. I should like to know what the mother of a poor family whose children are impoverished by drink would say on this question, the woman who is compelled every day of her life to look at that trap to which her husband is enticed to go and spend perhaps one-fourth of the family earnings, the woman who hears every Saturday night, and sometimes oftener, the chorus of half-drunken voices, one of them perhaps that of her husband. I should like to ask her whether the evil of taking the poll would weigh at all in her estimation in comparison with that constant strain upon her life. Why, such persons would laugh to scorn idle objections of this character. Another thing we are told is that the Bill would only be partially applied. That is very true. It would not settle this question. We should have Bills introduced in this House afterwards just as we have now, and we should have to legislate with regard to those populations that would not accept the provisions of this Bill. But we are told that it is altogether wrong to interfere, as this Bill would interfere, with individual liberty. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds said we ought next to bring in a Bill to tell people what they should eat or what clothing they should wear. Well, if the time should ever come when it can be said of an article of food or dress that it produces the mischief which drink produces, I do not doubt that somebody would appear in this House in the character of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, and ask us to pass some Act of Parliament to remove the evil. I do not quite know why the House of Commons should be so very particular with regard to the question of individual liberty, if a great necessity should arise to require interference. What precedents do we set? Look for example at the Compulsory Vaccination Act. That Act of Parliament requires that mothers should bring their children at the tender age of 12 weeks, at a particular hour of the day that the parish doctor may require, in order to insert some foreign matter into the blood of those children. Yet we know that some children are killed, that many are injured, and it does seem to me that to force a man into prison because, having one child injured, he refuses to have his next vaccinated, is a more high-handed interference with individual liberty than anything that can be found within the four corners of this Bill. Let me ask the House seriously to consider what advantages would arise, and what would be the state of things if this Bill were to pass. I think I may assert that a portion of the people would put themselves under its provisions, and would, in fact, adopt the new régime. I should feel almost sure that 10 per cent of the people of the United Kingdom would readily adopt the proposals of this Bill, or, in other words, some 3,000,000 of persons would accept it. Then what would be the result? The hon. and learned Member for Leeds would say, of course, that you would immediately in those districts "rob the poor man of his beer," but that is not true. We should not rob the poor man of his beer, and nobody believes that we should; the only thing we should do would be to place some difficulty in the way of the poor man getting his beer. If he had a belief that beer was necessary to his health and happiness, if he had one-tenth part of the faith in this beverage that the hon. and learned Member for Leeds has, he would by domestic brewing, or by co-operative brewing, if you like, produce his own beer, and he would have it of a better quality than he does now. The Bill would not rob the poor man of his beer, and it seems to me a pity that that statement should be for ever reiterated in this House. I say, what would be the result over that 10 per cent which I suppose would accept this Bill? This would be the result—and I believe no man will deny it—that instead of a large amount of money being injuriously spent in intoxicating liquors, a small amount would be spent, perhaps beneficially. I am not here to oppose the drinking of anything that a man likes to drink, and it may be that the little that would then be spent would be judiciously spent; but at any rate only a little would be spent. Well, then, what would be the condition of the people? They would have a great deal of money in their pockets; and what would become of it? Why, every shop that sells food, every shop that sells clothing, every shop that sells furniture would immediately feel the difference, and would be subject to a larger demand. The people would have such comfortable homes that they might hereafter lead a civilized life; the farmer who brings his produce to the market would have a higher price for it, the railways passing through these districts would have more traffic, and the churches and schools would be better filled. I say again that no Member of this House can deny that these would be the results which would follow from the acceptance of the provisions of the Bill. Your sanitary conditions would rise, and rates would fall. I believe the rates would fall so as to benefit the rural districts of England more than they are ever likely to be benefited by gifts from the Imperial Treasury, and your prisons, poor-houses, and asylums would be too big. We have been told by a speaker on my right that something like £150,000,000 are spent annually upon these drinks. Suppose you saved 10 per cent of that amount, it would be £15,000,000 sterling. Why, although it is only 10 per cent of what we spend in drink, it is a sum greater than all the home trade in cotton goods in this country. I think I may remind the House, coming from a manufacturing district and from a commercial city, that this question is assuming a commercial aspect. In the newspapers of Lancashire there is at this moment an interesting and important discussion going on upon the question of the effect upon trade of this vast consumption of alcoholic drinks. On the Manchester Exchange—the largest Exchange in the world—people are beginning to ask themselves whether there can be any good done to commerce by limiting this vast expenditure, and I have been told by men who have a right to speak upon the question that if this Bill were submitted to the frequenters of that great Exchange a majority of them would be in favour of its passing. The hon. Member who last spoke seemed to doubt whether this Bill would ever pass. I do not know whether it will ever pass—but this I do know, that the men who never know when they are beaten very often win in the end;—and my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, and thousands of earnest men behind him, do not know when they are beaten, and mean to continue this agitation for many years to come. Thirty-five years ago it was held to be impossible to repeal the Corn Laws. Men who came up from Lancashire were told by Peers of Parliament that they were madmen for expecting that they could ever repeal that law; and yet in six years, mainly owing to the fact that business men found it was necessary for the prosperity of the country, came the repeal of that law. Supposing that ministers of religion, social reformers, and business men put their heads together and come to the conclusion that each one has an enormous gain to make by restricting if not extinguishing this traffic, if that opinion should prevail in these quarters you may some day—perhaps, in a few years—have such a power of opinion in this country in favour of this or some similar Bill that the stubbornness of Parliament will be conquered, and we shall deal seriously with this question.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had listened very attentively to the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), and the arguments brought forward by the other supporters of the Bill in the course of the debate. He had, however, heard them over and over again in the discussion of this question, and he would simply ask what was the net result? There was no doubt that there was drunkenness, and a great deal of it—they all knew that; they all admitted it, and they were all ready to adopt any fair and practicable plan to put down that drunkenness; or if that could not be done entirely, to diminish it as far as possible. It was of no use talking about the sad cases of drunkenness, and the curse they were to husbands and wives, and all sorts of distress arising therefrom. That was not the question with which the House had to deal. The question really was—would this Bill, if carried, put an end to all these evils? He was strongly of opinion that it would not, and there were some facts which he thought were better than a thousand assertions. For instance, it was proved by official documents that in both Canada and the United States that, after several years' perseverance, the results were conclusive as to the utter failure of prohibitory legislation to put down drunkenness. In Canada, after many years' experience, the Permissive Bill had become a dead letter. In the State of Massachusetts a law was passed, in 1852 or 1853, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks; according, however, to the report of the principal officer appointed to see that law carried out, he found a vast number of unlicensed houses established for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and the consequences were so demoralizing to the people, that he advised the abolition of that law, and the passing in its stead of a good licensing enactment as the best means of promoting temperance. In Boston, the capital of the State, after seven years' experience of a prohibitory law, it was found in 1869 there were no fewer than 3,000 places where liquor was sold in open violation of the law. The matter was brought before the Legislature of Massachusetts; and after the matter had been carefully considered for two years, on the 1st of May last year the prohibitory law was repealed, and a licensing system similar to that in this country was again adopted; and the result was that already, by the 1st January of the present year, under the sanction of the new law, 700 of the houses which had previously been engaged in an illicit trade in Boston had been shut up—and the process was still going on—while drunkenness had been diminished more than 20 per cent. Again, the report of the British Consul at Portland with respect to the position of the liquor trade in the State of Maine, with a population chiefly agricultural of about 670,000 mentioned that in 1875 the number of persons convicted of drunkenness there amounted to 1,810, whereas in the town he had the honour to represent, with a population of nearly 500,000, the total number convicted during the same time was but 2,000. It was, therefore, clear that although the sale of intoxicating liquor might be prohibited by law, people managed to get it in some way or other, and that where there was a demand there would be a supply. The Maine Liquor Law was unfortunately still unrepealed, but the practice of illicit trading was so great that in this last year the fines for drunkenness in the county of Cumberland alone amounted to $48,000. The system of prohibition had produced the most demoralizing results. There was another point that should not be omitted in dealing with the Bill—namely, the constant turmoil and expense of the elections to determine whether houses should be closed in any town or district or not. They had already, in the election of school boards and town councils, had sufficient experience of the waste of time, money, and temper to which these manifold elections gave rise. The annual voting under this Bill would become an intolerable nuisance, and he thought this fact should weigh not only with the House but the hon. Member for Carlisle. Small minorities might become not only troublesome, but expensive; and he could mention a case in which in a single school-board election the expenses on both sides amounted to no less than £11,000. If any useful result could be produced the matter would be different, but it was evident from the facts he had referred to that, do what they might to prohibit the sale of drink, the people would still obtain it, and the trade would become still more demoralizing than before. They had heard a great deal of the excellent effect produced in Scotland by the passing of what was called Forbes-Mackenzie's Act. It had been stated that under the operation of that Act the consumption of spirits had decreased. Statistics showed that, on the contrary, it had greatly increased. He held in his hands the Returns of the quantities of spirits, home and foreign, consumed in England, Ireland, and Scotland, in the years 1871 to 1875. He did not go back to 1870, because since then changes had been made. He found from these Returns that the quantity of foreign spirits in 1873 charged with duty for consumption in England was 8,692,901, and in 1875, 9,993,601; in Ireland, in 1873, 587,758 gallons; in 1875, 610,226 gallons; while in Scotland the quantity was, in 1873, 978,769, and in 1875, 1,309,537 gallons. It would thus be seen that in the only one of the Three Kingdoms in which such a system as that now proposed had been tried the result had been a very large increase in the consumption of spirits. Taking the increase of population and other things into account, he thought the present system was working very fairly, and he saw no reason for breaking it by such an extreme change as that proposed by this measure, which would be a fruitful source of public excitement, irritation, contention, and expense, and would certainly, judging by the facts he had referred to, not diminish, but rather increase drunkenness and demoralization. For these reasons, he hoped the House would refuse its sanction to a measure by which it was sought to put down by legislation an evil for which education and the general improvement of society were, in his opinion, the best, if not the only remedies.

MR. E. JENKINS said, there were many persons in the same position with himself in regard to this question—namely, that while they admitted the enormous evils that drunkenness occasioned, they were not prepared to go so far as the hon. Member for Carlisle, and trusted that some way would be discovered of introducing a practical reform. Not feeling himself capable of pointing out this way, he was driven to support his hon. Friend, who was setting himself the task of redeeming this country from a tremendous evil, for he felt it would be a wrong done to society if one were to endeavour to interpose any obstacle to the progress of a measure which was aimed at evils so dire as those that they all acknowledged. The Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle did not in many respects meet his views in the way it was proposed to deal with the enormous evils of drunkenness; still, it was a step in the right direction, and he should feel bound to vote for the second reading. With respect to the crime, demoralization, and numerous evils caused by the prevalence of drunkenness there could be no doubt. Every day's current news gave accounts of quarrels, personal injuries, suicides, and murders arising from the immoderate indulgence in strong drink. He entirely denied the assertion that drunkenness was on the decline as proved by the absence of crime during the Whitsun holidays, for he had selected from the London and provincial newspapers several cases of crime which had occurred within that period, the details of which would lead one to imagine they had been committed in the realms of the King of Dahomey, and not in a country which had enjoyed the advantages of Christianity for sixteen or seventeen centuries. This state of things justified the hon. Member for Carlisle in bringing forward this measure, which called on those who suffered from the result of the public-houses to say whether they would allow a trade to be carried on in the midst of them which created so great a nuisance. Hon. Members who professed as earnest a desire to see the evils coped with as the advocates of the present measure, objected to it on the ground that it was an unjust and unrighteous interference with the public liberty. He did not say that he went the entire length of his hon. Friend in asking that the Bill should be passed in its present shape—it was possible that it might be too strong a measure to entrust the inhabitants of any neighbourhood with the power of prohibiting entirely the sale of intoxicating drink within that district. And here he desired to correct a misconception which existed with respect to the scope of this measure—it was not the consumption, but the sale of intoxicating drinks which was prohibited. It had already been pointed out by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) that the consumption was not interfered with, and it would be quite possible for those who thought it necessary to procure drink as an article of diet to supply themselves with it. But apart from that consideration, he wished to point out to hon. Members that the main principle of the Bill was local control over this trade. If Parliament, which was representative of the electors of the whole nation, had undertaken to control this traffic, surely it was only going a little step further in the direction of local Government if they asked the ratepayers in their various districts to do for themselves what Parliament did for the entire Kingdom. He appealed to those who found themselves unable to go the full extent of the prohibitory clauses of his hon. Friend's Bill to at least register their votes in favour of the principle of popular and local control. This being the ground upon which he supported this measure, and driven to it as he was by the dreadful calamities which were daily occurring, and which were harrowing one's soul and disgracing alike their Christianity and civilization, he meant to vote for the second reading.

Mr. STORER said, he thought the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) were unanswerable; and he might further remark that the catalogue of crimes referred to by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had no bearing whatever on the issue before the House. It was no argument, either in favour of it or against it, to say that some persons of that class which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) called the "residuum" got drunk upon a holiday, and made a violent use of the knife. It was, he considered, rather an extraordinary fact that every argument which had been used in the course of the debate in favour of free trade had proceeded from the Conservative Benches; while all the arguments which favoured the destruction of individual liberty were brought forward by those who were supposed to be included in the great Liberal Party. Those who were continually impressing them with the excellence, the power, the learning, education, and intelligence of the people were the very persons who sought by means of this measure to restrain the people from the exercise of that intelligence on which they seemed to set so much value—they would not even entrust these intelligent persons with the liberty to choose whether they would drink or not. For his own part he would leave them to their own free choice. He thought the very proposal of so arbitrary a measure as this for a free country was very extraordinary, especially as they well knew that wherever measures of this kind had been tried they had proved to be perfect and decided failures. The hon. Member had also remarked that if the public-houses were abolished the people in the manufacturing districts might brew their beer at home. He might remark that if the malt tax were repealed, the rural population would brew their beer at home; and in his belief the key of the question of drunkenness was to be found in the question of domestic brewing. If the labourers could get good home-brewed ale, they would discontinue to frequent public-houses. The public-houses supplied an article which the public had come to consider a necessity of life. If they would have furnaces and factories and mills and other occupations requiring great bodily exertion on the part of those employed in them, they must allow those men to drink to the extent they thought necessary to sustain their physical energy. They might very well regulate the hours at which intoxicating liquors might be sold, but they could not shut up the public-houses entirely without creating a greater nuisance than the one they were anxious to suppress. He lived in a part of the town where he could see of how great a use the public-houses were to the working classes—more especially to the carters coming in to the early markets, and who were from the very nature of their employment obliged to take refreshment. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) had referred to the repeal of the Corn Laws, and augured from that that this Bill would ultimately become law; but if it did, it would be attended with as many disappointments as had been the passing of the Act in question.

Mr. Storer

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Sir, I do not agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Storer) in thinking that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) who spoke just before him made an unanswerable speech; his arguments might be very good, but his facts were a little wanting. The hon. Member began by referring to the legislation upon this subject which has taken place in Canada, and he said that a scheme which had been tried there, and which was of a permissive character, had totally failed. But if he goes to Canada at this moment he will find that there is upon the Statute Book an Act with regard to the sale of intoxicating drinks far stronger than the Bill I am now proposing to the House—a Bill which gives the power of vetoing the issue of these licences to a bare majority; and that Act has been carried into operation in many parts of Canada, and has given satisfaction wherever it has been carried out. So much then for Canada. The hon. Member for Birmingham next travelled to Massachusetts, and he produced the Act which was passed in 1875 as the latest production of the Legislature of that country regarding licences. I was glad to hear him say, when he handed it to me, that he considered the law in Massachusetts a great deal better than we had it in this country. So do I. I am not going to read the clauses of that Act, but I may say that they are very stringent, and the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) would quail if he thought there was any chance of its being inflicted upon his friends and clients in this country. Well, the hon. Member for Birmingham said the law of Massachusetts was better than our law—and I again repeat so it is; but then it is a permissive law, for it enacts that licences shall only be granted by those who are elected for the purpose by the people. Then the Act also says, “but nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to compel said mayor and aldermen or select-men to grant licences.” It is therefore the Permissive Bill in another sense; and if there is any consistency in the hon. Member for Birmingham, and if he believes that the law in Massachusetts is better than the law we at present live under, he is bound to vote for my Bill. I have been led into this transatlantic disquisition by the remarks of the hon. Member for

Birmingham; but how does this question stand at home? We shall all agree that it is becoming very fast, if it has not already become, the irrepressible question of British social politics. I was very glad to see this morning what the Home Secretary said to a deputation which waited upon him in reference to this matter yesterday. He gave them a reception which, I am sure, from what I have heard, gave the greatest pleasure, owing to the courtesy and consideration with which the right hon. Gentleman met them. The right hon. Gentleman said the advocacy of this subject was not confined to teetotalers; he saw that it was a question which interested good citizens who wished to promote the happiness and well-being of the country. I have already said that this is an irrepressible question. The late Government tried to deal with the matter with the view of putting it upon a satisfactory footing; and the present Government, when they came into office, tried to deal with it, and endeavoured to make the licensing laws satisfactory; but I regret that they should have rather reversed the legislation of their Predecessors. Therefore, that being the state of the case, I am happy in one thing—namely, that there is an end of the old objection that we cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament. Both political Parties, as I have shown, have admitted that legislation can do much to make, or, if I may use the expression, to unmake the sobriety of the people. I contend that we must deal with this matter by law. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) said that we have a perfect right to enforce the law against those people who get drunk, but that we have no right to interfere with the means of getting drunk any more than we have a right to say what sort of clothes a man shall wear, or what language he shall use. But the law does deal with those subjects. If the hon. and learned Member came down to the House dressed in a manner which does not accord with propriety, he would soon find what the law would do with him; and if he used language either in the House or out of it—which I am sure he would not do—but which is called strong and bad and disgraceful language—he would find himself in the arms of the police. Well, then, we have got rid of the argument that the law can do nothing in this matter. We are here especially to make laws for the benefit of the people, and the question which presents itself is this—Is the present law the best which we evolve out of our deliberations to diminish and check drunkenness? I think I shall carry the House with me pretty well in saying that it is not the best; because if we look at the Notice Paper of this House we shall find that no fewer than nine Bills have been introduced this Session with the object of dealing with this matter, backed by no fewer than 37 Members, and all of them going in different directions with the same purpose in view. Some of these Bills abolish the magistrates as the licensing authority; some want to do away with the appeal Courts; some want to destroy beer-shops; and my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) is making a tremendous attack upon the grocers. He is possessed with a strong antipathy to them, and so far as I can make out of his views and the intentions of his friends, they have come to the conclusion that the 3,000 licensed grocers do as much harm as the 70,000 publicans. There are also other Bills dealing with this trade upon a Sunday having reference both to England and Ireland, and all these Bills are intended to diminish the evil and to check and diminish the sale of drink, and thus by that means to curtail the profits of the publican. We cannot by legislation do anything else except in this direction, and, therefore, to the best of my humble ability, I have supported all those Bills. But it is much better they should be brought on by hon. Members than by myself. People say, Why don't you do this, that, or the other to bring about an alteration in the licensing system? I reply that I do not believe in licences at all—and I would say let those who believe in them try to improve the system. They can do the business better than I can. My creed is a clear one—very likely I am quite wrong, but there is no mistake about it—I believe that every trade which is for the benefit of the people ought to be perfectly free, but a trade which is not for the good of the people ought not to be licensed and fostered, but should be prohibited. I believe this trade we are talking about to-night is not a good trade; and I will not give my own opinion upon the point, but that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who, I am glad to see in his place, and who I hope will give me the benefit of his opinion upon this measure by-and-by. He has described the evil of the liquor traffic as this—that people are allowed to deal in articles which produce crime, disorder, and madness; and that is a description which warrants me in saying that the trade is a bad one. I agree with much that has been said in this debate to the effect that we cannot go beyond public opinion in attacking a trade like this. If the trade is carried on in a place and in a community which believes it to be a good trade and for their benefit, then I admit you will have great difficulty in keeping it down; and for that reason I have constructed and drafted this Bill, which can only apply to cases where there is a strong public opinion which will lead to its being enforced by the wish of the people. Then this Bill is not antagonistic to any one of the Bills which I have already mentioned, or to any scheme of licensing reform which anybody may think it right to bring before this House. It is not antagonistic to these schemes, but is intended to supplement them. If any one of these schemes should be adopted, and be found to work well, then no one will desire to do away with it; but if they all fail I am sure the hon. Members who introduced them will not say they wish the trade to be carried on under a system which is unsatisfactory to the community. But after all, are hon. Members aware that we are living in this country already under a Maine Law, but unfortunately with an exception? By the general law of the country, no one is allowed to sell a drop of these drinks to his neighbour, because they are dangerous to the public welfare; but exceptions have crept in, and now the magistrates are allowed to grant the privilege to certain persons to make money by carrying on this trade if they are so minded. The magistrates are not an elected but a selected body—selected for their social or hereditary position, for their pecuniary condition or their political professions. I do not find fault with them; I am a magistrate myself, and I would not like to cast blame upon a body with whom I act. I heard the other day a strong defence of the magistracy by my hon. and gallant Friend the

Member for Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), who told us that we need not be afraid of the magistrates, for it was not likely they would do anything very wrong so long as the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) was alive. Under these conditions, it appears they cannot get into any very great scrape—so that their jurisdiction may be described as a benevolent despotism tempered by Taylor. But let them be as good or as bad as they may, I do hold the opinion that we put into their hands a power which they cannot safely be entrusted with; in fact, no body of men can safely be entrusted with it. After all, they are only human; and what a great temptation is placed in their hands, when by a stroke of the pen they may add hundreds or thousands of pounds to the value of a house when a man applies for a licence. What a door is open here for jobbery—a door so wide, that many may be tempted to enter. And who will say that there is not a large amount of jobbery carried on in connection with this licensing business? It will not be denied, on the other hand, that the magistrates have very fairly, in other cases, done their duty. They have tried to find out what is good for the community, and have acted honestly upon their opinions. I have nothing to do with their motives; but what I say is, let us look at the results, and if our experience shows that where they have not exercised the power Parliament has conferred upon them good has followed, and where they have exercised the power and set up a trade upon their own authority, and there great and serious evils to the public have resulted, then I say that this is a system which requires amending. Well, then, I come with my Bill as a measure intended to meet the difficulty and the evil, and I say let the magistrates be restrained from exercising those powers which Parliament has entrusted to them in those places where the people declare that they would rather those powers were not exercised at all. I have heard it laid down in this House by high legal authority that the magistrates have only three questions to decide upon in granting these licences: first, is the applicant a man of good character; secondly, is the house a good and suitable one for the purpose? thirdly, do the people require the house. I would say let the magistrates by all means deal with the first two points; let them judge of the character of the applicant and the nature and suitability of the house; but when it comes to the requirements of the public, let the public judge for themselves. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), who has made the strongest speech yet against my Bill, said, at the conclusion of his remarks, that he had no objection to the number of houses being reduced according to the requirements of the neighbourhood; so that even he, like the hon. Member for Birmingham, is in favour of my Bill without knowing it. But if people say they require no number at all, why should not their wishes be met?—for they have as much right to declare that they require none at all as others have to say they want two or five houses, or whatever the number may be. On the present occasion, however, I only want to discuss the principle of the Bill; and the principle of it is simply that these licences should only be granted for the good of the public. I have copied the details of the Bill and the machinery of it from many other Permissive Acts which are already in existence. As to the notice and to the number who shall give the notice, the system of taking votes and the majority required to decide the matter, they are all matters of detail. I say that two-thirds of the inhabitants or ratepayers shall give a vote which shall be decisive. The hon. Member opposite, who sits for East Aberdeenshire, has put a Notice upon the Paper by which we are to have a proposition of seven-ninths, but that is simply a matter of detail. The hon. Member has put the Amendment down for Committee, and I am sure I shall not quarrel with him. I will do anything with pleasure when we get into Committee, and all I wish is that the House would allow us to reach that stage by assenting to the second reading. Now, Sir, is this plan worth trying—a plan by which licences shall only be granted for the benefit of the public and not for the benefit of the publican? Of course, the answer to me is that if the Bill came into operation there would be much greater discomfort to the general community than there would be benefit to the population from the operation of the Act. Well, that is a fair matter of argument, and those who believe it would produce evil are bound to vote against the Bill. But some people have exaggerated views of the evil. The

hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) a year ago made a speech at a licensed victualler's dinner—I always read his speeches—and he said he should die if this Bill were to pass and public-houses were shut up. No one would regret to bring about such a circumstance more than myself, because the hon. and learned Member is a very amiable opponent. The hon. and learned Member stated yesterday to the licensed victuallers—and not many days pass, as a rule, without his being amongst them somewhere—that his policy was all fair and square: therefore I cannot have a better opponent than he is, and I hope he will not suffer the evil consequences he has alluded to—because I understand there is an idea that he will be raised to some high rank in consequence of the efforts he made to get rid of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill of last year. But, as to the operation of this Bill, surely the evils are so great at present that we might incur a little inconvenience, I would go even further and say, even run a little risk, for the sake of granting a benefit which we believe would arise from this Bill. I need not attempt to weary the House to-day as to the evils of drunkenness. I remember in former days I ventured to say in this House that I believed drunkenness was the greatest cause of crime and pauperism in this country; and Lord Aberdare, with whom I have had a good many good-humoured controversies upon this matter, said I was wrong; that I ought to have said one of the greatest causes of crime and pauperism. But I have never heard yet what is the other cause which is greater—so I still maintain that drunkenness is the greatest. I was very glad to hear the straightforward and manly speech of the noble Lord opposite (Earl Percy) to-day. It is clear that I shall not get his vote, but he spoke in a kind and sympathizing manner. He said he was not going to enter into the question whether drunkenness was increasing, decreasing, or was stationary, and I think he was wise not to enter into statistics which may prove anything. As an instance, not long since an inquiry was made of a colonel of a regiment in Africa as to the health of the teetotalers in his regiment, and he sent back a report that 50 per cent of them had died and 50 per cent had been invalided. Well, that rather alarmed the Temperance party; but the report was quite accurate, for there were only two teetotalers in the regiment, and one of them died from the bite of a serpent, and the other had been sent home with a broken leg. That, however, shows the unreliability of statistics. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) there, is a great statistician—he has pored over statistics to such an extent that he is convinced the number of public-houses does not affect the drunkenness of the people, but I do not think he will be successful in convincing anyone else. Surely the broad facts which meet us every day are sufficient to convince the public what really is the state of affairs. We have had a period of high wages, and I should have imagined that it would have brought comfort and happiness to the working classes. In some cases this may have been the case; but those who know the country will say that generally the comfort and happiness of homes has not very much increased by these high wages, because the wages have been spent in the public-houses which have been got up to tempt men from their homes and families. Take the Inspectors' reports. They say in the North and East drunkenness is increasing, but that in the South and West it was decreasing, because there had been strikes and the wages were lower—showing that as long as you have public-houses, high wages were more often a curse than a blessing to the working man. Lord Aberdare at the Social Science Congress, at Brighton, last year, said that during a long strike in his part of the country, in Wales, notwithstanding the distress which prevailed, there was a remarkable absence of crime, because people could not get money to spend in public-houses. We have therefore three elements—men, money, and public-houses. Take away the money from the men and drunkenness ceases; but I say leave the money with the men and take away the public-houses. No one denies the existence of this drunkenness, except hon. Members when they get up to speak against the Permissive Bill. We have heard from hon. Gentlemen who understand mercantile matters what is the state of the country—we are told we are in view of bad and trying times. We hear rumours in the manufacturing districts that the mills will have to go on short time: but what I want to see is instead of the mills going on short time that we should pass a measure which may possibly place public-houses on short time. There is a little pamphlet lately printed referring to the licensing system of Sweden. The writer says—

“What is essentially a Permissive Prohibitory Act has existed in Sweden for the last 20 years. So vigorously have the people outside of towns used their permission to limit and prohibit, that among 3,500,000 people there are only 450 places for the sale of spirits. That is, for a population such as we have in the county of Lancaster, which has 7,000 spirit licences and 8,000 beer and wine licences, they have only 450, besides a certain number of houses for the sale of weak beer. This it is which has so helped Sweden to emerge from moral and material prostration, and which explains the existence in that country of comfort and independence among all classes. In the country parishes, except where relay inns for changing horses exist, public-houses are now very seldom met with.”

The people of this country, I contend, have a perfect right to put themselves into a similar position of comfort and happiness. The Gothenburg plan has been proposed; and I have no objection at all to it if anyone wishes to try it. It is that public-houses should be taken from the hands of the publicans, who have an interest in the amount of business done, and transferred to the local authorities, who have no interest in the matter, and who if they make a profit will spend it for the good of the town. By this scheme people would be made to drink not for the good of the publican, but for the good of the public. It might be an improvement on the present plan; but even if it were adopted, why, I ask, should even the local authorities be allowed to force these places for supplying drink on the people if they do not want them? I can tell the House a rather curious thing which shows that even the plan I allude to would require to be supplemented by my measure. In Padiham it happened that a beer shop came into the possession of the local authority, and it was proposed to re-let it and to spend the money realized in that way for the benefit of the town. Well, the people heard of it, and they said—“You should not do that.” The local authority upon this said—“Well, you shall do as you like. We will take a vote on the subject, and according to the view of the majority the house shall be carried on, the profit realized going for the good of the town, or it shall be shut up.” A vote was taken, and it was decided by a large majority that the revenue accruing from the beer shop should be given up and that the house should be closed. Let us bring in the Gothenburg scheme if you approve of it; but when you have got it in let me have my little supplement, which would prevent the forcing of public-houses on the people against their own wish. I have often quoted the case of Bessbrook, in Ireland, where for years and years there have been no public-houses and no drinking shops, and I have the accumulated evidence of everyone who goes there to the effect that the state of things there is most pleasant, and that the people are quite satisfied. The other day, or not long ago, a vote was taken in this place as to whether or not they should have public-houses there; and it was decided by a majority of no less than 6 to 1 that the present state of things should continue. Why not, I ask, allow our fellow-countrymen to have the same advantages as these people enjoy? What argument is there against it? I come here year after year and appeal to the House on the same subject; and although my Bill is rejected, I never hear a sound argument showing why the people of this country should not have the power of local self-government. We know what a vast amount of good has been done wherever these public-houses and beer shops have been removed. We have had reports from Scotland and from elsewhere where these houses have been abolished showing the good results of the change. We ourselves know of good landlords who have cleared their property of these houses, and by so doing they have gained the applause of all good men and the thanks of their neighbours. But where these places are put down you ought, if you are logical, to interfere with the landlords, and say—"You are misusing your property, and we will legislate to make you give the people that which you are depriving them of." But you know perfectly well that the removal of temptation must remove the evil to a certain extent. The late Prime Minister said on one occasion that it was the duty of the Government to make it as easy as possible for a man to do right, and as difficult as possible for him to do wrong. I maintain, however, that our licensing system does the very reverse, and that it makes it easy for a man to do wrong and difficult for him to do right. Sir, after the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) I must be allowed to read one or two extracts to the House. They are not very long, but in my opinion they are important, because America has been referred to, and the state of things there will perhaps be given to show that prohibition is a total failure. Let me read a document to the House which is from the highest responsible authority you can get in the State of Maine—namely, the late Governor of that State. I will read that, and then what the Governor for the present year says, and I will leave the House to judge between the gossip which the hon. Member for Birmingham has repeated and the straightforward evidence of responsible individuals. In August, 1875, the Governor of Maine said—

"The influence of the law has been salutary, not only in mitigating the dramshop evil, but also in promoting good order, thrift, and sobriety. Lately, the execution of the law has improved from year to year, until dramshops have, practically, ceased to exist in the rural portions of the State, in which are found more than three-fourths of our population, and even in the cities, where it is always more difficult to restrain vice and crime, open tippling shops have been largely reduced, and in many almost entirely closed. So general has become the conviction that the policy of prohibiting the dramshops, on the whole, restrains the evils of the liquor traffic immeasurably beyond any conceivable system of licence or regulation, that all organized opposition to the Maine Law has ceased in this State, and at least two-thirds of our people give it a hearty support."

In 1876, Mr. Connor, Governor of Maine, said in his annual Message—

"The law, as a whole, fairly represents the sentiments of the people. Maine has a fixed conclusion upon this subject. It is that the sale of intoxicating liquors is an evil of such magnitude that the wellbeing of the State demands and the conditions of the social compact warrant its suppression."

The Report of the Select Committee of the Canadian Senate to consider the Report of the Government Commissioners to the United States to inquire into the results of prohibitory legislation, March, 1875, had this passage—

"The Report of the Government Commissioners shows clearly that the prohibitory law of the States of Maine and Vermont has been well enforced, and has largely diminished crime and pauperism, and that its beneficial effects upon the community have been so fully proved by the experience of over 20 years that there is now no attempt made to repeal it, while in the other States visited—although the law was not so generally enforced—wherever it was brought into full operation the same result of the diminution of crime invariably followed. In the cases where the prohibitory law was for a short time repealed intemperance and crime immediately increased to so marked a degree that prohibition was soon re-enacted."

Consul Murray (Report for 1875)—

"As regards the towns and villages there can be no manner of doubt that the law has been nearly successful."

That is the evidence of a man who has been quoted up and down in all the newspapers during the last Recess as proving that the Maine Law has been a failure. I know it is of very little use my making these quotations. Some one will get up and say that he has been in Boston or some other American city, that he has there met a man with a dark lantern in the street, and notwithstanding the law has gone with him, and that they have had rum together. Such evidence as this, however, is of little value—I like to see tangible proofs brought, and these I have read to the House. Now, of course, I shall be met by the old argument that this Bill is one of permissive and not Imperial legislation. But our present law is permissive. No magistrates are compelled to grant licences—they are only permitted to do so; and I wish to make very little addition to our present permissive law. I wish to say in my Bill that the magistrates shall grant licences as they do now, but not when the people are opposed to it. But even if my measure proposed a new permissive law, it should not be opposed by hon. Members on the other side of the House, because the present Government is a permissive Government. One after the other the Acts they bring in are permissive, and last year whilst sitting in my place I heard with delight the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government use these words—"I regard permissive legislation as the characteristic of a free people." I thought when I heard him say that that the words were spoken by him, like the good Radical that he was, is, and ever will be. Permissive government is a thing to which my Tory friends have lately become converted. I have been told that my Bill could not be carried out; but that is no argument for hon. Gentlemen opposite, because the Agricultural Holdings Bill was a permissive measure—that has not been carried out although it has been passed. In fact, I have heard it very highly extolled on that very ground. In that case they passed a law which a person can contract himself out of with some little difficulty. The legislation I propose differs from that, inasmuch as it would not be for people to contract themselves out of it but to contract themselves into it. There is another argument against the Bill—namely, that it will only come into operation in places noted for their sobriety. Why, Sir, I want to protect sober places and keep them sober. Now-a-days a flourishing village, where men are getting good wages and happy homes, and are accumulating a little money, is the place that the publican fixes on. He says—"There is a mine of wealth here, and if I can only start a shop I shall draw the money these people have accumulated from their pockets into my coffers." If my Bill were passed it would be possible to prevent publicans coming into a village and spreading crime and pauperism amongst the community. It would be helping the working man and the upper classes also. We have heard a good deal about Knightsbridge Barracks recently. When a deputation waited upon the Duke of Cambridge and represented the Knightsbridge Barracks as an isthmus of barbarism and a disgrace to the neighbourhood, what did he say? He said—"It is not my soldiers who cause these disturbances in the neighbourhood. It is the public-houses. Don't bother me with your deputation, but get the licensing magistrates to shut up the public-houses." Another objection to the Bill is that I do not provide compensation for the publicans, who might have to shut up shop in those cases where it was put into force. That, I say, is a matter which is entirely one for Committee. I want to know before I give an opinion what the publican is to be compensated for and who is to compensate him? If anyone will bring me in a bill and show me that it is a legitimate one and one that ought to be paid, I shall be quite willing to pay it. I do not know why a man who has paid a certain sum for a privilege to be enjoyed for a year should be supposed to be going on enjoying it, and should be bought out if, with the sanction of the House, the magistrate, or the ratepayers declined to renew the bargain with him. I consider that the public have a bargain with the beerseller for a year, and at the expiration of the 12 months can decline to renew it. Let any one make a case for compensation for the publican, I say, and no one will be more ready to compensate than I shall be. Then how about the Bill of the late Government. I cannot appeal to that of the present Government, because they did not take away any privileges by it. Gentlemen on this side of the House supported their Government when they brought forward their measure to shut up the public-house, especially the lower class of houses, during a portion of the time when they did their most profitable trade. No one said anything about compensation then, and no one gave the publicans in Scotland compensation when they were compelled to shut up their houses all day on Sundays. Let hon. Gentlemen look at home and see what they have done for themselves before they talk to me about not providing compensation clauses. I think I have gone through the objections to my Bill, and I do think my plan is a simple and a just one. I am afraid, however, good as it is, and just as I believe it to be, it does somewhat suffer from the imperfect way in which I bring it before you; because I understand that the other day the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) said, whilst speaking on the subject, that—

“the Permissive Bill was yearly rejected by the House by increasing majorities, owing to Sir Wilfrid Lawson's mismanagement of the case.”

From this it would seem that the Judge Advocate thinks the Bill is a good one, because he says its failure was owing to mismanagement. From this it appears that the Bill would get on better in other hands, and I trust some day the Judge Advocate will bring it in himself. At a dinner of Licensed Victuallers not long ago, the hon. Member for East Staffordshire declared I was the “Prince of Humbugs,” and called me the arch enemy of the trade. Another hon. Gentleman—the Member for Worcestershire—said I was a monomaniac. The hon. Member for Exeter, too, not long ago, was at a licensed victuallers’ meeting, and delivered an address, and there was a reverend gentleman present, who, in speaking to the publicans addressed them as “My Christian friends,” and then went on to say that he wondered how the Bishop of the diocese could associate with me—a course by which he thought the episcopalian office was dragged through the dirt. He also said that he did not think I had the slightest belief in the cause I espoused. Does he think that no one can believe in anything but beer? I have read all his speeches, and there can be no doubt that he believes firmly in beer. The demand for some measure of this kind continues with unabated force. That has been admitted by all the speakers who have addressed the House this afternoon. There is no doubt—and I think no one will contradict me—that a measure of this kind is supported by almost all the best and most intelligent and most earnest of the working classes, and no wonder. They cannot see why they are not to be trusted the same as their fellow-countrymen in Canada—when gambling was prevalent amongst the higher classes the State interfered and swept all the gambling houses away—why, therefore, should not the working classes be protected in a similar way? The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) said some years ago that no meeting could be called in his part of the country, on any subject, which would not endorse this demand. You know, as well as I do, that although we live in a time of political apathy or deadness no question can command such enthusiasm in large towns, especially in the North, as can this. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds will admit this, because he is a candid opponent. The hon. and learned Member always has an argument ready against the Bill. Last year, when we had numerous Petitions, he said—“Oh, Petitions are of no use. They go for nothing;” but this year he taunts us with having none at all. All the religious denominations are taking this question up, and a memorial signed by nearly 7,000 clergymen of the Church of England was recently presented to the two Archbishops, praying that something might be done to diminish the plague of drunkenness, and virtually urging that if nothing else could be suggested that they should give their support to the principle of the Permissive Bill. There is a strong feeling on the question, however badly I represent the views of those who are in favour of the Bill, and you may be sure that this matter cannot be got rid of by gibe, jest, and disdain. The time has come, you may depend upon it, when, if you are to allay this agitation, it must be done by some sound and solid argument by men of influence in the House. Working men cannot see why they may not be allowed to protect themselves from the incursions of capitalists who come among them to make money out of their misery. You may say they are too ignorant, too weak and stupid, to be allowed the exercise of the power I claim for them. If that is so, then surely they are too weak and too ignorant to have this temptation put before them. On the other hand, you may say—and many do say—that they are intelligent and independent. If that is so, then there is still less reason to hand them over, tied hand and foot, to the mercy of the magistrates and the publicans. I am not sanguine enough to suppose that the House will sanction the measure to-night. You will throw it out again, as you have done before, by a larger or a smaller majority, as the case may be, and there will be the usual rejoicing in the trade which is so ably represented by the hon. and learned Member for Leeds. Still, I think in the course of the year, when we all of us read the records of the crime—the murders and outrages—which follow upon the liquor trade, those who have helped to throw this Bill out will feel a little compunction and regret that they did not do something to check the misery and pauperism of the country. You do nothing. Everything is rejected. The Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), which was more comprehensive than mine, was refused. That of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone)—a very small measure, directed against the evil arising from the large issue of grocers' licences—is opposed by the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), and is thus in all probability defeated. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) urged on by the unanimous wish of the Irish people, desires to shut up the public-houses in his country for one day in the week; but the Government are throwing every obstacle in his way. Last year the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) endeavoured to introduce a clause in the Artizans' Dwellings Bill to prevent a public-house being built near the dwellings which would arise under the Act; but the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not accept it. It is a pity that this sort of thing should continue. We are an assembly here of rich men, and we do not of course realize all the misery that the public-houses are bringing on our poorer neighbours. We do not see it every day, but it is felt by those classes, and they feel hurt at seeing this House turn away from considering this question which affects them. They claim to be allowed to protect themselves from their greatest evil. But I tell you that this measure will receive the sanction of Parliament some day; and if it was passed to-day the House would do no disgrace to itself, but, on the contrary, it would do very much to promote the order, and the morality, and the happiness of the great mass of the people.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I am sure that, had my right hon. Friend the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), been present here to-day, he would not have been so rash as to assert that the course represented by the Bill before the House has not one of the very ablest advocates in the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. I venture at the outset to say to the hon. Baronet that that Gentleman, and those who sit with him on this side of the House, are as anxious as he can possibly be to reduce to the very utmost extent the evils he has been denouncing. Of that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has given conclusive proof at his reception, on the previous day, of the deputation which waited on him in reference to this very question. The question before the House is a practical one—it is to say whether the Bill now before the House is the best method of dealing with this grave matter. It is admitted on all hands that there is a very great and serious evil to be dealt with when, to some considerable extent, there is abuse in the consumption of intoxicating drinks. It has also been admitted, after very great attention devoted to the subject, that the best way of coping with the question is by regulation rather than by restriction, and that the best way of promoting that regulation is by strengthening the powers of the magistrates in promoting order. To that end of late years all the measures of the Legislature have been directed; and it is because the powers given to the magistrates have not gone so far as the hon. Baronet thinks they ought to have gone that he now complains of the working of the system altogether. I propose, however, only to deal with the principle of the hon. Baronet's proposals, and I venture to think the House will hesitate before it gives its sanction to a scheme that attacks the rights of property in the way that the Bill now before the House does. It is true that a publican's licence only gives him the right of carrying on business for a year; but the custom of the licensing law has been to recognize his right to carry it on as long as he conducts his business in a manner beyond reproach; and relying on that understanding, a large amount of capital has been embarked in the trade. And the Bill gives no compensation. The Legislature will never sanction the arbitrary decision of the majority of ratepayers in a district to deprive a man of his property and his business. Let us look, too, at the practicability of the measure, and at its working. If the hon. Baronet's Bill passed, and the vote of a majority closed the houses in a particular district, the defeated minority would set to work, and, rapidly becoming a majority, would perhaps in the very next year compel them to re-open those same houses; and the district, in the meanwhile, would be a scene of turmoil, confusion, and passion. But, more than all that, I ask the House whether the passing of the Bill would not at once deprive us of the great safeguard we possess for the good conduct of those houses, from the fact that capital is vested in them, and that the occupier knows that it is staked on the good conduct of his business? Would not the fact that no compensation is given tend to do away with that safeguard? The whole gist of the arguments used to-day in favour of the Bill comes to this—Are you prepared to entrust to the local districts the power of legislation on this question? If you are, I say you will be commencing a system which you may not be able to stop, for other questions will arise in which it will be proposed to proceed in the same way; for the House will be practically confessing its inability to legislate on the subject by handing over to the caprice or accidental state of opinion prevailing at a particular time among the inhabitants of a locality the power Parliament has hitherto exercised itself. If you do, you will have legislation of different kinds exercised in different places, according to the views of the majority that may prevail in those places. Surely nothing can be more detrimental to the interests of the country than to have your laws administered according to caprice or accident. But surely there are other ways in which the House can deal with this subject of intemperance in a more practical manner than the hon. Baronet proposes, and without acting so arbitrarily as regards property. He complains that the House has rejected every measure that has been brought forward from his point of view. But if the House would really cope with this evil in a manner likely to be effective, it must do so by giving greater power to the magistrates of the country—by giving them a more complete control over all the houses so as to limit them to the wants of the district—and by considering whether, under the circumstances, restrictions should not be applied to the sale of spirits throughout the country, so as to limit the facilities which have of late been so largely extended. It is only in those houses where magistrates have not full control that the number of licences have increased; if the magistrates have shown so much discretion in the exercise of the powers they at present have, surely we may expect good results if further powers are entrusted to them. In that way I think very beneficial results may be obtained, and by unobjectionable means. The Bill of the hon. Member will be operative, as has been urged, precisely in those places where it is not needed, while it will fail to affect those in which a remedy is really needed. That view is practically expressed by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. E. Noel), when he says that he shall vote for the Bill, not because he likes or approves it, but simply as a protest against the present law. When hon. Members advance an argument of that nature their course is hardly calculated to advance the cause which they have at heart. They are, in fact, advocating what they have no faith in—a course which does not add to the dignity of the discussions of the House of Commons. Looking at the details of the Bill, there are some points which seem to have been entirely overlooked by the hon. Baronet. He has provided a system for taking votes in a kind of election with regard to this matter; he has provided also that the votes shall be returned on a certain day and counted; but he has taken no care to guard against the fraudulent counting of the votes. There is no provision such as applies in Parliamentary elections to provide that the votes shall be counted in the presence of those who are interested on either side; and practically the whole matter in regard to elections is left in such a crude state that the hon. Baronet would find, if the Bill went to a Committee, that almost every provision would have to be remodelled. I believe that it would be impossible to pass the measure in its present shape, and I feel that any Bill should carry with it the views of the general body of the House. The hon. Baronet has told us that he is prepared to adopt the various suggestions which have been made to him, and he acknowledges that they would effect an improvement in the Bill. Now, I am of opinion that a Bill dealing with so serious and so grave a question ought to be more carefully prepared; and, at the same time, I am persuaded that in rejecting the measure the House will not be understood to assert that it is not interested in the suppression of drunkenness, but will merely say that this is not a practical mode in which the subject can be dealt with.

[BILL 42.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he had no objection to the preservation of the birds named in the Bill, chiefly aquatic birds, but objected to the means provided for carrying out this object. The Bill gave objectionable powers to gamekeepers and game preservers. It would also, as now framed, be of no practical value, and would, like the Small Birds Preservation Act, be enforced chiefly against poor people, while proprietors and others escaped.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

SWEDEN—EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT STOCKHOLM.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD (Lord STRAFFORD) wished to put Questions to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs upon a subject in which the English Protestant residents at Stockholm were much interested. About a century ago British and French Protestants obtained permission from the then King of Sweden, Gustavus III., to meet for Divine worship; but it was not until 1855 that a permanent Consular Chaplain was appointed. The maintenance of the chaplain was defrayed in the usual manner—namely, by an allowance from Her Majesty's Government equal to what British subjects contributed. Until 1866 Divine service was regularly performed in the Moravian Church lent for that purpose. In 1866 the present Episcopal Church of St. Peter and St. Sigfrid was consecrated by authority and opened for Divine worship. What was the cost of building and maintenance? The total amount spent from 1855 to 1875 for the building, maintenance, and administration of the church amounted to £10,859, of which the British Government contributed £5,134, British subjects, £5,498, and non-British subjects, £227. The annual Consular certificates required by and sent to the Foreign Office would, he believed, prove the accuracy of these figures. Up to May, 1875, there was no doubt as to the proprietary rights of the British Government and of British subjects in the church property; but in May, 1875, Her Majesty's Consul announced that as the Government had discontinued the annual grants in aid of Consular chaplaincies, he would no longer interfere in the management of the church affairs, and the Consul then retired. A Committee of Management was thereupon elected for a year, with power to fill up the then vacant chaplaincy. The Rev. J. Taylor, D.D., was nominated chaplain for the year. This was in July. On the 8th of December Dr. Taylor, in writing, gave notice of his intention to retire from the chaplaincy at the expiration of his term. This was accepted by the Committee. Subsequently, Dr. Taylor wished to withdraw his resignation, and asked for the help of Her Majesty's Minister at Stockholm in the matter. The Consul at first used his good offices with the Committee, but subsequently retired from any further interference; and the matter was considered as finally settled, and the Committee began to look out for a successor to Dr. Taylor. But now commenced the difficulties of the case, for Dr. Taylor's friends dissolved the legally appointed Committee, appointed a new one, and on the 14th of February last re-elected him as chaplain. They requested the former Committee to give up the keys of the church, the books, and other church property, which request was refused. The church was closed, various demands and counter demands were made by both of these Committees; and after sundry legal proceedings had been taken, on the 31st of March the Governor of Stockholm demanded from the British Committee the keys of the church; and on these being refused the doors of the church were on the 1st of last April forced, and Dr. Taylor and his friends were now in full possession. The matter had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown in England, and he now wished to know whether the Secretary of State could give any information on the subject. He thought it right to add that the remarks he had made were founded upon a printed statement forwarded to him from Stockholm and signed by five gentlemen, one of whom was a personal acquaintance of his own. Without wishing to offer any opinion on the points at issue, he still felt that the question was one of much interest and importance to the English Protestant community at Stockholm. The Question he desired to ask of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary was, Whether he could give any information respecting the case of the British Church Committee who are resisting before the Swedish Courts an attempt to deprive the British Government and British subjects of their proprietary rights in the Church property at Stockholm?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the question which his noble Friend had brought under the notice of their Lordships was one which had attracted a good deal of local interest, and therefore he thought that his noble Friend was right in calling attention to it. At the same time, he did not know whether he could give the noble Viscount much information in addition to that of which he had shown himself to be in possession. To the best of his recollection, the details stated by the noble Viscount were an accurate account of the transaction, and resolved themselves into this:—In consequence of a decision come to by the late Government with respect to Consular grants to such chaplaincies, the grant to the chaplain at Stockholm was withdrawn. The question now at issue was this—the old Church Committee, composed of British residents, claimed the church as the property of British subjects; while the party represented by the rival Committee claimed it as the property of the whole of that community at Stockholm which professed the religion of the Church of England, whatever might be the nationalities of the persons composing that community. Her Majesty's Government had consulted the Law Officers, and the Law Officers had advised against any interference by the Government:—they regarded the case as one which ought to be dealt with by the Swedish Tribunals before which it now was. There was some ambiguity in the wording of the title deeds of the land on which the church was erected, and the construction which should be put upon those deeds was the question which the Swedish Courts would have to determine. The old Committee was willing that the church should be vested in the Bishop of London; but the other Committee, without whose consent that proposed arrangement could not be carried out, would not accede to such a settlement. Her Majesty's Government had been asked more than once to make a representation on the subject to the Swedish Government, but they had declined to do so, because in its present stage the dispute was of a purely legal character, and he presumed that the Swedish Government neither would desire, nor would have the right, to take it out of the hands of the Swedish Tribunals.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that the difficulty that had arisen at Stockholm was only one out of several that had arisen from the hasty and inconsiderate manner in which the British Government had withdrawn our support from the Consular chaplaincies abroad. When the Government determined on that step some arrangements should have been made by which the present difficulties might have been avoided.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, without entering into the question raised by the right rev. Prelate, desired to express his opinion that the decision carried out by the Foreign Office when his noble Friend (Earl Granville) was at the head of that Department was a right one. It was only reasonable that British subjects who lived abroad should maintain the churches in which they worshipped. The only exception to that rule ought to be that of churches attended by British seamen who were only temporarily resident in the places where those churches stood.

TURKEY—THE TREATY OF PARIS, 1856.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any objection to state in what position this country stands with regard to the Treaty signed at Paris on the 15th of April, 1856, between Great Britain, Austria, and France, guaranteeing the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire; and, whether the Suzerainty exercised by Turkey over the Tributary States of Servia and Roumania is included in that guarantee? The noble Earl said, he thought it would materially assist to enlighten the public mind on a subject which at the present time, owing to its great importance, much engrossed public attention, if, without inconvenience to Her Majesty's Government, it could be stated how far—to what extent—this country is pledged by Treaty to maintain the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The Question which he proposed to put to the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office he had endeavoured to separate as far as possible from collateral questions of great interest at the present moment, believing that their Lordships would be put in possession of all information as to the state of affairs in the East at the earliest possible time; but it seemed to him important to know—more especially as regarded the future—what the exact position of this country was with reference to guarantees by Treaties of the integrity and independence of Turkey. This was the more necessary as since the Treaty of Paris, which was, perhaps, sufficiently distinct, other Treaties had been entered into; and, as would be in their Lordships' remembrance, one important part of the Treaty of Paris relating to Russian ships of war in the Black Sea had been abrogated by the Treaty signed at London in 1871. He was not aware, however, that anything had been done to weaken the force of the Treaty of Paris or of the Treaty which almost immediately followed it with reference to the Question which he had put to his noble Friend; but events had occurred, and might occur again, which might make it incumbent upon the Government of this country to consider further what course they should pursue. In order to make clear what he wished to bring under the notice of the noble Earl he must ask their Lordships to allow him to refer for a moment to the Treaties which bore upon this subject. By the Treaty of Paris, signed March 30, 1856, Art. 7, it was recited that—

“Their Majesties engage, each on his part, to respect the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire; guarantee in common the strict observance of that engagement, and will, in consequence, consider any act tending to its violation as a question of general interest.”

Then, as regarded the tributary States, there was Art. 22, which recited that—

“The Principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia shall continue to enjoy under the suzerainty of the Porte and under the guarantee of the Contracting Powers the privileges and immunities of which they are in possession.”

Next, with reference to Servia, it was recited by Art. 28, that—

“The Principality of Servia shall continue to hold of the Sublime Porte in conformity with the Imperial Hatts which fix and determine its rights and immunities, placed henceforward under the collective guarantee of the Contracting Powers. In consequence the said Principality shall preserve its independent and national administration as well as full liberty of worship, of legislation, of commerce, and of navigation.”

Now, the Treaty of Paris was followed very shortly by another Treaty between England, Austria, and France, reiterating the guarantee of the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire, and in stronger terms, by Art. 1—

“The High Contracting Parties guarantee jointly and severally the independence and the integrity of the Ottoman Empire recorded in the Treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of March, 1856.”

Again, Art. 2 recited that—

“Any infraction of the said Treaty will be considered by the Powers signing the present Treaty as casus belli. They will come to an understanding with the Sublime Porte as to the measures which have become necessary, and will without delay determine among themselves as to the employment of their military and naval forces.”

Their Lordships would observe that in the first Treaty any violation of the engagement entered into was to be made a question of “general interest,” while in the second Treaty the violation of the guarantee was made a “casus belli.” It would seem, therefore, that this country was bound to consider as a casus belli any violation of the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire recorded in the Treaty of Paris. There remained the further Question which he wished to put to his noble Friend, Did this guarantee of the integrity of Turkey include the Suzerainty of that country over the tributary States of Servia and Roumania? Was this country bound by Treaty to keep them in a state of vassalage, and had this Treaty any bearing upon the recent armaments in Besika Bay? It was impossible to suppose that this country would long look with indifference upon the struggles which had so often disturbed those countries—little known and little cared for—which lie to the eastward of the eastern shores of the Adriatic. One, Montenegro, had fought for and maintained its liberty and independence; another, like Herzegovina, was under the dominion of the Turks; another, like Servia, was in a state of vassalage to Turkey. It was a grave question, what was to be the future of these countries? Should their desire for independence be repressed by foreign interference? Should progress in civilization be checked? Should commerce be impeded by ports and harbours being kept in the hands of a foreign Power? He believed this country would watch the progress of events with the deepest interest, and, while earnestly desiring a peaceful issue, would look with sympathy for lasting and enduring results which had long been desired but never realized.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The best answer I can give to my noble Friend is to read the words of the Treaty, or at least of the material parts of the Treaty itself. The Treaty I refer to is that of the 15th of April, 1856, by which, in the First Article, Great Britain, Austria, and France—

“Guarantee jointly and severally the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, in accordance with the Treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of March, 1856.”

The Second Article of this Treaty of the 15th of April, 1856, recites that—

“Any infraction of the said Treaty will be considered by the Powers signing the present Treaty as casus belli. They will come to an understanding with the Sublime Porte as to the measures which have become necessary, and will, without delay, determine among themselves as to the employment of their military and naval forces.”

These are the words of the Treaty; and as far as I know that Treaty has not been invalidated or modified by any subsequent Treaty or any diplomatic document whatever. I do not understand that my noble Friend has asked me, and I do not think your Lordships will ask me, to do what would be hardly possible, and which if it were possible would be inconvenient and dangerous—namely, to enter on a purely hypothetical discussion as to the circumstances under which guarantees of that kind are to be held absolutely binding on the countries which have joined in them. No doubt they give us a right of interference, and no doubt, under certain circumstances, they might constitute on our part a duty to interfere; but what are the precise circumstances under which this right of interference ought to be exercised is a question which I think no one ought to be called upon to determine, and which no one can determine till the case actually arises. I am bound to point out that my noble Friend is under a misapprehension as to the drift and purport of the Second Article of the Treaty. There is no doubt that Roumania and Servia as States under the suzerainty of the Porte are included in that general guarantee of the integrity and the independence of the Ottoman Empire; but I submit that my noble Friend misapprehends the meaning of the Treaty when he asks whether it constitutes an engagement on our part or that of either of the other Powers who are parties to it to interfere in the internal affairs of the Ottoman Empire and interpose between the Turkish Government and States tributary to that Government. Evidently that was not contemplated by the Treaty, whatever may be its scope and meaning. The guarantee is one of the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire against external aggression; but it never was contemplated, and, indeed, it would be quite impossible, that we should be bound to take part on the one side or the other in internal quarrels arising between the authorities at Constantinople and the populations within the limits of the Turkish Provinces or Dependencies.

SALMON FISHERIES ACT, 1873— FISHERY BOARD.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether "The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873," confers the right of nominating representative members of fishery boards on persons purchasing licences to fish for salmon in public or common waters during the preceding fishing season; and, whether the fishermen who purchased from the Wye Fishery Board licences to fish for salmon in the common waters of the River Wye, otherwise called "The Free Water of Hoarwithy," in the fishing seasons of 1873, 1874, and 1875, have at any time nominated a representative member to the Wye Fishery Board; and, if not, whether he will postpone the consideration of the bye-laws recently made by the Wye Fishery Board, and calculated seriously to affect the interest of the common water fishermen, until a representative member has been nominated and elected by them in accordance with the provisions of "The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1873 did confer the right of nominating members of Fishery Boards on persons purchasing licences to fish for salmon in public or common waters during the preceding fishing season. With regard to the second paragraph of the Question he understood that the right was disputed, and it was at present a question of law whether the free water of Hoarwithy did constitute a public water. The persons licensed to fish the free water of the Hoarwithy had not yet nominated a representative, and in a disputed question he did not think he would be justified in coercing the action of the Board.

ARMY—MILITIA STOREHOUSES IN MIDDLESEX.—QUESTION.

MR. COOPE asked the Secretary of State for War, When Her Majesty's Government intend to relieve the rate-payers of the county of Middlesex from the burden of maintaining seven Militia storehouses, now occupied by the Crown for nearly four years, either by obtaining possession of them under "The Military Forces Localization Act, 1872," or giving them up with certificates that they are not required, under "The Militia Pay and Storehouses Act, 1873?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: A contract has been entered into for building a storehouse, with a view to setting free those at Turnham Green, Uxbridge, and Hounslow, and it is hoped they can be given up in 1878. An offer has been made to the county to rent the premises at Bethnal Green and Dalston. There are reasons against purchasing the buildings at Barnet and Hampstead; but the War Office will be prepared to treat with the county for their hire.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—KEYNSHAM BRITISH SCHOOL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, If it is true that the Education Department has refused an annual grant to the Keynsham British School; and, if so, what are the grounds of such refusal?

VISCOUNT SANDON: An annual grant has been refused to a British school at Keynsham, which has recently been re-opened after having been closed for some five years. It was refused on the following grounds:—In 1871 a British school was closed at Keynsham; in 1872 the Department gave notice to the place that there was a deficiency of school accommodation for 38 children, and that if the British school was re-opened with a certificated teacher, or the parish school enlarged to the extent I mentioned, no further accommodation would be required. The British school was not re-opened; but the National public elementary school complied with the request of the Department, and supplied the necessary accommodation at a considerable cost. The British school remained closed for five years, and this year we were informed that it was to be re-opened, and we were asked to give an annual grant. This we refused, as we considered it would be unfair to do so, considering that sufficient accommodation had been provided in a public elementary school at the bidding of the Department, because the British school declined to re-open its doors.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked whether the school district of Keynsham was under the School Board or not?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I think not.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the noble Lord, whether it was competent for the Privy Council to refuse a grant to any school with a certificated teacher because there was a Church school in the district?

VISCOUNT SANDON replied that if the hon. Member would give Notice of the Question he would answer it.

MR. MUNDELLA gave Notice that he would put the Question to-morrow.

INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET.

QUESTION.

MR. LEITH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Government are prepared to name a day for bringing forward, in this House, the Indian Budget?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I do not think that it would be for the convenience of the House that the Indian Budget should be discussed before the Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the depreciation of silver is in the hands of Members. When that Report is published, I hope that the state of Public Business will be such as to enable me to give a definite answer.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870)—SCHOOL BOARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether doubts have not arisen as to the legal construction of Rules 12 and 14 of the First Part of the Second Schedule of "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," whereby the absence of a member of the School Board during six successive months is held to constitute a disqualification of such member for the whole of his life; and, if so, whether he proposes to introduce an amendment of the Law in this respect?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Questions have been addressed to the Education Department as to the proper construction of Rules 12 and 14 of the first part of the second schedule of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and the opinion has always been expressed by the Department to the effect that a member of a school board who has been absent for six months, and whose cause of absence has not been approved by the board, is not eligible for re-election. I am not prepared to say at this moment, in answer to my hon. Friend, whether we shall propose any amendment of the law on this subject.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT—HARROGATE BOARD OF HEALTH.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLS asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the dismissal by the Harrogate Board of Health of their medical officer, Dr. De Ville; and whether any action will be taken by the Government in reference to the matter?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that several memorials and representations had been received from Harrogate; but whether it would be expedient for the Government to take any action on the subject depended on certain technical matters, which were now being inquired into.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS ACT—YARMOUTH ELECTION.

QUESTION.

SIR EDMUND LACON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the late Election for North Norfolk a lunatic pauper was taken from the Yarmouth Workhouse to vote, by a written order from the chairman of the Yarmouth Board of Guardians; and to know what steps he proposes to take to prevent such irregularity for the future; and, whether the Board of Guardians have refused to give any explanation?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that a statement to the effect mentioned by the hon. Member had been submitted to him by some of the Guardians of Yarmouth Union. In the ordinary course a copy of that communication was sent to the Board of Guardians, the reply to which was received two days ago. The Guardians said they had no remarks to make. He would, however, take care that the matter should be inquired into; but it did not follow that there had been any irregularity. That would depend entirely upon the circumstances of the case.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

[BILL 155.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Sandon.)

MR. MUNDELLA, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the recommendations contained in the recent Report of the Factory and Workshops Acts Commission, relating to the enforcement of the attendance of children at school, should be introduced in any measure for improving the elementary education of the people," said, it was not without considerable disappointment and regret that he felt it his duty to submit that Amendment. He had hoped that after the able Report of the Royal Commission had been for some weeks in the hands of Members, and after the encouraging speeches of the Home Secretary on the passing of the Factory Bill and the appointment of the Royal Commission on the factories—more especially his speeches in the country—that no measure of education would have been introduced to that House which was so utterly feeble and ineffective as that which had just been brought forward for second reading. His object in moving this Amendment was not to impede the progress of the Bill, for he had been always ready to help forward any measure for the education of the people; but his object was to remove from the Bill defects which the noble Lord himself acknowledged to exist when he introduced it. There had rarely been a more bold and graphic picture drawn of the state of education in this country than that which had been put before the House by the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) on that occasion. If such a statement had been made by any private Member even within the last 10 or 15 years it would have been utterly ridiculed. What was the statement which the noble Lord put before the House so graphically? He said that the school accommodation which the country provided was, at the lowest calculation, for 3,250,000 children; that the daily attendance was only 1,800,000; that the number of children presented for examination in any Standard, from the First to the Sixth, barely reached one-fifth; and that out of the whole number of 1,800,000 in daily attendance, only 200,000 were presented in the three higher Standards. The noble Lord did not say how many "passed" in any Standard. He spared the House that humiliation; but stated, in passing, that the number was not at all satisfactory or commensurate with the great expense which had been incurred in providing education for the children. The noble Lord appealed to the House not to make this a Party question. There were some Members on the Liberal side of the House who never had made any educational question a Party question, and it was to be hoped that the noble Lord would not let it be made a Party question on his own side. The result of the noble Lord's statement was that 1,000,000 children were not receiving a decent education, and after those frank admissions it might have been expected that the measure which he would bring in would be equal to the occasion. The noble Lord himself characterized it as a bold and cautious measure. All measures of this kind ought to be cautious; but he could not agree with the noble Lord that this measure was a bold one. The first part of his speech was bold enough; but the measure itself was as inferior to the promise as it could possibly be. The noble Lord said that he was thoroughly impressed with the gravity and importance of the question; that the country was thoroughly ripe for legislation; that the time and the circumstances were favourable, and that the Government ran no kind of risk in dealing with the subject in a bold and effective spirit. The noble Lord said he had watched the operation of the system since its introduction, and having seen how much the public was in favour of it he should be sorry if the question were made a Party one. He concurred in that expression of the noble Lord. The noble Lord told them that the time had come when he could put the coping-stone on the educational edifice. In these circumstances one would have expected that we should have had a real educational measure brought forward by the Government, and not what amounted to a reversal of the policy of 1870. Did this measure meet the educational requirements of the country? Was it, or was it not, a reversal of the policy of 1870? What were the educational requirements of the country? The educational position of the country was briefly this:—About one-half of the children were attending schools under bye-laws approved by the Educational Department. The noble Lord said that nearly half of the population were under school boards, where those bye-laws were in force, and where the local authorities made it obligatory on the parents to send their children to school; but the other half of the country was under no kind of educational control, excepting that which was established by the Labour Acts. The noble Lord said there were millions of children in the country who did not attend school at all. Where, he (Mr. Mundella) asked, were those millions of children? He would tell the House: they were in that section of the country which was not covered by the school boards, and wherever there were school boards with compulsory powers there were comparatively few children outside the school. Take nearly all the large towns in England, and it would be found that the increase had been from 60 to 100 per cent on the average attendance at school where there was compulsion. What had the Labour Acts done for education? They only led to general confusion, general inconvenience and dissatisfaction, and in reference to the factories and mines they were a constant cause of confusion. Why should the country have conflicting rules on this question? The noble Lord said—"What we want is simplicity and uniformity of management." Educationally considered, those Acts had been of little use. The Factory Act of 1874 did some good in providing that no child should pass from school into full-time labour until he had passed the Fourth Standard of education; and under the operation of that rule 11 children were rejected in one day, and sent back to school for another year; and if the law had not been passed, those factory children would be in the streets instead of at school. Wherever school boards had been established the education of the children had, he believed, been well attended to, and the noble Lord deserved credit for having stood by them; but where there were no school boards the effect of this legislation had proved absolutely mischievous. So long as we simply prohibited employment, and did not compel attendance, so long must the result be a failure. Where school boards did not exist we had absenteeism, irregularity, with all the consequences of ignorance and neglect. It would have been natural to suppose that the object of the Bill brought in by the noble Lord would have been to bring about in the non-school board districts by some machinery, whatever it might be, precisely the same state of things which existed in the school board districts. There were, as the noble Lord had said, many hon. Members who objected to school boards, but who were willing to accept any machinery which would accomplish the same end. But what had the noble Lord done? He had brought in a measure which, instead of giving us simplicity and uniformity of arrangement, would tend only to confusion, and to weaken the whole character of the education of the country. He proposed to bring about that uniformity and simplicity by creating two authorities, who might delegate their powers to a third. We had at present the school board elected by the whole borough or parish, with the cumulative vote, in order that the representation of minorities might be complete. Then we had the town council, which did not represent the whole borough, but simply districts marked out as wards, and not elected by numbers, nor with the cumulative vote. Outside the boroughs we had the Board of Guardians, a body elected for an entirely different purpose, and having no kind of educational proclivities. It was not elected by numbers; there was no cumulative vote in that case either; it was election by property, and not by numbers. The unpaid magistracy of this country were very much opposed to education. ["No, no!"] He maintained that the county magistrates of this country hated education as a rule. ["No, no!"] Conservative Members outside the House did not hesitate to say the same thing. At present the ex officio members generally did not take much interest in the work of the Guardians, now that it mainly had to do with the administration of relief; but now the magistrates and clergy would have every inducement to attend, in order to bring their influence to bear on education. Then, by way of "simplicity and uniformity," the noble Lord introduced new districts and new areas which did not always agree with those of towns. At Nottingham, for instance, the Board of Guardians had jurisdiction over some rural districts, but the town was under a school board; so that while they could do nothing in the town, they were all-powerful in those outlying districts. In Sheffield they had two school boards; but the Board of Guardians included the whole town, plus a small parish hard by in Derbyshire, and thus, while the Sheffield board had nothing to do with education in the town, it could direct this small village in Derbyshire. In fact, there were, according to official information, only two counties in England in which the Unions did not embrace portions of neighbouring counties; and there was a Union in Northamptonshire which comprised parishes in no fewer than six or seven counties adjacent. The next object of the Bill was to set up a standard of education for the children in the rural districts, and what was that standard? It was that any child who, at 10 years of age, applied to be employed must show that he had attended school 250 times a year for five years. That was, in fact, only half a year's attendance in each year; and, on looking further into the Bill, he found that these attendances need not be attendances in consecutive years, but that the child might be one year at the age of two in an infant school, attend dame schools in other and intermittent years, and at last satisfy the provision of the Bill with two half-years' attendances just before reaching the age of 10. That was the kind of education it was proposed to give in non-school board districts; 250 attendances in each year for five years was to be considered an ample education in these districts. The noble Lord proposed to substitute indirect compulsion for direct compulsion; or, in other words, he would prevent the child labouring until he was 10 years of age, but would not compel him to go to school. He had grave doubts as to the wisdom of preventing a child beginning to labour until certain things had been done, for that amounted in effect to visiting on the child the neglect of his parents. The Bill, he contended, was in several important respects a reversal of the policy of the Act of 1870, which fixed upon the parents the responsibility of the education of their children. The noble Lord, it was true, said that he left optional whether a district should adopt compulsion or not; but there was a reason for taking that course in 1870 which no longer existed, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) then said, that in introducing the novel system of compulsion he did not provide for it in his Bill, because two years must elapse before the necessary buildings could be erected which would enable the Legislature to force children to go to school, but that in two or three years he believed the country would be ripe for such a system. The right hon. Gentleman went even a step further, and made it compulsory that the children of paupers should be educated. The Bill of the noble Lord now required that the children of the poor, not paupers, should only be required to give half a year's attendance in each year for five years, without compulsion of any kind. The Factories Act of 1874 had been fairly and honourably carried out in Lancashire and Yorkshire, where children up to 12 years of age could not be employed unless they were at school for half-time. But this Bill would, under the age of 10 years, give the parents in outside urban and rural districts the power of sending their children to work in many domestic manufactures—such as straw-plaiting, lace-making, and other work, without sending them to school, where the children would be subject to no regulation as to hours. Whereas if they were sent into factories they would be compelled to work only half-time, and receive schooling the other half. The Commission which was appointed last year to inquire into and report upon the working of the Factories Bill in textile manufactures, had made an extremely instructive and able Report, which concluded with only two or three recommendations. They visited every part of the manufacturing districts; they examined 700 witnesses from all parts of those districts. Their recommendations as to education were—that the attendance of all children, whether at work or not (with certain exceptions), should be enforced by law; that the school age should be from 5 to 13 years; that the rule of attendance should be that of a full attendance for five hours daily; and that half-time attendance should be conceded as a privilege to all children who were beneficially employed after 10 years of age. The recommendations of the Commissioners and their able Report, on which this Bill was professedly based, had been thrown over, for no other reason, he was afraid, than Party exigencies. The Bill only adopted one of the recommendations of the Commissioners—namely, that no child should be employed until it had reached the age of 10 years. Some idea of the kind of education likely to be imparted under the proposed system might be obtained from the reasonable excuses which exempted a child from attendance at school. The 11th section stated that—

“A person shall not be deemed to have taken any child into his employment contrary to the provisions of this Act if it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court having cognizance of the case either that during the employment there is not within two miles, measured according to the nearest road, from the residence of such child any public elementary school which the child can attend.”

He maintained, however, that there ought to be a public elementary school within two miles of every residence. Another exception to the prohibition of the employment of children was if the employment were in the hay harvest, corn harvest, or hop picking, or was otherwise necessary for the ingathering of the crops. He wanted to know why the noble Lord had not the courage to say that children who were prohibited from working ought to be in attendance at school. In the North of England there was outside the towns a vast population which was not really a rural but an urban population, and why should the children in such places be employed while those inside the adjacent towns were at school? Again, why should there be a distinction between England and Scotland? Public opinion in Scotland would scout a man who allowed his child five half-year attendances up to the age of 10 and then sent him to work. Why, he wished to know, should the cities and towns of England have a good system of education while the rural districts had a bad one? The opposition to compulsion did not proceed from the artisans or the agricultural labourers. Some of the provisions of the Bill related to what the noble Lord called “wastrel” children. Manufacturers applied that term to every article which was spoilt in the course of manufacture, and if this Bill became law it would create more “wastrel” children than had hitherto existed in our large towns. The noble Lord said the idea of compelling the parent by law to send his children, broke down the feeling of personal independence; but in many other ways compulsion was introduced without having that effect. In this case its application would be of the most beneficial character, individually and nationally. Yesterday it was admitted by almost every Member who addressed the House that the moral character of the nation could only be raised by higher education and improved social condition. We were dealing now with the very first steps of education, and ought to lay a sound foundation. Many of the contests between labour and capital arose from what he might fairly call ignorance. He might say that the strikes which had taken place within the last five years had cost at least £30,000,000 more than the education of the whole country would have cost for years, and until the ignorance out of which those disputes arose was removed, we could not have improved social conditions. In another respect this was an important national question. Our artisans had to compete with foreign workmen, and yet, as the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had observed, we sent them into the field armed with “Brown Bess” against competitors who were armed with weapons of precision. Education was now a great public necessity. They were gradually extending the franchise, so that in time the agricultural labourer would be in possession of it, and that being so, it became the duty of the State to see that he was so far educated as to understand the value of the right which he possessed. He hoped he should hear no more about the expense of carrying out a complete system. He found from a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Leicester that in the course of the 24 years between 1851 and 1875, the Church of England—he ought perhaps to say the clergy of the Church, for in reality the Church itself had done very little in the matter—had contributed towards securing the general education of the country £9,700,000, that the contribution of the other religious bodies had been £2,032,000, and the Government £12,390,000—in all somewhere between £24,000,000 and £25,000,000. That was the whole contribution of the richest nation, and of the richest Churches in the world, to the great cause of national education, whereas the little State of Massachusetts had, in the course of five years, raised $5,462,000 for the same purpose by means of local taxation. And this was not the whole sum paid for education in Massachusetts. Pennsylvania spent still more than Massachusetts—$6,000,000 or $7,000,000 a-year; and with such examples he hoped no more would be heard of the expense of education in this country. The present Government did not shrink from increasing expenditure. Why should they not do for British education what they were doing for British armament? He had dealt only with the educational phase of the question, leaving other Members to state other objections to the Bill. In conclusion, he asked the noble Lord not to identify his name with a measure which would hang up the question of education for several years. Some years hence its complete failure would be admitted, and some future Minister would do for it what the noble Lord was doing for the Agricultural Children Act—repeal it. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in seconding the Amendment, said, the country looked in vain in this Bill for a distinct enunciation of the great principle which must underlie every system of national education—the principle that every parent should provide for the elementary education of his child according to his means. Considering the state of the education question, the hope that such a principle would be recognized in the Bill was not unreasonable. One would have thought that the range of permissiveness had been exhausted during the six years since 1870, and that the necessity for any Bill lay in the very fact that the time had expired during which any further extension of trustworthy education could be hoped for from the permissive principle. The contagious influence upon neighbouring areas of the system at work, in what might be called the compulsory areas, had prepared the minds of those still outside for the more distinct enactment of a universal compulsory law. He wished to draw attention to the opinions of the authorized advisers of the noble Lord—Mr. Cumin, Assistant Secretary to the Education Department, and that able Inspector of Schools, the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, as expressed in their evidence before the Royal Commission on Factories and Workshops. Mr. Cumin admitted that the people were much more disposed to submit to compulsion than they had been 10 years ago, and Mr. Kennedy stated that the population were gradually becoming accustomed to the compulsory system. Yet, in face of the views of their own Commission, the Government had put indirect compulsion in the forefront of their Bill. He put aside Clause 7, dealing with “wastrel” children, because he trusted it would mean nothing, as there were serious defects in it as an instrument of coercion. The indirect compulsion of this measure consisted in stopping children from going to work at a certain age unless they had completed a specified number of attendances at school, or unless they could pass certain Standards, that was to say you were to tell them—when they wanted to work—that, because by the neglect of their parents and of the State they were ignorant, we would take care that they should also be idle; because by no fault of their own, their mind was unskilled and could never gain the suppleness and polish of their fellows, therefore, care would be taken that their hands should be placed at an equal disadvantage, and that they should lose a couple more years in idleness, neither helping themselves nor the community. Such a proposition only required to be stated to be scouted; and, besides, in the case of factory children you would be debarring them from the only chance of education they had, because if they went to work they would also have to go to school half-time. It was based on the last Agricultural Children Act, the effect of which had been either nugatory or detrimental. He believed this regulation as to the employment of children could only be carried out by the Inspectors, and that town councils and Guardians would decline to enforce it, because it would compel neglected children 10 years of age to remain for two years longer not only idle, but ignorant. His objection to this proposal was, further, that while by this Bill it was very properly affirmed that instruction, and not work, ought to be the business of children up to the age of 10, the wrong business was taken away from them without necessarily substituting for it the right business. A material loss was inflicted on the children, but the consideration for that loss was not secured to them, because while the Bill rightly raised the age of exemption from labour to the age of 10, it did not secure education in the meantime. The House had been told that they must be content to advance by steps. He (Mr. Ashley) agreed in that, but this Bill only "marked time" by means of a compulsion that would not compel. It relieved the Government from a responsibility, but failed to bring home that responsibility to parents and others who have the charge of the children of this country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the recommendations contained in the recent Report of the Factory and Workshops Acts Commission, relating to the enforcement of the attendance of children at school, should be introduced in any measure for improving the elementary education of the people,"—(Mr. Mundella,)

—instead thereof.

MR. RIDLEY: I hope, Sir, that the speeches of the hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment and of the hon. Member for Poole who seconded him, are an intimation that the noble Lord was not too sanguine when, in introducing this Bill, he ventured to anticipate for it, if not in the most confident spirit, yet with some expectation of success, the impartial assistance of all those in this House who have taken, or are taking, a prominent part in furthering the educational interests of the nation. It is, unfortunately, too vividly within our knowledge that this ignorance of the masses has been often made the battleground of religious sects; nor are there wanting signs that the introduction of this measure, or, indeed, of any measure for supplementing the Act of 1870, will be made, as in former times, the occasion for a determined effort on the part of one section or the other to obtain indirect advantages in the struggle for supremacy. I will venture, Sir, in a spirit which I trust may not be thought either uncalled-for or presumptuous, to deprecate the intrusion of any such objects, whether avowed or not. I will endeavour, in the few remarks which I now ask the permission of the House to make, to avoid any such expression of feeling myself; and, further, I will claim for this Bill, no less than for the speech in which it was introduced to the House, the merit of being conceived with the single and loyal desire of supplementing the work done in 1870, of providing for needs created by that very Act, and even foreseen at the time of its being passed, and of its attempting to effect these objects without any unnecessary disturbance of existing machinery, and in accordance with the best public opinion of the country.

The very moderation, Sir, perhaps, of this Bill may be a bar to its progress. Partizans of one extreme or the other may have looked forward to finding proposals in it which it does not contain. They will make their efforts to amend in their own direction, and it is only too probable that failure may render them lukewarm towards a measure which contains much indeed of what they would admit to be universally approved, but little perhaps of what from their own particular standpoint is of the supremest importance. Such politicians may not be unwilling to sacrifice the immediate good, in hopes that the future may have better things in store for them, perhaps even that the agitation of an autumn or a year may strengthen the influence they may bring to bear upon public opinion and the Government. I trust, however, Sir, that this will not generally be the case. This is a Bill which, having been introduced, ought not to be allowed to drop. I hope the House will take a broad, practical view of it, and that we shall, so far as may be, waive our differences and even our prejudices for the common good. I trust, also, that the Government will show in their conduct of this Bill, as they have done in that of others, that while they can be conciliatory, they can at the same time be resolute and determined, and that once having set their hand to this work, they will not suffer it to languish or expire.

Now, Sir, as regards this Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield, I, for one, do not regret that it has been moved. Its object would be perfectly plain and intelligible, from its mere connection with the name of the hon. Member, whose views are well known to the House, even were it not for the unmistakable words in which it is couched, and its reference to the Report of the Factory Commissioners. And that object seems to me, Sir, whatever view one may take of its merits, to be a perfectly legitimate one. It involves, indeed, a point of distinct difference from the principle of the Bill, but it is not inconsistent with it, in so far as it is possible to contemplate it, if made, a part of the machinery of the measure. That measure, Sir, is based upon the universal recognition of all Parties, that means of education having been now provided throughout the country to an extent, if not entirely adequate, yet, at least, in excess of the numbers of children that can be got to attend, it is reasonable to provide further means than now exist for securing that the negligence or wilfulness of parents shall not be suffered to be a bar to their children receiving the simple elements of education, which the State declares it to be for their welfare as well as its own they should receive. With this object it proposes to extend and strengthen the existing provisions for indirect compulsion. It gives the ratepayers in school districts where there are no school boards the power of calling upon a local authority which already is there, to exercise that direct compulsion which cannot now be put in force without the election of a school board; and it gives also to these local authorities power to compel the attendance of those children whom the noble Lord called "wastrels." To propositions, therefore, of indirect compulsion, to the stringency of which some of my agricultural friends have already taken exception, but the safeguards to which more rigid educationists will wish to sweep away, the Bill adds direct compulsion, but at the will of the districts, and to some extent of the local authorities. The Amendment of my hon. Friend is to take away all option from the districts and authorities, and to establish a universal compulsory law. The object is one which he and others with whom he thinks sought to effect in 1870; it was then, as now, sought to be enforced by the example of various American and Continental States; but the hon. Member relies now to some extent upon the recent Report of the Factory Commissioners, and he has the advantage, too, whatever that advantage may be, of any sense of benefit which may have accrued from the working of the compulsory powers given by the old Act. These experiences have secured him, or done something, at all events, to secure him, the support of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who appears to be now of opinion that the country generally is ripe for the compulsion which is advocated by the hon. Member.

Now, so far, Sir, as the Report of the Factory Commissioners is concerned, I must altogether demur to its being produced as an argument for universal direct compulsion. Their general recommendation which my hon. Friend wishes by his Amendment to adopt may, indeed, be received with the attention and respect which the separate opinions of those Gentlemen who concurred in it deserve. Such weight, and I do not deny it is great weight, it will no doubt possess. But to ask Members of this House, and especially those who represent agricultural constituencies, to accept legislation of this kind upon the ground of the authoritative advice of a Commission, whose inquiry did not legitimately embrace so wide a field, and who, in fact, made no inquiry whatever into the special circumstances of agricultural districts—advice again which was upon this very ground not concurred in by one of their Colleagues, the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don)—such a course does appear to me to be a somewhat extraordinary proposition. It is one, at all events, against which I protest, and which I entirely decline to accept.

I say, then, Sir, that this Amendment has no claim to such a sanction as the hon. Member attempts on this ground to attach to it. Nor, again, have we anything to do with other countries. In the freedom of our institutions at any rate we cannot admit ourselves to be anything but leaders and examples, not followers of others, a boast no less true than that of the Athenians of old; and no unimportant part of that freedom is based upon that independence of character which is partly the outcome and partly itself the cause of the local self-government which we enjoy. Government by police and Inspectors may have worked well elsewhere—even there perhaps at a cost not at first sight apparent. Even to the extent to which it has been employed in the working of the Factory and Workshop Acts, are you quite sure that their partial failure may not be due to the invidious light in which the Inspectors you have been obliged to employ have been regarded? But let us at least be cautious how we advance upon such a path. Let us remember that law to be effective in a free country must follow and not lead public opinion. And in this case as in others we do not want the public opinion of other countries—we do not even want their example, certainly not as to details. What we do want, no less for its own sake than for its indirect effect in the maintenance of our national character, is the free action of our own people, urged on, if you will, by the advice, by the example, by the direction of those who have influence over them; but being rather educated in this way up to the abandonment of prejudices, and the self-imposition, if need be, of restrictions, than made to acquiesce discontentedly in law which they cannot understand and will reluctantly obey.

Let the Amendment then, Sir, of my hon. Friend stand or fall not upon the recommendation of a Commission in this matter of no corporate authority, nor upon facts or precedents deduced from other countries; let it rather be decided by seeing what the principles upon which we have hitherto acted, and the experience we possess, show to be the most prudent alike and the most statesmanlike course.

Now, Sir, the point at which we have arrived in this educational matter—and I will promise not to travel more than necessary beyond the Amendment of my hon. Friend—the point at which we have arrived seems to be this—Up to a comparatively recent period—and speaking now exclusively of England—the State practically ignored the general elementary education of the country. It is a fact to be regretted—but still no less a fact. By the agency, however, and exertions of private individuals, of societies, of religious denominations, a large number of schools were established throughout the country, which ultimately obtained recognition at the hands of the State, so that public grants were made both for building and maintenance, conditions being attached to such grants on the method known as the payment by results. All these exertions, however, and all the self-sacrifice which they entailed, did not succeed in meeting what were universally felt to be the legitimate requirements of society, and in 1870, many previous efforts, which I need not now refer to having been made, a great advance was achieved by the Act of that year which was passed under the vigorous but temperate guidance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster). The intention primarily of that Act was, it will be admitted, to create rate schools in districts where there was a proved educational deficiency. It was an Act essentially supplementary—the State even still maintaining a part which may fairly be called subordinate, so that even now education rests in the country much more upon the traditions and habits of the people than on State help. It was felt, however, that the money of the ratepayers having been taken to erect schools—it was right and proper that they should have through their elected representatives the power of compelling the attendance of the children for whom they were thus bound to provide. Compulsion of an indirect character, and imposed originally as much from humanitarian motives and reasons of health, as with the object of education, had obtained for some time in crowded manufacturing centres. These regulations were left unaltered and unextended, but the provisions of the general Act were, on the lines I have indicated, made of universal application. The results of this legislation were well summarized by the noble Lord when he introduced this Bill, and constitute indeed the reasons for its introduction. Great efforts having been made, and made successfully, by voluntary enterprize to provide good and efficient schools it is felt yet that there lack some ready means for compelling the children to come in. How is this power to be exercised or conferred? The Bill now before us, stringent as it is in many respects, proceeds upon the old lines of voluntary local action. The Amendment of the hon. Member proposes action yet more decisive. He does not wish to supersede indirect, but he would take away the local option of direct compulsion.

Now, Sir, before dealing shortly with the objections which I have to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman and his Friends, I should like to premise that we who in this House are not dealing with this matter either as educationists entirely or as members of voluntary bodies whether religious or otherwise, but as statesmen, ought not to be carried away by the enthusiasm however laudable of either of these classes. It is natural that persons who have the education of the ignorant deeply at heart should perhaps be little inclined to scrutinize the means of forcing it upon the unwilling parent—it is only natural too that every voluntary body should show a strong interest in promoting compulsion of whatever kind, so that the increase of their fees should diminish the heavy burden they have now to bear. Let us, however, in this House, while not forgetful of these considerations, remember also that our function is to make use, indeed, of these impulses; but, at the same time, to moderate them, and that we are responsible for enacting legislation which may be useless, or even harmful, if it be not such that it can be practically worked, and reasonably obeyed.

There is one class I do not know whether I am not stretching a point in calling them educationists, who do not lack representation in this House, and who while they are enamoured of direct compulsion are still more enamoured, as it would seem, of school boards. They are even so enamoured of them as to be willing to let compulsion go to the wall, if only they can secure the establishment of the machinery for which their soul longeth. Now I wish to say nothing here of their ulterior object, even though it has been openly enough avowed by themselves. I wish to deal only now with the arguments which they, and others who are not of them, deduce from the past action of school boards, in favour of their universal establishment in order to carry out direct compulsion. These gentlemen, Sir, argue that there being now a population of 12,000,000 and upwards under school boards, and of that 12,000,000, 10,000,000 and upwards under compulsory bye-laws, you have it as almost an axiom that the establishment of school boards would mean the establishment of direct compulsion, and would involve that satisfactory filling of our schools which we all desire. Now there is no necessity to argue against the universal setting up of school boards throughout the country. The project is a dead one—if, indeed, we might call that dead, which can hardly be said to have ever had life. It is quite plain that the country will have none of them. But has the argument deduced from their past action any life or reality either? On looking into the figures what do I find? Why I find that though the proportion of population under compulsory laws to the whole which is under the management of school boards is as large as I have stated, that is, about 10 to 12, or five-sixths, yet of the total number of school boards less than one-third (the figures are, I believe, 527 out of 1,653) have adopted these bye-laws—the fact, of course, being that in the large boroughs teeming with a crowded population these laws have been put in force, while in the rural districts, that is to say, in that part of the country which is mostly affected by this Bill, they have not been so adopted. I should have thought that was a significant fact. But, further, I find that whereas a very large proportion of those boards which were the earliest formed adopted the bye-laws—a steadily increasing number in proportion to the lateness of their formation have not passed any such laws. It is, of course, true that a large number of these later boards have been compulsorily formed, and I have no wish to push the argument too far; but it may at least be fairly deduced from these facts that whatever the result you obtain, you do not obtain one favourable to the views of these hon. Gentlemen to whom I have referred. Well, but I might go on again to ask—what proof have you got that the working of the compulsion which you say is so excellent a thing, is altogether what you represent it to be? Have you any right to attribute all the increase, which has admittedly taken place in attendance, to the effect of these laws? Have there been no other causes in operation? Or, again, are things going quite so smoothly, say in this great metropolis, as you would have us to believe? With all the care and caution which may have been exercised, has your system increased in popularity, even among the better classes touched by it? I shall be much surprised if a satisfactory answer can be given to such doubts, and in the absence of such an answer, how can you ask us to accept with cheerfulness the compulsory imposition of what, even when voluntarily undergone, has produced a result so negative, to put it in the mildest form, so unsatisfactory, as I should be disposed to call it?

But this same class of Gentlemen object again to what they say will be the operation of the compulsion proposed by this Bill. Granting that it will come into effect, they say you may be forcing the parent to send his child to a denominational school to which he conscientiously objects. Well, I am bound to believe in the earnestness of the hon. Gentlemen in this House who hold those views. But I honestly confess I cannot understand the reality of the objection. I have tried theoretically to realize it, and though I hope I am no bigot, and though my ambition is to take a fair view of both sides of a question, I utterly fail to do so. And if again I turn to experience, I not only find abundant evidence to prove, but I know of my own knowledge, that wherever good schools exist, the parents take possession of them for their children, and care nothing for the ecclesiastical differences of the managers. I know that was the case even before there was a Conscience Clause established, and when Government Inspectors were clergymen of the Church of England. And I must say I find it now impossible to bring home to myself that with this Conscience Clause in every public elementary school, with the clause which forbids the teaching of any creed in such a school, and with other safeguards existing, even if these were not sufficient, I say I find it quite impossible to believe that there is any force, any life, any substance whatever in this objection of the hon. Gentlemen. That it is put forward, and put forward with eloquence, strength, and pertinacity, I know well; but those who do so will forgive me for saying that it needs explanation, and that the explanation one suggests to oneself is more creditable to their courage and ingenuity than to their liberality and zeal for education.

Let me not be understood, Sir, as wishing to argue in favour of indirect as against direct compulsion. I am very reluctant to regard them as rivals. As to the former, it is unanimously admitted that it has the advantage of enlisting all the motives of the parent, both good and bad, in favour of education, and in principle at least, though naturally there will be objections raised to details, there will probably be no opposition to that extension of it which this Bill proposes. It is upon the latter—upon the question of how to grant direct powers for the compulsory attendance of children below 10 that the battle will be raised—that, in fact it has already commenced, and it is upon this point that I submit the Bill is wiser than my hon. Friend.

Now, I have tried to point out to the House—and I am much obliged to them for their indulgence, upon which I will trespass but very little longer—I have tried to point out the principles, which I humbly venture to insist should guide us in this matter. I have endeavoured to show negatively that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman and certain other educationists in this House, and out of it, are not worthy of our acceptance. Let me indicate very shortly the reasons why I think this Bill is sound in principle and practical in its character. Now, in the first place, Sir, this Bill avoids the error of trying to set up uniformity where uniformity does not and cannot exist. It shows in an unmistakable manner upon its face the intentions of the Legislature, and so far as certain conditions and requirements can be universally laid down, it enacts them, even then leaving the necessary modifications to the local authorities; beyond that point, and where you touch upon ground which experience tells you is delicate, it leaves the decision as to such interference to the ratepayers of the districts. It constitutes, in fact, an elastic system which can adapt itself to the varying wants, customs, and requirements of the diversified parts of the country which it will affect and benefit. How else could you hope for the intelligent co-operation of those who have to work it, or to be controlled by it? Am I to be told that in a part of the country like that which I have the honour to represent, where it is upon record that children seldom, if ever, go to work before 11 or 12, and then only for summer work, it can be reasonable or fair to impose restrictions and machinery, which mean expense, for the purpose of effecting that which is already done? Surely we have some right, Sir, to ask to be let alone—or, at all events, to be trusted with the discretion—if you will it, the privilege—of putting into force ourselves the machinery offered us by the Bill. And this leads me, Sir, to say a word about the fitness of the Boards of Guardians to exercise these powers. It is a common objection to them that, being composed to a great extent of farmers and employers of labour, they will not be too anxious to carry out the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman, Sir, used expressions about the predisposition of ex officio Guardians, which the past history of educational efforts in no sort of degree warranted his making against them, whether as county gentlemen or clerical magistrates. But, again, the disposition of the local authorities is not the sole measure of the efficiency of the Bill—for that you have the authority of the Education Department at their back, and your experience of that authority is that it is certainly not to be charged with remissness or negligence. But, more than this, and speaking now of those for whom I am bound to speak, I unhesitatingly say, in the words of that Report to which I have already referred, that so far from being lukewarm in promoting the education of their labourers, or hostile to it, the farmers in the division which I have the honour to represent give every encouragement to the schools, in some cases supporting them altogether, and in others paying the school fees of the children entirely or in part. I will make another quotation, and say, I find that in the southern division of my county (certainly not more favourably inclined to education than the northern), the Hexham Board of Guardians reported to Mr. Henley that—

“Few, if any, farmers in their Union employed either boys or girls under 12 or 13, and they would prefer not to have them till they are 14 or 15; and they recommended that no boy or girl be allowed to be employed under 12 or 13 without producing a certificate of attendance at school for a certain number of days during the preceding six months.”

Another Board of Guardians, again—that of Bellingham—reported—

“That children of either sex under 12 years of age are of little use to the farm, and ought to be at school under that age.”

I think that men who, 10 years ago, in their corporate capacity, held such views, may fairly be trusted to the extent this Bill proposes. Nor do I see, Sir, any force in the objection that by such agents you will bring education into association with pauperism. The Guardians will only pay the fees where the parent is too poor, and in that case who else but the relieving officer is the responsible and proper person for such a duty? And the work is not new; for in the case of paupers the Guardians have not only been in the habit of paying fees at any school selected by the parents, but have taken care through their officers to enforce attendance. And again, Sir, let it not be forgotten that there is a real connection between wages and education. Hunger and ignorance are both bad to bear, but hunger is the hardest; and as, in the case of nations, it is in the main true to assert that prosperity and wealth must precede high literary culture, so is it undeniably true—and let my own county be again the witness—that good wages make good education, rather than good education good wages.

Sir, in the support which I give, and give most heartily, to this Bill, let me not be supposed to be holding it up as a pattern of perfection. Of its principle I most unhesitatingly approve; but certainly I am not here to say that it does not contain faults both of omission and commission. Its details I might easily criticize. I think it, for instance, exceedingly doubtful how far the Bill is wise in committing such powers to the undefined Committees to be appointed by Boards of Guardians—how far the system of free education prizes is either sound or practical; whether some of the exemptions ought so explicitly to be defined by statute. Nor am I unwilling to confess that the Bill might have contained some facilities and provisions which would have been perhaps only fair and just, certainly very acceptable, to those who are now most heavily burdened in the struggle to maintain their old-established schools. But meanwhile, Sir, I believe this to be, as I have said, a loyal and honest measure. No country ever did more for education within the space of six years than we have done since 1870. This Bill advances in the old lines upon which the policy, the successful policy, of that Act was based. It enforces still more strongly the doctrine of parental responsibility; it tightens the grasp of compulsion. I do trust, Sir, this Session may see it passed; and I believe that if this be the case we shall hasten the day, which it may perhaps be too sanguine for us just now to anticipate, when compulsion shall have become effete machinery, and parental responsibility shall need no Acts of Parliament for its enforcement.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he did not know whether his hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) intended to divide upon his Amendment, but the House was certainly much indebted to him for having moved it. There were many points that would have hereafter to be discussed; but the question immediately before them was quite sufficient to absorb the attention of the House. The Amendment was not hostile to the Bill, because it could if adopted, be incorporated in it, and for this reason he should support that Amendment. Notices of Amendment had been given for Committee by the right hon. Member (Mr. W. E. Forster) and by himself which would, he believed, practically do what the hon. Member (Mr. Mundella) desired. It had been said that the Report on the Factory and Workshops Act should go for nothing, so far as regarded agricultural children; but the fact was, that the condition of those children came within the scope of their inquiry, for they were directed to inquire in reference to trades, industries, and occupations other than those which were dealt with by the Act of 1874, so as to arrive at the conclusion whether further provision was required in regard to the improvement of the education of young persons and children. How could the Commissioners have fulfilled that duty if they had not inquired into the condition of agricultural children? In the discussion upon the Bill of the hon. Member of Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), to establish school boards throughout the country and to provide for direct compulsion, the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) said that the Government would appoint a Commission to inquire into the whole of the Labour Laws in connection with education, which would include the case of agricultural children. It appeared from the Returns of population that there were in the country 400,000 children between the ages of 11 and 15 who were unemployed. Of these, 100,000 were employed in agriculture, 100,000 in factories, and 200,000 in various other occupations. He wanted to know why, under the Factories Act, there should be strong provisions for children who were employed in factories, whilst there were no similar provisions for those who were employed in other capacities? It could hardly be said that compulsory attendance was unsatisfactory, because the members of those boards which had adopted compulsory attendance had had to undergo re-election, and he asked whether there was any instance in which the electors had taken the opportunity to repeal that policy of the board. These compulsory bye-laws had been spoken of as an interference with the liberty of Englishmen; but such an interference with liberty could not have been brought about without the consent of each district. He did not see how the liberty of parents would be more interfered with by an enactment of Parliament than when the same principle was adopted by the votes of their neighbours. Why did not those who objected to the compulsion as an interference with liberty move to repeal the law that established compulsory education all over Scotland? Did the Scotch value liberty less than Englishmen did? Compulsion in Scotland had produced most satisfactory results. He believed that the plan proposed in the Report upon the Factories and Workshops Act was preferable to that embodied in the present Bill. The noble Lord stated that the key of the Bill was to be found in Clause 4, and that clause was entirely founded on the principle of the prohibition of employment. It said that no child under 10 years of age should be employed at all, and next that no child who had not obtained a certificate of efficiency in education should be employed up to the age of 14. The principle of the clause was the improvement of school attendance by the prohibition of employment; but the principle of the Report of the Commissioners was the education of all children consistently with the allowance of considerable employment. The object in view was that children should be employed, yet should be also educated—that their education should interfere as little as possible with their labour. With that object the Commissioners proposed—as the Government now did—to prohibit the employment of children up to the age of 10, but they also proposed that in the case of children over 10 years of age the system known as the half-time system, which had done so much good work in the country, should be extended by being adapted to the varying circumstances of the country. The noble Lord stated that very few children went to work in the agricultural districts under 11 or 12 years of age, and that above that age they only worked during the summer months; but if that were so, how could they be prejudiced by the adoption of the recommendation of the Commissioners? The reason of the bad attendance at school of children under 10 was not that such children were employed. It arose from the apathy and indifference of the parents; and how was it proposed to deal with that matter in the case of children under 14? By prohibiting the employment of such children unless they had obtained the certificate to which he had referred. The hon. Member had spoken of that as a system of indirect compulsion; but the House must not allow itself to be misled by words. The system proposed by the Commissioners and that of the noble Lord were totally dissimilar. Of the latter they had already had experience. It was tried under the Coal Mines Act and under the Agricultural Children Act, and in each case it completely failed. The reason it failed was this—that the penalty on the parent was so great that it could not be enforced. In the present case the hardship on the parent was great, but that on the child who was prevented learning anything as to the means of earning his future livelihood, and of obtaining training which would be invaluable to him, was greater still. But it was said that the necessity of obtaining a certificate could be got rid of by 250 attendances at school, and what was that but six months' attendance, by which means a child of between two and three years of age might become qualified. [Viscount SANDON observed that the child attending must be over five years of age.] He was glad to hear it; but, at all events, the 250 attendances might be got through in a little over six months, and such a proposal could not be for a moment compared with the half-time system, by which labour was associated with education. Mr. Tufnell, a high authority on the matter, had given an opinion in reference to it, in which he spoke of the hardship on the child who could not by examination obtain a certificate, adding that the hardship on a clever child of being deprived of further instruction than that which would enable him to obtain the certificate was greater still. Mr. Tufnell expressed strong objections to a pass examination. He said—

“There is, in my opinion, a still stronger objection to any pass examination. It is well known that the effect of a competitive examination is not only to keep the examinees up to the prescribed standard, but to induce them to go beyond it. . . . A pass examination has an exactly contrary effect. As every one must go through it, the standard must be fixed below the general average ability of the examinees, or an unendurable amount of failures would occur.”

Mr. Tufnell said, in conclusion—

“My final conclusion with regard to the proposal for prohibiting the employment of children who do not go through a pass examination is that it would be a retrograde movement in the educational condition of the country. I am not aware that it has been adopted by any foreign nation.”

This was the opinion arrived at by a gentleman who had for two years devoted his time to the consideration of the education of the children of agricultural districts. No adequate precaution was taken under the Bill that children under 12 should not be employed, nor was there any provision for the extension of the half-time system. It was important that children should be learning that which would enable them to earn their future livelihood while they were attending school, and this very often would only be done by the half-time system. Could not some arrangement be adopted, as in Northumberland, whereby in certain months when children were wanted in the fields, they might be excused from attending school, while the months when they were usually idle should be devoted to improving the education which they had previously acquired? The proposal of the noble Lord left the matter open to all the anomalies which he had himself condemned. For instance, there would be one set of rules under the Factory Acts, another under the Workshops Act, and a difference between districts having school boards and those without school boards. These differences were quite indefensible. The noble Lord gave reasons for dispensing with the certificate of education in the case of children who lived two miles from a public elementary school; but how would he deal with the parents who removed their residence in order to get into one of these districts? There were 865 civil parishes without elementary schools, and this Act might be evaded in each of them by a parent who had neglected to educate his children removing to one of these parishes where his children would be employed at once. In all these parishes the noble Lord's test failed. It seemed to him that there were very grave objections to the plan of requiring a preliminary test, while there was overwhelming evidence of the success of compulsory education, wherever it had been fairly tried, and there was no complaint from Scotland of the working of the complete compulsory system. If a parent could show that his child above 10 years of age was well employed he ought to be allowed to claim half-time attendance. If, however, the child were idle, and likely to fall into bad habits, then he should be compelled to attend full time. His reasons for preferring the plan of the Commissioners to that of the Government were because the former was based upon the successful experience of a system which had proved its efficacy. He preferred the plan of the Commissioners, because it would cause the least possible interference with employment. It would not hamper industry, or deprive the parent of wages, or the child of its early training for its future livelihood. The Government plan, on the other hand, employed the prohibition of labour as the fundamental means of securing education. The plan of the Royal Commissioners would raise the level of education, because the child must attend school regularly without some reasonable excuse, whilst the plan of the Government would tend to lower it. There were certain provisions in the Bill which would be useful; but if his hon. Friend pressed his Motion to a division he must vote with him. He trusted, however, that the noble Lord would summon up courage, and adopt provisions such as were suggested by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), which would give general satisfaction and operate beneficially for the country.

MR. HEYGATE said, he had to complain of defects in the Bill very different from those to which attention had just been called. He regarded the Bill as nothing more than a careful attempt to introduce a system of indirect compulsion, with the view of increasing the attendance at elementary schools, in a manner as little objectionable to the country as could well be conceived; and the only exception to this description of it was furnished by the 13th clause, which gave a small modicum of relief to the voluntary schools. To the principle of compulsion he had always objected in theory; yet he could not be insensible to the growing desire for it throughout the country, and therefore he would not put himself in opposition to the general feeling in favour of it; but he was glad to be able to thank the Government for having adopted the least objectionable means of enforcing compulsion. He thought the Government had gone too far in restricting the employment of children up to the age of 14, unless they had certain certificates, or had made a certain number of attendances, and if they had adopted the age of 12 or 13, they would have had less difficulty in securing the enforcement of the measure. He hoped the noble Lord in charge of the Bill would re-consider this point. The objection taken to the Bill that it was permissive in its character was an objection that already applied to the discretion of school boards as to whether or not they would adopt compulsory bye-laws. It was a fact that large numbers of school boards did not adopt compulsory bye-laws, and, until they were compelled to do so, compulsion could hardly be enforced in the case of Boards of Guardians. The objection that compulsion ought not to be enforced where there was only one school, which might be a denominational school that was distasteful to the parents, was a most unreasonable objection, for there was the most perfect freedom of withdrawal from religious instruction under the Conscience Clause, which certainly was valueless, though not in the sense suggested, but only because parents had no desire to avail themselves of it. The friends of religious education had great reason for disappointment with the Bill, and it was to them and to hon. Members sitting behind him rather than to the Opposition that the noble Lord ought to have apologized when he disclaimed any desire to reverse the policy of the Act of 1870. They had some right to expect the redemption of the promises that had been then showered upon them. There was a strong feeling throughout the country that some relief should be given to the voluntary system, considering the hard pressure there was upon it owing to the unfair competition of school boards, and in various ways; and he regretted that the suggestions laid before the Prime Minister in the autumn by an influential deputation, headed by the Primate, had not been embodied in the Bill, except the small relief that was granted by the 13th clause. There were no statistics to show what would be the operation of that clause, but he believed it would hardly carry out the intention of its authors to help the poorest and most deserving schools. It was shown, by honest inspection, that children in voluntary schools "earned" in Government grants a larger sum per head than the children in board schools, and the grants thus earned should be paid in full, and not subjected to deductions such as those partially dealt with by Clause 13 of the Bill; and both the history and the position of voluntary schools made it a duty to see that these were not overborne by unnecessary hindrances. Then, again, many school boards seemed to have misapprehended their mission and exceeded their duty, and that increased the injustice of compelling subscribers to voluntary schools to contribute to school-board rates. He could not help thinking that the building of schools had been carried to a preposterous extent; and the system appeared to have been sanctioned by the Education Department ever since 1870. He thought it was time that better control should be ensured by legislation in that respect. In London there was admitted school accommodation for 412,000 children, while the average attendance with a compulsory bye-law was only 288,000. In Leicester there was school accommodation for 16,500, with an average attendance of 12,000. There also they had a compulsory bye-law. These were fair examples, and not exceptional cases, and he believed the calculations were very erroneous on which so many schools had been built. There were other points in which some relief might have been expected. Where school boards had become useless, or where there was a general feeling that they should be dissolved, he thought the ratepayers who had originally called them into being should have the power to put an end to them. There was a general desire throughout the country for religious education, and he confessed he was disappointed that this Bill did not contain provisions to strengthen the voluntary system, by which alone religious instruction could be secured. In these circumstances he could but give a half-hearted and not a very cordial support to this Bill. It was good so far as it went, but it did not go far enough. He should have preferred a bolder measure, which, grappling with some of the greater difficulties of the case, might indeed have provoked greater antagonism, but would in the end have secured the religious teaching of the country, and entitled the Government who proposed it to the gratitude of the religious and law-abiding people.

MR. EVANS said, he could not entirely agree with the hon. Member who had just addressed the House. He had been a member of a school board ever since school boards were established, and that board had certainly not squandered the ratepayers' money in building unnecessary schools. They had also unanimously determined that religious instruction should be given in their schools. At the same time, he would not force it on a locality if the locality did not wish it. The question rested with the ratepayers themselves, and those whom they elected to the school boards. With regard to voluntary schools, the hon. Member appeared to think they were very hardly treated; but Clause 13 would be found very favourable to poor schools in many districts, whether voluntary or board schools. So far as regarded the general principles of the Bill, particularly after the rumours he had heard of re-actionary measures, he felt considerable relief. He thought the Government should have recourse to bolder and more stringent provisions, and endeavour to enforce what was proposed by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). The dread of compulsion in regard to education was proved by experience to have been very much of a bugbear. The school board with which he was connected had put in force compulsory powers to get the children to school, and they had found little or no practical difficulty in carrying them out. The committee of the board had to listen at its meetings to the remonstrances of neglectful parents and guardians, as well as to a good deal of falsehood; but, generally speaking, the dread of a summons sufficed to make them send their children to school. He believed the same result would be obtained if compulsion were applied in country places, and that with a law-abiding people like ours the difficulties which some apprehended would, as had been the case in the towns, be found to vanish. He should, therefore, be glad if that Resolution, which would not destroy, but only enlarge and supplement the Bill, were carried, or if the Amendments which the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was to move in Committee were adopted. In that case a valuable measure might be passed; whereas if the Bill became law as it now stood, it would cause disappointment, and in many parts of the country would prove very nearly inoperative.

COLONEL MAKINS regarded the Bill very much in the same light as the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate). He regretted that the Government had not seen their way to giving more substantial encouragement to voluntary schools than was offered by the 13th clause. He had been in hopes that the Government would have been able to see their way to adopting the suggestions he had made to the President of the Council for incorporating the Canadian system, or something very like it, in the Bill. The noble Lord had stated that there were various practical difficulties in the way of adopting that course, but as he had not explained what they were he was unable now to deal with that part of the question. However, even that small boon to those schools was, unfortunately, opposed. It was recklessly said that it would create inefficient schools, but, in fact, it was impossible for the schools to obtain any grant without first proving their efficiency. The voluntary schools now earned far more of the Government grant than the board schools. In his constituency one voluntary school in the matter of drawing obtained 54 prizes in the examination under the Science and Art Department, whereas no board school ever obtained more than 40; while in regard to the less ornamental branches of education, in the same school 99 per cent of the children passed the Inspector's examination. Nothing was more remarkable than the waning popularity of school boards and education rates, and they should look to voluntary effort, aided by Government grants, as the best means of promoting education. It had sent a thrill of shame throughout the country to think that such a state of things as now existed in Birmingham could have been brought about under the Education Act in one of our largest towns. He hoped the noble Lord would see his way to give increased support to voluntary schools. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Sheffield, if adopted, instead of improving the Bill, would render it still less acceptable than it was.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he did not like the Bill; but he hoped it would be so far improved as to make it a good measure. He regretted to say there were 13,000 children in a district of Wales which he knew who were not at any school, and he hoped the Bill would be so framed as to guard against and prevent such a state of things as that. He was quite of opinion that Boards of Guardians and Corporations would not take the necessary trouble to get the children into the different schools. The difficulty was not now so great as it was six years ago. He was a member of one of the oldest school boards, and that board had never experienced any difficulty in securing a proper attendance. That board had always been elected without opposition, and had not spent a penny on any of the elections. Unless compulsion was used he was satisfied that a proper attendance would never be secured. Approving of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield, he was prepared to give it his support, considering the vast number of children in the country who were growing up without receiving any education. The noble Lord, no doubt, thought that the 13th clause would benefit the agricultural districts, but in reality it would do nothing of the sort. In his district, which consisted of 5,600 acres, the rateable value at 7s. 6d. per acre was £2,100, and that at 3d. in the pound would produce £26. The number of people was 360, and the children in the district 60, and at 6s. per head the cost was £18. In the towns where the children were more numerous, and the same staff could teach double the number, the cost would be one-half what it was in the agricultural and thinly-peopled districts. The consequence was, that whereas in towns the cost would be cleared by the rates and the school pence, the Government rate in addition would absorb the extra penny of the income tax. In his opinion, there ought to be no Government grants unless the attendance was compulsory. Why should the parish or district be put to the expense of providing schools and schoolmasters unless they could get the children there? As a manager of these schools in his own district he did not find any difficulty, but he thought that the Church of England should have a little more friendly feeling. The noble Lord said that Nonconformists were an "unclubable set," but how could it be otherwise when such lessons were taught to the children as he would read from a catechism authorized by the Church of England? He did not stand up for building schools for every sect and denomination. Forty years ago, when he went to a Church school, no difficulties of this kind occurred, but somehow the Church had altered. He would not read from the catechism he had mentioned, and which was in use in Montgomeryshire, anything about doctrines, but he would ask the House to listen to these questions and answers—

"Q. What are those who separate themselves from the Church of England commonly called? A. Dissenters. Q. Are there different sorts of Dissenters? A. Yes; Baptists, Independents, Quakers, and others. Q. Is it wrong to worship with Dissenters? A. Yes; we should only attend places of worship which belong to the Church of England."

[Mr. BIRLEY: Will the hon. Member

name the author?] Why should he name him? The thing was clear enough. The book was largely circulated in Wales, which contained a large majority of Nonconformists, and was it any wonder they were offended? ["Name."] The book was circulated by the Church of England Extension Association. For himself he wished to see all these separations broken down, and that they should all join together as they did in the old times. It was quite clear that the children must be educated somewhere, and equally clear that, in the rural districts especially, they could not be educated in separate schools.

Mr. ONSLOW said, he was one of those who did not think it necessary that the Government should have brought in any Bill for education in the rural districts; but, at the same time, as there was a strong feeling existing on the subject, he believed the Government had exercised a wise discretion in proposing the present measure. He had read the Bill most carefully, and he acknowledged without hesitation that it was as good a Bill as could have been passed under the circumstances. There were provisions in it which, in his opinion, would meet all the requirements of the country, and for that reason the measure deserved to pass. He objected strongly to the principle of compulsion contained in the Bill of 1870, and considered the Government had acted wisely in excluding it from their Bill. It was their duty to guide the parents rather than force them to educate their children, and he believed that their object would be effectually attained by the provision that no child should be allowed to work before 10 years of age. He knew of nothing more calculated to induce parents to educate their children than that limitation as to age; and he did not see what better authority could be hit on to put that law into force than the Boards of Guardians, composed, as those bodies were, of gentlemen connected with land and farmers. The children in rural districts did not require any great amount of education. All they required was to be able to read and write and do certain sums in arithmetic; in fact, such an amount of education as would induce them on idle days to take up a book instead of going to the public-house. He trusted there would be no attempt to establish a very high class of education in our rural schools, as over education would have the effect of driving away manual labour from the country. There was no happier class than the agricultural labourers of England; and therefore whatever was done in this matter they should endeavour on the one hand not to make education nauseous to the people, or, on the other hand, to give them such an education as would tend to drive them from earning their bread from the soil. He considered that the Amendment struck at the root of the Bill by introducing the principle of direct compulsion, and therefore he should oppose it.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: When the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) introduced this Bill, he laid before the House, fairly and frankly, as in fact he laid before himself when engaged in devising remedies, the evils of the situation, and has enabled us to judge how far the remedies may prove effectual. The problem, for which the Bill seeks a solution, is how we are to get 1,700,000 neglected children into school. The noble Lord admitted that it was the desire of the country that education should be universal. In fact, since 1802, Parliament has been devising various means of compulsion through labour laws, and recently has provided ample school accommodation. But, still, there is a large deficiency of attendance, and parents do not perform their duties to their children. This Bill is a logical consequence of the Act of 1870. Then we compelled communities to provide schools and education for themselves, and it is but one step forward to say that the individuals composing them shall receive the education provided. There are differences of opinion how this should be done; but the noble Lord has the advantage of a practical unanimity of purpose that all the children of this country must be educated. There are three ways of achieving the end. The parents might be forced by direct compulsion to send their children to school; or the children should not be allowed to labour till they acquire educational certificates; or there might be a combination of the direct and indirect methods of compulsion. Now, the Bill adopts the latter combination. In the wisdom of this I entirely agree. There is, in fact, no antagonism between direct and indirect compulsion as there is between the subject to which the same adjectives are applied—direct and indirect taxation. In regard to compulsion, both are collateral roads to the same end. The leaning, however, of the Bill is to travel as much as possible by the indirect road. I have not the least objection to that if the result be secured, for, as to the abstract principles involved in the two methods, there is nothing to choose between them. The noble Lord seems to think it harsh that policemen or truant officers should drive children into school by direct compulsion. To my mind, it seems equally harsh to drive them in, through threats of starvation, by refusing employment to the uneducated. Both methods are stern, if they be not harsh, and the choice between them is a mere matter of expediency. As the Bill sometimes uses one method, sometimes the other, there is little use in discussing which is the best. The Bill in some respects uses the indirect method uniformly and well. It found our labour laws confused and complicated; it makes them simple and clear. It holds out powerful motives to ordinary parents to educate their children. It enlists both the noble and ignoble motives of such parents in the work of education. Under it, good parents will equip their children with the tools of labour, and selfish parents will push on their children in the hope of getting the wages of their work. And the merit of this part of the Bill is that the poor will feel that the same kind of compulsion is applied to them as to the rich. The Army, the Navy, the Civil Service, the medical profession, the Law, the Church, are all subject to labour passes of an acquired education. When a policeman drives the child of a poor man to school, the latter, though he is mistaken, thinks that the policeman does not go to the rich man's house. But the main principle of this Bill will appear equitable, because an examination of the rich for employment is now made nearly as general as that provided by this Bill for the poor. So far, then, as indirect compulsion will go, I believe the provisions of the Bill, except as to the absence at half-time in rural districts, are framed in a sense of justice and with a prudent forbearance to existing circumstances. But indirect compulsion is insufficient. The Bill admits this, or it would not have adopted a supplementary system of direct compulsion. A future educational standard, applied to a child in its eleventh year, involves at least five years' foresight on the part of the parent; and as prudent, intelligent parents will exercise this foresight—indirect compulsion is sufficient for them. But it is not enough for the thriftless, improvident parents, who will sacrifice to the needs of the day the whole future of a life. For such parents the year 1881, when this Bill comes into full operation, has no prospective terrors. The labour-pass system for their children, unless there be a compulsion between 5 and 10, would simply exclude the child of 11 from the labour market, and thus postpone for some years the working ability of the children of improvident parents. What would be the result of relying on this labour-pass system alone? One of two results must necessarily follow. Either the Act would become a dead letter, because magistrates would refuse to enforce the law against children of 11, from a disinclination to prevent them earning their bread; or the law would be enforced, and children of 11 would be at last driven into school, which they had neglected in their earlier years. But observe what an extravagantly costly system of education this would be. A child between 5 and 10 gets its schooling for 3*d.* per week. But a child from 11 to 14 has a wage value of 3*s.* a-week in the labour market. You refuse it permission to labour, and the parent is deprived of this 3*s.* a-week and has still to provide 3*d.* a-week in fees, so that the education which could have been got for 3*d.* a-week under 10 will practically cost 3*s.* 3*d.* above 10. The noble Lord would reply—that is the fault of the parent and not of the Bill. To that I would rejoin that it is the result of the timidity of the Government in not enforcing direct compulsion on the child between 5 and 10. With regard to the effects of a general labour pass we have little experience, and certainly as much of an unfavourable as of a favourable kind; but in regard to direct compulsion between the ages of 5 and 10, we have the widest experience. In Scotland it applies to the whole population. There the duty of a parent to send a child to school from 5 to 13 is clear and explicit, and his neglect of that duty is punished. In England, 10,000,000 out of a population of 22,000,000 are under the compulsory bye-laws of school boards. Hence we have a large experience of the working of direct compulsion, and full justification for its extension. The Bill recognizes this by allowing Boards of Guardians to make such bye-laws, if the ratepayers demand them. What are the chances of their doing so? The Agricultural Children Act gave the necessary powers to enforce a modified compulsory attendance, and only 11 counties have adopted it. Two-thirds of the English counties have allowed the Act to become dead. That represents the chances of permissive compulsion. Certainly, in some cases, Boards of Guardians will be moved by ratepayers to make compulsory bye-laws. But such action implies a ready-formed zeal for education. The effect would be to repeat the error of the old Committee of Council system, under which zealous and intelligent parishes got Government grants and preserved their intelligence; while ignorant and benighted parishes were left ignorant and benighted. So with this Bill, it will work well under conditions in which it is not needed, and it is certain to fail where it is most required. But this requires no argument, for the Bill gives us four direct compulsory clauses. By the 7th clause the local authority, though not the parent, is made responsible for the education of children under 10. But frightened by this spasmodic vigour, numerous doors are opened by which the parent may escape. Even "domestic employment" of the child is a statutory excuse. But supposing children are ordered by a Court of summary jurisdiction to attend school, as this clause provides, what is that but direct compulsion in its most naked form? If, then, the principle be admitted, why not make the parent responsible, as in the Scotch Act, and not the local authority? The noble Lord was very eloquent as to the responsibilities of the parent—will he accept the Amendment to make them statutory? He would thus lessen the extreme severity of the screw which he applies to the child at 10. The screw which he puts on them is applied with unsparing torture in Clauses 8 to 10. Actually, penal deprivation of liberty, through the Industrial Schools Act, is now to be applied to persistent truants. This Act of 1866, extended to school boards in 1870, is very useful for vagabond and criminal children, but was never intended for merely ill-managed children. Recollect what reformatories and industrial schools are. Reformatories are destined for those who have committed crime; and, in Great Britain, though not in Ireland, they have been confined to their true purpose. Juvenile crime does not increase, so the Reformatories remain stationary. From 1864 to 1874, their inmates have grown from 4,300 to 5,600, and no more. Industrial schools are in a different position. Their object is to remove from society, by sentences of penal detention, which may extend from short periods to a length of seven years, scamps and petty thieves, or children under criminal parents. If kept to their proper purpose they should not increase rapidly, because juvenile crime is stationary. Yet this is far from being the case, for while their inmates were only 488 in 38 schools in 1864, they had mounted to 11,409 in 104 schools in 1874. Now, the reason for this rapid increase is not far to seek. Local authorities use these schools as a substitute for Union schools, and as a means of throwing the expense of maintaining poor children on Imperial taxation. The proportion of local rates (independently of school-board contributions) last year was as £20,000 to £134,000 supplied by the Imperial Treasury. In Scotland this temptation is not so great, because the law forces parishes to contribute for wastrel children; but in England, where the law is lax, it is too great to be resisted by the local conscience. Since 1870, the school boards have used these institutions freely. In England last year, 1,331 were sent at the instance of these boards; while in Scotland, where industrial schools have a still larger development, only 31 were sent. Why this difference? Because compulsion is universal in Scotland, and that suffices to prevent the formation of a large wastrel class. The school boards spent £20,000 in this experiment, at a cost of 5s. a-head per week to themselves and of 15s. to the State. And what was the result? I will give the answer in the words of the Dean of Ripon, the Rev. Sydney Turner, who until lately has been the Inspector of these schools. In his last Report he says—

“But independently of the objections to mixing such unruly, wilful, and unmanageable (or, as they might be truly styled, ill-managed) children with the petty thieves and little scamps that the industrial school properly contains, the expense thrown on the board for the maintenance of such cases, amounting usually to 5s. per week, is not likely to allow of the continued use of so costly a method for enforcing school attendance.”

It is true that he gives a qualified approval to such a course as that suggested by this Bill, that the period of detention might be worked out by day attendances, but he prefers Miss Mary Carpenter's scheme of regular day schools for clothing, feeding, and educating these non-criminal wastrels. The latter plan is working successfully; but the mixed plan, as proposed in the Bill, was actually in operation in 1857, and had to be abandoned from its injurious effects on the discipline of the schools. I do not deny that if day industrial schools were administered with much care and watchfully guarded against improper use they might be a useful machinery in place of the more expensive boarding schools. It has been necessary to discuss at some length this particular plan for enforcing compulsion, because, as the Bill is now framed, it is its essential plan. My objections to it are twofold—first, that if successful it would be inordinately costly; and second, that it is unjust and impolitic. If partially successful, we may assume that 20,000 wastrels out of the 1,700,000 truants might be got into the schools in addition to their present numbers. Now, without taking into account new buildings which would be necessary, the cost of maintenance, according to the present rate upon 31,000 children, would be £750,000, of which the State would require to find at least £500,000. We now pay £1,750,000 to educate 2,000,000 children, but by this system we should have to pay £500,000 to educate 30,000. Will the managers of industrial schools co-operate in this plan? I am told that already four-fifths of these schools are memorializing the Government against the scheme. The second objection is as to the injustice and impolicy of the proposal. It is unjust both to the child and to the taxpayer. Instead of promoting parental responsibility, for which the noble Lord argued, it destroys it. The State is placed in loco parentis, and the parent is rewarded for his improvidence by being relieved of the care and charges of the child. The plan is unjust to the child, because mask the industrial school as we may, it is legally a prison in which a child is deprived of personal liberty. So the sum of the plan is this, that relieves the responsible parent of the consequences of his improvidence, and punishes the irresponsible child for the neglect of the parent. But there is a deeper objection still, for by using penal schools as the chief engine of compulsion, you connect compulsory education with crime, and go far to render enforced attendance odious to the community. I recollect when my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) proposed to make school attendance a condition of Poor Law relief, an outcry arose that he was associating education with pauperism. But surely it is a hundred times worse to unite it with crime. The reason why these penal clauses are now essential to the Bill is that the Government are afraid to make every parent responsible in law for the education of his children. Accept the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford to this effect—that is, simply to assimilate the law of England to that of Scotland—and all these penal clauses may be advantageously expunged from the Bill, because then the Industrial Schools Acts of 1866 and 1872 and the Education Act of 1870 contain abundant provisions for providing for a vagabond class. The mistake of the Bill is that it jumbles up this class with mere ill-managed children. For them ordinary direct compulsion is sufficient, as the experience of Scotland proves. For the others you have still the industrial schools and reformatories. I have discussed this Bill as an educational measure, in order that I might not be tempted off that view by the ecclesiastical herring which has been trailed across the path. I do not deny that the Bill is sufficient, in its indirect clauses, for ordinary careless parents. But it fails with the reckless and improvident parent, for it is he who supplies the habitual truant, and in after-life both the parent and the ratepayer will blame the Government for its temerity in enforcing direct compulsion. The parent will say, You had no justification in trusting to my knowledge of prospective law, or to my forethought, when all experience has taught you that I had neither one nor the other. The taxpayer and the ratepayer will blame your timidity when they find that you throw upon them at an inordinate cost the consequences of the neglect of the parent. Among the educationalists of this House there are many who care more for education than for ecclesiastical differences. But when your Bill makes us all hopeless of attaining universal education through its permissive provisions, it is natural that we should look somewhat jealously to the religious aspects of the measure. Then permissive compulsion in rural districts looks like a machine for filling old and creating new denominational schools. I do not think this was the object of the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) in constructing the Bill, because I have faith in his single desire to extend the benefits of education to the whole community. If he will meet those who have a like desire with himself by making the provisions of his Bill effective for this great object, the magnitude of such a result will dwarf the objections to the local means for carrying it out.

MR. BIRLEY congratulated the House on the eminently practical character which this debate had throughout assumed. He had heard with some regret the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) state that a good deal would be said by hon. Members opposite on the question of the religious difficulty; he trusted, however, that nothing would be uttered that would lead to an acrimonious discussion on the subject. For his own part, he should not object to see, at all events, the substance of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) incorporated into the Bill, with the Preamble of which it would not be inconsistent. It had been stated that there were no fewer than 1,700,000 truant children in England, but that was an exaggeration arising out of the way in which the Privy Council Returns were drawn up. As to the question of compulsion, there was on that side of the House as strong a desire as on the other, although they did not speak with as much emphasis, to see truant children of the careless poor or of the criminal part of the population sent to school and obtaining an efficient and useful secular education. He might remind the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh that the Bill was intended to carry out that object, although perhaps some of its clauses were weak as regarded penalties and as affording loopholes of escape to those who might attempt to disregard them. The experience of the last six years indicated the necessity of caution, and he could appeal with confidence to the school boards of the great towns, such as London, Liverpool, and Manchester, to show that with all their compulsory bye-laws, and with all their staff of truant compellers, they had been obliged to be extremely cautious in attempting to enforce the law rigidly. True it was that they had been able to reach a large portion of the population who were very indifferent about sending their children to school; but when they attempted to descend to the lower strata their efforts had proved most unsuccessful. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had naturally referred to the example of Scotland, and had alluded to the Report of the Commission upon the Factory and Workshops Act, but in that Report it was stated that in the towns of Glasgow and Dundee there was still a large proportion of the population which was not receiving efficient instruction. He might observe that, although there might be a strong feeling in favour of compulsion in theory, in practice it would be found to press very hardly upon those who were honest, but were exceedingly poor and destitute, and then the sympathy of all classes would be excited against the system. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman himself would be the first to complain in the event of anything like an abuse of authority in that respect being developed. When the Manchester Board had attempted to put stringent regulations into force they had been strongly attacked by the leading newspapers. A good deal had been said with reference to the desire which the working classes themselves had that compulsion should be adopted; but he imagined that they were in favour of its being applied in the case of others and not of themselves. They felt that many of their neighbours were a curse and an injury to the community, and to such persons they, perhaps, wished that compulsion should be applied. A great difficulty had been felt with regard to the age at which children should be allowed to go to work. The Manchester School Board, however, recommended that the local authority should have power to grant permission to children to be employed half time at the age of nine, in cases of evident necessity. With regard to industrial schools, there were very efficient ones in Manchester, and it would be a pity to send children of a certain class there to disarrange establishments of that kind. He believed it quite possible to have a number of schools of a low type to which those children might be sent without causing any great cost to the ratepayers. That course would be preferable to sending these children to ordinary elementary schools in the first instance; for many of them were only half fed and half clothed and of filthy habits, with whom children of the better class of labourers naturally objected to consort. He agreed with the hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. D. Davies) that the proposed allowance to the so-called poor districts would work in a most surprising manner, and the really poor districts would not get the benefit of it, and in this respect, therefore, he hoped to see the Bill modified. Certain of the deductions which were made were of a most annoying character, while they saved very little money to the department. The public elementary schools should not, in his opinion, be called upon to pay local rates. With regard to the question of religious education, he thought it was a matter of regret that there was nothing in the Bill which provided for religious teaching, or even for the recognition of religion. He failed to see how the fulfilment of parental responsibility in relation to the education of children could be properly secured unless parents were enabled to provide for their religious instruction. The country at large would hail the removal of this blot, if it were done with discretion. He hoped it would be possible to add a clause to the Bill providing that the board schools should give some elementary religious instruction that would be suited to the capacity of children of from 5 to 10 years of age. On the whole, he thought the Bill had been very well and carefully drawn, and that while its proposals had been to some extent misconstrued, the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Factories and Workshops Act had been exaggerated. He trusted the House would in the present case—as was done when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford passed his great Bill through the House—apply itself in earnest to the perfecting of the measure, in order to increase the quantity and quality of sound education for the working classes of this country.

Mr. Birley

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he felt he occupied an awkward position, because he agreed with nobody in the House upon this question. He declared his affection for the system of education which existed in 1870, when his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) introduced his measure, for at that time the progress in education was slow and sure, but now it was rapid and unsafe. Until the moment when the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Ridley) rose to speak upon this Bill it seemed as if the Government intended it to be a serious measure of legislation; but that impression was removed when he heard the hon. Member, who was an ardent supporter of the Government, say that the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Mundella) was one which ought to be introduced into the Bill. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member was not present, but he had certainly said something to that effect. Three defects were alleged against the Act of 1870. In the first place, it was said that the machinery which it rendered necessary was terribly costly; secondly, it was said that the education given in board schools was not as good as that afforded in elementary schools; and, in the third place, it was alleged that, though the education given in the board schools was not religious, those schools were, by the very fact of their existence, killing off the denominational schools. With regard to the first alleged defect, they found that under the school board system the average cost per child educated, for purchase of sites and building schools, was £11 6s., while in 1867-8, when he was Vice President of the Council, it did not amount to more than £5 per child, or £5 10s. in some exceptional cases. This was a vast expense, from which the ratepayers must inevitably recoil. He found that the charges for the cost of schooling the children in board schools, which might be described as the current expenses of the schools, was, in the case of the London School Board, £2 12s. per child. Canon Gregory, who had written a pamphlet on the subject, came to the conclusion that while the cost per child was £1 9s. 3d. in voluntary schools, it amounted to £2 9s. 10d. in board schools. In voluntary schools the expense amounted to £1 9s. per head, whereas in school board schools it amounted to £2 9s., the additional expense having, of course, to be found out of the rate. Was it, then, any cause for surprise that school boards had become unpopular? He found that of 14,082 civil parishes, only 1,479 had adopted school boards to the number of 1,100; while in the boroughs, excluding London, out of 224, 113 had adopted them. He further found that out of the 1,213 school boards 523 had no board schools, leaving 690 as the number having them. Then as regarded compulsion, the proportion of the school boards which had adopted the compulsory system was, again excluding London, in boroughs 96 to 113, and in parishes 316 to 1,479, another proof—if one were required—that the school boards were not popular, and more especially as to the system of compulsory attendance. Then, again, he would take the test of the Government grant. In the case of Nonconformist schools it amounted to 13s. 0½d. The Roman Catholic came next, amounting as it did to 12s. 10¾d. Next in order came the Church of England, which amounted to 12s. 8½d., while that to the school boards was 11s. 5½d. Then as to the religious teaching in the school boards. He knew that there was religious teaching in some of them; but the testimony of Bishop Ryan, the Vicar of Bradford, and as a member of a school board, was that his experience led him to the conviction that in board schools efficient religious instruction could not be given. But then the board schools had only, with a view to support themselves, to put their hands in the bag which was filled by the ratepayers, and it stood to reason that, with such an advantage, they must in time supersede the denominational schools. There were many cases in which Town Councils had to pay for the education of children who were in receipt of out-door relief, and those children were sent to denominational schools—in almost all cases Church of England schools. Again, Boards of Guardians might pay the fees of the children of "poor persons," and in spite of what had been said to the contrary he was of opinion that boards consisting of all the Justices of the Peace of the district and whose other members were elected according to a property qualification, would necessarily be influenced more or less by the interests and the prejudices of the class which had put them in office. He was glad to know that in the case of industrial schools children were sent to schools of the denomination to which they belonged, although he feared that if the principle were to be carried to its legitimate result great expense must be incurred in the building of industrial schools, as under the present state of things a child had sometimes to be sent to a school 100 miles off. The Home Secretary, in a letter read at the Sheffield School Board, stated that the introduction of short periods of detention would necessitate the establishment of special schools, as the bringing together of the two classes of children would be prejudicial to the discipline of the school. He added that the local authority must be prepared to contribute a large share of the expense of these industrial schools. There were to be two kinds of compulsion under the Bill, the one direct and the other indirect. There was to be a certificate of stupidity, and the parson of the parish would be the person who would usually be called upon to give it. One of the clauses of the Bill would prevent a child under 10, or in other cases under 14, from helping his father at his trade. Nor would a child be allowed to do a little sewing in the evening. Was that just? With regard to direct compulsion the locality might improve it if it chose, but was it likely to do so? Only 316 school boards throughout the rural parishes of England had adopted compulsion. He did not believe it would become more general under the Bill, for neither the farmers nor the Guardians desired it. If they adopted it would it be enforced? The Bill said the school authorities might do this if they thought fit, and might do that if they thought proper. This was permissive legislation run mad. What was the use of saying they might enforce compulsion if they thought fit, when the House knew they would not think it fit? If the Town Councils and the Boards of Guardians did not do their duty, the noble Lord took power to suspend them. But did the noble Lord believe that he would ever suspend a whole Board of Guardians or a Town Council and put others in their places? If he did put others in their places, they would do just the same. If, in fact, these bodies put compulsion in force, they would be doing a great injustice. He knew a town where there were several schools. One was a Roman Catholic school, attended by about 60 poor children. The Government had now brought in a Bill to make compulsion easy, and the result would probably be that all the children would be compelled to go to one of the Church of England schools. He would ask anyone whether that was just? No Irish Members, at least, would dare to vote for a Bill that would compel 60 Roman Catholic children to go to a Church of England school. He trusted that the House would not permit a measure that would perpetuate an injustice of this kind to become law. Take the case of a farm labourer, who was disabled by an accident, and unable to work. He could not afford to pay the 2*d.* a-week, and kept his children from school. The school officer would thereupon come to his house and insist on the children going to school, or, if not, the father would have to pay 5*s.* a-week for each instead of 2*d.* Or the labourer might say to his children—"You must do a little work to enable us to get food." Thereupon in came the officer and fined him 40*s.* for each child who had been allowed to work when the father had met with an accident. Was that just? He warned the Government that by this legislation they were meddling with the labour question, which was becoming a very serious one, both in this country and on the Continent. It might be all very well to smile at the mention of the name of Mr. Arch, but behind him there were thousands who would not be put down. The Bill would interfere with the labour of the very class to whom the House had refused to give votes. This in itself was not wise; and the time would come when they would spurn this legislation and would be tempted to spurn legislation of a more serious character. As to the religious question, it was clear that the board schools were not religious schools; and, in fact, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), in speaking about payment by results, claimed for the system as a merit that it would secularize education, and said that he desired to go further in that direction. To parody the poet—

"The force of pathos could no further go.

Though urged by Dixon and maintained by Lowe."

As to the relief afforded by the Bill to voluntary schools, the total amount of the deductions from the grants which by Section 13 of the Bill were not to be made any longer would amount to £28,142, so that only 1-34th of the grant would be added to some Roman Catholic schools, 1-40th to Church schools, 1-54th to Nonconformist schools, and 1-130th to board schools; but if all the 750 poor children now at large were compelled to attend, and paid their fees at the rate of 2*d.* they would amount to £6,250. That proceeding he objected to because it would simply relieve the rates. It was not the poor place but the poor school that required help; and there was many a poor school in a rich place. As cumulative voting did not exist in the election of Guardians, they were mostly members of the Church of England, and a local committee they would appoint would usually consist of the parson and his two churchwardens, who would compel Dissenters and Roman Catholics to send their children to a Church of England school and to pay its fees. That would be sufficient to raise a sectarian agitation throughout the country that would not die out until it had put an end to religious education in England, which would inflict great injury not only on the working man, but a still greater one in a religious point of view. The only way in which the Bill would supply the defects of past legislation was that it would prevent other school boards being established and necessitate legislation for getting rid of those which exist. No Nonconformist, and certainly no Irish Member, ought to vote for the second reading.

MR. PELL said, he was entirely at a loss to understand what particular system of education the noble Lord who had just sat down would advocate. His speech reminded him of a remark he once heard a right hon. Gentleman address to the Conservative Members, when in Opposition, on the occasion of the Irish Church Bill. He compared the Opposition to oxen, who, being in the enjoyment of a fine fat pasture, hunted about to find a corner of the field in which there was a crop of nettles or thistles in which they might get their noses stung. He thought even on that—the Conservative—side of the House the Bill had not been received with that hearty approval which it deserved. It required that the parent should send his child to school from the age of 5 to 10 with something like regularity, so as to ensure his attendance for 250 days in the year; and if the required attendances had not taken place the parent might be then required to send the child to school until he attained the age of 14. No new educational local authority was to be brought into existence. The powers of the Bill were to be entrusted to an old local authority, the guardians of the poor, whose duty it would be to enforce its provisions; and, finally, if the local authorities were in default the Education Department would have the power to supersede them. Those were very important, and at the same time simple and intelligible, provisions, and went a considerable length in the direction of compulsion. The question they had to ask themselves now was whether the country was prepared to submit to more than was proposed by the Bill. He thought not, and further, that nothing could be more injurious than an attempt to thrust on the country a code of laws which the people did not approve and were not prepared to respect or enforce. In his opinion, the Bill went as far as the country was willing to go. If any alteration was made in it, he would desire some little change in the exceptions. These, in the form he found them in the Bill, might afford a loop-hole through which parents might escape from the legal obligations intended to be imposed on them. But that point would be considered in Committee. He hoped the Government would adhere to the Bill as closely as they could, for it had been drawn by a master-hand with great care and apparently without sectarian views, either to advance the cause of the Church or Dissent.

MR. DIXON understood his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) to say that if the Government could see their way to accept the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), both those right hon. Gentlemen would be prepared to support the Bill; but the House would not be surprised when he stated that he should not be prepared to support the Bill even if that Amendment were accepted by the Government. He said more, even if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) were accepted by the Government, it would not entirely remove his objections to the Bill. Without troubling the House with any argument at present, he would very briefly state the changes he should like to see made in the Bill. He should like Clause 13 to be omitted entirely from the Bill. That clause proposed to increase, under certain circumstances, grants to poor schools or schools in poor districts. Although he knew something about school matters and had been accustomed to study the clauses of Education Bills, he had not been able to make out what was the meaning of this clause. He could not understand what would be the effect of it, because, according to his reading of the clause, Birmingham would be proclaimed a poor district. He could not think for a moment that was really the intention of the Government. It might be that the clause had been drawn up in such a manner as not to represent their intention. He presumed it was the intention of the Government to afford some assistance to what was ordinarily understood by the words poor or struggling denominational schools. He thought schools of that description ought to be handed over by some means or other to the local authorities, who would be able to supply any deficiency in their means out of public funds and to give public management and control. There were two other points in which he wished changes to be made which he thought important. One was with reference to direct compulsion, and the other with reference to the powers to be given under this Bill to the local authorities who were charged with the carrying out of compulsion. Whilst he did not wish to raise any objection to the provisions of the Bill with reference to indirect compulsion, he must say that, in his opinion, those provisions were of the most severe and stringent character, so severe and so stringent that, if they stood alone, he for one, much as he was in favour of compulsion, and greatly as he desired the education of the people, should hesitate before he gave his vote for the Bill. What was required, and what would, in fact, take away almost entirely the stringency of the indirect compulsion clauses, would be a satisfactory provision for direct compulsion, because, if a direct compulsory law worked satisfactorily, then indirect compulsion almost ceased to be necessary. He believed, however, that the direct compulsory clause of the Bill was extremely roundabout, and would be very imperfect in its operation. He doubted whether the House fully comprehended what its effect would be. They were to be launched in a course the effect of which they could not anticipate, because they had had no experience of it; and they were asked to leave a channel which they knew, and of the success of which they had had experience. It would be much better if, having fixed upon the local authority, they were to say simply that they would give to that authority the power of enacting bye-laws which was given by the Act of 1870; but with this difference that they would make it obligatory upon all local authorities—whether school boards, Town Councils, or Boards of Guardians—to make and enforce compulsory bye-laws. In his opinion, compulsory bye-laws so framed would be much better adapted for the purpose they had in view than the first section of Clause 7. They had often been told that the circumstances of different parts of the country varied considerably, and that it was difficult to make a law which should apply with equal force and justice in every district, and they had been told, moreover, that they in that House were not thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of every district. If, therefore, they left the formation and carrying out of the bye-laws to the various districts, he was inclined to believe that compulsory laws so framed would be more perfect and more effective than anything that could be done under the first section of Clause 7. He had always been considered to be the advocate of school boards, and when on three several occasions he had brought forward an Elementary Education Bill he had been met with the objection almost universally from the other side of the House, not that his Bill was a measure for direct compulsion, but that it was a Bill for the establishment of universal school boards. He assured the House that he was willing now to support the Government in the establishment of a different machinery—that was to say, a machinery of Boards of Guardians and Town Councils for carrying out compulsion. He must, however, remind the House that he did not think this machinery was as good as the machinery of the Act of 1870, and he had stated on various occasions his reasons for entertaining that opinion. Boards of Guardians, though nominally popular assemblies, were not really elected by the parents of the children who would be sent to the schools. With a strong compulsory education law they ought to have a popular representative body to enforce it, and that body should be representative, not of the clergy, not of the landowner, not of the farmer merely, but also of the parents of the children themselves. That objection to Boards of Guardians, which to his mind was a very strong one, he, however, got over by looking forward to a very great improvement in our system of local self-government; to a local authority—probably the Board of Guardians—elected by the same constituency as the Town Councillors in the large towns. In his opinion, it was essential, if this Act were to work well in the rural districts and to be satisfactory to the country generally, that, having fixed upon their local authority, the Government being satisfied with it and the country party having accepted it, they should give to it the full powers of the school boards. He had noticed all through the discussions upon this interesting question that the objections to school boards had been of such a character as would not apply to Boards of Guardians and Town Councils; and, therefore, he saw no reason why Gentlemen opposite should not be perfectly willing to confer upon the local authority of their choice the powers of school boards. If that were done, he should regard the proposition of the Government as statesmanlike, and would give it his support. He very much doubted the possibility of passing this Session the Bill as it stood; but, assuming that it was carried, it would not satisfy a very important section of the country—namely, the Nonconformists. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) had in very forcible language explained what the feeling of the Roman Catholics would be if the measure were carried in its present form. The Roman Catholics would have no protection for their children against being driven into Church schools. The Nonconformists complained of the same grievance; and since the Bill had been introduced the most important of the Dissenting denominations had met to protest against the grant of compulsory powers which might be used to compel their children to attend Church schools. He was not surprised at their having raised this protest.

There was no protection granted to them by the Bill, and that being the case, they were not satisfied. One result of passing the Bill in its present form would be to create a great deal of ill-feeling throughout the rural districts, and there would be a revival of hostility to the Church of England which might accelerate its downfall. The other result which might follow was that the Nonconformists, being the most numerous and the most active section of the Liberal Party, would insist, when a new Liberal Administration came into office, upon the abrogation of the obnoxious clauses. But they would not in that case be satisfied with the mere repeal of these clauses. They would insist, not only on the universal establishment of school boards, but on the establishment of an unsectarian school in every district. It was for Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to say whether these were results which they would desire to produce. For his own part, he should, for the reasons he had given, oppose the Bill.

MR. A. MILLS said, he was not at all alarmed at the consequences foreshadowed by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dixon) if Parliament adopted this Bill. He did not understand what the hon. Member meant by unsectarian education; but he believed the feeling of the country would have supported the Government if it had recognized distinctly in this Bill the duty of Christian education. However, as a member of the London School Board, he wished to make some remarks, as that body had been greatly abused in this debate. He did not need to be told that it was very unpopular, and he would not discuss whether it deserved to be so or not. One reason, no doubt, was its alleged extravagance. But, practically, its unpopularity rested upon its having enforced the compulsory bye-laws which it had adopted. The Bill before them recognised not only indirect, but direct compulsion; and the question was, how far, by whom, and how it should be carried out? The London School Board had been in existence nearly six years—and he had been a member of it nearly three years. Its expenditure on enforcing compulsion was no doubt great—£29,000 a-year; and at the present moment the average attendance of children, notwithstanding the application of compulsory bye-laws, had not increased in proportion to the numbers on the rolls beyond what it was three years ago. They had no doubt brought a larger number of children, not only into the board schools, but into the denominational ones; but they were not in a position to put the London School Board before the country as a model of success in the matter of compulsion. At this very moment he was summoned to attend a committee of the whole Board to consider and revise their compulsory bye-laws, and it certainly appeared to him that the effect produced by these bye-laws had not been what might have been expected from them considering the expenditure they involved. In view of that state of things, would it be wise to invite the country to adopt, he would not say a system of universal school boards, but school boards carrying on the compulsory system in a manner precisely analogous to that of London? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had said that by imposing parental responsibility upon the people they would settle the education question; but that really was a problem they had not yet solved, and could not solve. A little practical experience was worth a great deal of theory; and in presiding over one of the Committees—the Committee which was trying to carry out the compulsory bye-laws—he had never had a task more difficult to discharge in a manner satisfactory to himself. Everyone knew the difficulty. It was not a question of fees, or the pennies and twopences which parents had to pay, but it was whether, in order to carry out strictly what the law ordered and decreed, that the child of very poor parents should be educated, they would go the length of breaking up the homes of such persons, by taking from them the 3s. or 4s. a week which their children might earn or might save by “minding the baby” while the mother was engaged in some productive labour. If this system of compulsion throughout the country was made universal and without exception, it would greatly increase the burdens of the ratepayers and bear heavily upon many poor families, and would end by making national elementary education generally unpopular. That would be a most unfortunate mistake. He had some experience in the London School Board, and that had shown him that in most large towns they could not get on without compulsion. In London they might as well throw their money into the sea as try to do without compulsion, but he did not think that that applied to small towns and rural districts. Objection had been made to entrusting Boards of Guardians with the duty of carrying out the law where there was no school board; but he doubted whether, on the whole, the Government could have found any existing body better qualified to carry out tentatively the experiment which was proposed by this Bill. It was a case in which they must begin by degrees, and he repeated that he thought a good selection had been made. With respect to the Bill, as a whole, he would not deny that there were portions of it which he would like to see altered, and in Committee probably it might be considered; but he hoped the Session would not close without its principal clauses being agreed to, and the work of education in the rural districts, small towns, and remote districts thereby greatly promoted.

MR. WALTER said, he had hoped they might have been allowed to discuss this important measure without feeling as if they were sitting under the shadow of Disestablishment. He had hoped that, had not the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) introduced the religious element into the question, they might have altogether passed it over. But as the hon. Member had referred to a document which most of them had, no doubt, received—a sort of remonstrance drawn up by the Nonconformist body against this Bill—he must be allowed to say that he had read that document with very great surprise and very great regret; and he almost wondered how those respectable gentlemen could have the conscience to put their hands to it. What was it they really expected them to do? Had they not been as active as others in pressing for compulsion, and were we now to be told that, having arrived at the point of making compulsion universally applicable, it should not be applied—that they would offer it all the opposition in their power, and subvert the whole existing system with the view of introducing something new and untried? He feared they were utterly irreconcilable; but he could only say, however intolerant they were of Churchmen in this matter, he had never felt the same intolerance in dealing with Nonconformists. He must say he wished, while they were so ready to discover points of difference when it was a question of sending children to school, they would be a little more consistent when they asked, as they usually did, for assistance to help to build their own schools. He would read to the House a short note which he received some time ago from a Wesleyan minister in answer to a letter on the occasion of applying for a subscription, because it was a fair illustration of the sort of feeling which Nonconformists in general entertained on the subject—a feeling which was natural, and which he did not in the least object to. He was asked for a subscription to a Wesleyan school in his own neighbourhood, and he gave it as a matter of course. He asked the minister to be so good as to inform him what was the principle on which the school was conducted, because he understood that Nonconformists in general professed something unsectarian and undenominational and liberal in their Church principles. In the reply the minister said—

“Allow me, in the name of the committee of the Wesleyan day school, to thank you for the cheque which you so kindly enclosed, and, in reply to your inquiries about the management of the school, to say it will still be conducted under the general direction of the Wesleyan Committee, sanctioned by the Lords of the Privy Council on Education. It will be supported by voluntary contributions, and partly by Government grant, with instruction given by the teacher, and an occasional address by myself, without interfering with the time for secular instruction.”

The Conscience Clause, he added, was strictly followed, and the instruction embraced Bible lessons and the Wesleyan catechism. “Beyond this there was nothing distinctly denominational, except the name of the school.” Now, he would venture to say, from his knowledge of Church of England schools, that this was precisely the description which he would give, as a Churchman, of the management and the character of the religious instruction adopted in these schools. He might mention the case of a small town near which he lived. There were three schools in the town; there was one under his own management, one a National school, and the other a British and Foreign school. They were all excellent schools. There was no dispute between the managers of these schools and the parents. Not long ago a poor woman, who was a Nonconformist, complained that her child, who was sent to the National school, was obliged to learn certain hymns to which she objected. She had remonstrated with the clergyman, who refused to allow the child to receive any religious instruction without learning these hymns. But the mother did not on this account send her child to the British and Foreign school. She sent her child to the other Church of England school, and the clergyman there very properly allowed the child to receive religious instruction without learning the hymns, and the child thus received religious instruction suitable to his age without being sent to the Nonconformist school. One practical illustration was worth 50 arguments, and he mentioned this case to show that there was really no religious difficulty. These remonstrances were got up for Party and political purposes. And unless you were prepared to disestablish the whole of the 10,000 or 15,000 Church of England schools in this country, making them purely secular schools, he did not see how they could deal with people who were so unreasonable. Strictly speaking we had no denominational schools, because the timetable clause, which was insisted upon by the Nonconformists as the only conscience clause which would afford them the protection they required, really converted every school after a certain hour in the day into a purely undenominational and secular school. Dismissing the religious question, he came now to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). The Prime Minister the other day stated that this House was remarkable among other things for a dislike of logical legislation. The Bill now before the House, and the way in which it had been met, was a fair illustration of that truth, for truth it undoubtedly was. The hon. Member (Mr. Mundella) met the Bill, not by a direct negative like that of which the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke) had given Notice, but by saying that it was desirable to import something into it which he did not explain, referring the House, instead to a Report which no Member was bound to go into the Library and read, not increased in proportion to the numbers on the rolls beyond what it was three years ago. They had no doubt brought a larger number of children, not only into the board schools, but into the denominational ones; but they were not in a position to put the London School Board before the country as a model of success in the matter of compulsion. the measure, on which they were all substantially agreed, or in offering any serious opposition to the Bill going into Committee.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that a great deal had been said about Scotland, and it seemed to be the opinion of some hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House that because they had school boards in Scotland they ought to be satisfied. He could not say from his experience—which was somewhat extensive, as he was connected with different parts of the country, and had been chairman of a large country school board for three years, and had lately been re-elected—that all what was expected of these school boards had been fulfilled. There was a great deal of trouble, turmoil, and confusion in the election of the members of the boards, and a great deal of unnecessary expense in the machinery employed. ["No."] The hon. Gentleman might say "No, no;" but he thought in his part of the country that he had as much experience as anyone else in the matter, and if he had time he could bring forward facts in the case to satisfy hon. Members. From his own experience, the men who were appointed on the school boards came from all parts of the country, were not always elected on account of their previous knowledge of education, and of some it had been said, they could hardly write their own names. He alluded to this as showing that though it was not the rule, many were elected who could scarcely be considered fit persons to be entrusted with the care of the education of the people. As regarded himself, he in his official capacity had been fortunately circumstanced, but numerous complaints of the system had been made in all parts of Scotland, and he could not say that school boards had given such universal satisfaction in that country as hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to imagine. There was a difficulty in getting good men to act on the boards, but a still greater difficulty in getting good men to take any interest in matters of education. "What was everybody's business was nobody's business," and the result of the school board system was, that the education in Scotland was not as sound as it was, neither in developing the higher branches, nor from a religious point of view. It was true that in Scotland there was a general feeling that compulsory attendance ought to be strictly enforced. It had been said—"If it can be enforced in Scotland, why could it not be enforced in England?" But it should be remembered that for the last 300 years—since 1494—compulsion had existed in Scotland, and it was therefore no new thing in that country, not that he implied by that statement that it had been the rule, for the Act passed by the Estates in 1494 confined compulsory education to one class—that was, the nobles—and it had long been obsolete; but there could be no doubt that, whether engendered by the spirit of that old Act or not, there was a strong feeling in the minds of the people of Scotland before the Act of 1872 was passed, that education ought to be made compulsory, so the Government of the day had experienced no difficulty in insisting on the principle of compulsion. While expressing his general concurrence with the present Bill, his chief object in rising to address the House was to express his sincere regret that it contained no clause with regard to religious education. He was certain there would be no difficulty in carrying it out if it were passed. The Bible ought to be read in every school that received money or aid from Parliament, and if it was kept back it would be denying to the agricultural labourer that which would not only teach him to elect his legislators, but which would teach him to live so that he need not fear to die. It was not the working man either of Scotland or of England who objected to the Bible, and he held that unless they inserted a clause in the measure on the subject of religious education they should not be faithful to their trust as Members of Parliament. The only objectors to the proposal would be the members of that party in the House known as the Birmingham School. Hon. Members ought, in his opinion, to be very thankful to the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), for having in so straightforward and so truthful a manner answered the Nonconformist memorandum which had been referred to. He (Mr. Stewart) was not advocating denominational teaching—little children did not trouble themselves about doctrine; but they should be taught their duty to God and man, on which surely they were all agreed. He trusted there would be no strife or angry feeling and which 500 Members certainly would not read. If the hon. Gentleman specified the recommendations of the Report which he desired to incorporate in the Bill they might then be considered in Committee; but the House could not with propriety be asked now to pledge itself to recommendations which were not so specified. In the Report a whole string of measures were recommended for the compulsory education of factory children; but though these measures might be expedient for the particular purpose for which they were recommended, it did not follow that they should be imported into a Bill of this kind. It was an illogical way of meeting the Bill; and he could not help referring to what seemed a growing evil—the custom of meeting the second reading of Bills by abstract or semi-abstract Resolutions, instead of by direct negatives, which enabled one to say “Aye” or “No” on the question. It was an ingenious way of catching votes, for if Members opposed the Amendment it might be said that they objected to the recommendations of the Commissioners. Now, he did not object to those recommendations, but he did object to the attempt to foist them into the Bill in this way. As to the question at issue between the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) and the Vice President of the Council, it appeared to be very much a question of words. He could not help feeling that the noble Lord had been rather unjust, not only to children and parents, but also to himself in the particular form in which the measure was framed. Undoubtedly if sub-section 1 of Clause 7 were carried out in his parish he should make it a direct mode of compulsion. The question of direct or indirect compulsion was very much a question of words. In the one case you said—“You shall do this or that.” In the other case the parent was told—“Your child shall not earn sixpence a week till it goes to school.” Clause 7 did more than this, because it empowered the local authority, if it pleased, to send the child off to school. At the same time, he should have been better pleased if there had not been this apparent concession to the feelings of unwilling parents, and if a more direct mode of dealing with the subject had been adopted. He did not approve the system of waiting for parishioners to apply to Boards of Guardians in order to exercise the powers given to them under the Bill. The children meanwhile were much in the position of the children in the parable, who sat in the marketplace and complained that while they piped their companions would not dance. So might our children say—“We have compelled you to build schools for us, but you don’t compel us to go into them.” The ratepayers had a right to complain that they were taxed for this purpose, whether they liked it or not, while parents were allowed to send their children or not, as they pleased, into the schools thus compulsorily built. From his experience as a county magistrate, he was bound to say that he did not find the great difficulty which was sometimes supposed to exist among parents about sending their children to school. The greater difficulty was in securing regular attendance on account of the many temptations to children to stay away. Much firmness on this point was required on the part of the schoolmaster and the managers; and, indeed, the great desideratum just now was strict supervision by managers and thoroughly efficient schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. As to the body to which these functions were to be delegated in rural districts, the Board of Guardians seemed to be the only authority which was really available. The hon. Member for Sheffield said that the county magistrates did not care for education, which he believed to be a very unjust imputation upon them; but if you had an election in rural districts the very people elected to act in this capacity would probably be the working committees of the schools, including the parson, the squire, and one or two other gentlemen. It was to be regretted that the Bill did not provide for securing the services of ladies who took an interest in carrying on schools, because, as far as he was aware, ladies were not eligible as members of Boards of Guardians. [“Yes.”] At all events, it was not the practice to elect them in that part of the country with which he was best acquainted. If his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield or any other Member had Amendments to move which would remove defects from the Bill, he would do well to bring them forward subsequently; but he hoped that much more time would not be consumed in discussing the principles of

Gentleman who has just sat down; but I should have supposed, had I not heard otherwise from such high authority, that the course taken this evening by the Government is somewhat unusual. A course somewhat similar to this was taken some few nights ago on the occasion of the discussion on the second reading of the University of Oxford Bill, and although on that occasion a statement was made by a right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench, no right hon. Gentleman afterwards thought it necessary to rise and answer the arguments addressed to the Government from both sides of the House. Now, it is somewhat singular that very nearly the same reason was discovered by the Government on that occasion for the course they took as that of to-night. When the Adjournment of the Debate was moved the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that no Member of the Government had risen to answer the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) because, in the opinion of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman had answered himself. Now the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) has borrowed, which is not his usual custom, and which I was rather surprised to hear him do, the argument of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in saying that it was not necessary to answer the arguments which were advanced on this side because several of the speeches answered themselves. Well, Sir, that is a matter of opinion. No doubt it is extremely satisfactory to the Government that the debate should be so conducted that we should either answer ourselves, or one another; but it might perhaps have been more advisable if some Member of the Government had taken the trouble to point out in what respect we have answered ourselves or answered each other. But I am not disposed to take so serious a view of the conduct of the Government as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney. If they think this a fitting way of conducting a debate, I am sure I am not desirous of contradicting that opinion. I can only assume that this is a subject of great importance, and that they are not anxious that it should be brought with undue haste to a conclusion, and that we ought—all of us—to express our opinions in the course of a debate from which they admit they are gaining very much instruction as to the mode in which they should treat the Bill. I presume that after the debate has been conducted for a few hours more they will be able to form an opinion on the measure, and that some right hon. Gentleman sitting upon those benches will be prepared to rise and give expression to that opinion. The only conclusion I can draw at present from the silence of the Government is that they think this debate well worthy of long and protracted discussion, and that if they think it proper to pursue the same tactics as they have done to-night on another evening, they will consent to yet another adjournment to another evening.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

CUSTOMS LAWS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. William Henry Smith,
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

[BILL 154.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its main object was to consolidate the existing Customs laws, the sole alterations in those laws being in the direction of reducing the penalties now in force in respect of infractions of the Customs laws. He did not intend then to go through the provisions of the Bill, which consisted of 287 clauses; but if the House would consent to read the Bill a second time on the present occasion, he would undertake that hon. Members should have ample opportunity for considering the measure before going into Committee upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 29th June.

upon what every right-thinking person must agree in heart, for if religion was to be taught it should be well taught. It should be put on the same footing with other branches of education. It could be easily taught, few failures would take place, and good payment would follow. At that late hour he would not further detain the House.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth.)

MR. FAWCETT wished before the Question was put, to complain of the manner in which the debate been conducted on the part of the Government. He had been a Member of that House for over 10 years, and he believed it to be a thing absolutely without precedent that a Bill of such importance should have been discussed during an entire evening, and yet that no Minister should have condescended to reply to the remarkable speeches which had in more than one instance been made against it. For his own part, he begged to give Notice that if a similar course were adopted when the debate were resumed, and no Member of the Government rose until it was about to be wound up, he should move that it be again adjourned, in order that he might have an opportunity of replying to whatever the Government might have to urge against the objections taken to the Bill.

MR. DISRAELI: There is one speech from an hon. Gentleman opposite which will receive a reply to-night, and that is the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. One more unauthorized or unfair I never heard. The hon. Gentleman referred to his Parliamentary experience—not of very great duration—and says there never was an instance known in which a debate was conducted as this has been to-night. I say, from my own experience, which is not inferior, I believe, to that of the hon. Gentleman, that with Bills of a similar character to this the same course is invariably taken. Why, the measure was introduced by one of the Ministers in a speech of considerable length, in which my noble Friend entered into all the principles and most of the details of the question, and we have naturally a wish to hear the opinion of both sides of the House.

Mr. Mark Stewart

That is invariably the custom under circumstances of this nature. We have not attempted to curtail the debate; we have thrown no obstacle in the way of its adjournment; and we shall be prepared at the proper time to take our part in the debate. The hon. Gentleman, who is always dictating to the Government how we are to conduct the Business of the House, gave a solemn warning of empty threats as to what he he will do unless we pursue a course which is agreeable to himself. He says we have not answered the speeches of several distinguished Members who have spoken. One reason why we have not done so is that some of those Gentlemen answered themselves. He says that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) ought to have been answered, and also the right hon. Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Lyon Playfair). Any observations we may have to make upon their speeches will be made in due time. But the right hon. Member for Edinburgh University answered in a great degree the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield. We have been listening critically to the remarks of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House on this great question of national education, and it is only by that attention that the Government can become acquainted with the feeling of the House. It is a very common complaint—one which is well founded, but one which is inevitable—that the opportunity is not given to many Members of this House who wish to address it of doing so. That is an inconvenience arising from the great interest now taken in Public Business, and the number of Members who wish to take part in it, and in an important question like this it seems to me that the House ought to have ample opportunity for discussing it. It has had to-night an opportunity of that kind. The debate will be continued, and I trust concluded, on Monday, and, unless the hon. Member who has just addressed us brings forward any very original views which may perplex the Government, we shall, in relation to the observations and suggestions which have been made, offer our opinions to the country and to you, Sir.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not pretend that my Parliamentary experience rivals that of the right hon.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made; The Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. —(No. 123.)

THE NOBILITY OF MALTA.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is willing to produce the correspondence which has recently passed through the Colonial Office in reference to certain grievances complained of by the Nobility of Malta, more particularly a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by that body?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in reply, said, he would be very happy to give his noble Friend any extracts from the Correspondence to which he had alluded in his Question if he would move for it in the usual manner. He could not promise to produce all the Correspondence, but he would lay on the Table all that was material and that could be given. He was not aware that his noble Friend wished for further Correspondence relating to the suggestions made for the better government of the Island. However, if his noble Friend would specify what he wished to have he would look into the Papers and produce all that he could.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he had understood that some communications had been addressed by the Nobility of Malta to the noble Earl alleging certain complaints against what passed upon a recent occasion, and that there were other matters contained in the despatch which might be produced. He would be glad to have the Correspondence relating to all that had taken place.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he would look through all the Papers at the Colonial Office, and would then tell his noble Friend what he could lay on the Table.

QUEENBOROUGH HARBOUR BILL.—(by Order.)

THIRD. READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. PEMBERTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, that its object was to authorize the Corporation of Queenborough to improve their harbour for the benefit not only of merchant ships, but also of ships of Her Majesty's Navy. It had received the sanction of the Board of Trade, which had inserted clauses to prevent the tolls from being applied to any other than shipping purposes, to provide for a regular account of the income and expenditure, and for the reduction of the tolls, if they should at any time exceed the requirements. He considered the opposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea most unreasonable, when it was remembered it had passed through Committee, and had undergone the scrutiny of the Chairman of Ways and Means. His object was to prevent the improvement of the harbour, merely because the Commissioners appointed to

MR. GOURLEY objected to the consideration of so important a measure at so late an hour.

MR. JAMES opposed the Motion on the ground that the Bill would affect every port and harbour in the United Kingdom, and that no explanation had been given of the objects of the measure.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 23: Majority 75.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. DODDS said, that they had had no proper explanation of the Bill, and therefore he moved that the Chairman should report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. SYKES explained that the Bill enabled the local authorities to reduce the local light duties, but only when they had the means of doing so, and almost every port in the Kingdom was in favour of that proposition. He was determined to go on with the Bill.

LORD ESLINGTON supported the Bill, believing that it was for the public benefit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained the objects of the Bill, and said they appeared to him reasonable.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 96: Majority 86.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES AND FEES BILL—(No. 94.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for Committee read.

On Motion, That the House be put into a Committee on the said Bill,

EARL NELSON said, there was a point of some importance in regard to which there had been a difference of opinion in the Select Committee by which the Bill had been considered. The question on which the Committee were divided was whether all ecclesiastical fees should be paid into a central fund to be held by the Ecclesiastical Commission, or whether these fees should be placed under diocesan management. A number of witnesses examined before the Committee—including the Dean of Lichfield and Lord Alwyne Compton—thought that these fees should be managed by a Diocesan Board; and in his (Lord Nelson's) opinion the diocese was the natural integer from which Church work should be carried out. The Committee, however, were in favour of the central plan; but it would be a failure unless the central body was instructed as to the different fees levied in the different dioceses. In the Bill it was proposed that this information should be obtained by a cumbersome representative body called the Council of the Vicar General. He thought that it could be better obtained by means of a Royal Commission, or by Commissioners named in the Bill. He should be prepared to give Notice of Amendments to effect that object if he received any encouragement from the House.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made; The Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. —(No. 123.)

THE NOBILITY OF MALTA.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is willing to produce the correspondence which has recently passed through the Colonial Office in reference to certain grievances complained of by the Nobility of Malta, more particularly a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by that body?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in reply, said, he would be very happy to give his noble Friend any extracts from the Correspondence to which he had alluded in his Question if he would move for it in the usual manner. He could not promise to produce all the Correspondence, but he would lay on the Table all that was material and that could be given. He was not aware that his noble Friend wished for further Correspondence relating to the suggestions made for the better government of the Island. However, if his noble Friend would specify what he wished to have he would look into the Papers and produce all that he could.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he had understood that some communications had been addressed by the Nobility of Malta to the noble Earl alleging certain complaints against what passed upon a recent occasion, and that there were other matters contained in the despatch which might be produced. He would be glad to have the Correspondence relating to all that had taken place.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he would look through all the Papers at the Colonial Office, and would then tell his noble Friend what he could lay on the Table.

QUEENBOROUGH HARBOUR BILL.—(by Order.)

THIRD. READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. PEMBERTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, that its object was to authorize the Corporation of Queenborough to improve their harbour for the benefit not only of merchant ships, but also of ships of Her Majesty's Navy. It had received the sanction of the Board of Trade, which had inserted clauses to prevent the tolls from being applied to any other than shipping purposes, to provide for a regular account of the income and expenditure, and for the reduction of the tolls, if they should at any time exceed the requirements. He considered the opposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea most unreasonable, when it was remembered it had passed through Committee, and had undergone the scrutiny of the Chairman of Ways and Means. His object was to prevent the improvement of the harbour, merely because the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of Unreformed Corporations had not yet completed their inquiries. If the Bill passed it would not interfere with any alteration which the Royal Commission might propose should be made in the Corporation. With respect to the Memorial to which the Amendment of the hon. Member referred, it was merely a copy of the Memorial prepared as far back as the year 1839. The Corporation had replied to that Memorial, stating that it was devoid of a particle of truth. No doubt the Corporation was bankrupt 36 years ago, but its property had been sold under an Act authorizing them to dispose of it, and their only object was now to obtain powers to enable them to improve the harbour. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the third reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Pemberton.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving an Amendment, said, that in 1836 the Corporation, which was still an unreformed one, consisted of a very small number of members, and in the year 1836 they possessed a revenue of £16,000 or £18,000 a-year. In 1839 they became bankrupt, and again in 1843. Their debts had never been fully paid, and they owed large sums at the present time. The Bill would enable them to impose taxes to a considerable amount, and in some cases would increase the tolls from 2s. to 8s. The inhabitants had no power in the election of the members of the Corporation. He considered several of the clauses of the Bill to be most objectionable, particularly that which extended the tolls to almost every saleable commodity brought into the town, and that which provided that no justice should be disqualified from acting on account of his being a member of the Corporation. The Commission referred to had only just commenced its inquiries, and had not yet had sufficient time to consider the provisions of the Bill, and under these circumstances he begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard to the fact that a Royal Commission has lately been appointed to investigate the affairs of Unreformed Corporations, it is not desirable to proceed with a Bill conferring fresh borrowing and taxing powers upon a Corporation which has been bankrupt under circumstances disclosed in a Memorial ordered by the House of Commons to be printed 30th July 1875,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GORST said, the question before the House was not that of the constitution of the Corporation, and whether it was bankrupt or not, but whether the harbour of Queenborough should be improved. The improvement proposed was necessary for the benefit not only of the borough, but of the surrounding country, especially in connection with the new route to Flushing, and if the opposition should prevail all improvements would be put an end to until the Commissioners should have presented their Report. It was most desirable that some authority should have the power of making the improvements required, and as there was no other existing body the Bill proposed to confer it on the Corporation. Every precaution had been taken to prevent abuses, and clauses for that purpose had been inserted by the Board of Trade. That Board decidedly approved of the Bill, and he hoped the House would not reject it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR urged that the Bill ought not to pass until the Corporation of Queenborough had complied with the Order of the House calling upon it to furnish Returns and accounts. An examination of the abstract of the accounts of local taxation laid annually before Parliament would bring to light the fact that this place had never sent in their accounts to the Local Government Board, which had the responsible duty of making up the whole of the accounts of local taxation; and now, seeing the remarkable way that kind of taxation was increasing, it became a question of great importance to enforce the rendering of due accounts; and as that Bill gave great powers to a place to raise more taxes than hitherto, it was only just to refuse to use that power till the taxes hitherto raised had been accounted for. He also opposed the Bill because it gave rights to a little Corporation to put on additional taxes on our commercial and fishing vessels. These were already sufficiently burdened. Moreover, the duties entrusted to the new Corporation of Queenborough were of a national character, and ought not to be given over to any other but a national body of officers, and not to a local corporation. Indeed, all taxes and charges now laid on our ships ought to be inquired into and removed, in order to enable them to compete with foreigners not so heavily taxed.

MR. RAIKES thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea was under a mistaken impression with regard to the Bill, and that it would be inconvenient to delay a private Bill because it related to an unreformed Corporation which might or might not satisfy the Commissioners. Great injustice might be done to any body in the position of the Corporation of Queenborough, if they were denied the exercise of powers which would be accorded to other bodies, merely because the Commissioners had not yet exercised their powers with regard to Unreformed Corporations. Whatever the Corporation might have done formerly had nothing to do with the question before the House. Great improvements were contemplated in the harbour for the purposes of a new Continental route, in connection with which Queenborough stood in a singular position, being near the greatest depôt of explosive materials, and being frequented by vessels containing materials of that description; and therefore it was considered necessary that the Corporation should have the power of making regulations for the safety of the passengers in the vessels employed on the new route. The Bill, therefore, had been introduced with the simple view of effecting certain improvements, and to provide for the strict application to shipping purposes, and to no other purposes, of the harbour dues. It did not touch any question relating to the solvency or insolvency of the Corporation or its rating powers; it only touched the Corporation as the harbour authority, connected with which they had to carry out certain improvements which the passing of the Bill would enable them to do; and a refusal to pass it would prevent them making any improvement at all. The Bill came before them as an unopposed Bill; and it would be most unusual if the House, at the last stage, were to throw it out.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that when the matter came before him for consideration, he did not think it his duty to interfere. To his mind the fact that an inquiry was being made into the affairs of Unreformed Corporations furnished no reason why the public improvement contemplated by the Bill should not be proceeded with. It would be some time before that Commission made its Report, and during the interval public interests must suffer.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, the harbour required improvement, and as no other body had the power to do so but the Corporation of Queenborough, the matter should not be delayed because the conduct of the Corporation had been impugned in respect to other matters. The Bill had nothing to do with Unreformed Corporations, and he thought it was unprecedented that a private Bill, which had passed through all its stages unopposed, should be opposed on the third reading for such reasons.

MR. DILLWYN said, that his hon. Friend (Sir Charles Dilke) gave timely Notice that he should oppose the Bill on the third reading, if it went through Committee as an unopposed Bill.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 84: Majority 59.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ARMY—CAPTAIN ROBERTS, 94TH REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that Captain Roberts, 94th Regiment, has been in arrest for more than a month at Newry Barracks without being brought to a Court martial; whether such arrest was not in consequence of a communication made to the Horse Guards by three Members of this House; whether the matter has ever been brought to the personal notice of His Royal Highness Commanding in Chief; and, what is the cause of the delay in bringing Captain Roberts to trial?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I must answer the first part of the Question in the affirmative. It is true that is made where there are school boards, even if they have no board schools, for the refusal by the Department of an annual grant to a school, if the Education Department considers such school unnecessary; and in the Scotch Code a like provision is made respecting all cases. As far as principle goes, there can be no distinction between these cases and one like that of Keynsham. As the hon. Gentleman, however, has raised a doubt as to the power of the Department to act as they have done, we shall be most happy to refer the matter to the Law Officers of the Crown, and I will inform him of the result.

TURKEY—ASSASSINATION OF MINISTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government with respect to the news which has just arrived as to the occurrence of a fresh tragedy at Constantinople. The statement is that the tragedy which has there been enacted is one arising from private revenge. If that be so, it has of course no great public or European importance. It is possible the Government may have information confirming that statement, and, if so, I am sure the House would be glad to hear it. If they have any information of a contrary and more unpleasant character, still I think the House and the country would be equally glad to hear that information. I have waited, thinking it probable that the Question would be asked by some of my Friends sitting near me, but, the Question not being asked, I take on myself the freedom of asking the right hon. Gentleman, If he wishes to say anything in regard to it which may be interesting to the House and the country?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, from information which we have in our possession there appears to be no doubt of the occurrence of the dreadful event to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. Two of the Turkish Ministers were assassinated; a third was wounded, and one of their attendants was shot dead. It is said that the deed was prompted by private revenge against the Seraskier, Hussein Avni Pasha, who was the first victim. It is, however, impossible for me to pretend at present to offer an opinion to the House on such a subject as the real motives for the deed. If of course any information of an authentic character reaches me, I shall not fail to take an early opportunity of communicating it to the House.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE COMMISSION—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked, When the Report of the Royal Commission on the Fugitive Slave Question would be in the hands of Members? The purport of it was stated in the newspapers several days ago.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Report, as usual, was laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament on Tuesday, and how any portion of it got into the newspapers next morning he was utterly unable to explain. As to the distribution of copies of the Report among Members, he should give instructions that that should be done as soon as possible after it was printed, which was now being done.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

TAXATION IN MALTA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. POTTER: Sir, according to the Notice I have given, I beg to call the attention of the House to the Taxation at present levied in Malta; and to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient in policy and mischievous as an example to other Nations on the shores of the Mediterranean, to continue to levy ten shillings a quarter on wheat imported into the island of Malta, and other high Duties of a protective character on grain and cattle."

My attention was first called to this subject when in Rome last year, and when I was discussing the question of our new Commercial Tariff with Italy. From an Italian point of view, the Maltese Tariff appeared altogether inconsistent with English professions of Free Trade principles, and was calculated to do harm as an example, particularly when the Italians were called upon by England to adopt a policy so different. By a Return laid before the House of Commons in August, 1875, it appears that the main feature of the Maltese Tariff is a tax of 10s. per salma (7½ bushels) on wheat, and similar duties of a protective character on other grain. There is likewise a tax of 10s. per head on imported cattle, and a considerable duty on light wines and on oil. Fully one half of the revenue, or about £85,000, is raised on corn, wine, and oil; in fact, on the necessaries of the people. It appears to me to be an entirely false principle, especially in the case of Malta, which is so densely populated. After reading this Return, I put a Question to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies; and his Answer appeared to me so unsatisfactory that I placed the present Notice on the Paper. I was not, however, prepared for the larger question, which involves the whole system of the English government of Malta. The hon. Gentleman spoke of Malta being a fortress, and drew a parallel between it and Gibraltar. I wish he could have carried out that parallel and told me that Malta was a free port like Gibraltar. Had such been the case, it is probable that I should not have put down my Motion. It is true, doubtless, that Valetta is a great fortress, but the islands of Malta and Gozo cover an area of 115 square miles (according to an authority now recognized in this House, Whitaker's Almanack), whilst Gibraltar is a great rock covering only 1½ square miles. The Maltese population is 150,000, whilst Gibraltar contains only 25,000, including the garrison. Malta and Gozo produce a considerable quantity of grain, on which a protective duty of more than 20 per cent is levied in favour of the Maltese landowner. To show the anomaly of the Maltese Tariff, I am told that in the spring of 1875, 10,000 tons of new potatoes were sent to the London market, which so completely cleared the market in Malta that the inhabitants and garrison were obliged to draw their supplies, on which a considerable import duty was levied, from foreign countries. In reference to the Maltese Tariff, it must be remembered that it was enacted when England was Protectionist, in the year 1837, nine years before the repeal of the Corn Laws. Protectionist England was clearly responsible for what was done, as Malta had no representative institutions whatever at that time. It is not probable that Free Trade England, after 1846, would even have sanctioned such a Tariff. Malta has been in the possession of England since 1800—76 years; and it had previously enjoyed a certain amount of representation. But it was not until 1849 that England gave it any sort of representation. In 1849, a Council was formed to assist the Governor, who acts as President, consisting of 18 Members, 10 official and 8 elected, the official Members being bound to vote with the Governor. That is the present system; and practically the Governor has the power to do what he chooses. I am not going to urge a full and fair representation of the people such as in England. It may not be suited to the present condition of Malta. Malta, as a fortress, is of first-rate importance to England, and military necessities must be the first consideration. But I hold that every liberty consistent with these necessities should be conceded to the people; and if the Government must, to some extent, be despotic, that despotism should be enlightened and worthy of England. Such a heresy and anomaly as a bread tax should not be continued, and the initiative of some other alternative tax must rest with the Government, who can, if they choose, having all the power, levy a tax on property and income, and make Malta a free port like Gibraltar. There can be no reason why municipal rights and self-government in local matters should not be conceded. From information which I have received from Malta, I find that it is desired to have a civilian instead of, or in addition to, a military Governor. On this point I express no opinion; but I hope that every reasonable wish of the inhabitants will meet with a favourable consideration. I am told by some in England that the Maltese are disloyal to the British Government. If this be so, which I trust it is not, there must be some grievous fault on our side. A wise and enlightened policy on the part of England should bind the interests and inclinations of 150,000 Maltese to us; and that wisdom and enlightenment the Maltese have a right to claim at our hands. I am fully aware that it may be said this is a small question to bring before the House of Commons. But I firmly believe that the association of the name of England with a policy of retrogression on the subject of Free Trade never can be of small importance. In conclusion, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

MR. ANDERSON: Sir, in rising to second the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Potter), which I do with great pleasure, I must also express some regret that his Resolution had not been of a broader character, because it appears to me that, though my hon. Friend has decidedly hit upon a blot, still the iniquitous bread tax which he denounces is only one of the symptoms of a deeper disease in the administration of Malta, the real cause of the evil being a Government entirely despotic and irresponsible to the people governed. We have held the island since 1800, previous to which there was a Consiglio Popolare, which ensured some approach to popular government, but under our rule that entirely vanished, till in 1849, under Letters Patent, a Council was instituted consisting of 18 Members, of whom the Military Governor, along with other 9, are official, and 8 are elected, and in this way the official element at any time swamps the elective. But even the elected Members are only the representatives of a very narrow constituency, as I believe the franchise is equivalent to an £8 ownership or a £40 occupancy, and there are only about 2,300 electors in a population of 150,000. The natural result of this state of matters is bad government. The military and official elements everywhere override the civilian, the people are treated with disrespect or indifference, and even the native nobility, dating from as old as the Norman Conquest, is nowhere. I propose to give a few illustrations of the bad government of which I have spoken. The bread tax, of which the hon. Member for Rochdale has just spoken, is one of them. He has told us that it was imposed in 1837; but he omitted to tell us that, in its imposition, there was a stipulation that it should be used only "for purposes of unquestionable public utility." Now, it appears that this has been interpreted to mean utility to the town of Valetta only, and the money that is raised generally, is expended locally, in decorating Valetta and making it a healthy and pleasant place of residence for the garrison and the officials. I am informed that about £60,000 has been spent on an opera house, about £40,000 on a cemetery, the corridors of the Governor's palace have been lately paved with costly marble, half the cost of an extension of the harbour for the British fleet—some £100,000—and £6,000 a-year for lighting the streets of Valetta, while the smaller towns are not allowed the cost of a paraffin lamp. There are no municipalities and no local authorities, so that outside Valetta local government is entirely neglected. There is no attempt to check mendicity, and the schools are neglected. There is one good point about the schools—they are cheap, the fees are almost nominal, but unfortunately along with that the education is bad. Out of 28,000 children of school age—five to fifteen—only 7,400 are at school, and, even after our rule of three quarters of a century, there is little provision for teaching our language. Only in the higher schools is it required, and at the primary schools only about 800 children are subjected to even a pretence of learning it. Yet another instance of misrule. Lord Cardwell, on the 19th September, 1864, sent a despatch instructing the local government that "no money Vote was to be passed against the opinion of the elected members." But that despatch has just been set at nought in the most flagrant manner. It seems the Chief Secretary wanted his salary raised from £1,000 to £1,300; so having got the consent of Lord Cardwell, he moved it in the Council on the 23rd February last; and notwithstanding that every one of the elected members opposed it—the whole 8 voting against it—the official members carried the increase by a majority of 1, that one being actually the vote of the Chief Secretary himself. It seems to me that open corruption could not go much further than this; and when such an act can be done openly and unblushingly, what may not be suspected of more secret acts? It is even alleged that justice can hardly be had, if that justice happens to be invoked against an official. Sir Adrian Dingli, the Crown Advocate, has held his office for 23 years, during which he has appointed all the Judges and heads of Departments, and has concentrated in his own hands pretty much the whole power in the island. With so long a tenure of office it could hardly be otherwise, and to a certain extent this is the case with the permanent officials in our Departments at home. The Governor having only a five years' term of office, knows and can do little. If there is an appeal to the Governor, he refers it to the Crown Advocate. If there is an appeal to the Chief Secretary, he also refers it to the Crown Advocate. If the appeal be to the Secretary of State at home, the Crown Advocate writes the despatch that accompanies the appeal; and if the appeal be to the Law Courts, again the Crown Advocate appears and defends the Government—that is himself—before Judges who have been appointed by himself. Now I do not say that wrong is actually done under all that; there may be no wrong done—but the circumstances indicate a system under which wrong is possible, and therefore suspicion is warranted. I believe that Malta, if well governed, would be a very flourishing place. I understand its imports from England come to near £1,000,000 sterling annually, those from other countries only a tenth of that. I understand that about 4,500 steamers touch there annually, and I do not doubt that if the suggestion of my hon. Friend, for making Malta a free port, were adopted, it would soon become a great entrepôt of trade. At present its revenue, as regards the amount, is in a satisfactory state. It appears to be about £170,000, while the expenditure for the coming year is estimated at about £160,000, leaving a surplus of £10,000, besides which there is a sum of about £9,000 invested in Consols, derived from some former land sales and held to meet any pressing emergency. Malta pays the whole of the military Governor's salary of £5,000 a-year, and besides that I believe it keeps up a regiment of fencibles. When a few days ago I asked the Under Secretary for the Colonies, if Government had considered the policy of appointing a civilian Governor, and would do so on the expiry of the present appointment in June, 1877, he said—"No, they would not change, because Malta must be considered as a great fortress, where we keep British troops." But, Sir, that fortress and those troops are not kept there for Maltese purposes, but for national ones; and I question the fairness to Malta of having a highly-paid military Governor and making Malta pay his whole salary. In my opinion the Governorship ought to be divided, both salary and duties. Let there be a military Governor to look after national interests and paid for by us, and also a civilian Governor to look after Maltese administration and paid for by Malta. Were that done, the interests of the people would be looked after as they are not at present, and a great deal of the improper expenditure would be saved. Besides that there ought to be local rating for purely local purposes in Valetta as elsewhere, and if these changes were not enough to get quit of the bread tax, there should be a change to direct taxation, exactly as we, in 1846, adopted the income tax in order to abolish the Corn Laws, the best thing Great Britain ever did for her own prosperity. My hon. Friend has pointed out the iniquity of the Maltese bread tax; it amounts to a farthing on every pound of bread; and, as the poor are the great consumers of bread, it falls with the greatest hardship on the poor. A man's consumption of bread does not increase as his wealth increases, but rather the contrary, and on no principle of justice can such a tax be defended. Even the Crown Advocate of Malta, in defending his Financial Statement the other day, was obliged to admit that it was "a very ugly tax," though, in some measure, he tried to justify it on the old exploded fallacy that wages were regulated by the price of food, and therefore that dear bread assured higher wages. It would be insulting the common sense of the House of Commons even to argue against that fallacy, and, in truth, the only ground on which the tax can be in any way justified is the difficulty of arranging for a substitute. That difficulty might, I think, be overcome under a better form of government, that is with the military and civil rule separated, the constitution of the Council changed, and an enlarged constituency to give that civil rule a more truly representative character. But as Government seem to have decided against present change, there is another proposal which I would urge upon them, and it is one that, in many other matters, they have shown great readiness to adopt. Let them send out a Royal Commission to inquire into the civil administration of Malta; and I feel confident that the result of that inquiry will show the necessity of some such changes as I have pointed out.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient in policy, and mischievous as an example to other Nations on the shores of the Mediterranean, to continue to levy ten shillings a quarter on wheat imported into the island of Malta, and other high Duties of a protective character on grain and cattle,"—(Mr. Potter,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he had passed many years of his life in the Mediterranean and at Malta, and would remind the House that Malta voluntarily undertook to pay the expenses of the Government, which he thought very moderate. The corn tax was no doubt, as it had been called, a very "ugly" tax, and one that it was impossible to defend; but in a small community like Malta it was exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to raise revenue by direct taxation, which would cause greater discontent among the population than the present system, bad as that might be. When he was Chief Secretary at Corfu, under the late Sir Henry Storks, they were anxious to reform the system of taxation in the Ionian Islands, and appointed a Commission to investigate the matter; but it was found to be perfectly impossible to raise anything by direct taxation. Therefore, with every desire to see a better system of finance in Malta, he knew how difficult it would be to have there anything but a system of indirect taxation, especially as a great part of the inhabitants of Malta were a seafaring population. He felt certain that if the hon. Member for Glasgow were to go to Malta, and examine for himself into the local conditions of Malta, he would see how difficult it was to have anything but that existing system of taxation. As to the present system of government in Malta, it was that recommended by the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis, who was one of the Commissioners sent out to inquire into the subject, and the Maltese were quite satisfied with our rule. With regard to the increase of the salary paid to the Chief Secretary of the Governor, that increase did not involve any addition to the taxes paid by the people of Malta. The Chief Secretary for several years received £1,000 a-year. This year the Governor thought it right to increase his salary. The Governor had a private secretary, who received £300 a-year. The Governor gave up the private secretary and added £300 to the salary of the Chief Secretary.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, in contradiction of a statement that the people of Malta were disloyal, said they were thoroughly loyal. Although, no doubt, there was a small revolutionary party, they were of no importance, and they only served to bring into more prominent relief the feelings of the majority of the population. He trusted that the time would come when the financial condition of the island would render it possible to deal with the question raised by the Motion, but he did not see what the present Government could do with it. It was a question which would be debated much more appropriately in the Council of Malta than in Parliament. The present Constitution of Malta was thoroughly unsatisfactory. Much might have been done for ameliorating the state of the population had not military concerns engrossed the attention of the Government of Malta. In the Council of Malta there were eight persons who represented the people of Malta, and there were nine persons who held official positions in the island under the Government, and who were bound to vote as the Governor chose. Moreover, the Governor himself had a vote. Therefore the Executive Government could carry everything their own way, and the Constitution was a mere mockery and delusion. This condition of affairs had caused great discontent. Those who represented the population ought surely to have a majority, even if it was only a majority of one, and he trusted that something would be done to satisfy the people of Malta that those who represented them should have a due preponderance on all matters relating to taxation in the island and to the expenditure of money. With regard to the increase of the Chief Secretary's salary, he observed that the salary of the Judge, who was a very able man, was only £600 a-year, and the salary of the Queen's Advocate was £600 a-year. The Chief Secretary had the highest salary in the island, except the Governor. The people of Malta had a right to derive some benefit from the abolition of the office of private secretary. The private secretary was disposed of, he (Sir George Bowyer) assumed, because his services were not required. The elected members of the Council who represented the taxpayers ought to have had an opportunity of deciding on that matter. On a recent occasion, the nobility of Malta had met with anything but proper treatment, and he thought they ought to look with favour on the people of Malta, and that their complaints should be listened to with respect, the more so as they were under a military, and not a civil administration. It should be remembered that the Maltese aristocracy was very ancient.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that no apology was necessary, for he (Mr. Lowther) should be the last person to call in question the propriety of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Potter) bringing this subject under their attention. But although his hon. Friend had brought forward the subject of which he had given Notice and confined himself to it, other hon. Gentlemen had, very naturally perhaps, taken the opportunity of travelling very far beyond the terms of the Notice originally given. His hon. Friend having stated that the revenues of Malta were derived almost exclusively from indirect sources, it would probably be convenient to the House to point out briefly what the facts were. The population of Malta was set down roughly at about 150,000. The estimated expenditure for the past year was £160,000. Of that sum £40,000 was revenue derived from the rent of land; and that was an item which in no way fell on the bulk of the population, as it was paid by the occupiers. Upwards of £6,000 was derived from interest of Consols and other Stock, and £1,200 from reimbursements from the Imperial Funds. His hon. Friend would thus see that out of £160,000 required for this expenditure, about £48,000 was met from sources to which the bulk of the population in no way contributed. That left about £113,000 to be made up by general taxation. Of that amount some £52,000 was derived from sources to which his hon. Friend had more especially referred—the tax upon wheat, barley, and other grain. His hon. Friend would therefore see that the items of revenue against which he had directed his attacks formed a very considerable element of income, being two-fifths of the entire revenue of the colony. There were other items to which he had referred—namely, £3,500 for the import duty on cattle, and some £200 from a duty on horses and mules. He had shown the House that the sum of £55,000 odd was derived from those sources which were more particularly attacked in the Resolution. How did his hon. Friend propose to meet the deficiency which he would create? His hon. Friend might have followed a distinguished example offered to him not long ago, when a large remission of taxation was proposed, and no substitute sketched out. His hon. Friend had declined to follow the example, though he had adopted a course which certainly was not inspired from the source to which he just alluded. His hon. Friend suggested the imposition of an Income Tax. He confessed he was rather astonished to find his hon. Friend in 1876 advocating the imposition of a tax which his political Friends had so frequently denounced. Another source of revenue suggested as an alternative by the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion (Mr. Anderson) was the transfer from Imperial sources to local rates of a considerable item of expenditure incurred in the town of Valetta. The hon. Member for Rochdale was a zealous apostle of Free Trade, and they were all indebted to him for a valuable addition to their library. But he would point out to his hon. Friend that there would be some incongruity in English public men propounding the doctrine of Free Trade as a cardinal principle applicable in all conceivable circumstances and cases. There might be some incongruity, for instance, in advocating that doctrine on the shores of the Mediterranean, while a few miles distant a different system was upheld under British rule. He therefore thought his hon. Friend might easily convince himself that Free Trade, though advantageous in certain cases, would not be so in exceptional ones. The English Government presided over many communities who were by no means of one mind on this subject. His hon. Friend proposed that the Government should take advantage of the majority it possessed in the Council to overrule the elected element.

His hon. Friend, however, must be perfectly well aware that the Natives of Malta were by no means well versed in the doctrines of political economy. He would express no opinion on the subject; Her Majesty's Government were not called upon to do so. But if it was the duty of the Government to constitute themselves the champions of Free Trade, and force it on every community over the destiny of which they were called to preside, what reception, he would ask, would such a policy be likely to meet with in Canada or Melbourne, for example. The hon. Member for Glasgow, in seconding the Amendment, had suggested that a civil as well as a military Governor should be appointed for Malta. He might, however, remind the House that Malta was not only a colony of some importance, but that it was also an important fortress, and the question, therefore, would be how far the appointment of a dual government would conduce to the military efficiency of the fortress. The subject the hon. Member for Glasgow would doubtless himself admit to be one of some difficulty, which Her Majesty's Government would be justified in considering before arriving at a decision with regard to it. Looking at the subject abstractedly, he confessed that he could see no objection to the appointment of a civil Governor, provided such an appointment would be consistent with the military efficiency of the fortress; but it was the opinion of competent authorities that the retention of the present system was more likely to maintain that efficiency than the scheme of the hon. Member for Glasgow would be if it were carried into effect. Some 30 years ago a gentleman whose name was not unknown to many hon. Members (Mr. More O'Ferrall) was appointed Civil Governor of Malta, but that result of that appointment was not in favour of a repetition of the experiment. The hon. Member for Glasgow objected that the cost of the Governor was thrown upon the population of Malta, and suggested that the salaries of both should be defrayed out of the Imperial revenues; but he (Mr. Lowther) should have thought the Estimates were already sufficiently high, and he was therefore surprised at the suggestion of the hon. Member.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that he did not intend that the Governors should receive £5,000 a-year each, but that the Military Governor should receive £3,000, and the Civil Governor £2,000 a-year.

MR. J. LOWTHER doubted whether, under those circumstances, the hon. Member would find the efficiency of either improved, and was afraid that the dual government would in the end prove far more expensive than the present system. At all events, it would certainly require great consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Government before it could be adopted. Men of great experience were opposed to such a system. The experiment had been tried in another colony some years ago, and had failed, and Sir George Cornwall Lewis expressed an opinion decidedly hostile to such an experiment. The hon. Member was wrong when he termed the government of Malta an enlightened despotism. On the contrary, the wishes of the inhabitants were most carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government, whenever they were not inconsistent with the efficiency of the fortress. It had been said that the tax was an exceptional hardship upon the working classes; but in his opinion it pressed very lightly upon the general community, while the imposition of any substitute for it would inevitably lead to great discontent. In his opinion, it would be most unwise to attempt to interfere with the fiscal arrangements which had commended themselves to the general approval of the Council.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not think that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowther) had been very successful in his reply to the hon. Member for Rochdale. The story about such taxes pressing lightly was the familiar one which had always been urged in favour of this form of taxation, and he could not entertain the opinion that the officials of the Colonial Office, and one of the ability of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowther) himself, could not devise a substitute for the taxes of which the hon. Member for Rochdale complained. He did not think that any fair parallel could be drawn between Malta and Canada, because in the former there was no popular representation.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was of opinion that the duties referred to were not imposed for the purpose of Protection, but were mere fiscal regulations for revenue purposes. The House had at present no satisfactory information with regard to the taxation of Malta; and he thought that those who proposed a change in the existing system ought to show how the change was to be effected. With regard to the question of imposition of income tax on the Maltese, he considered that was the very last means that should be resorted to, and until he heard of some better scheme of taxation than that which at present existed he could not vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend.

ARMY—SPECIAL ALLOWANCES TO THE BRIGADE OF GUARDS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. A. MOORE, in rising to call attention to the special allowances to the Foot Guards, said, that he did not wish to make any attack upon the administration of the War Office, or upon the brigade of Guards, but simply to call attention to certain abuses which had existed for some years. For instance, he found from Returns which he had obtained that while £30,190 was allowed to the Foot Guards as special allowances, £8,008 only were allowed to the Infantry regiments of the Line. He also found, among a variety of other items, that £11,079 were voted for hospitals and recruiting, whilst only £5,692 were spent upon those services; so that it would seem that £5,387 should be returned to the Treasury. This, however, was by no means the case, but, instead, £1,360 per annum were given in aid of the band expenses of the regiments, which was indirectly an allowance to the officers, who would, otherwise, themselves have to pay the band expenses. There was also £907 for Staff allowances for non-commissioned officers, and £6,278 for "profits" to field officers and captains; or in all a total of £8,545. He wished to know where the money came from. He did not wish to destroy any vested interests which the Guards had enjoyed for many years; but he thought the system was a bad one, because the money was voted under the wrong name; in the next place, it was not devoted to the purpose for which it was voted; and, thirdly, it was impossible to audit the accounts. Whenever the "profits," to which there was no legal title, were less than usual, there was simply added to the bottom of the account a sum that would bring it up to the usual amount. He thought they were entitled to know how these accounts passed the Controller at the War Office, for he could not conceive any system which would be more loose or irregular. For instance, a sum of £77 was paid for hautboys, which most certainly did not exist, and it was in order to end such charges as those that he desired to see the accounts placed on a proper and correct footing.

MR. STANLEY, in replying on behalf of the Government, said, he should like to point out the footing upon which the brigade of Guards stood. He could not help thinking that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Moore) had put the case in a manner which told equally well both ways. Whether these allowances were right or wrong, they were payments which had been made from time immemorial, going back even to that remote time when the country did not possess a standing Army; and no public account of their disbursement has ever been rendered or asked for in connection with the Estimates. He did not say that that alone was an infallible argument for their continuance, but he had a right to point out that there had been many and careful investigations into the pay and allowances of the Army by Committees of very high class, both in that House and in "another place;" and notwithstanding alterations had been made, these allowances had been continued. The brigade of Guards had been allowed to remain upon the same footing; and that mere fact went a long way to prove that there were strong reasons for the continuance of these allowances. The Committee which sat in 1850-1 took a considerable quantity of evidence, and made a carefully-drawn and valuable Report, from which it appeared that the cost per man in the Guards was £48 11s. 3d., whilst that of the regiments of the line was £46 19s. 6d., showing a difference of something like a penny per day, which was the actual amount of increased pay received by a soldier in the Guards. With respect to the form of accounts, there could be no doubt that it was not quite what was to be desired; but the subject was gone into with some care by his Predecessor (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and the late Sir James Lindsay, and they came to the conclusion that it would be impossible to interfere with the matter without entering into much wider questions. He believed it would be in accordance with the feeling of the officers of the Guards that there should be an inquiry into the stock-purse expenses, and such an inquiry had been contemplated for some time past; but the question up to the present moment was not ripe for investigation. With respect to recruiting, the system of recruiting for the Guards—a full account of which would be found in the Report of 1851—had always been carried on upon a different principle from that of the rest of the Army, but under the new system of recruiting through the brigade depôts the Guards did not wholly depend upon their own recruiting resources. Then, again, other regiments had paymasters—at all events, up to a certain date—but in the Guards, owing to their regimental arrangements, the duty was performed by the quartermasters, who received £20 for each battalion, which was the extra allowance shown in the Return. However desirable it might be to place these Guards' allowances upon a footing more in accordance with modern methods of account-keeping, immense difficulty had been found in dealing with these questions without recognizing the fact that the officers of the Guards found their own lodgings and did not receive allowances which were made in kind or in money to officers in the rest of the Army. If put on the same footing they would probably require the same allowances at large cost to the public. There was also the difficulty of deciding whether the officers of the Guards had any, and, if any, what vested rights to the property in the regimental hospitals. These were presumably built out of public money, and yet the officers contributed to the hospital fund and received proportionate sums on retirement, and these sums had even been paid to the heirs of deceased officers, which appeared to show that they might be legally claimed. He should not like to express a strong opinion on the question until he had the results of an inquiry to guide him. Substantially, then, while there was room for improvement in the form of the accounts, there had been no misappropriation of money in the sense of diverting it from the purpose for which it was granted by the State, and there had been no undue expenditure upon the brigade of Guards as compared with the general expenditure of corresponding branches of the Army.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, it was impossible to examine the accounts and history of the whole question as it had been his duty, when at the War Office, to do, without coming to the conclusion that the present arrangements were in a most anomalous condition; though, at the same time, he did not know that the country lost much, or that it would gain by a change if it had to provide barrack accommodation. The form of accounts was most extraordinary, and they were made more complicated from the circumstances which occurred during the Crimean War. Up to the date of that war, there was an annual sum of £158 odd per company granted to the Guards, which was supposed to cover their recruiting and hospital expenses; but during the war the battalions became so diminished in numbers, that the recruiting expenses to replenish the numbers were exceptionally heavy, and the officers complained that the sum allowed—£158—was not sufficient, and an arrangement was made by which they agreed to render items of their account, and that if they had a surplus, the balance should be paid over to the country, whilst, on the other hand, if there was a deficiency, it should be made up by the country. The items had remained stereotyped exactly as they were at that time, and that was the origin of the payment of £1,600 to make up the deficiency. But this was a small matter compared with the question of administrative efficiency, and in that respect he believed the system to be indefensible. With regard to the hospitals, they were not so efficient as the hospitals of the Army generally, and the claim set up by the officers that the hospitals belonged to them was one which could scarcely be allowed without considerable hesitation, because although they had given liberal contributions the public had also rendered considerable assistance. He trusted that these matters would be further inquired into—that a thorough and complete inquiry would be instituted, and that there would be associated with the officers of the Guards, to whom his hon. Friend had alluded, a certain number of outsiders, so that the country might be satisfied that the interests of the public would be duly cared for.

MR. WHITWELL hoped the matter would now be thoroughly investigated. With regard to recruiting, the present system was certainly not so efficient as it ought to be; and as to the other point, if it could be said that the officers of the Guards had a vested interest in their hospitals, the sooner they were compensated for them the better. It was absolutely necessary that the question should be dealt with.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not think that the public suffered in the matter, but there were certainly points connected with it which appeared to be anomalous. There were difficulties in the way of coming to a practical conclusion on the subject. When it was known that money had been paid to the heirs of deceased officers, it certainly looked as if they had a vested interest in their hospitals. All he could say was that, having had his attention called to the subject, he would undertake to look very carefully into it, and see what was the best way of arriving at a satisfactory solution. But he might add that if he felt it his duty to institute inquiry it would be an impartial one, and not be by the Guards alone.

CRIMINAL LAW—ADMINISTRATION IN SUMMARY CASES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HOPWOOD, who had a Notice upon the Paper which he was precluded from moving—

“That the law regulating the appointment, jurisdiction, and duties of Justices of the Peace, and the administration by them of the Criminal Law in summary cases in England and Wales, needs speedy and thorough investigation, with a view to its amendment,” said, there could be no doubt of the imperative necessity of the inquiry referred to in that Resolution. In November last he introduced to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary an influential deputation of the working classes, who expressed their feelings on the subject. They did not offer any detailed scheme, but urged their conviction that the existing law was in a most unsatisfactory condition, and pressed with undue and unnecessary harshness on the poorer classes of the community. Premising that no man ought to be tried excepting by his peers, they suggested that an extension should be given to option of trial by jury, as illustrated in the recent case under the Conspiracy Act and other instances; a clearer separation of criminal from civil offences, as had been done in the case of workmen's contracts; and a re-consideration of the whole question of imprisonment, which among certain classes had become too common, they said, and had in a great measure ceased to be regarded either as a punishment or a disgrace. They stated that the greatest dissatisfaction was felt with the way in which many of the magistrates discharged their duties, and urged that no reform of the laws of summary jurisdiction could remove the suspicion with which the local administration of justice was unhappily attended, unless it were accompanied by some remedial measure with regard to the appointment of the local magistrates. Having these objects in view, they desired an inquiry. The Home Secretary, while combating their views on certain points, gave the deputation on the whole a favourable reception. With regard to the law regulating appointments, as it stood at present it was most unsatisfactory, especially with respect to the appointment of magistrates. It was also a scandal and a reproach to both political Parties in the State, the sole ground on which those appointments were made being that the persons receiving them had rendered services to their Party in their respective neighbourhoods. That kind of patronage was a public trust, and the manner in which it was administered by Lords Lieutenant of counties was often a disgrace to those high functionaries. The qualification now required for holding the office of a justice of the peace did not include any knowledge of the law, or any fitness for the discharge of the important duties to be performed, involving the administration of hundreds of Acts of Parliament; indeed, for all the precaution taken, he might be a man who could neither read nor write, and it might be possible to find that there had been magistrates who could do neither. The present qualification as regarded the counties, which dated as far back as the reign of George II., was that the person appointed should possess £100 a-year from land or have £300 a-year from land in reversion. Justices appointed were young or old. As regarded the former, in counties it was considered a sufficient passport to the magisterial office that the person chosen should be 21 years of age, if he were the representative of landed estate in the county. It was monstrous that a mere property qualification should suffice. In the case of the older men who were selected, a knowledge of the world and of the habits of the community among whom they had to administer justice might help to qualify them for the office, but surely some amount of legal knowledge was also necessary? According to the Commission of justices of the peace, they had to inquire, among other things, "into enchantments, sorceries, arts of magic, forestalling, regrating, engrossing," and other obsolete matters. He knew it would be said that the magistrates, so far as a knowledge of the law went, relied on their clerks, and in seven cases out of ten the clerk was practically the magistrate, and being in practice as an attorney might decide cases in which his clients were concerned. But would the House believe it there was no legal obligation even for the clerk to be a lawyer; any magistrate might appoint his butler, and although there could be no doubt clerks ought to have some legal knowledge; and as a rule they had, yet he had known more than one instance of a mere attorney's clerk being appointed to the office, with nothing to recommend him but his cheapness. The clerk, again, might be the confidential solicitor of half the country round, and might and did advise magistrates while cases, political or otherwise, affecting their own clients, were under consideration. Indeed, he knew a case in which the magistrate's clerk, being also a political agent, advised the dismissal of a charge of offence against the Ballot Act at an election, but which on the very same evidence the grand jury sent for trial, and justice was not defeated. That injustice was known and keenly felt. He should, no doubt, be told that he was attacking a respectable body of men. That was a parrot-cry in such cases. But he had yet to learn how justices or justices' clerks or any body of men could be insulted by a statement that there were some unworthy men among them against whom the public ought to be protected by legislation. Magistrates had to deal with 34 large classes of offences, and in addition they were called upon to inflict punishment for breaches of prison discipline. The lash was not very popular in England, but any felon, or other person, sentenced to hard labour could be whipped by order of the magistrate. He found from the judicial statistics just issued that in the year 1874 there had been 163 cases of whipping in the gaols of England and Wales; putting in irons, 60; confined in solitary cells 16,300 men and women; stoppage of diet, 40,000. He found in some gaols the whipping was extravagantly done, in others very sparingly. In Manchester, where there was a daily average of persons imprisoned of 467, there had been 39 whippings, while in Liverpool, where the daily average was rather more, only 8; and in Wandsworth, with a much larger number of prisoners, 14, which was also the figure at Salford. At Coldbath Fields Prison, with four times the number of prisoners, there had been 40 whippings; but at Maidstone, with a daily average of 312, there had been only 2, and at Wakefield, Durham, and Stafford, none at all, although the daily number of prisoners in each of those prisons was much larger than in Manchester. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Cross) was proposing to transfer these powers by his Prisons' Bill from local to national jurisdiction, and it would be a nice point how to regulate these floggings. Were they to go up to the Manchester level, or come down to that of Wakefield, Durham, and Stafford? Then, as regarded the other punishments in the gaols, he found that at Coldbath Fields no females were punished at all, while at Liverpool there were 1,193 women put into solitary cells, and only 813 men. The total number of cases dealt with by the magistrates in 1874, by summary jurisdiction, was 622,000 out of which 486,786 were convicted, and against those convictions there were but 107 appeals, of which 51 were in cases of bastardy and 28 as regarded the Beer Acts. Deducting only the bastardy cases from each side, that would give in round figures one appeal to every 8,600 convictions. That, however, was not a proof that justice had been done in all the other cases, because in nine out of ten cases there was no appeal. It was monstrous that that should be the fact, when they reflected how many thousands of these cases were assaults, and subject to any amount of perjury. They all knew that the police frequently made charges of assault, and yet the magistrates had the power of sending a man to prison for six months on the word of a policeman, without an appeal. These were things not to be borne, and fully justified his demand for investigation. Some of these cases were so outrageous that the Home Secretary was called upon to overrule decisions like these. There was the case, much commented on, of the captain who the other day was sent to gaol for keeping a refractory seaman in irons for an excessive time; but if the captain had had an appeal the case might have been calmly discussed; it would have been decided whether the magistrate was right or wrong, the captain would not have been wronged by injustice, and his right hon. Friend would not have been obliged to interfere. He complained that although magistrates were not allowed by law to pass sentences of more than six months' imprisonment, yet by dividing charges they often exceeded that amount. Thus if a man were charged with assaulting two policemen, the man would probably be sentenced to six months for the assault on each, the second sentence to commence at the expiration of the first, the result being that the punishment of a year's imprisonment was inflicted while the law limited the magistrate's power to six months only. He found, too, that there were a great number of imprisonments for the non-payment of costs. There were at the present moment several prisoners in Salford Gaol who, unless they could find sureties, in a very short time would be going through six months' imprisonment in addition to three to which they had been first sentenced for night-poaching. Doubtless there were many similar cases. Often when the magistrate assessed the breach of the law at 6*d.* the unfortunate delinquent would be sent to prison for seven or 14 days, or a month, for non-payment of the fees or the costs; and that also was a point into which there ought to be an inquiry. In making those observations he wished it to be understood that he was attacking the system, and not the men by whom it was administered, and he did so, because the subject was an important one, and one in which he took much interest. But while he made no attack on individuals, he contended that the law as it stood was objectionable, and protested against the present mode of appointing magistrates as monstrous, maintaining that an inquiry ought to be instituted by the Government as to how they were to be appointed in future, so that some evidence of fitness for the office might be secured, as well as the proper administration of the criminal law in summary cases. He also thought the right of appeal should be multiplied wherever personal liberty was affected. A crying evil existed; but he was sure that the subject could not be in better hands than those of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was not disposed to find fault with the way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hopwood) had laid his case before the House, or to deny that it was deserving of the utmost attention. The general tone of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech might, however, lead to some misconception out-of-doors, inasmuch as the inference might be drawn—he would not say correctly—that he had brought a great indictment, not against any individual justice, but against magistrates as a body. [Mr. Hopwood: No, no!] He knew that was not the feeling of the hon. and learned Member. Standing as he (Mr. Cross) did, in a certain sense, at the head of the magistracy of the country, he was bound to say that, for his part, he believed there were no men who, as a body, acted more fearlessly, more honestly, with more care, with more patience, or with a more thorough determination to do what was right than the magistrates of this country. They gave an enormous amount of time, and took infinite trouble, for which they got no thanks—at least he had never got any himself—to discharge properly the duties which devolved on them. Having, however, said this much on behalf of the magistrates—and he could not speak too strongly of them in that way—he was willing to admit that the system which the hon. and learned Gentleman had brought before the House was one which required alteration, and it had been his intention, if the state of Public Business had admitted of his doing so, to introduce a measure with a view of correcting many of the anomalies which existed in the present state of the law. He hoped, however, early next Session, if not before, to be able to deal with one or two matters in it which required amendment. He did not, he might add, think that there was need of much inquiry for the purpose, because all the facts of the case were, he believed, already very well known, and whenever he brought forward his measure he would, he imagined, be able to show how certain mischiefs had crept into the system which it was desirable to remove. Act after Act, for instance, had been passed, into which, whether owing to the action of the draftsman or some other cause, a clause relating to summary jurisdiction had in some shape or another been introduced, and the result was that, a number of those clauses having got into Acts of Parliament one by one, it was impossible to obtain a bird's-eye view of the whole of our criminal law, except in some big book which was scarcely ever read. He, however, had, with the assistance of several able persons, taken the trouble to get a somewhat complete view of all those ugly clauses, and he certainly was of opinion that they wanted re-arrangement, and that they could easily be re-arranged without making a revolution in the practice of the criminal law. He was also quite willing to admit that it was a great hardship that out of 140,000 sent to gaol there should be as many as one-third to whose cases the statute law was not applicable, and that great relief might be given by the amendment of the part of the law relating to costs. He could not, however, assent to the statement that there was throughout the country great dissatisfaction with the decisions of the justices. Their decisions, he believed, on the contrary, though they might not in many instances be learned in the law, carried with them very great weight with the people themselves. The hon. and learned Member found fault with the mode of their appointment, but he seemed to have much more knowledge, he (Mr. Cross) might add, of their appointments of justices in boroughs than in counties. He was quite aware that in the county with which he was connected the appointment of the magistrates was at one time extremely political. He was not blaming one side more than another; but he was happy to say that the system had been changed, and that the appointments were now practically non-political. With regard to the counties, he believed that the Lords Lieutenant generally made the appointments fairly; and the Lord Chancellor was responsible for the selection of borough magistrates. If we could not trust the Lords Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor it would be rather difficult to find any one in whom confidence could be reposed. The hon. and learned Member talked about the qualifications of justices, and suggested that they should know a little law. Now in the administration of justice he (Mr. Cross) thought that a little law was a dangerous thing. What they wanted, with, of course, some knowledge of law, if possible, was a great deal of sound common sense. Look at the great body of the people from whom the justices were selected. They were persons who had spent a great number of the years of their life in active employment and in building up their fortunes or promoting the honour and renown of their country. It was in the same class which supplied them with Members of Parliament that they practically found their magistrates. They could not put them through any examination. The examination which these men had passed had been the work of their lives; they had raised themselves to a position which qualified them for appointments to the magistracy. In his own country they had a magistrate for every policeman, 800 in number, but he did not say that they had too many magistrates—and it was quite right that they should be in the commission of the peace. He might here remark that he would alter the terms of the commission with regard to witchcraft and enchantments, if the change would give any satisfaction to the hon. and learned Member opposite. Undoubtedly one of the oldest laws which could be found provided, and it was no doubt desirable, that there should be on the commission of the peace gentlemen learned in law. So far as they could that was carried out by the practice which almost invariably obtained of making use of the County Court Judges, and he could speak of the immense services which were rendered by the County Court Judges, not only at petty, but at quarter sessions in all cases of appeal. The hon. and learned Member had referred to the absence of any qualification in the justices' clerk, and had said that they might appoint a butler to the office. The magistrates' own character was at stake in the administration of justice, and they would take care to appoint the best man they could get. He admitted that the clerks ought to be paid by salary, and not by fees, and he hoped to be able to persuade Parliament to make the Act which was now permissive compulsory. With regard to terms of punishment, there were a good many old statutes, and they found that in these the punishments were more severe than in the modern statutes, and it was one of the great evils of Consolidation Acts that the severer penalties were almost always retained. With regard to the differing amounts of punishment awarded by the justices as stated by the hon. and learned Member, he wished to have their administration in prisons as uniform as possible, for, although they did their duty there as honestly as they did elsewhere, they were apt to get into particular grooves in particular localities. The hon. and learned Member had referred to the question of appeal. Now, from the decisions of the justices, there was a short, cheap, and easy appeal to the Secretary of State, and he had been perfectly astonished at the comparatively few cases in which complaints had been made to him of the decisions of the justices. As to the question of costs in criminal appeals he knew that there was a feeling in some populous places that persons were sent to prison so that the clerks might get their fees, and he should like to see some legislation by which the clerks would be paid by salary, and, secondly, that power would be given to the magistrates to give time to parties so that they might find sureties for payment. He did not think that any inquiry into the subject was necessary, and in conclusion he desired to repeat his testimony to the admirable way in which the magistrates of this county performed their duty.

AUDIT OF ARMY AND NAVY EXPENDITURE ACCOUNTS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. HOLMS, who had a Notice on the Paper to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, in order to secure the due appropriation of Army and Navy Expenditure to the purposes intended by Parliament, it is expedient that the system of independent audit which, since the passing of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, 1866, has been successfully applied to the accounts of the Annual Grants for the Miscellaneous Civil Services, should be extended in its leading principles, to the Grants for Military and Naval Services,” said, that at a time when the House of Commons was called upon to vote a sum almost unparalleled for the Army and Navy during peace, it might not be inappropriate to draw attention to the manner in which a sum of £27,000,000 voted for those Services was audited on the part of the House. Fortunately, the principle involved in the Motion he was about to submit was not one upon which there was any controversy. On the contrary, the principle was admitted by financial authorities sitting on both sides of the House as well as by financial authorities outside the House. The duty he had to perform was to show that the House and the country had some reason to complain that the system which had worked so well with regard to the Civil Service expenditure had not been applied to that of the Army and Navy. The Act of 1866, introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was intended to give the Controller and Auditor General substantial authority by making him independent. But in that measure a distinction was drawn between the accounts of the several Departments, and while the Auditor General was required to guarantee that the Civil Service accounts had been expended in accordance with the wishes of the Legislature, he was merely called upon to audit the Army and Navy accounts in gross, to see that the sums for each vote had not been exceeded. It was clear, however, both from speeches made at the time and from the terms of the Act itself, that such an arrangement was only tentative; that a larger application of the principle was contemplated; and that it was intended to extend the system of examination by the Controller and Auditor General to the Army and Navy accounts. Why, then, had not the provisions of this Act, which had worked so well in relation to the other great spending Departments, been applied to the Army and Navy? There was hardly a year since the Act passed that it was not in the power of the Auditor General to draw the attention of the Select Committee on Public Accounts to some case or cases of misappropriation of public money. As early as 1868 the Select Committee on Public Accounts suggested in their Report that the system for which he contended should be applied to the accounts of the Army and Navy, and in 1869 they again drew the attention of the House and the Treasury to the subject. In 1871, on the examination of the Inland Revenue accounts by the Auditor General, a discovery was made which the Committee characterized as a "grave impropriety," that grave impropriety being that some gentlemen in a public office had divided £2,385—the accumulation of income tax—among themselves. These remonstrances at length had some effect, and it was suggested to the Auditor General that as regarded the Army and Navy accounts, he should put the provision of the Act of 1866 into operation himself; but he did not like to do so without the authority of the Treasury or of the House of Commons. Perhaps he thought it impossible to act unless the Treasury moved first and gave him the means. The Treasury, in a letter to the Auditor General, dated March 6, 1872, yielded the whole of his case. He thought that the suggestion in the Treasury letter that expense should not be allowed to stand in the way of the establishment of a proper system of audit was a very wise and proper one. He must remind those who objected to his proposal that Mr. Scudamore had objected to an independent audit of the Post Office accounts, on the ground of the expense of such a system; but five years afterwards that Gentleman had to give evidence with regard to a sum of £830,000, which had been misapplied by the Post Office, which misappropriation had been discovered through the vigilance of the Auditor General to whose appointment he had objected. The Select Committee on Public Accounts had reported favourably on the establishment of an independent audit of the accounts of these great Departments, and their last Report on this subject was made in March, 1875, and in it the statement appeared that a plan had been sketched for the audit of the War Office expenditure, and the same principle was to be applied to the Admiralty accounts. It was similar to that then in process of application to the accounts of the Revenue Department. He could assure hon. Members opposite that he had brought forward this subject in no spirit of antagonism to Her Majesty's Government, but merely in the hope of obtaining from them the fullest and most complete information which they could lay before the House on the subject. He was willing to believe that the Financial Secretary desired to place this question upon a proper footing; but, at the same time, he thought that some explanation should be given with regard to the delay that had occurred in arriving at a determination with regard to it. Doubtless he should be told that the matter was still sub judice, but it was that very fact that he complained of, because a decision should have been arrived at with reference to it long ago. It would be disrespectful to the House were he not to refer to a Memorandum which was appended to the Report of the Select Committee by the Accountant General of the Admiralty, which contained several objections to the proposal which he might as well answer at once. The Memorandum raised the objection, in the first place, that the departmental examination of the accounts was so perfect that it was a mere waste of time and money to do the work again. In his opinion the more perfect the work was done in the Departments the easier would be the task of the Auditor General in auditing their accounts; and, indeed, the same objection might be urged against auditing the accounts of those Departments which were subjected to the supervision of the Auditor General. Besides, it was scarcely correct to speak of an internal examination of accounts as an audit. A person of authority, with an independent judgment, ought to make the audit, and report impartially upon the state of the accounts. The purpose of an independent audit was not so much to control the officer who recorded the expenditure as the head of the Department who ordered it. It had been objected that the heads of the Naval and Military Departments, being responsible for their administration, would not wish to be hampered by external supervision; but in fact they were not more responsible for the expenditure of their Departments than were those who directed the Miscellaneous Expenditure, and could not possibly be hampered in their action, seeing that the audit did not take place for months after the expenditure. If the audit were good for the other Departments, why should it not act well in the case of the Naval and Military Departments, with their vast expenditure of £27,000,000? Either the system of audit was wise or unwise; but if it was good in the one case, why should it not be adopted in the other? He could see no reason why it should not, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give them some reason for hoping that the Army and Navy Departments would be placed under the Auditor General, and that they would be careful not to incur any expenditure for which they could not account to the House of Commons.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that no question could be raised in that House which was of more importance than that which related to the audit or examination of the expenditure of the country. It was, however, a mistake to suppose that the vouchers used for compiling the accounts of the Military and Naval expenditure were not audited or examined with the same care that was bestowed upon the vouchers used in making up the accounts of the different Departments in the Civil Service. His own practical experience with reference to the matter led him to the conclusion that the system of audit in the Military branch which he believed to be formed in assimilation with that at the Naval Department left fewer openings for jobbery in respect to misapplying monies than were to be found in the Civil Service. He submitted that as regarded the auditing of all the accounts of all branches of the Service, there might be, as had been pointed out, great improvements made, as much at the Treasury as at the War Office and Admiralty. The examinations of the vouchers of expenditure at the War Office and Admiralty were conducted by civilian officers formed into a distinct branch in those two Departments of Army and Navy, and this examination being made by one set of Civil servants specially set apart for that duty, he considered that the public had a good right to consider the interests of the country fairly protected, whereas the Civil Service expenditure was examined by the officers of the several individual branches which expended the money, so that for as many branches as there were in the Civil Service there were so many separate sets of examiners, and all intimately connected with the head of that one branch and with the other officers of that branch. The Exchequer and Audit Act of 1866 appeared to give to the Auditor General the power of auditing the Civil Service expenditure, but it was one merely of vouchers, whether the Civil Service expenditure was supported by vouchers or proofs of payments—that was to say, whether the total charge was vouched for; that was a mere City kind of verification practised by every company, it was no examination as to the propriety of the outlay, and the accounts laid before Parliament only showed totals without any details of separate payments. The mode in which the expenditure of the Army and Navy was recorded in the accounts was well-calculated to indicate misapplication of funds from the special and particular purposes intended by Parliament. But there was no such security in respect to the Civil Service outlay, for the accounts thereof were lumped up in large amounts, aggregating different kinds of expenditure into one item, and so entered in the accounts and laid before Parliament; so that there was no such useful check as that afforded by the accounts stated in detail of the Army and Navy, by which the fact could be ascertained as to misappropriations—that was, using the monies voted by Parliament for a different purpose from that for which granted. There could be no second opinion on this point—that sums of money which had been voted for one purpose of the Civil Service might be expended for another. The best and only check for that was a clause in the Appropriation Act requiring the outlay to be specifically accounted for under the very heads, and in the form in which the funds were stated in the Estimates. The Treasury, however, had full power to direct inquiries as to the public expenditure in the Military and Naval Departments. Every figure of expenditure in the Army—and he had no doubt in the Navy too, though he could not speak with equal certainty on that point—was carefully scrutinized by officers of the Comptroller and Auditor General, who were always in the War Office, and to whom every voucher was submitted, in order to see that the entries had been duly verified by the responsible examiners, and that proofs entry was initialed so that falsification was impossible. The 29th clause in the Exchequer Act, which was supposed to be so effectual in protecting the public in regard to the Civil Service expenditure, was, in fact, the course followed for nearly 35 years in respect to the expenditure of the Army and Navy; and, in addition the outlay was initialed in the books so as to ensure the preparation of a correct account. The really best and most effective foundation for a proper examination of the accounts were clear and distinct Estimates, and in order to prevent misappropriation, the more fully and complete the items of expenses were stated, the greater would be the scrutiny of the expenditure entered in vouchers. The Estimates were now presented in great detail by some of the Departments, whilst by others the items were lumped together in a most unsatisfactory manner. The contrast between the Civil Service accounts and those of the Army was great. The real examination by the Comptroller and Auditor General of the Civil Service outlay was a mere test as to whether the total sums which the Heads of each of the many branches of the Civil Service were supported by vouchers. It was no examination as to whether that total was rightly spent for the exact purpose which Parliament intended. It was a mere audit of totals in vouchers, and not of the items entered therein. No doubt the Treasury had the power under the Audit Act to remedy that great de-

THE CHANCELLOR
 QUER said, that the importance of th

Service than for the Military Departments. The origin of that system might be, however, attributed rather to the Military than the Civil Departments, because up to that period the former had a more stringent and efficient system of audit than the Civil Service. The Act of 1866 was therefore brought in and made to apply to the weak part of the Civil Service system, and was not brought to bear on the Military Departments. He had the honour of serving upon the Public Accounts Committee when the late Sir James Graham, Sir Francis Baring, and other authorities examined into this subject, and they thought the audit of Military accounts was a model to be followed in the Civil Service accounts. A clause was afterwards introduced into the Bill giving an optional power to the Treasury to apply the new system of audit to the military service also. Now that the very great advantages of the kind of control and audit exercised by the Controller and Auditor General had been ascertained, he agreed that within certain limits and upon certain conditions the same test should be applied as far as possible to the Military Departments. That had been the opinion not only of the Treasury, but of the Committee of Public Accounts which had given much time and attention to this subject. He believed that it would be found when the next Report upon this matter was laid before the House that considerable progress had been made. He would rather not then go into details, but he would say generally that they appreciated the importance of having a control and audit that would have the advantage not only of being efficient, but they also thought that the audit that took place in the War Office and Admiralty was a very efficient and valuable audit, and ought on no account to be superseded or weakened, because it would be absurd and extravagant to do all the work over again. But they also saw that there was advantage in bringing the eye of some one who was independent of the Departments to bear upon the accounts; some one who was in the habit of examining the accounts of different Departments; and who could bring his experience in testing the accounts of one Department to bear upon another Department. It was not in checking computation and addition that they were to look to find out anything that was irregular, but they were to look to find out irregularities—which though perfectly honest might exist in opening new accounts and in appointing sums to one account that should be placed to another. It must not be supposed that in these irregularities there was anything in the nature of a fraud upon the public. In talking of irregularities it was not meant that there was anything like embezzlement, but rather that money had been paid in a way that Parliament did not intend, or that there had been given a wrong impression of the accounts of one service or another. Such things a departmental auditor would not perhaps see, because he would have been always accustomed to them, whilst they would be detected by a person who was accustomed to audit the accounts of different Departments. He thought that it was of the greatest importance that they should, considering our enormous expenditure, bring as many cross lights to bear upon it as they conveniently could; and that the bringing in the assistance of the Controller and Auditor General was very desirable. It was a subject to which they were directing their attention. They all desired to have a searching audit, and the only question was as to the mode in which the work should be done. The Government hoped in the course of the present Session to arrive at a conclusion that would go to a certain extent in the direction to which the hon. Member (Mr. Holms) had adverted.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, having paid much attention to the subject of the Estimates, was desirous to say a few words in relation to them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there should be a concurrent audit. If the accounts were audited at Somerset House, that would be an independent audit; but in the War Office, where the accounts were audited, that was not an independent audit. This was also the case at the Admiralty. The question had been brought before the House year after year, and he himself had brought it before the House three years running; but great tetchiness existed on the part of the Departments in question. If there was a sum which was not used, say, for bridge building or otherwise, that sum should be surrendered to the Treasury. It was a great blot on our system of audit that in the War Office and at the Admiralty the excess of one Vote might be applied to the deficiency of another, and all attempts to alter this had failed, because Ministers liked to handle the surpluses they created and devote them to the deficiencies they produced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, like a man skating over bad ice, passed lightly over the difference between auditing for the Treasury and auditing for the House of Commons. There were two kinds of audit. One was the audit presented to the Treasury, the other to the House of Commons. The audit for the Treasury merely consisted in the examination of the vouchers for money spent, and if that was correct there the matter ended. The audit for the House of Commons meant proof that the money had been expended for the purposes for which the House had voted the money, which was a very different thing. In the first case, the House had no guarantee that the money had been spent as it was intended to be spent. In the second, there was a direct check upon misappropriation—he did not mean dishonest misappropriation, but merely application to different purposes from those for which the money was granted. The wisdom of the House of Commons had devised these two checks on expenditure—that of the Treasury before it and that of the appropriation audit afterwards; but the two things were now mixed up. [“No, no!”] They used to be. When was a change made? [“Four years ago.”] The Auditor General had to report to the Treasury, and in one instance an objection he took was resisted by the Treasury and did not appear in the published Report. The Auditor General could not be an independent officer when he was appointed by the Treasury. If we desired to have correct accounts we must make the office independent of the Treasury, and the Auditor General, instead of being a petty clerk at £2,500 a-year, ought to have a position equal to that of a Secretary of State. Until this was done the House of Commons would never attain to the economy it desired.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had for so many years taken an interest in this question that he intended to have made some remarks in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms). The remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which he had listened with great satisfaction, showed that he was fully aware of the importance of an independent audit, and that he sympathized with the object for which the Motion had been brought forward. He hoped that in a short time they would have the accounts of all the Departments placed before the House in a proper manner. Accepting the assurance he had given, he thought it unnecessary to prolong the discussion.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) was mistaken in supposing that the Controller and Auditor General reported to the Treasury. He did not send his Reports to the Treasury; he was in no sense an officer of the Treasury; he reported directly to the House of Commons; and although it was true the Treasury had the power of appointing officers in the department, the Controller had full power under the 9th clause of the Act, constituting the department, to make orders and rules for its internal regulation, and to promote, suspend, or remove any officers, clerks, or others employed therein. The Treasury had no power whatever over any clerk or officer after he was once appointed. The internal regulation of the department in every respect depended upon the Controller, who had as high a salary and an official rank as any permanent official of his class in the public service. He was fully conscious of the great responsibility of his office: he communicated with the Treasury only when it was necessary to obtain information, and he fully maintained the dignity and independence of his position.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY, who had intended to call attention to the subject, said, he would content himself with simply asking the First Lord of the Admiralty. What steps he proposes to adopt to enable Officers of the Navy to obtain adequate knowledge of pilotage and practical navigation: and if he will state what course he intends to take with the view of improving the position of the present Navigating Officers?

OFFICERS OF MARINES—RETIREMENT.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that before the preceding Question was answered, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the case that there are at the present moment several Officers of Marines who are entitled to retire on a pension; and, whether the Treasury has been required to make provision for pensioning these Officers during the current year; and, if so, whether he has taken into consideration the advisability of creating an immediate flow of promotion by applying the sum so provided by the Treasury in extending the privilege of retirement to other Officers, or in granting increased pensions to a limited number of Officers who may be willing to retire immediately?

NAVY—ENGINEER OFFICERS AND ENGINE-ROOM ARTIFICERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GORST said, he had a Question on the Paper which, perhaps, it would be well that he should put, in order to enable the right hon. Gentleman to reply to it as well as those which had just been put to him. He wished to call attention to the present unsatisfactory position of the Engineer Officers and the Engine-Room Artificers of the Royal Navy, and to the urgent necessity for taking some immediate steps to improve the same. There had been an increase of duties thrown upon the chief engineers, and a decrease of rank and pay. When they compared the position of these officers in the British Navy with officers of the same rank in the American Navy, it would be found that in every class the American officers were paid double, and in some cases treble, the amount paid to engineer officers and engine-room artificers in the British Navy. By the substitution of engineer officers in large vessels, which ought to have been under the command of chief engineers, there was a stagnation in the promotion of chief engineers, and altogether it would seem they had made a serious mistake in selecting the British instead of the American Navy for the exercise of their profession. He was not disposed at that late hour to enter into a lengthened statement, but he reminded the House that last year the First Lord of the Admiralty promised to appoint a Committee to investigate the grievances of these officers. He had done so; and he (Mr. Gorst) wished to know whether it was true that that Report had been made, and that the Committee recommended a large increase in the pay of engineers and an increase in the pay of engine-room artificers? It was of the utmost importance that the control of the machinery of the Royal steamships would come into most efficient hands.

MR. HUNT said, that without any pressure on the part of his hon. Friend, or any other Member of the House, he appointed a Committee to inquire into the subject. He had therefore given an earnest that the subject was being properly considered by the Admiralty, in order to see what improvement could be devised. It was quite true that the Committee reported some two months ago. The Committee recommended some sweeping changes as to the engineers, and very important changes as to the service and the financial aspect of the question. Under these circumstances the recommendations of the Committee could not be accepted without careful consideration. When he was asked to present the Report and the evidence to the House, he stated that he was not willing to do so until the Admiralty had determined whether the recommendations of the Committee should be accepted. When that Question was put to him he had not had time even to read the evidence; but in the Whitsun Recess he had a certain amount of leisure, and he read a great part of the evidence. He was, therefore, better informed now on the subject than when that Question was put. The matter was engaging the attention of the Admiralty, but he could not undertake to say that their decision upon it would be come to while Parliament was sitting. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had asked him a Question as to officers of the Marines—namely, whether the sum taken did not provide for all the officers who were entitled to retire if they chose, though some of them had not elected to do so. The sum taken provided for the number who were expected to retire, and not for all who might retire if they wished; because it was known by experience that many who had the option of retiring did not choose to avail themselves of it. He was desirous of remedying, if possible, the present stagnation of promotion; but he felt great difficulty in doing anything in the matter until the Report of the Army Commission was presented, which he was led to hope it

MR. SPEAKER here intervened, reminding the hon. Gentleman that it was out of Order to discuss the principle of a Bill not before the House.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I bow to your decision, Sir; but perhaps I may name the Scotch Bills now pending respecting which we have had no proper discussion. The Poor Law Amendment Bill has been smuggled through two stages without discussion. The Roads Bill, which we are more anxious to see passed, has been waiting for the appointment of a day, and there is not the least chance of its being brought forward. I saw from the Minutes that the Roads Bill was read a second time last night, but that I am now told was a mistake. It either has been read a second time without discussion, or it is not likely to be read a second time at all, because there is no day on which it is likely to go on. The Sheriff Courts Bill is another important Bill, and so is the Agricultural Holdings Bill; and the Ecclesiastical Assessments Bill raises some difficult questions in regard to the incidence of local taxation. Then we have the everlasting Game Bills, Liquor Bills, and other smaller measures. What prospect is there of these being discussed? I say the Government have made no arrangement to lead us to hope that they will give us time to discuss them. We must take them in silence or not at all. I say we are greatly ill-used in this matter. Last Tuesday we were given to believe that one of the Scotch Bills would be brought forward. I thought it likely that the Government would have taken a Morning Sitting to-day, and devoted it to a Scotch Bill; but they have not even fixed next Tuesday for that purpose. I hope that now we have been so often told that the Government hope to dispose of Scotch Business, they will be able to tell us something definite, and to say whether they really are going to do anything or nothing; because if they are going to do nothing, it is time these deputations should be enabled to go home to attend to their own affairs, instead of dancing in attendance here in a hope which is not likely to be fulfilled. I trust we shall have definite information given to us.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is only with the permission of the House that I am entitled to speak at the present moment. I have spoken before; but if the House will allow me, I have two or three words to say as to what the Government will do. I think the hon. Gentleman could not have been in his place last night, for it was then stated that we had fixed certain days for these Bills, with the intention then of naming some day when it would be practicable to bring them forward. It was our intention that the Bills the Government could bring forward should then have a day specially appointed for them, so that they should not be brought forward on a day when there was no opportunity of discussing them. As to the deputations, I am extremely glad to see them; and, more than that, the fact of their having been here has, I believe, greatly contributed to the solution of the Roads question. Having said that, I can only say further that I think it is likely that the Roads Bill and the Poor Law Amendment Bill will be arranged for this Session.

MR. RAMSAY said, he was quite sure that no one could have been less satisfied with the manner in which Scotch Business had been conducted, not only that Session, but during the present Parliament, than the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate himself. The Bills that passed last Session were passed by the Clerk reading their titles at the Table. There was no opportunity for discussion, and they were told they must either take the Bills as a whole or reject them altogether. That was not the mode in which the Business of any section of this country should be treated. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer received Scotch Members with great courtesy and attention, but more was wanted than these courtesies—the people of Scotland wanted that their circumstances and feelings should be considered. That had not been done. The only important measure that received any discussion was one the passing of which was not now regarded with pride, but rather with regret—that was the Bill for creating a new franchise for the election of ministers in the Church of Scotland. He felt, therefore, that they were justified in taking an opportunity of the present kind to say that they must receive not only the courtesy they had already received from the right hon. Gentlemen, but that the Business of Scotland should be treated with the respect paid to the legislation of every other portion of the Empire. He did not think it would be a satisfactory mode to substitute the Tea Room for the House; but he thought it was worthy of the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman that some means should be devised by which, without impeding general legislation affecting the Empire, the Business of Scotland should receive greater consideration than had yet been given to it.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to say two or three words on this subject. In the earlier days of his Parliamentary experience, the Lord Advocate was good enough to assemble Scotch Members in a convenient place, and from them received not only information as to Bills brought before the House, but as to the support he would receive in conducting that Business to a satisfactory and rapid conclusion, and he ventured to say that it would be of great advantage to Parliament if that process were re-introduced. If the Lord Advocate would consult the Scotch Members upon Scotch Bills, and would accept not the votes of the majority, but would form his own opinion, and then introduce his measures into Parliament so shaped that he would have a reasonable prospect of carrying them through, as had been the former practice on Scotch measures, he would do good service.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £109,194, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the several Scientific Departments of the Navy, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877."

MR. RYLANDS objected to their proceeding at so late an hour with so important a matter. There had been a promise given that the details of the Estimates would not be taken after half-past 11.

MR. HUNT said, that was what he certainly had promised, but they had been taken by surprise by a "Scotch invasion," which, however, had only lasted until three minutes beyond the hour he had fixed upon. If it was thought he should not go on, the time arranged only being exceeded by three minutes, of course he must agree to report Progress; but if the Committee was willing to go on he should be glad.

MR. RYLANDS thought half-past 11 was too late. The Navy Estimates should be brought on at an earlier hour. Several of the Representatives of the Dockyards—Members who wished to take part in the discussion—were not present, and he should therefore move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, some of them who represented Dockyard towns had sat there for hours waiting for these Votes to come on, and it was hard that, after what was called a "Scotch invasion," and the discussion of questions of no very great interest, those Members interested in the Navy Votes should be prevented discussing them.

MR. GOSCHEN said, they had not interposed in the discussion, wishing to save time, but he thought it must be admitted half-past 11 was a late hour to go into Committee. He therefore thought there was reason in the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley; but, at the same time, he sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HUNT felt obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his friendly remarks; but he must feel that at that late period of the Session it was difficult to arrange the Business. He thought after the previous discussions on the Navy Estimates the Committee might be willing to continue them, but he could not object to the Motion. He would try to arrange that the Navy Estimates should come on upon a future day at an earlier hour. But his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War wished, before Progress was reported, to propose a Vote for the Army.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I hope the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Ramsay), who is anxious to promote Scotch Business, will see that he has taken up another day which they might have had for Scotch Business.

MR. RAMSAY: I may fairly say I did not know that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was about to mention this matter, and I was no party to any delay. I wish to say, however, that no Scotch business should have been treated in the way the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) has spoken in this House of our business. I do not see that Scottish business should be spoken of as a "Scotch invasion," or that such remarks should be made on Scotch affairs. I feel it necessary to make a protest against being treated in that fashion. It will not tend to allay the discontent already existing if we are told we must stand over until the dock-yard constituencies' affairs are discussed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had no desire whatever to interfere with naval Business. He did not wish to do so, though he felt there was a risk of that result, and took counsel on the subject, and was led to believe that there was an objection to taking the Naval Votes at so late an hour. He understood the English Poor Law Bill could be taken any time before 12 o'clock, and hoped it would be taken.

MR. GOSCHEN said, it would be a mistake to suppose that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy had taken counsel with him or any of his Friends sitting on the front bench.

MR. ANDERSON thought the Home Secretary had gone out of his way to taunt the hon. Member for Falkirk as having taken up one of the nights which might have been available otherwise for Scotch Business, merely because he made some remarks about Scotch Business. No time had been lost in making those remarks, except the time the remarks took in being delivered. They were not going away. There were more than 24 Orders on the Paper, and he had no doubt the House would sit till 2 o'clock, using the whole of the time in other work.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY feared that in consequence of the time which had been lost by English and Scotch Members it would be impossible that night to go on with the Poor Law Rating (Ireland) Bill.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would withdraw his motion, in order that, as had been suggested, the Secretary for War might take a Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY PURCHASE ESTIMATE.

£364,200, to complete the sum for Army Purchase Commission.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that a more irregular Vote had never been presented. It was of that bad kind of Votes which carefully concealed the information by which you could verify the actual expenditure with the estimated outlay; and consequently no one knew whether the mode in which the money was spent was right or not. He hoped the Secretary of State for War would give a distinct account of the manner in which the money had been spent in the past, and state clearly the names, ranks, and corps and regiments of the various officers who received the money voted by Parliament as well as the sums paid to each.

MR. DILLWYN also asked how the money was to be expended. There was no information in the Estimates.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY remarked, that the Estimate was laid on the Table of the House three months ago. The money had been voted, and there would be no difficulty whatever in stating to the House what commissions had been purchased.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, no information had been given respecting the particular commissions which had been bought. It was only right to those who advocated the abolition of purchase to have the information given in a clear way, so that they might be able to judge whether the recommendations they offered, and which the House followed in abolishing Purchase, were right. Already millions had been spent, and many more millions had yet to be spent, but no other accounts had been given except lump sums. But as the Treasury was charged with the duty of issuing instructions as to the accounts to be rendered, he hoped that the controlling Department would not fail to require the Commissioners of Purchase to submit to the Comptroller and Auditor General a detailed account of every item, and that that account, when audited with the vouchers, would be laid before Parliament, to enable Members and the country to form right views about the outlay of £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 for buying back the Army from the officers.

MR. STANLEY said, a Return giving the information required by the hon. Gentleman would be laid on the Table by his right hon. Friend.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

ARMY CORPS TRAINING BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 182.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved the addition of a new clause providing for the appointment of special Commissioners by the Lords Lieutenant of the counties of Surrey, Sussex, Hants, Wilts, Gloucester, and Somerset, one for each county.

Clause (Appointment of special Commissioners by Lords Lieutenant,)—(Mr. Secretary Hardy,)—brought up, and read a first time.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT suggested that it would be as easy to appoint two Commissioners as one for each county, and that two would increase the confidence of the public in the decisions.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN concurred in the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Baronet.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY undertook to consider the point before the Bill reached the other House.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

General Sir George Balfour

POOR LAW RATING (IRELAND) BILL.

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 156.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, stated its provisions shortly, and intimated that the House would have full opportunity to consider it in Committee; and with regard to the clause providing for a re-valuation of Unions in certain circumstances, to which he understood there was an objection, he might state that he did not consider it essential to the Bill. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he was not disposed at the late period of the Session to throw any obstacles in the way of the passing of the Bill. He hoped that in Committee any objectionable clause might be amended, so that the Bill might pass this year.

MR. MORRIS also took exception to portions of the measure, but would not offer any obstacle to the second reading.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN agreed to the second reading, with reservations as to certain clauses in Committee.

MR. STACPOOLE regretted that the right hon. Baronet had not extended the principle of Union rating to Ireland in the same way as it was applied in England.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

House adjourned at One o'clock, till Monday next.

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary (Mr. John Croker)

Moved, "That the punishment inflicted on Mr.
John Croker, late Sub-Inspector in the Royal Irish Constabulary, by reduction in rank in 1867 and subsequent dismissal from that force, for offences of which he declared himself to be innocent, without first affording him an opportunity of proving his innocence before an independent tribunal, was not just;
and, in the opinion of the House, such opportunity ought now to be given" (Mr. Bruen)
